The rollout of Hard Choices hasn’t been helped by the summer’s depressing news feeds from around the world. Vladimir Putin’s reckless, thumb-in-your eye forays in eastern Ukraine began early enough for Clinton to work in a mention of his seizure of Crimea. This suggests that she may have recast other parts of her chapter on Russia, which now is appropriately downbeat. There had been high hopes of a new relationship with Russia, nicknamed “the reset” when Obama reached the White House in 2009. Clinton, who early on staged the jokey presentation of a gift-wrapped “reset button” to her Russian counterpart, now tells us she had only “modest expectations” herself. Leaving office, she advised Obama in what was presumably a highly classified memo that Putin was on a “negative trajectory” and it was now time to hit the “pause button,” to take a tougher line. This was another of those occasions when “not everyone at the White House agreed.” Obama accepted an invitation to a Moscow summit she’d advised him to skip. Months later he “began taking a harder line with Putin” and finally did back out of the Moscow visit. Now it’s important for her to have us (and those pesky opposition researchers) know that she was never taken in, even if that means leaving an impression that the president was a little soft.

Her care in distinguishing her inclinations from Obama’s is even more conspicuous in her pages on the Israelis and Palestinians. As might perhaps be expected of a former senator from New York, she can’t find it in herself to scold Israel over its occupation of the West Bank; in fact, she never uses the word “occupation.” She recognizes the expanding settlements as a political problem, and she pressed hard while in office for a limited construction “freeze,” but says nothing to suggest that the problems posed by existing settlements or the actual conditions on the West Bank—the suffocating overlay of security checks, road blocks, army patrols—offend her sense of fairness or human rights. Of course, like all secretaries of state of the last half-century, she doesn’t mention that Israel never signed the nuclear nonproliferation pact, the treaty we’re rightly pressing Iran to observe. First she says that she feels “personally invested in Israel’s security and success,” then that she’s “someone who cares deeply about Israel’s security and future.”

We get the point. Still, it’s instructive to see how carefully she distances herself from Obama in recounting his difficulties with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. The two men repeatedly go to the edge of confrontation while she and the Israeli leader are able to work together as “partners and friends.”

“I learned that Bibi would fight if he felt he was being cornered, but if you connected with him as a friend, there was a chance that you could get something done together.” Someone who was “friending” long before the invention of Facebook, she believes in “building relationships and understanding how and when to use them.” What she gets out of this one is an agreement to extend the freeze on settlement construction for ninety days, except in East Jerusalem, at the cost of an additional $3 billion in military aid. Earlier, when Joe Biden was greeted on a visit to Israel with an announcement of new Jewish construction in the Arab quarter of Jerusalem, a “furious” Obama instructed her to tell Netanyahu that he viewed the provocation “as a personal insult to him, the Vice President, and the United States.” Clinton puts the words in quotes so we understand that they’re the president’s. She delivers the blast but almost seems to excuse herself. “I didn’t like playing bad cop,” she writes, “but it was part of the job.”

Late in 2012, with her time in office running down, she persuades the president to let her fly to the Middle East to see if she can head off a threatened Israeli ground invasion of Gaza. An air campaign is already underway in retaliation for rockets fired into Israel by Hamas. Civilian casualties are rising. “There was no substitute for American leadership,” she argued. She even succeeds in lining up Mohamed Morsi, the Muslim Brotherhood president of Egypt who’ll soon be on his way to jail. A cease-fire is struck, thanks to her “diplomatic intervention.” Now in the summer of 2014, less than two years later, her account of this achievement makes sour reading (no fault of Clinton’s, obviously). Hamas and Israel have been at it again. Another “intervention” is required. Clinton’s successor flies in and out of Cairo, doing what he can through the good offices of Hosni Mubarak’s real successor, Egypt’s latest military ruler.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Florida's Marco Rubio, twenty-four years her junior, a first-term senator hoping to replicate Obama's 2008 run, recently put Hillary Clinton down as a "twentieth century candidate." She could see this line of attack on her longevity in politics and her age—sixty-nine on Election Day 2016—coming. Having been there in 1992 as well as 2008, she doesn't need to be told that a new face often trumps a long résumé. So she stakes out positions on the near side of the generational line. The last pages of her memoir are crammed with up-to-the-minute references not only to her struggles on behalf of women but also (for eight of those pages) efforts as secretary to inscribe the fraught subject of LGBT rights on the international agenda.

She mentions, too, a push to spread democratic values by offering technological support and smart phones to networking young dissidents around the globe. Of course, if they then rise up against rulers who have been important strategic partners, she could face even more hard choices.

Washington Post blog: WorldViews: "Clinton in Mexico, worried about Russia"

By Joshua Partlow

September 5, 2014, 2:54 p.m. EDT

MEXICO CITY — Former secretary of state Hillary Clinton, in a mostly upbeat speech about the state of the world, said Friday that she was "particularly concerned" about Europe faltering in the face of Russian intimidation.

"I do worry about President Putin's view that Russia should dominate its border and intimidate people beyond its borders," Clinton said in a speech in Mexico City.

It was important, she said, that Europe remain whole and stable in the face of this and that Russia should be "persuaded or somehow convinced or coerced into looking towards the future" and not the past.

Clinton was visiting Mexico — on the same day that her potential future presidential opponent New Jersey Gov. Chris Chirstie was wrapping up his three-day visit to the city — to speak at an event hosted by Mexican telecom baron Carlos Slim. Her audience was students who received scholarships from Slim's foundation, and her remarks mostly extolled the virtues of equal rights and hard work.

Clinton didn't spend much time on the relationship between Mexico and the United States except to say that it was "critical" and that "we have to cooperate where we can." Christie's visit, with mostly a business-focused itinerary, has been styled as a humble rookie-diplomat listening tour, while Clinton projected the image of a seasoned stateswoman imparting her wisdom about the world.

She said that Latin America, with its female presidents and prime ministers in places such as Chile, Argentina, Brazil and Jamaica, were a "great example" for the rest of the world.

"Countries that don't have the full participation of girls and women, their economies are not as strong, they are not as stable and democratic," Clinton said. "We've gotten so much further than most of the rest of the world in knocking down barriers."

Clinton said that "obviously" she was thinking about running for president in 2016 but she had not yet made a decision. Attending the event with her were billionaire Mark Zuckerberg, actor Antonio Banderas and former Brazilian soccer star Ronaldinho.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Clinton Sees ISIS, Ukraine as Central U.S. Worries"

By Anthony Harrup

September 5, 2014, 2:35 p.m. EDT

Former U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said the "aggressive, hostile" Islamic State and tensions between Russia and Ukraine are her main points of concern overseas, in a speech to graduate students in Mexico City.

Mrs. Clinton also said she will said she will announce a decision on whether she is running for president "probably after the first of the year."

"Obviously I'm thinking about it, but I haven't made a decision yet," she said.

This is in line with her previous remarks on the subject. In an extended interview with ABC's Diane Sawyer in June, Mrs. Clinton said she would be "well on the way to making a decision" by the end of this year. But in that interview, she added she would not announce a decision until some time in 2015.

In her remarks Friday, Mrs. Clinton said the Middle East and Eastern Europe are her main foreign-policy concerns.

"In the Middle East, the rise of a very aggressive, hostile form of jihadism through the Islamic State which is trying to carve out a so-called caliphate in Syria, and in Iraq, which is a very direct threat to all the countries in the region but even beyond," she said.

Mrs. Clinton also had harsh words for President Vladimir Putin and his attitude toward the eastern Ukraine.

"I did worry about President Putin's view that Russia should dominate its borders and intimidate people beyond its borders, using gas and oil as a weapon even where we're seeing now in Ukraine military force. It's very important that Europe remain whole, stable and that Russia be persuaded and somehow convinced, even coerced, into looking toward the future not the past."

Mrs. Clinton, meanwhile, had nothing but praise for Mexico, which also this week is hosting a possible rival for the White House, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie.

"I really do believe … that Mexico's future is extraordinarily positive," she said, adding that the relationship between Mexico and the U.S. is critical for both countries, the region and the world. "I think economically and socially there are so many advances that need to keep going."

The event was organized by billionaire Carlos Slim's Telmex Foundation.

MSNBC: "Want to know what Hillary Clinton thinks? Read her book"

By Alex Seitz-Wald

September 5, 2014, 6:45 p.m. EDT

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When Hillary Clinton stepped onto the stage at an clean energy conference in Las Vegas Thursday night, many observers eagerly hoping for some fresh comments on natural gas extraction or the Keystone XL pipeline were instead treated to a veritable book reading.

On fracking, the controversial technique used to extract natural gas and oil, Clinton praised its economic benefits before warning of its dangers. “We have to face head-on the legitimate, pressing environmental concerns about some new extraction practices and their impacts on local water, soil, and air supplies,” she said. She cited methane leaks as “particularly troubling.”

That’s an almost word-for-word reproduction of what she wrote in her new book, “Hard Choices.” There, she warned there are “legitimate … concerns about the new extraction practices and their impact on local water, soil, and air supplies.” She cited methane leaks as “particularly worrisome.”

On Thursday night, she added: “It’s crucial that we put in place smart regulations and enforce them, including deciding not to drill when the risks are too high.”

In her book, she wrote: “It’s crucial that we put in place smart regulations and enforce them, including deciding not to drill when the risks are too high.”

On Keystone, she said in Las Vegas exactly what she wrote in her book: Absolutely nothing.

Those seeking something new from Clinton were almost certainly disappointed. Instead, she stuck to her practice — in play since stepping down as secretary of state — of largely staying above the domestic political fray and offering few details on her policy views.

Of course, attendees of the Last Vegas event could have just read her book. Many critics were disappointed by the 650-page tome, dismissing it as a “low-salt, low-fat, low-calorie offering with vanilla pudding as the dessert,” as Slate’s John Dickerson wrote.

Rather than trying to be a page-turner, the book serves as an official record of Clinton’s tenure as secretary of state, with the final few chapters giving Clinton’s sanctioned take on some key policy areas. It’s a carefully crafted work that undoubtedly helped Clinton and her team clarify their thinking, and will provide a blueprint for Clinton’s future speeches.

Think of it as 600 pages of ready-made talking points, anecdotes, and policy positions.

This is common for likely presidential candidates. Jeff Shesol, a speechwriter in the Clinton White House who went on to found West Wing Writers, told msnbc that candidates’ books often become the ultimate “text of the presidency.”

While some politicians’ books are thrown together for quick sale, a book like “Hard Choices” is the product of “intensive efforts to really get it right,” he said. “The dividends of that effort will payout over an extended period of time, both for her and for anyone writing for her,” he added.

Jon Lovett, a former speechwriter for both Clinton and Barack Obama, said Clinton’s earlier book was an enormous resource when he was writing speeches for the then-senator, both for its substance and to help capture her voice. “When I was first learning how to be a speechwriter, when in doubt I would crib from ‘Living History,’ and it always ended up sounding like Hillary Clinton,” he told msnbc.

“You’re constantly trying to find good stories to tell, constantly trying to find good anecdotes,” he explained. “‘Living History’ was a repository on about almost every possible topic you could ever want.”

When Lovett moved to the White House, he said the process for any major speech started with reviewing both what Obama had said previously on the subject, as well as any relevant passages from his books. “It’s a natural place to start,” he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As Clinton puts herself on more public stages and delves into new policy areas, a similar cycle of high expectations met with a rehash of existing talking points will probably repeat itself.

So if you want to know what Clinton thinks about something … start by reading her book.

National Journal: "How Hillary Clinton Once Disappointed Elizabeth Warren on Wall Street Reform"

By Emma Roller

September 5, 2014

[Subtitle:] As a senator, Clinton doubled back on the advice Warren once gave her.

On Friday, the Bill Moyers show released a vintage clip of Sen. Elizabeth Warren appearing on the show in 2004. In the video, Warren talks about a prescient meeting with then-first lady Hillary Clinton.

Warren tells the story like this: In the late 1990s, Congress was set to pass a bill that would make it harder for customers to alleviate their debt by claiming bankruptcy. Banks and credit card companies were pushing the bill hard.

Warren wrote an op-ed opposing the legislation, arguing the bill would disproportionately hurt single mothers. The first lady apparently read the piece, because Warren got a call from the White House asking if she'd meet with Clinton to discuss bankruptcy.

After Clinton gave a speech in Boston, Warren met with her. Over hamburgers and french fries, Clinton said to Warren, "Tell me about bankruptcy."

"I gotta tell you, I never had a smarter student," Warren told Moyers, saying Clinton understood the principles of bankruptcy "quick right to the heart of it."

After their conversation, Clinton got up and said, "Professor Warren, we've got to stop that awful bill." And stop the bill they did. The bankruptcy bill was the last one to cross President Bill Clinton's desk, and he vetoed it. On the campaign trail in 2007, Hillary Clinton used the bill as evidence that she "fought the banks."

But when Clinton joined the Senate in 2001 and the bankruptcy bill came up again, Clinton the senator did what Clinton the first lady opposed—she voted for it.

"As Senator Clinton, the pressures are very different," Warren told Moyers. "She has taken money from the groups, and more to the point, she worries about them as a constituency."

As Warren sees it, the "student" she saw in that meeting over burgers and fries ultimately fell victim to a corrupt system. In Clinton-as-ideologue, Warren saw an ability to resist the lure of Wall Street. But Clinton the lawmaker could not resist its influence. "This is the scary part about democracy today," Warren said.

Warren's comments from 10 years ago align with her position on Wall Street today. In an interview with Katie Couric on Wednesday, Warren took former House Majority Leader Eric Cantor to task for taking a well-paying gig at an investment bank. When Couric asked Warren what she thought about Clinton's "cozy" relationship with Wall Street, Warren demurred—but did not go so far as to defend Clinton's track record.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While some pundits may proffer a superficial "catfight" narrative between Warren and Clinton, there is a more substantive ideological gulf between them. And even though Clinton's reversal came all those years ago, it's a lingering contrast neither of them can avoid.

Mother Jones: "Hillary Clinton Praises a Guy With Lots of Blood on His Hands"

By David Corn

September 5, 2014, 1:44 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] In lauding Henry Kissinger, the possible Democratic presidential nominee goes far beyond her usual hawkish rhetoric.

Hillary Clinton often plays the hawk card: She voted for the Iraq war, dissed President Barack Obama for not being tough enough on Syria, and compared Vladimir Putin to Adolf Hitler. This is to be expected from a politician who has angled for a certain title: the first female president of the United States. Whether her muscular views are sincerely held or not, a conventional political calculation would lead her to assume it may be difficult for many voters to elect as commander-in-chief a woman who did not project an aggressive and assertive stance on foreign policy. So her tough talk might be charitably evaluated in such a (somewhat) forgiving context. Yet what remains more puzzling and alarming is the big wet kiss she planted (rhetorically) on former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger this week, with a fawning review of his latest book, World Order.

Sure, perhaps there is secretary's privilege—an old boy and girls club, in which the ex-foreign-policy chiefs do not speak ill of each other and try to help out the person presently in the post. Nothing wrong with that. But former-Madam Secretary Clinton had no obligation to praise Kissinger and publicly participate in his decades-long mission to rehabilitate his image. In the review, she calls Kissinger a "friend" and reports, "I relied on his counsel when I served as secretary of state. He checked in with me regularly, sharing astute observations about foreign leaders and sending me written reports on his travels." She does add that she and Henry "have often seen the world and some of our challenges quite differently, and advocated different responses now and in the past." But here's the kicker: At the end of the review, she notes that Kissinger is "surprisingly idealistic":

Even when there are tensions between our values and other objectives, America, he reminds us, succeeds by standing up for our values, not shirking them, and leads by engaging peoples and societies, the sources of legitimacy, not governments alone.

Kissinger reminds us that America succeeds by standing up for its values? Did she inhale?

Kissinger, who served as secretary of state for President Richard Nixon and then President Gerald Ford, is a symbol of the worst of US foreign policy. Though he guided the United States through détente with the Soviet Union and initiated the historic opening to China, he engaged in underhanded and covert diplomacy that led to massacres around the globe, as he pursued his version of foreign policy realism. This is no secret.

Chile: Nixon and Kissinger plotted to thwart the democratic election of a socialist president. The eventual outcome: a military coup and a military dictatorship that killed thousands of Chileans.

Argentina: Kissinger gave a "green light" to the military junta's dirty war against political opponents that led to the deaths of an estimated 30,000.

East Timor: Another "green light" from Kissinger, this one for the Indonesian military dictatorship's bloody invasion of East Timor that yielded up to 200,000 deaths.

Cambodia: The secret bombing there during the Nixon phase of the Vietnam War killed between 150,000 and 500,000 civilians.

Bangladesh: Kissinger and Nixon turned a blind eye to—arguably, they tacitly approved—Pakistan's genocidal slaughter of 300,000 Bengalis, most of them Hindus.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And there's more. Kissinger's mendacity has been chronicled for years. See Gary Bass' recent and damning book on the Bangladesh tragedy, The Blood Telegram. There's Seymour Hersh's classic, The Price of Power. In The Trial of Henry Kissinger, Christopher Hitchens presented the case against Kissinger in his full polemical style. As secretary of state, Kissinger made common cause with—and encouraged—tyrants who repressed and massacred many. He did not serve the American values of democracy, free expression, and human rights. He shredded them.

Once upon a time, Hillary Clinton protested the Vietnam War. She attended the 1968 GOP convention in Miami to join the effort to draft Nelson Rockefeller in order to prevent Nixon from winning the party's presidential nomination. She served on the staff of the House judiciary committee, which voted to impeach Nixon; one of the articles of impeachment drafted by the staff (but which was not approved) slammed Nixon for covering up the bombing in Cambodia. She knows what Kissinger has done. She knows what Kissinger represents. There's none of that in her self-serving review. Instead, she hails him as a champion of a values-driven foreign policy. Maybe when he's typing in front of a computer these days—but not when he wielded power. Clinton lets him off the hook and participates in the long-running pretense that Kissinger is a grand old statesman who deserves respect rather than scorn.

Democrats uneasy with Clinton as their party's standard-bearer have often wondered if there is a limit to what she might say or do to win the White House. Embracing Kissinger in this manner shows how low she can go. It likely will cause cringing among not-there-yet Democrats who can only fear that, with plenty of time before the campaign truly starts, Hillary Clinton is not yet done disappointing them.

Associated Press: "Clinton Rallies Support For Crist in Governor Race"

By Michael J. Mishak

September 6, 2014, 3:42 a.m. EDT

MIAMI (AP) — Bill Clinton is lending his political star power to Democrat Charlie Crist, a former Republican governor who is locked in a tight race for his old job in the nation's largest swing state.

The former president on Friday headlined a rally in Miami where he implored Democrats to defy historical trends and turn out and vote in November.

"We're great at doing what's right if there's a presidential election on the ballot but we're not nearly as good as our Republican opponents are at showing up in the midterm elections," Clinton said. "The whole shebang is going to depend on who shows up."

Speaking to several hundred supporters, Clinton painted Crist as a bipartisan conciliator who would rebuild the middle class by raising the minimum wage, ensuring equal pay for women and expanding Medicaid to hundreds of thousands of Floridians. He cast incumbent Republican Gov. Rick Scott as a multimillionaire who has favored corporate interests.

"If you're trying to raise a kid or two on the minimum wage, you need somebody with the facts to be on your side, and Charlie Crist will be on your side," Clinton said.

The Clinton rally was the first in a series of high-profile events featuring Democratic heavyweights designed to boost party enthusiasm for Crist, a former Republican governor who has run four statewide races on the GOP ticket as well as one as an independent.

Massachusetts Gov. Deval Patrick is set to appear with Crist in Florida on Monday, while Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, who is weighing a 2016 White House bid, will campaign with the Democratic nominee on Sept. 20.

While Crist easily secured his new party's nomination last month, his campaign must still reassure some of the key Democratic activists who have opposed him throughout his political career. He also must work to overcome an unprecedented barrage of negative advertising, which has hurt his popularity and helped erase his lead in public polls. Scott has spent more than $25 million, much of it portraying Crist as a "slick politician" and "lousy governor."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Speaking to a half-empty ballroom at the Friday evening rally, Clinton asked Democrats to spread the word that Crist's political conversion is for real. He focused his comments on hot-button topics that resonate with some of the party's most loyal voters, including women, Hispanics and African-Americans.

Standing next to Crist, the former president reminded supporters that when Crist was a Republican governor he extended early voting hours in the 2008 presidential election and enacted the automatic restoration of voting rights for former nonviolent felons -- an effort, he noted, that Scott has since undone. He also recalled voting restrictions that Scott and the GOP-controlled Legislature enacted before the 2012 election, measures that resulted in long lines on Election Day.

Later, Clinton, a native Southerner, invoked the Jim Crow South and its history of poll taxes designed to prevent black voters from casting ballots. "For me, when somebody messes with the right to vote, I take it personally," he said to roaring applause.

Clinton's appearance is a clear sign of the gubernatorial race's importance to national Democrats.

Retaking the governor's office in the nation's largest swing state would give the long-suffering state party a governing and political platform to try to reverse decades of conservative rule, build its candidate bench and help lay the groundwork for the Democratic presidential nominee in 2016.

During his trip to Miami, Clinton also visited with his former attorney general, Janet Reno, who has been ailing with Parkinson's disease. The former president and Donna Shalala, the president of the University of Miami and a former Clinton Health & Human Services secretary, spent an hour with Reno and her family at the family's house in the Kendall section of Miami.

"We had a wonderful visit with him and it was very kind of him to come," said Reno's sister, Maggy Hurchalla. "He told us stories — he was Bill Clinton at his best."

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· September 9 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton fundraises for the DSCC at her Washington home (DSCC)

· September 12 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton headlines a DGA fundraiser (Twitter)

· September 14 – Indianola, IA: Sec. Clinton headlines Sen. Harkin's Steak Fry (LA Times)

· September 15 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton speaks at the Transcatheter Cardiovascular Therapeutics Conference (CRF)

· September 15 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton speaks at Legal Services Corp. 40th Anniversary (Twitter)

· September 16 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton headlines a 9/11 Health Watch fundraiser (NY Daily News)

· September 19 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton fundraises for the DNC with Pres. Obama (CNN)

· October 2 – Miami Beach, FL: Sec. Clinton keynotes the CREW Network Convention & Marketplace (CREW Network)

· October 6 – Ottawa, Canada: Sec. Clinton speaks at Canada 2020 event (Ottawa Citizen)

· October 13 – Las Vegas, NV: Sec. Clinton keynotes the UNLV Foundation Annual Dinner (UNLV)

· October 14 – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton keynotes salesforce.com Dreamforce conference (salesforce.com)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- October 28 – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton fundraises for House Democratic women candidates with Nancy Pelosi (Politico)
- December 4 – Boston, MA: Sec. Clinton speaks at the Massachusetts Conference for Women (MCFW)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: theSkimm <dailyskimm@morning7.theskimm.com>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 11/11/2015 10:38:47 PM
Subject: Daily Skimm: Just keep swimming

Is this email not displaying correctly? View it in your browser.

theSkimm
brought to you by

Skimm for November 12th

Skimm'd at Starbucks after sharing a Peppermint Mocha. Lucky you. Buy one holiday drink, get one free to share. Sharing is caring.

QUOTE OF THE DAY

'Singles Day" – The name of a holiday in China . Think Black Friday meets the anti-Valentine's Day. It was yesterday, and e-commerce giant Alibaba did a record $14.3 billion in sales. Proving all you need is love. Or a credit card.

SKIMM THIS

MIZZOU

THE STORY

Racial tensions at the University of Missouri are still high.

CATCH ME UP.

Over the last few months, there's been a series of racist incidents on campus . A lot of students and faculty felt like the administration really botched its response, and called for the school's president to resign. Weeks of protests – including a hunger strike from one grad student, and a boycott from dozens of members of the football team — resulted in the president packing his bags , and the school's chancellor getting demoted earlier this week.

SO WHAT HAPPENED NOW?

Yesterday, online threats and rumors of violence led the school to bulk up security on campus, and some teachers to cancel class altogether. Then, police arrested two students at different state universities for allegedly making separate online "terroristic" threats – one of them specifically against black Mizzou students.

theSKIMM

Mizzou student activists have been using the name "Concerned Student 1950," in reference to the year the first black students enrolled at the University of Missouri. Earlier this week, one of those students – now 89-years-old – said he was glad to see the protesters are bringing change to campus, but was sorry that they had to fight for it in the first place.

SKIMM THIS

REPEAT AFTER ME...

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOU WAKE UP READY TO TAKE ON THE DAY...

So did the Kurds. Earlier today, they launched a US-backed operation to take back Sinjar from ISIS. Sinjar: a town in northern Iraq that sits on a key ISIS supply route. It's also where last year thousands of Yazidis — a small religious minority in northern Iraq — were rescued from ISIS by the Kurds after being trapped on a mountain. Yesterday, some Yazidi forces joined the Kurds in the offensive. The US-led coalition has been crowded out lately by Russia and Iran joining the ISIS fight in a big way. Taking back Sinjar would be a huge W, since it's between Syria and Mosul – Iraq's second largest city, and basically ISIS HQ in the country.

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOUR NEWLY MARRIED FRIEND ASKS IF YOU'RE SEEING ANYONE SPECIAL...

Yes, thank you. Yesterday, AB InBev (think: Budweiser) and SABMiller (think: Miller Lite) defined the relationship. The two companies are becoming one huge beer company in a deal valued at more than $105 billion. They've been flirting for months, and now the new company will sell one in every three beers worldwide. When the talks were first announced, some people said 'ever heard of antitrust laws?' To which the companies said 'ugh, fine.' SABMiller agreed to get rid of its $12 billion stake in MillerCoors, another big name in beer. Which gives it much better odds at getting the OK from regulators. Cheers.

SKIMM THIS

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOU HEAR YOUR THIRD COUSINS ARE STAYING AT YOUR HOUSE FOR THANKSGIVING...

Gotta love family. Yesterday, two nephews of the First Lady of Venezuela were arrested in Haiti. That's because they were apparently trying to sneak 800 kilograms of cocaine into the US. Casual. The nephews had just arrived by private jet when they were reportedly turned over to the DEA and flown straight to New York. Probably not in the same style. This comes as US investigators have been giving top-level Venezuelan officials some serious side-eye for reportedly dabbling in money laundering and drug trafficking in the US. In recent years, Venezuela's socialist government has been facing on-and-off protests for being unable to revive the country's struggling economy. So no, this isn't a good look.

WHAT TO SAY WHEN THE MAGIC 8 BALL SAYS 'OUTLOOK NOT SO GOOD'...

Theranos knows how you feel. The Silicon Valley blood testing startup (valued at $9 billion) has been having a rough couple of months. The company – founded by 31-year-old Elizabeth Holmes – made a name for itself by developing a blood test technology that it says works with just a finger prick. Holmes is the youngest self-made female billionaire in the world. Then last month, the Wall Street Journal published an article alleging that Theranos doesn't actually use the new technology for most of its tests. Holmes said the report was "full of falsehoods." But then a few weeks ago, Walgreens put a partnership with Theranos on hold. And then earlier this week, the WSJ reported that the grocery chain Safeway is dropping its $350 million dollar deal with the company that would have opened clinics offering Theranos blood tests. In response to this new report, Theranos says 'speaking of a finger prick…' it's "disappointed to see yet another inaccurate WSJ article."

SKIMM THIS

THING TO KNOW

Fish gape: The new duck face. A pose favored by selfie lovers everywhere. Think: mouth slightly open, eyes staring at the camera. Soul slowly dying.

SKIMM THIS

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SKIMM SHARE

We love meeting you in your inbox every morning. So we want today's top sharer to get to choose the subject line for tomorrow's Skimm. Keep it clean, people. Here's how you share.

SKIMM BIRTHDAYS

*indicates Skimm'bassador. Cake cake cake cake.

Skimm Grandma Fran Schechter (Neponsit, NY); Kelsey Muldoon (Denver, CO); Jenn O'Mara (Philadelphia, PA); Namrata Singh (Houston, TX); Catherine Christ (Palmdale, CA); Katy Hallman (Columbia, SC); Chandni Jaggi (College Station, TX); Kirsten Horton (Memphis, TN); Lyndsey Jefferson (London, England); Lindsay Barta (Tampa, FL); Lori Dobrin (Camarillo, CA); Mary Raymond (Nashville, TN); Victoria Lannom (Chicago, IL); Jennifer MacDonald (Freeport, ME); Shannon Burgess (San Diego, CA); Stacey Young (Syracuse, NY); Leslie Stine (Waynesboro, PA); Carrie Rickenberg (Edgewater, NJ); Kandice Miles (Spartanburg, SC); Cicely Lewis (Fairfax, VA); Isabel Lanaux (New Orleans, LA); Colin Strickland (Oklahoma City, OK); Amanda Usher (New York, NY); Nicole Bleuel(San Francisco, CA); Bianca Cesaratto (Madison, WI); Lalit Gurnani (San Francisco, CA); Jessica Weingarten (Roslyn, NY); Kathryn Lentych (South Bend, IN); Anne Summa (San Diego, CA); Megan Zilis (New York NY); Devin McDonnell (Baltimore, MD); Talia Ziskroit (New York, NY); Harpreet Sawhney (West Windsor, NJ)

Skimm'd something we missed?

Email SkimmThis@theSkimm.com • Read in browser »

SHARE & FOLLOW US

Copyright © 2015 theSkimm, All rights reserved.

Our mailing address is:

theSkimm Inc.

584 Broadway, Ste. 409

New York, NY, 10012, United States

Update Profile

Unsubscribe

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: Caroline <clara@lces-environment.com>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 4/1/2015 7:30:45 PM
Subject: Confirmed as Speaker at Low Carbon Earth Summit-2015 (Sep 24-26, 2015)

The 5th Low Carbon Earth Summit-2015

Theme: Take Actions for Rebuilding a Clean World
Time: September 24-26, 2015
Place: Qujiang International Conference Center, Xi'an, China
Website: http://www.lcesummit.com

Good day John Podesta,

How is everything going? May I ask whether you have received my previous emails? This year we will host an attractive International Conference called The 5th Low Carbon Earth Summit-2015 (LCES-2015), which as one parallel conference of the 6th Euro-Asia Economic Forum during September 24-26, 2015 at Xi'an Qujiang International Conference Center, China. Therefore, it is our great honor to have you to be Speaker at Session 401: Innovative Energy Efficiency Technologies under Symposium 4: Low Carbon and Clean Technologies.

Meanwhile, I'm glad to tell you that with the efforts of our colleagues, we have updated the tentative program list online. Please do check it at your convenience at: http://www.lcesummit.com/ScientificProgram.asp . (PS: this is a preliminary program. Changes may occur.) And below please find parts of Renowned Speakers of LCES-2015.

Mr. Conrado Moren, Vice President, World Wind Energy Association, Germany
Mr. Andrew Lang, Vice President, World Bioenergy Association, Australia
Dr. Goon Cherl Park, President, KEPCO International Nuclear Graduate School (KINGS), South Korea
Dr. Bao-Lian Su, Fellow of the Royal Society of Chemistry, The University of Namur, Belgium
Mr. Usman Ahmed, Vice President and Chief Reservoir Engineer, Baker Hughes, USA
Mr. John Rossant, Founder and Chairman, New Cities Foundation, Switzerland
Mr. Gianni Minetti, President and CEO, Paradox Engineering, Switzerland
Dr. Woodrow W. Clark, Managing Director, Clark Strategic Partners, USA
Mr. Alfonso Bataller, Mayor, Castelló de la Plana, Spain
Mr. Jorge Munoz Wells, Mayor, Miraflores City Council, Peru
Mr. Narinderpal S Sood, President, Energy Asset Development Inc, USA
Mr. Gerald (Gerry) Hamaliuk, CEO, SusGlobal Energy Corp, Canada
Mr. Brian Smith, Secretary General, Heritage Europe, UK
Mr. Mike Weinmaster, Chief Designer, Green Over Grey, Canada
Mr. Jason Teliszczak, CEO, JT Environmental Consulting, USA
Mr. Jack P. Broadbent, Chief Executive Officer / Air Pollution Control Officer, Bay Area Air Quality Management District, USA
Mr. David Jackson, Director Local Development Practice Area, UN Capital Development Fund (UNCDF), Thailand
Mr. Tom Tansy, Chairman, SunSpec Alliance, USA
Mr. Alfredo Ramos, Vice President, Power & Carbon Capture and Storage (CCS), Process Systems Enterprise (PSE), UK
Mr. Mauro Passos, President, Instituto IDEAL, USA
Mr. Tanay Sidki Uyar, Vice President, EUROSOLAR European Association for Renewable Energy, Turkey
Mr. Graham Weale, Chief Economist, RWE, Germany
Dr. Jackie Wright, Principal & Director, Environmental Risk Sciences Pty Ltd, Australia
Dr. Marjorie Campbell, Chair, Department of Biological Sciences, Clark Atlanta University, USA
Mr. Jose Juan Gomes Lorenzo, Financial Markets Lead Specialist, Inter-American Development Bank, USA
Mr. Oliver F. Campbell, Director of Worldwide Procurement & Packaging Engineering, Dell, USA
Mr. David Dornbusch, President of Cleantuesday; CEO of France Cleantech, France
Mr. Olivier Coispeau, Partner, Maverlinn, UK
Mr. Seth R. Freeman, CEO, EM Capital Management, LLC, USA
Mr. Jacques Van Hee, Managing Director & Founding Partner, NOVANTE; Communications Director, GDF SUEZ, France
Mr. Ruijie Zhang, Secretary General, Low Carbon Economy Committee of CAPEC, China
Mr. Danny Price, Founder and Managing Director, Frontier Economics, Australia
Mr. Thomas Jorberg, CEO, GLS Bank, Germany
Hon. Dr. Mohammed Hasan Mahmud, Chairman, Parliamentary Standing Committee on Ministry of Environment and Forest, Bangladesh
Mr. Archie J. Beaton, Executive Director, Chlorine Free Products Association, USA
Dr. Chris Constantine, Vice President of Business Development, Skyonic Corporation, USA
Dr. Terry Cooke, Founder and CEO, GC3 Strategy, LLC, USA
Mr. Hans Folkesson, Chairman, Clean Motion AB, Sweden
Mr. Martin Klaasen, Director, Klaasen Lighting Design, Singapore
Dr. Jiang-Shiou Hwang, Professor, National Taiwan Ocean University, Taiwan
Mr. Richard Pyvis, Chairman, CLSA Capital Partners, Hong Kong, China
Mr. Les Liddiard, VPAsia, Tetronics International, UK

Would you like to attend our conference this time? Please do not hesitate to contact me if you require further information

If you don't want to receive any further e-mail from LCES-2015, please revert back with a subject Unsubscribe.

Sincerely,

Ms. Caroline Wang

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Organizing Committee of LCES-2015
Add: East Wing, F11, Building 1,
Dalian Ascendas IT Park, 1 Hui Xian Yuan, Dalian Hi-tech Industrial Zone,
LN 116025, China
Tel: 0086-411-84799609-845
Fax: 0086-411-84799629
Email: caroline@lcesummit.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Cammie Croft" <ccroft@progressivemediausa.org>
To: "big campaign" <bigcampaign@googlegroups.com>
Date: 5/22/2008 4:46:12 PM
Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Rally and Media Availability Stockton, CA

Hello Big Campaign,

Just off the phone with our tracker Evan who was on the ground in Stockton, CA today. Below are the notes from our call.

BIG HIGHLIGHTS: McCain attacks Obama throughout rally speech and media avail; McCain repudiates Hagee and Parsley's endorsements; McCain asked about medical records

Stockton, CA: McCain Rally and Media Availability 05/22/08

Background Details:
- Approximately 800-1,000 people in attendance
- Crowd make-up diverse; significant Asian presence - several signs read 'Vietnamese Americans for John McCain'
- Recurring themes of the rally, repeated by several speakers: the only good democrat is one who is going to vote for John McCain, thankful for the many Independents and Democrats in the audience; and Republicans are going to turn California red in the fall
- at the VIP bleacher spots (ie those located behind McCain in camera view), veterans and Asian Americans were occupying the seats

Rally Highlights:
- At the beginning of the event, VFW guys presented the colors
- Steve Moore, a county sheriff, led the pledge of allegiance
- Rep. Alan Nakanishi gave brief remarks
- The MC of the event said this is not a speech, this is an interactive rally -- and then led the crowd in a rally cry, 'We want Mac! We want Mac!'
- The MC said 'the other side' thinks that America is responsible for all the problems in the world
- Local candidate came on stage and gave brief remarks and compared McCain to national heros
- The county supervisor came on stage - he said he was thankful for McCain Democrats and praised McCain for bringing people together
- State Assemblyman Dan Tran(sp) came up; he spoke about his family history and how it intertwined with McCain's family history
- A high school teacher came on stage and talked about how he would show his students a PBS special of John McCain; teacher brought a former student on stage who is also an Iraq Vet that was badly burned while serving (80-90 percent of his body)
- The MC reappeared and led the crowd in a chant, "USA! USA!"
- Candidate in District 6, Dale Pritchard came on stage -- led more cheering
- Another candidate from a different district came on stage and led more chanting; she also said that we can "sleep good" at night knowing McCain is answering the phone at 3am
- Rally ended as McCain arrived and members of the group Rolling Thunder (vets on bikes) got on their motorcycles and revved their engines as McCain walked into the rally
- McCain brought with him the California Insurance Commission, former Governor Pete Wilson, Senator Jeff Denham
- McCain's California campaign chair took to the stage to introduce McCain - he said McCain is California's Republican Senator
- McCain took the stage -- and at this point he asked the bikers from Rolling Thunder to rev their engines again
- McCain said republicans are gonna win California in the fall
- McCain talked about terrorism as the transcendent challenge
- Protester interrupted McCain -- disrupting the speech; she was removed by police
- McCain talked about Obama -- said that for a young man he has done well despite having no experience
- McCain continued hammering Obama until he was interrupted again by two more protesters; they too were escorted away by police
- McCain went on to say, never surrender, we are succeeding in Iraq; said thank God for Petraeus
- Talked about Osama bin Laden -- said if 'I have to follow him to the gates of hell, I will'
- Attacked Obama for a vote against troop equipment/war funding bill -- crowd booed this line
- Talked about farm bill, said it was a bad bill; attacked Obama for voting for it -- then said that for Obama the only change that he wants is 'business as usual'
- McCain said he really wants to increase troop benefits -- BUT that we need to get soldiers to serve longer

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Media Availability:

1) Has it been difficult trying to run a leaner campaign?

MCCAIN: what I really need to do is energize the party and reach out to Independents and Reagan Democrats; we're pretty far out, but I'm pleased with where we're at and I'm looking pretty good in the polls right now

2) California needs the farm bill. Isn't being against the farm bill going to hurt you here?

MCCAIN: It's a bad bill. I support farmers, but we need to cut pork out of the bill and we need open markets. We need to open the world and the rest of the states to California agricultural products. Ethanol subsidies distort the markets -- Obama is for the farm bill and that isn't change.

3) So you repudiated Hagee. Why now and not earlier?

MCCAIN: His latest remarks were crazy and unacceptable. Hagee can have his own views and he's entitled to them. But I go to North Phoenix Baptist Church and my pastor and spiritual adviser is Dan Yeary? (sp). Hagee's remarks were just too much. Repudiates Parsley's endorsement.

4) Your campaign is going to release medical records in the next few days. How do you feel about your own health?

MCCAIN: Great! I have lots of vigor and feel confidant. [CHANGES SUBJECT] I have the experience, knowledge and judgement to take on Iran.

5) Is Obama lack of military experience something we should be concerned about? What about having all these people over at your house this weekend -- is it some kind of VP thing?

MCCAIN: I've earned the right to speak on veterans issues. I judge Obama not on military experience, but general experience. I want to raise veterans benefits -- the NCO is one of the most important people in the military. Careers in the military add vitality to the unit.

6) Filipino news agency asked him about the Senate bill that finally recognized Filipino WWII vets -- asked why weren't you in the Senate for that vote?

MCCAIN: I was out campaigning. Veterans are great -- look at how many veterans that are out here today.

7) Nobody on the campaign trail has mentioned immigration. Are you afraid of the issue of immigration?

MCCAIN: Gave stock answer: We must secure our borders first. And we need tamper-proof bio-metric ID's.

8) What is going to be the bigger challenge for you in the fall - beating Barack Obama or pretending you like Bush?

MCCAIN: Are you from comedy central? In both cases, I gotta portray my plan of action. Did you see me on SNL? That was pretty funny.

Follow-up Q: 'so is that a like him, like him?

MCCAIN: I have to follow through with my plan.

9) French TV guys asked about global warming

MCCAIN: We gotta decrease our dependence on foreign oil. The French are using lots of nuclear energy -- we need to do that too.

10) Asked to respond to VP retreat this weekend (from an ealier question)

MCCAIN: It's not a VP thing -- I'm just having a few friends over to celebrate Memorial Day.

11) Vietnamese reporter asked about his policies toward Vietnam.

MCCAIN: As you know, years ago we normalized relations with Vietnam and as you know I'm all about pushing for democracy. human rights and freedom in Vietnam.

--
Cammie L. Croft
Tracking/Media Monitoring Director
Progressive Media USA
ccroft@progressivemediausa.org
202-609-7679 (office)
206-999-3064 (cell)
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
To: "Herbert Sandler" <hms@sandlerfoundation.org>
Date: 3/31/2014 8:57:38 PM
Subject: Re: dinner at 6:30pm at my apartment

Ok. Look forward to it.
.

On Mar 31, 2014 3:59 PM, "Sandler, Herbert" <hms@sandlerfoundation.org > wrote:

> Dinner at 6:30 at the apartment at 1750 Taylor Street, on Russian Hill, between Broadway and Green
>
> John, it's possible that Steve and Susan will be still at the office, which, as you know is very close to BARDT. I suggest you call Susan on her cell (415)4201338 or Steve, on his cell,(925)3833853 , when you leave Berkeley and, if they'll still be there, arrange to meet them in their lobby and Susan will drive you to the apartment. Alternatively, grab a cab at the Hyatt Regency. If a problem, call me and I'll pick you up

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 8/4/2014 2:25:40 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Monday August 4, 2014 Morning Roundup

Correct The Record Monday August 4, 2014 Morning Roundup:

Headlines:

New York Times: "Hillary Clinton's Fee for a Hometown Speech: Free"

"The former secretary of state, who regularly commands $200,000 for speeches, returned to her adopted hometown, Chappaqua, N.Y., on Sunday to address seven high school seniors at their graduation from a summer scholarship program. In this instance, she spoke for free."

New Republic: Anne Applebaum: "Hillary Clinton's Crystal Ball: How 'Hard Choices' predicts her presidential campaign"

"Hard Choices is not remotely a book for the ages. It does not belong on the same shelf as Dean Acheson's memoir. But maybe it contains the winning formula—and for this author, winning is what counts."

Mother Jones: "Meet the GOPers Trolling Hillary From the Left"

"With the absence of lefty criticism of Hillary this time around, America Rising is trying to fill the void."

The College Fix: Daniel Waqar, UNLV Student Government Student Relations Director: "Hillary Clinton Doesn't Need Another $225,000, but UNLV Students Do"

"In fact, in talking with students, I found them grateful and appreciative for the fundraising efforts of Clinton on behalf of the UNLV Foundation, a nonprofit organization that helps raise money to award millions of dollars in scholarships to thousands of UNLV students every year. For that matter, students are excited about anybody who would raise money for UNLV."

Towleroad: "US Ambassador to the OSCE Daniel Baer Marries Partner Brian Walsh"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Tweeted Baer: 'So, I got married this morning. Thank you @BarackObama, @HillaryClinton, & @JohnKerry for your commitment to equality'."

Associated Press: Today in History: "August 4" [Partial]

"Five years ago: North Korean leader Kim Jong Il pardoned American journalists Laura Ling and Euna Lee for entering the country illegally and ordered their release during a surprise visit by former U.S. President Bill Clinton."

Associated Press: "US Sent Latin Youth Undercover in Anti-Cuba Ploy"

"An Obama administration program secretly dispatched young Latin Americans to Cuba using the cover of health and civic programs to provoke political change, a clandestine operation that put those foreigners in danger even after a U.S. contractor was hauled away to a Cuban jail."

Articles:

New York Times: "Hillary Clinton's Fee for a Hometown Speech: Free"

By Benjamin Mueller

August 3, 2014

Hillary Rodham Clinton apparently gives a steep hometown discount.

The former secretary of state, who regularly commands $200,000 for speeches, returned to her adopted hometown, Chappaqua, N.Y., on Sunday to address seven high school seniors at their graduation from a summer scholarship program. In this instance, she spoke for free.

At a time when the size of Mrs. Clinton's speaking fees has drawn controversy, she left the clamor behind for a community center auditorium, where the families of graduates from New York City mingled with the suburbanites who housed students for the summer.

The draw for Mrs. Clinton, who is on the cusp of a summer vacation in the Hamptons, was the Chappaqua Summer Scholarship Program, which was founded after the assassination of Robert F. Kennedy in 1968. The goal was to expose low-income students from struggling city schools to the advantages offered by the hamlet's more robust classrooms.

Over the course of three high school summers, under the tutelage of instructors who include a young-adult author and seasoned Shakespearean actors, the students make films, act, write essays and program tiny robots.

"This program is really one of the best ways that all of us can break down the artificial barriers that too often exist," Mrs. Clinton said, addressing the graduates from behind a microphone held together by a rubber band.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But as influential as the long classroom hours were, the graduates said, the weeknights spent sleeping under One Direction band posters pasted to pink walls had an impact as well. (The students returned home on the weekends.) The nearest 50-cent honey bun was miles away, said one of the graduates, Jejomar Ysit, and the chirp of crickets replaced the “voices of fierce Latina women.”

“I remember seeing an endless stretch of green: green trees, green trucks, green houses, green hills,” said Mr. Ysit, a rising senior at DeWitt Clinton High School in the Bronx, as Mrs. Clinton, dressed in an aqua-green suit, chuckled in agreement.

Mrs. Clinton, who bought a $1.7 million Dutch colonial in Chappaqua with her husband, former President Bill Clinton, on the eve of her run for the United States Senate in 2000, browsed the students’ biographies and gamely closed her eyes when one asked the audience to conjure an image.

Despite her grueling travel schedule, Mrs. Clinton routinely marches in the local Memorial Day parade. She was invited to the graduation by the scholarship program’s chairwoman, Diane Albert, during a book signing at the Chappaqua Library.

But attendees at the event on Sunday speculated that the demands of preparing for a possible presidential run had recently kept Mrs. Clinton out of sight. Her husband, on the other hand, who addressed a group of Chappaqua scholarship program graduates in 2005, is often seen walking the couple’s chocolate Labrador retriever along the hamlet’s leafy streets.

“The mystique wore off after a few years,” Nancy Silver, a scholarship program board member, said of the Clintons’ stay.

Identifying with the students’ discomfort in the lush suburbs, Mrs. Clinton described her first week at college, when she made collect calls to her parents to tell them how all the students “seemed so much smarter.”

Mrs. Clinton said in her speech that as the students shared their encounters with suburban wildlife, she thought, “Yes, mice, raccoons, deer, sometimes hawks and eagles, all kinds of wildlife that you just come to expect and get used to.”

She exhorted the graduates to learn from tough experiences and rebound when they stumble, a maternal message that could have doubled as a metaphor for her own political ambitions. “Obviously, you can’t just jump into the deep end, as Carlos explained,” she said, referring to one graduate’s story about struggling to learn how to swim. She added, “But don’t be afraid to get caught trying.”

Her possibly veiled meaning did not seem lost on Mr. Ysit.

As mock iPhone shutters snapped closed around her and one student feigned a curtsy to a beaming Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Ysit digested her advice about passing along good deeds. “She’s, like, the president,” he said in amazement, and quickly caught himself. “Well, the president’s wife.”

New Republic: Anne Applebaum: “Hillary Clinton's Crystal Ball: How ‘Hard Choices’ predicts her presidential campaign”

By Anne Applebaum, Pulitzer Prize-winning author and former Washington Post editorial board member

August 3, 2014

Even while Hard Choices was still wafting its way across the Atlantic Ocean— and long before it landed on my desk in central Europe, an entire twenty-four hours after the official publication date—Hillary Clinton’s account of her State Department years had already led several news cycles, inspired thousands of megabytes of commentary, and left its subsequent reviewers with serious literary and philosophical dilemmas.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Normally, the process of writing a book review begins after the reviewer has read the book in question. The process of “reading” Hard Choices, by contrast, begins not with the physical or even the electronic book, but rather with the advance “leaks” in Politico, and the Fox News reports about the advance “leaks” in Politico, and The Wire’s report on the Fox News reporting on the advance “leaks” in Politico. To understand this book, one must be aware also of the Diane Sawyer interview with Hillary Clinton, and the Twitter rage about the Diane Sawyer interview with Hillary Clinton, and the Slate analysis of the Twitter rage about the Diane Sawyer interview with Hillary Clinton. And then there is the NPR interview, and so on.

For this reason, Hard Choices presents the reviewer with an existential problem: is it actually a book? Is it even intended to be a thing that people sit down and read, cover to cover? Or is it rather a collection of carefully crafted messages, each designed to reach a particular person, or to deflect a particular criticism, or to inspire a certain kind of remark? When my husband, who happens to be the foreign minister of Poland, saw the book on my desk, he picked it up, flipped to the index, and checked to see if he is mentioned. (He is.) I have absolutely no doubt that over the past several weeks that same action was performed by dozens of people in dozens of capitals around the world.

Of course Clinton and her team anticipated, and helped to arrange, the media frenzy, and they knew that many would read the index before the book. Each description therefore reads as if it had been vetted for that purpose. In Hard Choices, almost all of Clinton’s colleagues are admirable people who are a “living embodiment of the American Dream,” or a “terrific communicator” who works hard while always remaining decent, passionate, and unstoppable. If they are slightly difficult colleagues, they might be a “creative thinker” (Rahm Emanuel) or have a “bulldozer style” (Richard Holbrooke) with which the secretary nevertheless learned cheerfully to live.

Her foreign partners are much the same. In general they are “consummate professionals” and “enjoyable company.” A few, such as ex–French President Sarkozy, can even be “fun.” And even with more challenging interlocutors, such as the Chinese official Dai Bingguo, Clinton usually manages to speak “deeply and personally about the need to put the U. S.-China relationship on a sound footing for the sake of future generations.” Do not read Hard Choices if you seek a nuanced analysis of the people who run the world’s foreign policy, let alone any juicy gossip. Even the “candid” photos look staged: Hillary, Bill, and Bono sitting at a piano, for example.

Yet even if we accept that Hard Choices really is a book—it has a binding, after all, and has been produced by a printing press under the auspices of a publishing house—it isn’t that easy to say to which genre it belongs. It clearly is not a work of history: the book is constructed according to geography rather than chronology, and although Clinton does give accounts of her more important policy decisions, she refrains from setting them in any particular domestic or global context. Each one is told as a separate story, and most of the stories have happy endings, even if in real life they didn’t.

Clinton’s chapter on Europe, for example, begins with the deterioration of the transatlantic alliance under George W. Bush, explains how she fixed the problem by renewing relationships with “invaluable” partners, and ends with a visit to Belfast where an “old friend” is now the lord mayor of Armagh. This latter event gives Clinton a moral for her Europe story: she hopes that children growing up now in Northern Ireland will “never turn back and that their peace and progress would be an inspiration for the rest of Europe and the world.” A scant, bland paragraph or two are devoted to the European economic crisis, which was by far the most important issue at the time. There is no mention of the European Union’s longstanding failure to come up with a coherent foreign policy, no sense that anything at all is wrong with an institution which has made “many contributions to peace and prosperity within and beyond its borders.”

Clinton’s chapter on Burma is similarly glossy. It begins with a description of Aung San Suu Kyi—“frail, but with unmistakable inner strength”—and ends with Burma on the road to democracy, a story that she calls a “high point” of her term in office and “an affirmation of the unique role the United States can and should play in the world as a champion of dignity and democracy.” There is no hint that the Burmese army was just then beginning its vicious war against the Karen insurgency, that a brutal conflict between Buddhists and Muslims was already growing worse, or that Suu Kyi’s prestige was starting to plummet as she failed to exert any influence to stop either one of those outrages. Even Clinton’s portrayal of Haiti, where she and her husband have a long involvement, fails to note that their plan to “Build Back Better” after Haiti’s earthquake in 2010 is now widely perceived to have failed.

On topics that she knew would be examined more exhaustively, Clinton is more careful to avoid overly sunny conclusions. Her account of her attempt to “reset” relations with Russia was clearly rewritten just before publication in order to include recent events in Ukraine. Here she draws what positive stories she can—there was some cooperation with Russia in central Asia, for example—but makes clear that she had low expectations for the Russian-American relationship from the beginning. As she left office in 2013, she advised the president that “difficult days lay ahead and that our relationship with Moscow would likely get worse before it got better.” Still, even this more realistic version of events is unsatisfying, for Clinton never digs very deeply. She offers no real analysis of Vladimir Putin’s motives, and never goes into the complex history of the Russian-American relationship. She acknowledges that Russia does present a very difficult problem: “Hard men present hard choices—none more so than Vladimir Putin, the President of Russia.” But she doesn’t tell us on what basis she or anyone else will solve it.

For similar reasons, Hard Choices also cannot be called a work of political philosophy or political science. There is no overall argument in the book, no marshaling of evidence to make a particular case or to set forward a particular strategy or thesis. This is not an argument for “realism” or “idealism.” It is not an analysis of America’s priorities. There are admirable nods to human rights, a discussion of climate change, and some intelligent observations about diplomacy in the Internet age. But Clinton does not connect the dots into a larger view, clearly because does not see the need to. Early on, she does dismiss the “outdated” debate between “hard power”—military force—and the “soft power” of other kinds of influence. She prefers “smart power,” which she defines as “choosing the right combination of tools—diplomatic, economic, military, political, legal, and cultural” in order to advance “our core national security objectives.” Yet that is an argument about process, not about policy; about the means, not the ends. Most of the time Clinton prudently stays away from thorny debates about just what those core national interests should be.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And although the words “a memoir” appear in tiny print on the cover, this is also not an autobiography, at least in the classic sense of the term. It actively avoids any language that might be construed as “literary,” or any psychological insights of any kind. By her own account Clinton never gets angry, although occasionally she admits that she is “exasperated.” She doesn’t get tired very often either—or if she does, she doesn’t complain: “I drank copious cups of coffee and tea, and sometimes dug the fingernails of one hand into the palm of the other.”

Instead, her personal triumphs and tragedies, like her diplomatic triumphs and tragedies, are always converted into stories and more stories, usually with moral lessons for herself, for the reader, for the nation. Her mother’s death reminds her that you must “never rest on your laurels. Never quit. Never stop working to make the world a better place.” Chelsea’s wedding makes her think of her daughter’s “dreams and ambitions”: “This, I thought, is why Bill and I had worked so hard for so many years to help build a better world—so Chelsea could grow up safe and happy and one day have a family of her own, and so every other child would have the same chance.” The news of Chelsea’s pregnancy makes her recall “what Margaret Mead said, that children keep our imaginations fresh and our hearts young, and drive us to work for a better future.”

Clinton carefully puts to rest any hint of conflict between herself and her husband, or herself and President Obama. Instead she includes a scene of herself sitting in East Timor, watching ex-President Clinton nominate President Obama for the second time: “Watching from some ten thousand miles away, I was full of pride for the former President I married, the current president I served, and the country we all loved.”

Of course Hard Choices could be shelved alongside the memoirs of other statesmen— Henry Kissinger, say, or Margaret Thatcher. But those books, while also painting the world in colors designed to flatter the author, are generally composed by people who did not anticipate a further career in public life. Clinton’s book, by contrast, does not seek merely to establish the author’s place in the nation’s past; it is designed also to establish her place in the nation’s future. This is clear to the reader from the cultural context—from Diane Sawyer and NPR and Fox—but also from the volume’s enigmatic conclusion. After 593 pages of writing about foreign policy, Clinton suddenly shifts gear. “Our strength abroad depends on our resolve and resilience at home,” she declares in her epilogue. “Citizens and leaders alike have choices to make about the country we want to live in and leave to the next generation. ... We need more good jobs that reward hard work with rising wages, dignity, and a ladder to a better life.”

We know why she has made this gear shift—and she knows that we know. But she tells us anyway: “Over the past year, as I’ve traveled around the country once again, the one question I’m asked more than any other is: Will I run for President in 2016?” And the answer? “I haven’t decided yet.” She explains:

“Whatever I decide, I will always be thankful for the chance to represent America around the world. I have learned anew the goodness of our people and the greatness of our nation. I feel blessed and grateful. Our future is so full of possibility. And for me and my family that includes looking forward to a new addition— another American who deserves the best possible future we can offer. ... There have been too few quiet moments like this over the years. And I want to savor them. The time for another hard choice will come soon enough.”

And thus, having spent 595 pages eschewing anything that might look remotely like a literary device, Clinton finally resorts to the oldest one of all: the cliffhanger.

In the end Hard Choices is not history, and not political philosophy, and not auto-biography. It belongs to an altogether narrower genre. Like Mitt Romney’s No Apology: The Case for American Greatness, Barack Obama’s The Audacity of Hope: Thoughts on Reclaiming the American Dream, Newt Gingrich’s A Nation Like No Other: Why American Exceptionalism Matters, and John Kerry’s A Call to Service: My Vision for a Better America, Hard Choices is, quite simply, one of those books that people write when they are running for president. Since it calls itself a “memoir,” and focuses on her four years as secretary of state, and since it does not have the word “America” in the title, Clinton’s version is a little different from the others. But really there can be no doubt that this is a campaign book in an autobiographical and statesmanlike disguise.

I am not sure when it became de rigueur for presidential candidates to publish a work between hard covers, but nobody now runs for high office without having written, or having arranged for the ghostwriting of, a very large book. The advantages are obvious. Such books provide some vignettes for voters to chew over, and some pre-approved quotes for the press. They offer a narrative about the candidate that is entirely of the candidate’s own construction, a story that Hillary or Mitt or Barack can control from start to finish. Above all, the publication of a book, if judiciously planned, can provide an excuse for interviews, a book tour, and quite a lot of highbrow media, and all of this many months or even years before the candidate begins the tedious process of running an actual campaign. If the candidate proves really adept at the writing/ghostwriting/marketing of the thing, he or she can even make some money.

But once the reviewer understands that Hard Choices belongs to this genre, then its positive attributes become much clearer. If you leaf through this book, as I initially did, looking for insight into particular people or events, you will be disappointed. If you look for a grand strategy, you will be similarly let down. But if instead you peruse the book in search of clues as to how candidate Clinton is going to portray herself over the next two years, then it becomes somewhat interesting, even downright useful.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It is impossible not to notice, for example, that throughout the book Clinton emphasizes very particular personality traits. She returns again and again to the ethic of service that her parents bequeathed to her. At one point she speaks of her " 'service gene,' that voice telling me there is no higher calling or more noble purpose than serving your country." Clinton also hints at personal sacrifices: "When I chose to leave a career as a young lawyer in Washington to move to Arkansas to marry Bill and start a family, my friends asked, 'Are you out of your mind?' I heard similar questions when I took on health care reform as First Lady, ran for office myself, and accepted President Barack Obama's offer to represent our country as Secretary of State."

That is a clear message: Clinton is not enjoying all of this, and she is not going to pretend otherwise. She didn't move to Arkansas or tackle health care reform or become secretary of state because those were pleasurable things to do. She was not seeking personal gratification—on the contrary. Unlike some of the men who have been or will be her competitors, she is not motivated by narcissism, arrogance, and egotism. She is animated entirely by her "service gene."

And also by her work ethic. She lets us know that she travels doggedly and works obsessively, almost to the point of making herself ill. She tells us more than once how many countries (112) she visited while secretary of state and how many miles (nearly a million) she clocked up. She says that she encouraged her staff to "do whatever they could to stay sane and healthy amid the rigors of a grueling schedule." Diplomats who have dealt with her do indeed testify that she really was always well-briefed and well-prepared. Whichever of those 112 countries she happened to be in, she always knew what the issues were, and she always understood to whom she was talking. Unlike Joe Biden, she never mixed up the president and the prime minister.

This necessarily meant that she relied on the State Department and its employees rather than on her own relatively narrow knowledge of foreign countries—and this, frankly, is a lot better than winging it. Indeed, there is more than a hint of the technocrat about Clinton. She doesn't delve into policy debates much herself, at least not in this book, but she likes to surround herself (along with her retinue of loyalists and handlers) with people who know about things, and she has the technocrat's desire to find the best solution to the problem, whatever its origin. She studiously avoids anything that could be misconstrued as "ideological," or even as an "idea." She admires experience, preferring the sage advice of Richard Holbrooke over the "younger White House aides" who rolled their eyes when he spoke. What she seems to mean by "smart power" is policies that work.

From all of this, it is possible to make a few good guesses about what kind of candidate Clinton hopes to be: deeply non-ideological, a centrist. She intends to run as a hard-working, fact-oriented pragmatist—someone who finds ways to work with difficult opponents, and not only faces up to difficult problems but also makes the compromises needed to solve them. Again and again she portrays herself sitting across the table from Dai Bingguo or President Putin, working hard, searching for a way forward. Similar methods, presumably, can be applied to the Republican leadership.

Though pretty stultifying to anyone who wants a bit of moral uplift from their presidential candidate, this might well be a brilliant campaign strategy. It might even be a brilliant presidential strategy. Clinton wants to be the politician who will rise above the partisanship that has hamstrung the Obama administration, end the gridlock in Washington, cut deals, and move forward.

In order to do this, she will transform herself into a figure of benign neutrality. Unlike Obama, she will not inspire, but she will also not enrage. Perhaps she provoked angry passions as First Lady, but that is all behind us now. Hillary Clinton circa 2016 will promote not the left and not the right, she will promote America.

To anyone whose memory stretches back beyond the two most recent presidential administrations, this may sound familiar. In the Bill Clinton years, this stance was called "triangulation," and it meant that the president kept an equal distance from both the Republicans and the Democrats in Congress. Those who didn't like it complained that, in practice, triangulation required a rejection of anything that looked like political principle or moral consistency in favor of whatever policies might be politically feasible. On the other hand, a decade's worth of bitter partisanship hasn't gotten us anywhere, either. After eight years of Bush and eight more of Obama, the nation might well be tired of Big Ideas, and might well prefer some old-fashioned wheeling and dealing instead.

As for Clinton's lack of emotion, and the reliance on stiff formulations and cliché— well, we might as well get used to it. For there is another message in Hard Choices: by writing the kind of book that she wrote, Clinton is indicating that she is not going to open up and reveal herself in some new way—ever. If there is more depth beneath the surface, if she is less stolid and lackluster than she appears to be, then we aren't going to know about it. This is a woman who is aware that every outfit she wears, every hairstyle she adopts, every word she utters can create an international debate, and she intends to control as much of that conversation as she can. If, once upon a time, there ever was a spontaneous Hillary Clinton who said what she really thinks and did not worry about how the media would respond, that person was suppressed long ago.

Maybe, if she really wants to be president, she was right to have done so. It really is true that one slip of the tongue could end Clinton's career. It is also true that the stories with edifying morals, the glossy photographs, the promise of bipartisanship, the work ethic, the devotion to service and duty—all of this makes sense in the context of a national campaign: a lot of people who are only remotely, or not at all, interested in the nuances of the Russian-American relationship can identify with this package very easily. Those who do not want or do not need a grand strategy for America, at home and abroad, may find her "journey" very compelling. And many people will like the positive spin she puts on even the most negative world events: it is so cheerful, so upbeat.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hard Choices is not remotely a book for the ages. It does not belong on the same shelf as Dean Acheson's memoir. But maybe it contains the winning formula—and for this author, winning is what counts.

Mother Jones: "Meet the GOPers Trolling Hillary From the Left"

By Patrick Caldwell

August 4, 2014, 6:00 a.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] With Democratic groups uniting behind a Clinton presidential bid, America Rising has swooped in to stir up her progressive critics.

When Hillary Clinton declined to attend the annual Netroots Nation conference in July, the most vocal outcry came not from the progressive base, but from a Republican super-PAC founded by former staffers for Mitt Romney and the Republican National Committee. "Despite flying over Detroit, MI – the home of Netroots Nation 2014 – Hillary Clinton will not strategize with Democratic activists at the United States' 'largest progressive gathering' this weekend," the group wrote on its website. "Instead, she will be traveling from Connecticut to Minnesota in order to $ell her book." That condemnation was paired with a meme-ified graphic of Clinton waving goodbye to the "grassroots" as she flew by.

Officially, Hillary Clinton is still a private citizen contemplating a possible 2016 presidential campaign. But everyone else in the political world is treating her as if she were a formal candidate. A slew of right-wing books targeting Clinton have been published this summer. And a bevy of Democratic super PACs have sprung into existence to defend Clinton and expand her base of support. "I've been amazed at what a cottage industry it is… If it all stopped, a lot of people would lose their jobs," Clinton said recently on the Daily Show of the hype machine that revolves around her potential candidacy.

Unlike during her 2008 presidential campaign, the progressive critique of Clinton has been tepid so far. On the left, there's really no counterweight to the newest branches of the Clinton machine. Massachusetts Gov. Deval Patrick's remark that he does "worry about the inevitability thing" is about the most damning Democratic criticism you hear against Clinton these days. Sure, there's a new group agitating for Sen. Elizabeth Warren to run in 2016, but all the big money on the left has turned to helping out Hillary. Clinton has often had an uneasy relationship with the progressive flank of the Democratic Party—during the 2008 election there was plenty of Hillary trashing throughout the primaries. But, at least so far, Democrats have been held their fire.

With the absence of lefty criticism of Hillary this time around, America Rising is trying to fill the void. It launched a "Stop Hillary 2016" project and website last summer. (If you donate $5 to the PAC they'll send you a Stop Hillary bumper sticker.) And the group released an e-book titled Failed Choices to counter Clinton's State Department memoir. Some of its anti-Clinton material rests on retreading the predictable conservative tropes on Benghazi.

But the super PAC hasn't confined itself to the sort of attacks you would expect from an opposition research shop manned by GOPers. "Our view is that she can't be allowed to have a free pass," says Tim Miller, the group's executive director and a former spokesman for the RNC. "And right now the entire Democratic establishment—from John Podesta to Jim Messina to Randi Weingarten to Emily's List's Stephanie Schriock—are all anointing Hillary the 2016 nominee, so we see it as part of our job to make sure that her real record is being publicized, regardless of the issue or the ideological perspective on it."

The group seems to be going out of its way to stir up trouble for Hillary within the Democrats' lefty base. America Rising has highlighted Clinton's past support for the Iraq War and called her out for continuing contracts with Blackwater when she was at the State Department. The weekend of Netroots Nation, the PAC made a video that spliced together a clip of Elizabeth Warren denouncing lobbyists with an old video of Clinton defending her decision to accept donations from lobbyists, a clear appeal to the liberals who might be wary of Clinton's campaign finance record.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The group's greatest concern trolling coup came in June, after Clinton was interviewed by NPR's Terry Gross. Before the interview had aired on most stations, America Rising had already clipped a seven-and-a-half minute segment during which Clinton grew defensive when Gross questioned her over her shifting views on same-sex marriage. Media outlets immediately picked up on America Rising's framing of the interview, including liberal media outlets that would traditionally defend Clinton against conservative attacks.

Miller is unabashed about the intentions of America Rising; it's not just a conservative organization, but a Republican super PAC. But despite that affiliation, he doesn't find it weird to be the one behind the occasional bit of liberal prodding. "I think that a big vulnerability for Hillary Clinton throughout her entire career is that she has come off as disingenuous, and come off as overly political, and we see our job as exposing that," Miller says. "So when she is going to either move to the left to try to appease these liberal voters who might be upset about certain things in her record, or pivot to the right to prepare for a general election, that's something we're going to talk about." Until another Democrat steps up and decides to challenge Clinton for the presidential nomination, America Rising won't have much competition.

The College Fix: Daniel Waqar, UNLV Student Government Student Relations Director: "Hillary Clinton Doesn't Need Another $225,000, but UNLV Students Do"

By Daniel Waqar

August 4, 2014

$225,000 for one speech.

When news broke that former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton would be paid $225,000 to address an October fundraiser for the UNLV Foundation, you could only imagine student reaction. Recent tuition hikes on UNLV students, including a four-year, 17 percent hike passed a few weeks earlier, only compounded the outrage.

For students working to afford the cost of a quality public education in Nevada, life has become tougher in recent years. Unemployment rates for college-age individuals remain at record levels, and tuition for Nevada's in-state universities has tripled in the past 10 years.

Donating her speaking fee to the thousands of students who would benefit from the UNLV Foundation would be an incredible opportunity for Clinton to remain true to her commitment – stated in March at the Globalization of Higher Education conference co-organized by former Florida Republican Gov. Jeb Bush– to making higher education more accessible and affordable for all students.

Though higher education is certainly a priority for leaders both parties, especially potential 2016 presidential candidates like Bush and Clinton, student opposition to Clinton's speaking fee is neither personal nor political.

In fact, in talking with students, I found them grateful and appreciative for the fundraising efforts of Clinton on behalf of the UNLV Foundation, a nonprofit organization that helps raise money to award millions of dollars in scholarships to thousands of UNLV students every year. For that matter, students are excited about anybody who would raise money for UNLV.

However, hundreds of projects on campus would benefit from the funds of her speaking fee. Not just vital undergraduate research – Huffington Post columnist Joe Ferraro calculated her fee would cover tuition and fees for almost 70 students for a semester at UNLV.

In the face of tuition increasing 17 percent over four years, and more than 100 percent in the last decade, students find themselves priced further away from their education. Teenage and young adult unemployment rates in Nevada are among the highest in the nation – Fox 5 Las Vegas reported figures from the Nevada Department of Employment, Training and Rehabilitation in March that teen unemployment was 17.4 percent.

It's becoming harder for young Nevadans to partake in the "shared sacrifice" of higher tuition, as Nevada System of Higher Education Regent Jason Geddes urged in the Las Vegas Sun, when the job market is making employment incredibly tough to find.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Just two months ago, right around commencement in May, UNLV released statistics to the Las Vegas Review-Journal showing that the average debt burden of the 2012 graduating class was $21,126 per student. Some 40 percent of the 2012 graduating class had taken out student loans.

With a class of about 3,000 students, the total debt burden for the class of 2012 would be about $63 million. Nationwide, student loan debt exceeds credit card debt, and it will be impossible to raise tuition without simultaneously burying students in more student loan debt.

Though Clinton has spent her career standing up for higher education, both in the private sector as well as through public service, students found it difficult to reconcile that support with her receiving a six-figure speaking fee from our university. As the representative voice for 23,000 undergraduate students, the student government in which I serve wanted to let Clinton know her speaking fee, if donated back to UNLV, could serve as a gesture of solidarity with students who are sacrificing so much to pay for their education.

Nevada journalist Jon Ralston noted recently that Clinton has claimed to have donated part or all of her speaking fees back to elite universities all around the country and the world, from Bryn Mawr College to the National Defense University Foundation to St. Andrews University in Scotland.

When Clinton started as a paid speaker last year, Politico reported that she would “likely do some speeches for no fee for causes she champions” and expected to “occasionally donate her fees for charitable purposes.”

If the former secretary of state speaks for 90 minutes, that would be $2,500 a minute, about the cost of a semester’s tuition for a UNLV student. Lost in the partisan rancor of her speaking fee was this question: Who needs the money more, hardworking students buried in student loan debt paying for their education, or a seasoned politician raking in six figures on a regular basis?

Towleroad: “US Ambassador to the OSCE Daniel Baer Marries Partner Brian Walsh”

By Andy Towle

August 2, 2014

Gay U.S. Ambassador to the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) Daniel Baer married his partner Brian Walsh today.

Tweeted Baer: "So, I got married this morning. Thank you @BarackObama, @HillaryClinton, & @JohnKerry for your commitment to equality".

Congrats to them both!

Associated Press: Today in History: “August 4” [Partial]

[No Writer Mentioned]

August 4, 2014

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

…

Five years ago: North Korean leader Kim Jong Il pardoned American journalists Laura Ling and Euna Lee for entering the country illegally and ordered their release during a surprise visit by former U.S. President Bill Clinton.

…

Associated Press: "US Sent Latin Youth Undercover in Anti-Cuba Ploy"

By Desmond Butler, Jack Gillum, Alberto Arce and Andrea Rodriguez

August 4, 2014, 3:41 a.m. EDT

An Obama administration program secretly dispatched young Latin Americans to Cuba using the cover of health and civic programs to provoke political change, a clandestine operation that put those foreigners in danger even after a U.S. contractor was hauled away to a Cuban jail.

Beginning as early as October 2009, a project overseen by the U.S. Agency for International Development sent Venezuelan, Costa Rican and Peruvian young people to Cuba in hopes of ginning up rebellion. The travelers worked undercover, often posing as tourists, and traveled around the island scouting for people they could turn into political activists.

In one case, the workers formed an HIV-prevention workshop that memos called "the perfect excuse" for the program's political goals - a gambit that could undermine America's efforts to improve health globally.

But their efforts were fraught with incompetence and risk, an Associated Press investigation found: Cuban authorities questioned who was bankrolling the travelers. The young workers nearly blew their mission to "identify potential social-change actors." One said he got a paltry, 30-minute seminar on how to evade Cuban intelligence, and there appeared to be no safety net for the inexperienced workers if they were caught.

"Although there is never total certainty, trust that the authorities will not try to harm you physically, only frighten you," read a memo obtained by the AP. "Remember that the Cuban government prefers to avoid negative media reports abroad, so a beaten foreigner is not convenient for them."

In all, nearly a dozen Latin Americans served in the program in Cuba, for pay as low as $5.41 an hour.

The AP found USAID and its contractor, Creative Associates International, continued the program even as U.S. officials privately told their government contractors to consider suspending travel to Cuba after the arrest of contractor Alan Gross, who remains imprisoned after smuggling in sensitive technology.

"We value your safety," one senior USAID official said in an email. "The guidance applies to ALL travelers to the island, not just American citizens," another official said.

The revelations of the USAID program come as the White House faces questions about the once-secret "Cuban Twitter" project, known as ZunZuneo. That program, launched by USAID in 2009 and uncovered by the AP in April, established a primitive social media network under the noses of Cuban officials. USAID's inspector general is investigating that program, which ended in September, 2012.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Officials said USAID launched "discreet" programs like ZunZuneo to increase the flow of information in a country that heavily restricts it. But the AP's earlier investigation found ZunZuneo was political in nature and drew in subscribers unaware that the service was paid for by the U.S. government.

"USAID and the Obama administration are committed to supporting the Cuban people's desire to freely determine their own future," the agency said in response to written questions from the AP. "USAID works with independent youth groups in Cuba on community service projects, public health, the arts and other opportunities to engage publicly, consistent with democracy programs worldwide."

In a statement late Sunday, USAID said the HIV workshop had a dual purpose: It "enabled support for Cuban civil society while providing a secondary benefit of addressing the desire Cubans expressed for information and training about HIV prevention."

Creative Associates declined to comment, referring questions to USAID.

Both ZunZuneo and the travelers program were part of a larger, multimillion-dollar effort by USAID to effect change in politically volatile countries, government data show. But the programs reviewed by the AP didn't appear to achieve their goals and operated under an agency known more for its international-aid work than stealthy operations. The CIA recently pledged to stop using vaccine programs to gather intelligence, such as one in Pakistan that targeted Osama bin Laden.

The travelers program was launched when newly inaugurated President Barack Obama's administration was talking about a "new beginning" with Cuba after decades of mistrust, raising questions about whether the White House had a coherent policy toward the island nation.

Drawing on documents and interviews worldwide, the AP found the travelers program went to extensive lengths to hide the workers' activities. They were to communicate in code: "I have a headache" meant they suspected they were being monitored by Cuban authorities; "Your sister is ill" was an order to cut their trip short.

"We worked it so that the government here didn't know we were traveling to Cuba and helping these groups," said Yajaira Andrade, a former administrator with a Venezuelan organization. "Because that was when (President Hugo) Chavez was in power, and if he had known about us - that some Venezuelans were working to stir rebellion - we would have been thrown in jail."

To evade Cuban authorities, travelers installed innocent-looking content on their laptops to mask sensitive information they were carrying. They also used encrypted memory sticks to hide their files and sent obviously encrypted emails using a system that might have drawn suspicion.

It is illegal in Cuba to work with foreign democracy-building programs. Nevertheless, one contract was signed days after Gross' detention.

"They arrested a contractor from another agency. That could be dangerous," one Skype message between two project workers would later read. "Thank God he's not one of ours."

Documents show Creative Associates approved the use of the travelers' relatives to carry cash to the Cuban contacts. But the family members weren't to be told that the funds were from the U.S. government.

Hector Baranda, who was a college student in Cuba when he was befriended by a group of traveling Venezuelans, said he was surprised to hear from the AP they were working for the U.S. government and had profiled him.

"How would you feel if you offered your sincere friendship and received this kind of news?" Baranda asked.

The travelers' project was paid for under the same pot of federal money that paid for the ZunZuneo program. But USAID has yet to provide the AP with a complete copy of the Cuban contracts under a Freedom of Information Act request filed more than three months ago.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton, who was in office during the program and is a likely Democratic presidential candidate in 2016, said in her new book "Hard Choices" that she was pleased "to see change slowly creeping into the country."

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· August 6 – Huntington, NY: Sec. Clinton signs books at Book Revue (HillaryClintonMemoir.com)

· August 9 – Water Mill, NY: Sec. Clinton fundraises for the Clinton Foundation at the home of George and Joan Hornig (WSJ)

· August 13 – Martha's Vinyard, MA: Sec. Clinton signs books at Bunch of Grapes (HillaryClintonMemoir.com)

· August 16 – East Hampton, New York: Sec. Clinton signs books at Bookhampton East Hampton (HillaryClintonMemoir.com)

· August 28 – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton keynotes Nexenta's OpenSDx Summit (BusinessWire)

· September 4 – Las Vegas, NV: Sec. Clinton speaks at the National Clean Energy Summit (Solar Novis Today)

· October 2 – Miami Beach, FL: Sec. Clinton keynotes the CREW Network Convention & Marketplace (CREW Network)

· October 13 – Las Vegas, NV: Sec. Clinton keynotes the UNLV Foundation Annual Dinner (UNLV)

· ~ October 13-16 – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton keynotes salesforce.com Dreamforce conference (salesforce.com)

· December 4 – Boston, MA: Sec. Clinton speaks at the Massachusetts Conference for Women (MCFW)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: Nancybk@aol.com
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
andrew_imparato@help.senate.gov
Date: 5/17/2013 11:43:03 AM
Subject: John Podesta help stop widespread suffering inflicted by unions on workers in me

Dear John, In Medicaid funded in-home supportive services there will be a very miserable day in California soon if something is not done to stop the elimination of the companionship exemption in California's IHSS program. Many families will see their incomes cut in half, long time close relationships between consumers and providers will be torn apart if what is about to happen in California, which we predicted would be the outcome of federal DOL changes in this. You can read the results from our legislative analyst below of what the Brown administration is doing in anticipation of the Dol rules Please I know you're a proud member of a union family. Don't permit them to inflict misery an enormous numbers of Medicaid funded IHSS rank-and-file workers if there is any way in which you can intercede. -- nancy PS at the end of this you will see a petition written by a rank-and-file worker in Medicaid funded in-home supportive services.

From: Nancybk@aol.com
To: bob.adapt@sbcglobal.net, davidwittie@yahoo.com, flacacata@aol.com, SStahl@cdrnys.org, tilrc@tilrc.org, pat_nobbie@rockefeller.senate.gov
Sent: 5/17/2013 1:14:46 P.M. Pacific Daylight Time
Subj: Brown Administration Will Propose...Avoid Triggering Overtime Provisions If Pro

From: martyomoto@rcip.com
Reply-to: CDCANreportlist01@rcip.com
To: CDCANreportlist01@rcip.com
Sent: 5/17/2013 12:58:02 P.M. Pacific Daylight Time
Subj: Re: CDCAN REPORT #033-2013 (MAY 17 2013): Brown Administration Will Propose Budget Legislative Language Impacting IHSS & Other Homecare Workers To Avoid Triggering Overtime Provisions If Proposed US Dept of Labor Regs Are Approved

CDCAN DISABILITY RIGHTS REPORT

CALIFORNIA DISABILITY COMMUNITY ACTION NETWORK

#033-2013 – May 17, 2013 – Friday

Advocacy Without Borders: One Community – Accountability With Action

CDCAN Reports go out to over 65,000 people with disabilities, mental health needs, seniors, people with traumatic brain and other injuries, people with MS, Alzheimer's and other disorders, veterans with disabilities and mental health needs, families, workers, community organizations, facilities and advocacy groups including those in the Asian/Pacific Islander, Latino, American Indian, Indian, African-American communities; policymakers, and others across the State.

Sign up for these free reports by going to the CDCAN website. Website: www.cdcan.us

To reply to THIS Report write:

Marty Omoto at martyomoto@rcip.com Twitter: martyomoto New Phone: 916-757-5949

SPECIAL NOTE ON CHANGES FOR CDCAN REPORTS – HELP NEEDED:

NEW EMAIL LIST SERVICE PROVIDER - CDCAN is in process of transitioning to a different email list service to send out future CDCAN reports very soon that should provide a lot of ways to improve and expand reporting. The reports will look basically the same, though there will be differences in format and we won't be able to send out attachments. Please let me know if you are receiving the reports using the new service, and if the format and reporting looks okay or have other comments.

HELP NEEDED: It will cost more every month, so any support would be greatly (and urgently) needed and appreciated. Please help! (see below)

I want to pay special tribute to River City Internet Providers (RCIP) and the staff there for their tremendous support they have given over the past 15 years to CDCAN and the work of advocacy for people with disabilities, mental health needs, the blind and seniors. Without them I could not have been able to provide the reports I was able to do over the years. – Marty Omoto martyomoto@rcip.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

California State Budget:

BROWN ADMINISTRATION WILL PROPOSE BUDGET LEGISLATIVE LANGUAGE FOR IHSS WORKERS IN RESPONSE TO PENDING US DEPT OF LABOR HOMECARE REGULATIONS

Budget Legislative Language Reportedly Would Put In Place Provisions That Would Prevent IHSS Workers From Working Overtime Hours As Defined By Proposed Federal Regulations That Would Require Overtime Pay

Proposal Wouldn't Cut IHSS Recipient Hours – But Could Place Limits On Number of Hours A IHSS Worker Could Provide To That Recipient And Not Trigger Overtime Requirement of Proposed Federal Regulations

Proposal Likely To Come Before Assembly and Senate Budget Subcommittees on Monday

Issue Impacts IHSS Budget Under Department of Social Services – and Likely Impact to Supported Living and Independent Living Services Funding Under Department of Developmental Services Budget That Funds Regional Centers

SACRAMENTO, CA (CDCAN) [Last updated 05/17/2013 10:50 AM] – The Brown Administration will propose budget related legislation – known as budget trailer bill language – that reportedly will include provisions that would limit the number of hours an In-Home Supportive Services (IHSS) worker could provide to a IHSS recipient so that the overtime pay requirement in a pending controversial federal Department of Labor regulation would not be triggered. As of May 17th, there has been no announcement yet from the federal government on whether or not the proposed final regulations have been approved – though most observers believe approval is likely at some point.

It is not clear if the proposed trailer bill language would make changes in State to impose the change – and how those changes would specifically impact individual IHSS and other workers - or if the language would simply state intent that would require change in State law later.

The issue has major impact of potentially hundreds of millions of State general fund dollars to the IHSS budget under the Department of Social Services – the state agency that oversees the program statewide that serves over 440,000 children and adults with disabilities (including developmental) the blind and seniors, and likely impact to Supported Living Services and Independent Living Services funding under the Department of Developmental Services budget that funds regional center community-based services for over 260,000 children and adults with developmental disabilities. The issue would have major impact to home health agencies. Other program and services in other budget areas could be impacted depending on the wording of the proposed federal regulations – and the wording of the proposed budget trailer bill language.

While the proposed legislative trailer bill language would not change the maximum number of hours under State law that an IHSS recipient can receive, it could have impact on their workers if those workers provide services to the recipient that would trigger overtime rules as proposed in the federal regulations

The budget legislative language has not yet been released but could be available sometime later today or Monday (May 20th), when the issue will likely be heard and acted on by the Assembly and Senate Budget Subcommittees on Health and Human Services. CDCAN will send out a report with the proposed language as soon as it is available.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Brown Administration previously sent a letter urging the Obama Administration to modify the proposed regulations on IHSS and other homecare workers, citing limited state resources to cover overtime costs that the regulation would impose, and the impact on IHSS recipients that could mean less availability of their experienced worker and the need to hire additional people, in order to avoid exceeding the overtime rules.

IHSS COURT SETTLEMENT BILL UP FOR FINAL ASSEMBLY VOTE MONDAY

Meanwhile, in related news, SB 67, the budget related bill that makes the necessary changes in State law to implement the IHSS court settlement agreement, including a temporary 8% across-the-board cut in hours to all IHSS recipients beginning July 1, 2013 to June 30, 2014, followed by a 7% across-the-board cut that begins July 1, 2014 and ends June 30, 2015, will be taken up for final vote on the Assembly floor on Monday afternoon, May 20th. The bill passed the State Senate, as expected, on May 13th by a vote of 24 to 9.

WHAT THE PROPOSED FEDERAL REGULATIONS WOULD DO

The federal Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA) was passed in 1938 to provide minimum wage and overtime protections for workers, to prevent unfair competition among businesses based on subminimum wages, and to require employers whose employees work excessive hours to compensate employees at one-and-one-half times the regular rate of pay for all hours worked over 40 hours.

The Fair Labor Standards Act did not initially protect workers employed directly by households in domestic service, such as cooks, housekeepers, maids, and gardeners. However domestic workers that were employed by businesses covered under the federal labor law, such as gardeners employed by landscaping companies or a cook employed by a caterer, did received minimum wage and overtime protections even if their work was in or about a private household.

Congress in 1974, amended the Fair Labor Standards Act, to extend coverage to “domestic service” workers amending the federal law to apply to employees performing services of a household nature in or about a private home. While amending the federal law, Congress also provided for a limited exemption from both the minimum wage and overtime pay requirements for “casual babysitters” and companions for the aged and infirm, and created an exemption from the overtime pay requirement only for live-in domestic workers. Federal law on this issue has largely remained unchanged since then.

The proposed US Department of Labor regulations would change and in some cases repeal those existing overtime exemption under the Fair Labor Standards Act so that many of the nearly 1.9 million domestic workers across the US (including hundreds of thousands of IHSS and other homecare workers in California) would no longer be considered exempt from federal minimum wage and overtime rules.

The proposed federal regulations would add home health aides and personal care aides as subject to federal minimum wage and overtime rules and more narrowly defines the current wage and hour exemption for "companionship services" to "the provision of fellowship and protection."

The proposed federal regulations would place limits on the amount of other work done by a person under the "companionship services" exemption to "20% incidental and occasional services such as dressing, grooming, toileting, driving to appointments, feeding , laundry, bathing."

The proposed regulations would clarify that “companionship services” do not include the performance of medically related tasks for which training is typically required.

ISSUE HAS DIVIDED ADVOCATES FOR WORKERS & RECIPIENTS OF SERVICES

Across the nation and in California, the issue has sharply divided worker unions and workers, with many of the IHSS and other recipients of domestic and homecare services and advocates.

Advocates for people with disabilities and seniors while agreeing that domestic and IHSS workers should be treated fairly and paid overtime – fear that the federal and states will not fund overtime. That in turn will mean – they believe – potential loss of in-home supports or instability because new additional workers would need to be hired to avoid triggering the proposed overtime provisions.

Advocates for the proposed rule say that state and federal governments should fund the overtime provisions – as they do for other state, federal and county workers. They assert that domestic workers – including homecare workers – have a right to be treated as a worker on the same level as any other worker protected by federal law. Advocates for workers and unions have previously made attempts in recent legislation to make changes in State law regarding overtime for domestic and certain homecare workers, though exempting IHSS workers. Those bills however either failed to win final approval in the Legislature or were vetoed by the Governor.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ISSUE HAS MAJOR IMPACT IN CALIFORNIA

The issue would impact some number of the over 360,000 IHSS workers who work more 40 hours per week for a IHSS recipient, and some number of the over 440,000 children and adults with disabilities (including developmental), the blind and seniors who are IHSS recipients.

The pending regulations – and proposed Brown Administration trailer bill language in response to those proposed federal regulation – would also impact other similar support workers including Supported Living Services workers funded under the 21 non-profit regional centers under contract with the Department of Developmental Services for thousands of people with developmental disabilities.

PROPOSED FEDERAL REGULATIONS ISSUED DECEMBER 2011 BY PRESIDENT OBAMA

The proposed regulations that would extend federal minimum wage and overtime protections to domestic worker, including in-home health care workers was announced by President Obama in December 2011, with the proposed regulation appearing in the December 27, 2011 Federal Register for public comment.

That public comment period was extended twice, with the final comment deadline March 21, 2012.

A copy of the most recent version of the proposed regulation – as released December 27, 2011 can be downloaded from this link from the federal register: http://webapps.dol.gov/FederalRegister/PdfDisplay.aspx?DocId=25639

PROPOSED FEDERAL REGULATIONS STILL PENDING FINAL APPROVAL – BUT DECISION COULD COME ANY DAY FROM WHITE HOUSE OFFICE OF MANAGEMENT AND BUDGET

DEC 27, 2011: the US Department of Labor submitted the proposed regulation, published in the Federal Register, for public comment.

FEB 24, 2012: the US Department of Labor published a notice to extend the comment period to March 12, 2012, because of requests received to extend the period for filing public comments.

MAR 13, 2012: the US Department of Labor published a notice to extend the comment period a second time - until March 21, 2012. Over 9,000 public comments were received between December 27, 2011 and March 21, 2012 will be included in the rulemaking record according to the US Department of Labor

JAN 15, 2013: the US Department of Labor submitted for final review the proposed federal regulations to the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs (OIRA), a division within the White House Office of Management and Budget (OMB) as part of the long federal regulatory process. Certain federal regulations that have significant impact are referred to the Office of Management and Budget for further review and approval. That White House agency, under federal law, normally has 90 days to review the proposed final regulations, which mean a deadline of April 15th in the case of the domestic worker proposed US Department of Labor regulations. However that deadline can be extended by the OMB director for an additional 30 days – or extended indefinitely by the agency proposing the regulations – in this case the US Department of Labor.

APR 15, 2013: 90 day deadline for the Office of Management and Budget's review of the US Department of Labor domestic worker proposed final regulations.

MAY 15, 2013: It is clear the deadline has been extended, but it is not clear if the extension is 30 days – meaning May 15th, or if it was extended indefinitely.

MAY 17, 2013: No word yet from the Office of Management and Budget on the proposed US Department of Labor regulations. The Office of Management and Budget could give final approval, could deny the proposed regulation or send it back to the Department of Labor for needed changes. The decision by the Brown Administration could mean that a decision from the US Office of Management and Budget to give final approval of the proposed regulation is imminent.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.change.org/petitions/united-states-department-of-labor-don-t-remove-the-companion-exemption-to-the-flsa-until-money-is-there

Dear Editor;

In your editorial, "Homecare Rules in the Homestretch," you fail to understand the reality of living on government funded Medicaid and the Russian Roulette pistol aimed at the heads of the Seniors, People with Disabilities and our Home Care Workers who depend on it, every year when budgets are cut. Although overtime pay would be great for IHSS providers, in publicly funded Medicaid programs, states that are cutting IHSS (In Home Supportive Services) are not likely to provide overtime pay and will instead most likely cut hours worked above 159 hours a month for any one provider. There is a big move to push through these Department of Labor rules as written right now with no consideration of how they'll really play out in the homes of Seniors and People with Disabilities and their Caregivers in New York and California where people have over 159 hours of IHSS a month.

I know of a proud union member, a mother over 60, who has multiple disabilities of her own and takes care of her adult son with athetoid cerebral palsy who will see her household income of about $2520 a month in California drop to $1431, as her hours are cut from 280 hours a month to 159 hours. She doesn't have the stamina to supplement her income with more jobs and she has trouble finding other caregivers because her son cannot be understood very well by others. The union has taken over $40 a month from her for check each month to lobby for what will cut her income by a pretty big fraction. 70% of the caregivers in California are family members whose households stay intact with IHSS. A cut in hours can threaten their ability to stay in their homes. Seniors and People with Disabilities with Live in Caregivers will be uprooted as well. Jerry Brown just got done settling a lawsuit trying to cut the IHSS program in California by 20% and settled for cutting it by about 8 percent. Do you really think he's going to take time and a half for over 50,000 providers? His representative on an Olmsted conference said they wouldn't.

When I was in the Young Socialist Alliance in college, before I had my accident, I believed in theories in a vacuum. Then I became disabled and saw how these things work out on a real-life level. In California, we have the most highly advanced In-Home Supportive Services program, and the reason it was so good is that the disabled person received money to find somebody and all of that money went directly to the caregiver. The attendant got all the bang for the buck. And while ADAPT American Disabled for Attendant Programs Today was fighting to get In Home Care, this wonderful program to all the states, they came up with things like "Money Follows the Person" and "Community First Choice Option" where that money continued to go to the disabled person to pay directly to their caregiver with no middleman.

But suddenly all kinds of profiteering is going on as big bad corporations and yes even sometimes big bad unions behaviors are immerging as monied interests smell a beautiful dollar to be made in the graying of the baby boomers. On a good day the union is our greatest blessing on a bad day they are our greatest curse. The only way to come up with a reasonable solution that takes everyone's welfare into account is to sit down and work it out. I think what's been most frightening to me in all of this is the ease with which able-bodied regard People with Disabilities as invisible. The SEIU would not even sit down at the table with People with Disabilities to work out a compromise. Would this happen to a person of color? Are we the last population to be seen as a fraction of a person -- or a person who is really there at all?

People have been making industries of people with disabilities for decades, in the nursing home industry, the charity industry, and now the medical industrial complex and the unions too on a bad day. People from ADAPT clawed our ways out of nursing homes that were profiteering off of us and now we have to fight against the nursing agency industry, managed care corporations, and even at times a union that is so out of touch with its rank and file providers needs that it would create three crappy jobs from one not so good one in order to collect two or three union dues on a one house. It is the people disabilities and rank-and-file providers, who are in a symbiotic relationship, huddled together to keep industries and unions from objectifying us and moving us around like "furniture" in their business plans. You can choose to be naïve and come up with lovely little fairy lands in your own mind, but make no mistake, your naïveté will be paid for by the rank-and-file workers whose pay will be cut badly and people with disabilities who will go back to nursing homes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The ADAPT-NCIL compromise would simply eliminate the exemption for third party employers, treating Medicaid consumers in consumer directed programs (including public authorities, fiscal intermediaries and agencies with choice) the same as private employers so they can still use the existing exemption. According to the DOL analysis, this change - alone - would eliminate the companionship exemption for 70% of home care workers. It covers all of the "bad players" and concerns raised in the DOL analysis that exist in traditional home care while minimizing the negative impact on people with disabilities and preventing the unexpected consequences such changes would have on real live people in Medicaid funded programs.

Where were our points of view in this newspaper? In the DOL discussions? Why include us? It's only our bodies, our civil rights, our freedom to live lives akin to political prisoners in iinstitutions! If anyone had any respect for people with disabilities we would have included us in the discussion.

Nancy Becker Kennedy

Appointed Member Since Its Inception
Los Angeles County Public Authority Board PASC that oversees the In Home Care of over 200,000 Seniors and People with Disabilities

Join the IHSS Consumers Union on Facebook at http://www.facebook.com/groups/IHSS.ConsumersUnion/

"Nothing About Us Without Us!" (Latin: "Nihil de nobis, sine nobis") is a slogan used to communicate the idea that no policy should be decided by any representative without the full and direct participation of members the group(s) affected by that policy. This involves national, ethnic, disability based or other groups that are often thought to be marginalized from political, social, and economic opportunities.

From: "Donna Calame" <donna@sfihsspa.org>
Date: March 3, 2013, 10:33:48 AM PST
To: <letters@nytimes.com>
Subject: Home Care Rules in the Home Stretch

What this NY Times editorial fails to acknowle

-----Original Message-----
From: Nobbie, Pat (Rockefeller) (Rockefeller)
<Pat_Nobbie@rockefeller.senate.gov>
To: 'Nancybk@aol.com' <Nancybk@aol.com>; 'Elena Ackel'
<EAckel@lafla.org>; 'Bruce Darling' <bdarling@cdrnys.org>
Sent: Fri, May 17, 2013 8:47 am
Subject: Companionship exemption

Good Morning all,

Can you tell me the latest update on the DOL rules for this issue? We have received requests for signing on a letter, but want your take.
Thanks,
pat

Patricia D. Nobbie, Ph.D.
Joseph P. Kennedy Public Policy Fellow
Office of Senator John D. Rockefeller IV

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

West Virginia
531 Hart Senate Office Building
Ph. 202-224-0822
Fax: 202-224-7665

Click here: The Center for Disability Rights - Free Our People

From: bob.adapt@sbcglobal.net
To: bob.adapt@sbcglobal.net
Sent: 3/23/2013 5:58:27 A.M. Pacific Daylight Time
Subj: Disability Community vs DOL

From California:

Although overtime pay would be great for IHSS providers, in publicly funded Medicaid programs, states that are cutting IHSS are not likely to provide overtime pay and will instead most likely cut hours worked above 159 hours a month for any one provider. There is a big move to push through these Department of Labor rules as written right now with no consideration of how they'll really play out in the homes of Seniors and People with Disabilities and their Caregivers in New York and California where people have over 160 hours of IHSS a month.

In California where 70% of caregivers are family providers, IHSS makes it possible for families to stay intact when they have a senior family member or a family members with a disability, who needs in-home care. These families could see their household income drop dramatically. Significantly disabled people with over 160 hours could lose loyal live-in and live out caregivers they've had for decades, because their work hours will be cut below the money they need to live. Or people with severe disabilities may not be able to get providers to help them when one of the providers needs to leave, because the remaining providers will be in danger working overtime. The unintended consequences of this unbalanced approach to the way private and public in-home supportive services are paid could lead to widespread misery in publicly funded In-Home Supportive Services.

Senior and Disability Rights Advocates were not included in discussions where these Department of Labor rules were developed. Now, the National Council on Disability is trying to explain this to those who can make a difference. Their letter is printed below. The NCIL/ADAPT compromise could be a win-win solution for everyone, where privately funded agencies would have different rules than in publicly funded Medicaid In-Home Supportive Services in states where finite revenues determine what can be paid. "Our compromise creates a win-win solution, covers 70% of attendants and allows us all to be at the table for further discussion," says Bruce Darling of CDR ADAPT.

Below see the Letter from the National Council on Disability about these possible negative unintended consequences. http://www.ncd.gov/publications/2013/03192013/ The Disability and Senior communities and the rank-and-file IHSS providers in New York and California do not seem to of been fully informed or permitted to give input about the impact of this law as written. If after reading this letter, you feel the Office of Management and Budget should delay changing these rules until they consult with Disability And Senior Communities and make sure it won't cut the number of hours providers are permitted to work in publicly funded programs, then sign the petition at the link above or make your comments here at Capitol Hill's Congress blog http://thehill.com/blogs/congress-blog/economy-a-budget/286539-act-now-on-fair-wages-for-home-care-aides and DIRECT letters to letters@nytimes.com

As more sign-on letters are developed for the Office of Management and Budget OMB, we will give you other opportunities to voice your opinions, but time is running short before these proposed laws will become what we try to live with. United in win-win solutions for Home Care Workers and Seniors and Persons with Disabilities!

http://www.ncd.gov/publications/2013/03192013/
Sent via BlackBerry by AT&T

"The disability community is deeply concerned that the proposed changes will have a negative impact on people with disabilities, consumer direction and our attendants. Medicaid rates are not going to increase so attendant hours will be capped. DOL - in its own analysis - identified that instutionalization was an outcome of these rules. Are you aware of our concerns? Do you really think Medicaid rates are going to increase to coveer the cost of time-and-a-half? Appreciate your insights as to how this would - practically - move forward. -- Bruce Darling ADAPT"

Check outwww.DOLoffMYbody.org to get a feel for how these proposed rules impact people with disabilities.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jennifer Palmieri" <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 8/16/2015 11:14:54 AM
Subject: Re: Today's Post story on HRC

No

Sent from my iPhone

On Aug 16, 2015, at 5:33 PM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com > wrote:

> Tony's response to do you know her.
>
> ---------- Forwarded message ----------
> From: "Tony Podesta" <podesta@podesta.com >
> Date: Aug 16, 2015 4:29 PM
> Subject: Re: Today's Post story on HRC
> To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com >
> Cc:
>
> Yes
> Lloyd hand daughter
>
> Sent from my iPhone
>
> On Aug 16, 2015, at 3:38 PM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com > wrote:
>
> > Know her?
> >
> > ---------- Forwarded message ----------
> > From: <catherinehand5@aol.com >
> > Date: Sunday, August 16, 2015
> > Subject: Today's Post story on HRC
> > To: jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com , john.podesta@gmail.com
> > Cc: lorraine@xeolux.com
> >
> > Dear Jake and John:
> >
> > I'm sending this to you at the suggestion of my friend Lorraine Hariton. By way of introduction, back in 1980 I helped Norman Lear create People For the American Way -- even before Tony Podesta came into the picture. I spent months traveling across the country with Norman meeting with so many people to talk about the rise of something Norman was seeing -- the rise of the Religious Right and its impact on our politics. You know the rest.
> >
> > Currently, I am one of the producers of a film adaptation of the award wining children's classic, A Wrinkle in Time, that Jennifer Lee (FROZEN) is scripting for Disney. I mention this, because this book has meant a great deal to millions of young people over the past 50 years. Even Sheryl Sandberg was quoted in the New York Times during an interview for her book, Lean In, that A Wrinkle in Time was her favorite childhood book.
> >
> > Wrinkle was written in 1962 and received the Newberry Award for children's literature in 1963, the year I first read it. As you will read in this note, 1963 was quite a tumultuous year. The year before, in 1962, the Cuban missile crisis threatened the world with the possibility of nuclear war. Against a backdrop of uncertainty, death, and fear, A Wrinkle in Time, came along at a time when young people needed a way to understand the changing world around them. It wasn't necessarily a conscious need, more a longing or yearning for a way to comprehend the evil that existed, and to feel comforted by a story that helped us see that it could be overcome. I think the need for a vision of a loving and empathetic universe is as needed today as it was 50 years ago.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I'm writing a book about my 50 year journey to make Wrinkle into a movie and have been doing research on the past 5 decades which moved me to write this note to Lorraine this morning.

Lorraine-

Just wanted to send along a few thoughts re today's Post story on HRC. First, hope you are enjoying your time in NY. The emails and phone calls about the campaign are very helpful.

Something struck me in reading the Post piece that you may want to consider. When Hillary speaks of the email issue or other issues, her counter is "politics as usual." Those very words are what contribute to the general feeling of her tone deafness. I have no idea what is said in your discussions, but I assume lots of very smart, savvy people are thinking about this problem everyday. Most people do not know what she really means when she says "politics as usual' and it might help her if she were more precise in her reply. What I mean by that is not to use words that mean something to people who follow politics, but use words that mean something to people who don't. And, “politics as usual’ is immediately heard as “politics as usual in Clinton-world.”

Take every single opportunity she has to explain in the simplest way over and over again that she represents change to a more conservative way of thinking and rather than talk about the need for inclusivity in all things for all Americans, her opponents only want to instill fear about her as a person and the change she represents.

I've been doing a little research on the big historical events over the past 50 years and it is a real awakening to take in how much change this country has been dealing with ever since 1963.

Hillary's candidacy is an accumulation of a 50-year shift in attitudes and ever since the early 1970s a backlash to this change has taken shape and strengthened. It's not a vast right wing conspiracy - it is real fear of change. When she uses the words ‘politics as usual’ it only helps to strengthen that backlash.

She needs to be seen and heard as someone who can lead us to a more empathetic world where we can learn to actually get along with those who are different than us.

Take a look at what happened in 1963:

George Wallace became Governor of Alabama and proclaimed “segregation now, segregation tomorrow, and segregation forever. “

Betty Friedan’s The Feminine Mystique launched the reawakening of the women’s movement in the United States as women’s organizations and consciousness raising groups spread.

70,000 marchers arrived in London to demonstrate against nuclear weapons.

Martin Luther King, Jr. issued his Letter from Birmingham Jail.

The US Supreme Court ruled that state-mandated Bible reading in public schools was unconstitutional.

Pope Paul VI succeeded Pope John XXIII and continued the Vatican Council II. Priests were now asked to celebrate Mass in the language of the countries in which they lived, face the congregation, and not only to be heard and seen but also to signal to worshippers that they were being included because they were a vital component of the service. No longer was prayer to be seen as a performance, but active participation.

The United States, United Kingdom, and Soviet Union signed a nuclear test ban treaty.

Martin Luther King, Jr delivered his I Have A Dream speech on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial to an audience of 250,000 people participating in the March on Washington for Jobs and Freedoms.

South Vietnamese President Diem was assassinated following a military coup.

“ I Want to Hold Your Hand” and “ I Saw Her Standing There” were released in the U.S., marking the beginning of Beatlemania on an international level.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

President John F. Kennedy was assassinated.

And the 1970s became fertile ground for even more divisiveness:

As the protests against the Viet Nam war intensified, the backlash began to take shape. When Richard Nixon won the presidency in 1968 he dismantled programs put in place by President Johnson's War on Poverty. The anti-war protests increased in frequency and no longer only w ere students protesting, but professors, scientists, and stay at home mothers.

In response to protesters, hippies and the new drug culture, President Nixon's 'silent majority,' -- mostly white working and middle class voters, were angry at what they saw as the destruction of a country they had known and loved.

The nation seemed to tear apart at the seams as America watched the live coverage of the Watergate hearings. When President Nixon finally resigned from office in 1974 the seeds of government mistrust were firmly rooted.

The women's rights movement took hold when Congress approved the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) to the Constitution in 1972. Twenty-two of the necessary 38 states ratified with no difficulty, but the conservative faction in the country saw it as a threat to the traditional role of wife and mother and successfully fought back and defeated it.

The 1980s were a difficult period for Democrats. I remember helping to mount the Democratic convention in 1984 and standing on the podium that last night looking at a sea of waving American flags, excited that the first woman had been nominated for Vice President, inspired by Mario Cuomo's speech about the "two cities on a hill" and all I could think about was my dog. I didn't believe in any of it anymore. Reagan had done a great job of making the word liberal sound like a dirty word. Few Democrats had passion back then- we were so splintered and couldn't get along which lead to the creation of Democratic Leadership Forum and the eventual rise of Bill Clinton in 1992.

Hillary is the embodiment of the changes that have been bubbling up since 1963. She is a woman embracing the need to include everyone at the table. But, she is falling into a trap that started in the 80s -- demonizing her opponent. That happened back in the 80s to raise funds. Direct mail campaigns for Dems, Republicans, and special interests groups had to demonize their opponents to fan the flames of fear to survive.

What Bernie Sanders represents is someone who doesn't seem to be caught in that demonizing cycle. There has to be a way for Hillary to rise above it, too, with humor, compassion and empathy. She needs new tactics, a new strategy and to breakaway fro m how she handled her adversaries in the past. She most likely first developed her deep distrust of conservative operatives in her formative years working as a lawyer during the Watergate hearings. That mistrust of Nixon and his associates left a lasting scar on so many of us. But, we need to move passed it.

Stephen Hawking said something recently that might help ground a new strategy:

"The human failing I would most like to correct is aggression. It may have had survival advantage in caveman days, to get more food, territory or a partner with whom to reproduce, but now it threatens to destroy us all. We need to replace aggression with empathy, which "brings us together in a peaceful loving state."

Hillary needs to be President of the United States to act upon Hawking's insight and her ability to lead must start with a new kind of campaign.

Catherine

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jake Sullivan" <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
"Christina Reynolds" <creynolds@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 7/31/2015 5:13:35 AM
Subject: RE: TWEET | Rubio Hits HRC On Cuba, Russia

Adding Reynolds.

Perhaps an HRC tweet along the lines of:

Those who seek to lead our country should focus on the future, not try to pull us back to the past. Embargo hasn't worked for 50+ years. Let's try something new.

From: John Podesta [mailto:john.podesta@gmail.com]
Sent: Friday, July 31, 2015 12:05 PM
To: Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com >
Cc: Laura Rosenberger <lrosenberger@hillaryclinton.com >; Brian Fallon <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com >; Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >
Subject: RE: TWEET | Rubio Hits HRC On Cuba, Russia

I'm good with either. Whatever is faster.

On Jul 31, 2015 8:00 AM, "Jake Sullivan" <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

> Adding Laura and Fallon. John, did you have in mind having HRC hit back, or campaign?
>
> From: Dan Schwerin [mailto:dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com]
> Sent: Friday, July 31, 2015 10:57 AM
> To: John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >; Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com >
> Subject: Fwd: TWEET | Rubio Hits HRC On Cuba, Russia
>
> Here we go...
>
> ---------- Forwarded message ----------
> From: Jeremy Massey <jmassey@hillaryclinton.com >
> Date: Fri, Jul 31, 2015 at 10:31 AM
> Subject: TWEET | Rubio Hits HRC On Cuba, Russia
> To: Clips <clips@hillaryclinton.com >
>
> User Actions
> Following
>
> Marco RubioVerified account @ marcorubio
>
> After Clinton's failed 'reset' with Putin, now she wants to do a 'reset' with Castro. She is making another mistake.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

https://twitter.com/marcorubio/status/627124174495055872

--
Jeremy Massey
Research Department

847 736 9211
JMassey@HillaryClinton.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	5/12/2015 12:37:57 AM
Subject:	H4A News Clips 5.12.15
Attachments:	H4A Clips 5.12.15.docx

H4A Press Clips
May 12, 2015

SUMMARY OF TODAY'S NEWS

Huffington Post did an extensive deep-dive report on Hillary Clinton's legacy as former First Lady of Arkansas. Politico previews Mayor De Blasio's expected announcement today of a progressive "Contract with America," characterizing it as an effort to exert leftward pressure on Clinton.

With a procedural vote set in the Senate later today on fast-track authority on trade, both the New York Times and Washington Post report on Clinton's reticence on the issue of free trade since departing the State Department.

John Oliver's Mother's Day segment this Sunday mirrored Clinton's support and highlighted that the United States is the only developed nation not to provide any paid maternity leave. News outlets declared that paid leave would become a big issue during the 2016 election.

And a group of Ohio voters have filed suit over that state's early voting laws. News outlets have claimed that because Marc Elias is involved in these proceedings that Hillary for America is a party to the suit being filed. The campaign issued a statement indicating it is not involved in the suit, though it shares the concerns of the plaintiffs.

On the Republican side, Jeb Bush's interview with Fox News prompted searing coverage from right-wing commentators such as Byron York and Laura Ingraham over his statements that even knowing what he knows now, Bush would still vote to authorize the Iraq war.

LAST NIGHTS EVENING NEWS

Last night there was no 2016 coverage on any of the networks. The three major news outlets instead covered Patriot's Tom Brady's 4 game suspension and fine due to the Deflate-gate scandal, severe weather in Texas and Arkansas, and the major hurdle cleared for Shell Oil Company to start drilling in the Artic.

SUMMARY OF TODAY'S NEWS..... 1

LAST NIGHTS EVENING NEWS..... 1

TODAY'S KEY STORIES..... 3

On trade deal, Hillary Clinton keeps her distance from Obama and her past // WaPo // David Nakamura – May 12, 2015 4

In Arkansas, Hillary Clinton's Legacy Remains Potent // Huffington Post // Scott Conroy - May 11, 2015 7

Paid Leave Is Going to Matter in 2016, Thanks to John Oliver and Hillary Clinton // New Republic // Elizabeth Stoker Bruenig - May 11, 2015 11

SOCIAL MEDIA..... 13

Alex Hanson (5/11/15, 10:40 PM) @theAlexHanson: First Republican presidential debate on track for Aug. 6 at The Q in Cleveland, sources say s.cleveland.com/USEtCGi via @clevelanddotcom..... 13

Emily Schultheis (5/11/15, 12:15 PM) @emilyrs: New GW Battleground poll has @HillaryClinton at 48 fav/49 unfav. 47% say they would consider voting for her: tarrance.com/docs/BG57quest..... 13

Joe Sudbay (5/11/15 4:54PM) @JoeSudbay: Huh. While Bush struggles with immigration issue, his PAC's anti-gay senior advisor, Jordan Sekulow, today signed amicus to end DACA & DAPA..... 13

Zac Moffatt (5/11/15 12:54PM) @ZacMoffatt: @Hillary Clinton Rubbed Elbows w 250 Top Donors For Each

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Everyday American" She Met Last Week www.americarisingpac.org/populist-hero-..... 13

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 13

Hillary Clinton Walks Tightrope as Pressure Grows to Take Stance on Trade Deal // NYT // Amy Chozick – May 12, 2015 13

Clinton Foundation Donors Fill Hillary's Campaign Coffers // AP // Lachlan Markay - May 12, 2015 16

Ohio lawsuit shows Clinton is already looking at battleground states // On Politics- USA Today // Gregory Korte - May 11, 2015 18

Wall Street warns Hillary Clinton: Don't be like Ed Miliband // Politico // Ben White - May 11, 2015 19

Arkansas: The Clintons Don't Live Here Anymore // Real Clear Politics // Rebecca Berg - May 11, 2015 21

California woman receives Mother's Day greeting from Hillary Clinton // LA Times // Seema Mehta - May 11, 2015 24

Hillary Clinton Adds Latina From Labor Department To Oversee Hispanic, Black, Women's Media // Buzzfeed News // Adrian Carrasquillo - May 11, 2015..... 25

Are Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama 'Affirmative-Action Presidents'? // NY Mag // Jonathan Chait - May 11, 2015 27

The Hillary Clinton paradox: Progressives can't trust her — and that's a good thing // Salon // Elias Isquith - May 11, 2015 28

Clinton campaign's dilemma: What to do with Bill? // WaPo // Phillips Rucker – May 11, 2015 30

Former Clinton Advisor: Bill Looks 'Washed-Out And Washed-Up' // Daily Caller // Scott Greer - May 11, 2015 35

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 35

O'Malley plans 4 stops in NH Wednesday // WMUR // May 11, 2015..... 35

De Blasio 'Can't Think of Anything More Important' Than going to D.C. // Observer // Will Bredderman - May 11, 2015 36

Bill De Blasio, Elizabeth Warren escalate pressure on Hillary Clinton // Politico // Gabriel Debenedetti - May 11, 2015 37

Elizabeth Warren fires back at Obama ... again // Politico // Karey Van Hall – May 11, 2015 39

Why Hillary Clinton needs Elizabeth Warren // Vox // Ezra Klein - May 11, 2015..... 39

GOP..... 41

First GOP debate: Aug. 6 in Cleveland // Politico // Dylan Byers - May 11, 2015..... 41

Jeb Bush Says He Wouldn't Repeal Obama's Immigration Actions Right Away // Bloomberg Politics // Michael C. Bender - May 11, 2015 41

The Assets and Liabilities of Jeb Bush // WSJ // Gerald F. Seib - May 11, 2015..... 42

Jeb Bush leans on nonprofit group as he prepares likely presidential run // Washington Post // Ed O'Keefe and Matea Gold - May 11, 2015 44

Bush favorability rating suffers in new poll // The Hill // Jonathan Easley - May 11, 2015 46

John Boehner press aide Michael Steel takes job with Jeb Bush // Politico // Jake Sherman - May 11, 2015 47

Jeb Bush's disastrous defense of the Iraq War // Washington Examiner // Byron York - May 11, 2015 48

Jeb Bush's Revisionist History of the Iraq War // New York Times // Andrew Rosenthal - May 11, 2015 50

All in the Family // Slate // Jamelle Bouie - May 11, 2015..... 51

PolitFact NH: Jeb Bush says he met NH man who founded only U.S. bank since Dodd-Frank // Concord Monitor // Clay Wirestone - May 10, 2015 53

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

First on CNN: Ted Cruz to host fundraiser along U.S.-Mexico border // CNN Politics // Theodore Schleifer - May 11, 2015 56

Rand Paul Plans To Filibuster Patriot Act // Huffington Post // Igor Bobic – May 11, 2015 57

Rand Paul Battles the PATRIOT Act (and Fellow Senators Who Miss Votes) // Bloomberg // David Weigel - May 11, 2015 58

Rand Paul supports bird flu role of agency he tried to cut // USA Today // Christopher Doering - May 11, 2015 59

Rand Paul's 'Fast Track' Dilemma // WSJ // Bob Davis – May 11, 2015..... 61

Rand Paul Campaign Takes a Licking in New Hampshire // TIME // Philip Elliott - May 11, 2015 63

Chris Christie Racked Up $300k of Food and Alcohol on Expense Account // TIME // Sam Frizell - May 11, 2015 65

Marco Rubio Pushes Extension of NSA Phone Metadata Program // Bloomberg // Ali Elkin - May 11, 2015 65

We Can't Turn To The Leaders Of Yesterday // Medium // Marco Rubio - May 11, 2015..... 66

Scott Walker Helps Journalists in Wisconsin Cover His Trip to Israel // NYT- First Draft // Nick Corasanti – May 11, 2015 67

What Ben Carson's Flat Tax Would Do to the Poor // Bloomberg // Peter Coy – May 11, 2015 67

Carly Fiorina Changes Mind On Amending Constitution To Bar Same-Sex Marriage // Huffington Post // Amanda Terkel – May 11, 2015 68

TOP NEWS..... 69

DOMESTIC..... 69

Administration Gives Conditional Approval for Shell to Drill in Arctic // New York Times // Coral Davenport - May 11, 2015 69

Wellmark spurns Obamacare exchange, but two competitors don't // Des Moines Register // Tony Leys - May 11, 2015 71

HHS: Insurers must cover all birth control // The Hill // Peter Sullivan – May 11, 2015.... 74

Tex. bill would bar local officials from issuing same-sex-marriage licenses // Washington Post // Sandhya Somashekhar - May 11, 2015 75

INTERNATIONAL..... 78

Pakistanis Knew Where Osama Bin Laden Was, U.S. Sources Say // NBC News // Matthew Cole, Richard Esposito, Robert Windrem and Andrea Mitchell – May 11, 2015..... 78

Nepal Rattled by Powerful New Earthquake East of Capital // NYT // Austin Ramzy – May 12, 2015 79

John Kerry and Vladimir Putin to Hold Talks in Russia // TIME // Matthew Lee - May 11, 2015 81

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS..... 81

Clinton clobbers Rubio on immigration // The Hill // Brent Budowsky – May 11, 2015..... 81

Clinton's claim that illegal immigrants pay more in taxes than some corporations // Washington Post // Glen Kessler - May 11, 2015 82

Hillary Clinton hasn't answered a question from the media in 20 days // Washington Post // Chriz Cillizza - May 11, 2015 85

I Am A Dreamer Who Met Hillary Clinton // Lets Talk Nevada // Blanca Gamez - May 11, 2015 86

Barack Obama's Hillary Clinton Problem // Roll Call // Steven Dennis - May 12, 2015..... 88

Smart Social Programs // New York Times // Jason Furman - May 11, 2015..... 90

HBO's Veep Just Got Very Real About the Hillary Clinton Campaign // Vanity Fair // Joanna Robinson - May 11, 2015 92

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

On trade deal, Hillary Clinton keeps her distance from Obama and her past // WaPo // David Nakamura – May 12, 2015

The United States' reputation in Asia was suffering under the weight of its own economic and political turmoil when Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton arrived in Hong Kong to reassure American business executives in the summer of 2011.

Back in Washington, President Obama was locked in a budget dispute with Congress that would ultimately damage the nation's credit rating. But in remarks to the American Chamber of Commerce, Clinton painted a robust vision of U.S. economic leadership, anchored by an emerging free-trade deal that "will bring together economies from across the Pacific."

The goal of the Trans-Pacific Partnership, she explained, was to "create a new high standard for multilateral free trade," a pact that would cement the United States' standing in the world's fastest-growing region.

Four years later, with Obama making a desperate final push to complete that 12-nation pact, his former partner and most effective global advocate for the deal has gone quiet. As the president has scoured Capitol Hill for elusive Democratic support in recent weeks, Clinton has said virtually nothing about the TPP, other than to point out areas of the deal with which she has concerns.

[How Obama could face a Democratic filibuster on trade]

Clinton's silence on trade, coming at the worst possible time for Obama, dovetails with her transformation into a presidential candidate eager to align herself more squarely with the liberal wing of her party. In other areas in which Clinton has moved to the left — such as immigration reform and gay marriage — White House aides have been delighted that she has forcefully embraced the president's governing record.

But on trade, Clinton's hedge has left Obama without political cover in his increasingly bitter feud with Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) and other progressives, who have fiercely opposed the pact as a boondoggle for big business. On Tuesday, a bill to grant Obama "fast track" authority to complete the trade pact faces its first test in the Senate, without a clear path to the necessary 60 votes to avoid a filibuster.

"One of the biggest proponents of the TPP in the administration now, as a candidate, picking on a couple of technical issues just looks like pure politicking," said Ernest Bower, a Southeast Asia expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

For Clinton, the trade pact is "part of her legacy," Bower said. "She really believes in it." He predicted that as president she would "not only work to support it, but expand it as fast as she can."

White House aides have refused to criticize Clinton for remaining on the sidelines, noting that the trade pact has undergone changes since she departed more than two years ago. But she has been mocked by her political rivals on both sides of the aisle — including other Democratic presidential hopefuls who oppose the deal and GOP leaders who support it — for her refusal to take a clear position.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“She can’t sit on the sidelines and let the president swing in the wind here,” House Speaker John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said on “Meet the Press” last week.

Clinton’s campaign pointed to a statement from three weeks ago, in which her spokesman said any trade pact must “raise wages and create more good jobs at home” and strengthen national security. Clinton reiterated those criteria a few days later during an appearance in New Hampshire, her only public comments on the trade deal since launching her campaign.

In many ways, the politics for Clinton are playing out in a fashion similar to 2008, when both she and Obama, competing for support in Rust Belt states during the Democratic primary, distanced themselves from the 1993 North American Free Trade Agreement, signed by President Bill Clinton.

Longtime allies described Hillary Clinton as generally less inclined to support large, multilateral trade deals than her husband was. As a senator, she voted against the Central American Free Trade Agreement in 2005, as did Obama, then also a senator.

“Some people are generally pro-trade or anti-trade. She’s case-by-case on trade,” said Gene Sperling, director of the National Economic Council in both the Clinton and Obama administrations. “There is no question she has historically had a more skeptical view on trade than President Clinton.”

With manufacturing-heavy Iowa holding the first-in-the-nation caucuses — which she lost to Obama seven years ago — Clinton would be foolish to actively stump in favor of the president’s trade initiative, allies said.

But this time, the political calculus is complicated by her legacy as the nation’s top diplomat.

Foreign policy analysts have pointed to the Obama administration’s bid to shift U.S. attention and resources toward Asia to counter China as potentially one of Clinton’s most significant achievements as secretary of state (especially when compared with the deteriorating security environments in the Middle East and Eastern Europe).

From the start of her tenure, Clinton made Asia a priority; her first trip in office was a swing through Japan, Indonesia, South Korea and China. Early on, Clinton and her top aides endorsed the TPP as a way to balance the Pentagon’s military buildup in the Asia Pacific region with an economic platform.

Clinton’s team, in conjunction with the White House, helped elevate the trade pact as a pillar of what Clinton later described, in a Foreign Policy magazine cover story in October 2011, as the administration’s “pivot” to Asia.

“Clearly, we all saw this as strategic,” said James Keith, the U.S. ambassador to Malaysia from 2007 to 2010. Before the administration publicly unveiled its Asia strategy, “there was lots of talk of having to add meat to the bones, not just on security but on economics, too. There were deep discussions about making it more than just showing up, but also about adding real resources and economic integration in Asia.”

Yet a primary concern Clinton has raised about the TPP after leaving office did not register alarms inside the State Department during her tenure.

In 2009, the agency oversaw a review of a component of U.S. trade policy, appointing a panel of business officials, labor leaders and academics to review the language in the United States’ “model bilateral investment treaty.” That treaty is used by U.S. negotiators to open talks with other countries and is included in most trade deals.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

During the review, which lasted six months, one of the primary disagreements centered on the standard inclusion of a dispute settlement mechanism that allows corporations to sue nation-states over policies that damage their profits. Under the provision, the cases are heard by an international tribunal that rules outside of domestic legal systems.

To the chagrin of the labor representatives, the dispute mechanism provision remained intact during the State Department review after the business representatives on the panel fiercely defended it.

“I had the feeling that we were a box that was just going to be checked off,” said Kevin P. Gallagher, an associate professor at Boston University who participated on the review panel. “It was a multi-stakeholder dialogue in which we did not agree with each other, so they just go with the old model.”

Warren has made this arrangement — formally known as “investor-state dispute settlement” — a chief part of her objections to the TPP. She has argued that the mechanism potentially exposes U.S. taxpayers to massive monetary damages outside of U.S. courts if corporations sue the government over new laws to protect the environment or workers.

Obama has called her arguments “dishonest,” and he has pointed out that the United States has been sued just 13 times over the provision in previous trade pacts and never lost a case.

In her book “Hard Choices,” published last year, Clinton raised concerns that echo Warren’s. She cited a case in which the Asia division of tobacco giant Philip Morris sued Australia over a “plain packaging” law, employing the dispute settlement provisions in an Australia-Hong Kong trade pact.

“We should avoid some of the provisions sought by business interests,” Clinton wrote.

Some progressives said they do not fault Clinton for raising concerns only after leaving office. They noted that the issue gained greater notoriety and urgency after public protests last year in Europe after a Swedish company sued Germany under a similar trade-deal provision.

Robert Hormats, a high-ranking State Department official from 2009 to 2013, oversaw the trade policy review and emphasized that Clinton was not involved in those types of granular policy discussions.

By the time she left office, the general framework for the TPP was already in place. During a speech in Australia in November 2012, Clinton referred to the pact as “the gold standard in trade agreements.”

The risk now for Clinton is that if the trade deal fails, the Obama administration’s “Asia pivot” strategy risks being viewed as more rhetorical than tangible, foreign policy analysts said, which could lead to a reevaluation of her legacy at the State Department.

“We saw it as a chance to make a difference,” Hormats said, reflecting on the Clinton team’s early embrace of the TPP. “You have to remember, the American economy was in the dumps. The weakness of the American economy in the financial crisis led many to assume the U.S. was backing off and incapacitated.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

After he and other Clinton aides made trips to China in 2009, Hormats said, “we came back more resolute than ever that we had to do this.”

In Arkansas, Hillary Clinton’s Legacy Remains Potent // Huffington Post // Scott Conroy - May 11, 2015

Back in the sizzling summer of 1991, Arkansans could often find Bill and Hillary Clinton sitting in the bleachers at softball fields around Little Rock, as they watched their 11-year-old daughter Chelsea play third base for the Molar Rollers -- a team sponsored by a local dentist.

After the last out was made, Chelsea’s teammates would often get a thrill when the governor loaded them into his official vehicle and took them out to get frozen yogurt. But every now and then, Bill’s jam-packed schedule was such that Hillary was the only member of Arkansas’ first couple who could attend a particular game.

It was on one such occasion that longtime Clinton family friend Skip Rutherford -- whose daughter Martha was the Molar Rollers’ catcher -- struck up a conversation about national politics while sitting in the stands next to Hillary.

Still just a few months after the Persian Gulf War’s triumphant completion, President George H.W. Bush’s approval rating remained above 70 percent, and Rutherford shared the popular opinion at the time that his re-election was all but assured.

“Whoever ends up running, it doesn’t look like they’ll have much of a chance,” Rutherford recalls lamenting to Hillary. “I just don’t think President Bush can be beat. The numbers just look like he’s got the thing in the bag.”

Clinton -- the acclaimed attorney, who typically chose her words carefully -- pondered this for a moment before issuing her reply.

“Well, I’m not so sure,” she said.

“Really?” Rutherford shot back, not yet aware that her husband had begun contemplating a White House run.

“What the Democrats need is a message and a messenger,” Hillary said.

Clinton was, no doubt, referring to her husband. But in truth, “Billery,” as Bill and Hillary Clinton were known in Arkansas, was indeed a singular force, and it was impossible to talk about the achievements of the former without mentioning those of the latter.

Even today, Hillary Rodham Clinton’s legacy in Arkansas -- particularly in the realms of education, health care and childhood welfare -- remains nearly as robust as her husband’s.

This is, after all, a city where a 15-minute drive eastward can take you from the Hillary Rodham Clinton Children’s Library along President Clinton Avenue and then on to Bill and Hillary Clinton National Airport.

As the Democratic frontrunner revs up her second campaign for the presidency, one of most common critiques that Republicans levy against Hillary Clinton goes something like this: “Yeah, she has a long resume. But what has she actually accomplished?”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On the federal stage, she has had some significant swings and misses that have fed into that perception. Among the most politically toxic: her failed 1993 health care reform push as U.S. first lady, and the Russia “reset” policy and botched response to the 2012 Benghazi terrorist attacks when she was secretary of state.

Perhaps the simplest rebuttal that Clinton could deliver would be this: “Just look at what I left behind in Arkansas.”

And while her achievements in the state are now a quarter-century or more in the rearview mirror, the Clinton campaign says it isn’t shying away from running, in part, on the now-distant past.

“Every aspect of Hillary’s professional life is an important part of the story for voters in this election because her collective body of work demonstrates a proven track record of being a tenacious fighter for everyday Americans, their families and especially their children,” said Clinton spokesperson Adrienne Elrod. “People know that’s what she’ll do if she gets elected because it’s what she’s always done."

Clinton developed her curiosity -- and ultimately her expertise -- in the issues that would define her tenure as first lady of Arkansas before she moved to the state with the future president.

Following her graduation from Yale Law School in 1973, Hillary Rodham spent a year conducting postgraduate work at the Yale Child Study Center, during which time she published a widely cited article in the Harvard Educational Review examining how children were viewed under the law, and offering significant proposals for reform.

She also landed a job working for the Children’s Defense Fund, where she worked to expose discrepancies between census data and school enrollment -- a time she recalled at the first public event of her 2016 campaign in Monticello, Iowa, this April.

“I was knocking on doors saying, ‘Is there anybody school-aged who’s not in school?’ and finding blind kids and deaf kids and kids in wheelchairs who were just left out,” she recalled. “And I was able in Arkansas to work and try to improve education there and give more kids chances who really deserved them.”

Hillary Rodham’s path to improving education in Arkansas began in 1974 when she moved to Fayetteville and became just the second female faculty member at the University of Arkansas Law School. Bill Clinton lost his bid for a U.S. House seat the same year.

After she married the following year, retaining her maiden name, Bill was elected attorney general of Arkansas, and the couple moved to Little Rock. Meanwhile, Hillary’s own career took off upon joining the high-powered Rose Law Firm, where she took on pro bono children’s rights cases.

In 1977, Hillary co-founded and drew up the articles of incorporation for the Arkansas Advocates for Children and Families -- a group that for nearly four decades since has fought for expanded opportunities in early education, juvenile justice reform, increases in state funding for child health care and other major initiatives.

“She was a very forceful advocate to say the least,” recalled Jim Miles, who worked with her to create the group and develop its mission. “I think Arkansas Advocates is one of the nation’s premier child advocacy organization. They have tremendous peer respect.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

After Bill Clinton was sworn in as governor for the first time in 1979, he appointed his wife to be the chairwoman of Arkansas' Rural Health Advisory Committee -- a group that worked to expand health care access within the state's large rural population.

Around the same time, Hillary became a board member of the Arkansas Children's Hospital, where she helped establish the state's first neonatal nursery while she was pregnant with Chelsea. The facility has since expanded several times over.

Meanwhile, after reading about it during a trip to Florida, Hillary brought to Arkansas a program called Home Instruction for Parents for Preschool Youngsters, or HIPPY, which trains parents of at-risk children in early education methods.

It wasn't until after Clinton lost re-election in 1980 and then won his 1982 comeback bid that the newly minted political wife (who now made it known that she would henceforth be known as "Hillary Rodham Clinton") made what is widely regarded as her most significant and lasting contribution to public policy in Arkansas.

Shortly after he reassumed office in 1982, Bill Clinton named his wife as chair of the Arkansas Educational Standards Committee, an entity with the daunting task of reforming the state's public education system, which was ranked at or near the very bottom of all 50 states in just about every measure.

To get a sense of how dire the situation had become, consider that a majority of Arkansas' 365 school districts at the time offered no art or chemistry classes, and almost half had no foreign language program to speak of. And teacher training in some districts was fourth-rate.

Don Ernst -- who was a social studies teacher at Southside High School in Fort Smith, Arkansas, before joining Clinton's education policy staff -- recalls walking into his school's biology lab and seeing two dozen unopened microscopes in storage. When he asked the biology teacher why the instruments weren't available to her class, she responded that she was afraid her students might break them.

Still, as Ernst recalls, school reform in Arkansas was not an easy sell.

"It was doing the right thing," he said. "But we also had to figure out how to deal with the politics of an anti-tax state and a state that has never been particularly fond of intellectuals and education."

Hillary spent months traveling the state to sell her proposals for reform -- which included boosting course offerings, reducing class sizes and implementing testing requirements for both students and teachers -- while soliciting ideas from parents and teachers.

In the end, the administration tied the package to an unpopular initiative to boost the state sales tax by 1 percentage point.

Though she faced heated pushback from the teachers' union and a related group, Hillary largely won over lawmakers in the end.

Political operatives in the state still laugh about the thunderstruck reaction that Rep. Lloyd George, a colorful state representative with a syrupy drawl, had to her presentation: "I think we've elected the wrong Clinton!"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Though Bill Clinton received most of the credit nationally for the reform package that he signed into law, Skip Rutherford, who has served for the last decade as the dean of the Clinton School of Public Service, said it was Hillary who “took Arkansas to a completely different level educationally.”

“She was really saying, ‘Look, when our students graduate now, they’re going to be competing in a world economy,’” he said. “She was very visionary. She did it not for immediate gratification but for long-term success.”

In recent years, Arkansas' public school system has been ranked by education groups as high as fifth in the nation and as low as 45th, as relatively low achievement levels have struggled to keep up with the high standards that Clinton implemented.

But in spite of the continued challenges, education in Arkansas is no longer the national laughingstock that it was when a common lament among self-conscious policymakers around the capitol was, “Thank God for Mississippi.”

And for Clinton -- particularly in a general election scenario, in which she may face off against a Republican governor who will boast of his own executive leadership -- that is something to crow about.

Still, even if she does emphasize her Arkansas achievements more than she did during the 2008 campaigns, there appears to be little chance that she’ll be doing so within Arkansas’ borders.

The years of Democratic domination here have long since passed, as Arkansas has assumed an overwhelmingly Republican profile that is more in keeping with neighboring states like Oklahoma and Missouri than it is with the new South battlegrounds of North Carolina and Virginia.

It was Bill Clinton himself who offered a frank reality check for any Democrats who may have dreams of an Arkansas victory in 2016 dancing through their heads.

"I was governor a long time," he said last month during a question-and-answer session at his alma mater, Georgetown University. "The people of my native state were good enough to elect me five times. Based on recent events, I don't know if I could win again down there."

Paid Leave Is Going to Matter in 2016, Thanks to John Oliver and Hillary Clinton // New Republic // Elizabeth Stoker Bruenig - May 11, 2015

John Oliver’s Mother’s Day segment this Sunday opened with a glimpse into what businesses are willing to take in the name of motherhood (namely: your money, on this shamelessly Hallmarkian holiday) versus what they’re willing to give: paid maternity leave.

Oliver pointed out that the United States is singular among developed nations in its complete failure to provide any paid leave to mothers whatsoever. Globally, we are joined only by Papua New Guinea in our lack of paid maternity leave policy, according to data collected by the International Labor Organization, a United Nations agency. Unlike mothers in countries with mandates providing paid maternity leave—The Netherlands, for example, where women are guaranteed 16 weeks of paid leave, or Norway, where women can take 36 weeks—women in the U.S. often patch together a mishmash of vacation time, sick days, and whatever maternity leave is available from their workplace to eke out time to care for their newborns.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Oliver observed, quite rightly, that the meager twelve weeks of unpaid leave currently mandated by the federal government spooked employers when proposed in 1993. Businesses' allergy to any kind of regulation, Oliver proposed, helps explain why America has fallen so far behind when it comes to paid family leave. California's paid maternity leave mandate hasn't introduced chaos or even inconvenienced businesses in the state; nonetheless, only three states have enacted similar legislation.

It is a scandal that, in a nation where family values feature so prominently in political discourse, there is barely a shred of protection for working women who give birth. Worse, even the weak provision of twelve weeks unpaid leave doesn't extend to some women, as Demos senior fellow Caroline Fredrickson points out in her new book Under the Bus: How Working Women are Being Run Over. Women who work part-time, for small businesses, and immigrant women often in domestic work are left out of our leave mandates. Unfortunately, the women who happen to be excluded from these protections also happen to be the poorest workers, a reality that leads to dire conclusions: "[I]n almost 9 percent of cases where [families] go under the poverty line, the precipitating factor was the birth of a child," Fredrickson notes, "and nearly 25 percent of these families succumb to poverty in thirty days when they are dependent on the earnings of a single mother." Fredrickson also reports that a study of 1,700 bankruptcy cases conducted by Human Rights Watch found that 7 percent of debtors identified the birth of a child as their reason for going bankrupt.

With numbers like these, it's a wonder nobody has made paid family leave a campaign issue yet. But Hillary Clinton is aiming to fill that gap. On Mother's Day, Clinton's campaign posted a two-minute video detailing Clinton's respect for her mother, her role in her daughter and granddaughter's lives, and her support for paid leave. "It is outrageous that America is the only country in the developed world that doesn't guarantee paid leave," Clinton says, her voice set to a montage of family photographs and her own meetings with constituents' kids and babies. "We know," Clinton adds, "that when women are strong, families are strong."

Fredrickson's data on childbirth and poverty seem to bear out Clinton's claim: When women are well supported in terms of paid leave, families have a better shot at staying above the poverty line, which is good news for parents and babies. The Right may have a traditional claim to the politics of strong families, but unless they can stake out a position that will offer the kind of protections to mothers that Clinton has in mind, the pro-family rhetoric of the Right will remain nothing but talk.

SOCIAL MEDIA

Alex Hanson (5/11/15, 10:40 PM) @theAlexHanson: First Republican presidential debate on track for Aug. 6 at The Q in Cleveland, sources say s.cleveland.com/USEtCGi via @clevelanddotcom

Emily Schultheis (5/11/15, 12:15 PM) @emilyrs: New GW Battleground poll has @HillaryClinton at 48 fav/49 unfav. 47% say they would consider voting for her: tarrance.com/docs/BG57quest ...

Joe Sudbay (5/11/15 4:54PM) @JoeSudbay: Huh. While Bush struggles with immigration issue, his PAC's anti-gay senior advisor, Jordan Sekulow, today signed amicus to end DACA & DAPA

Zac Moffatt (5/11/15 12:54PM) @ZacMoffatt: @Hillary Clinton Rubbed Elbows w 250 Top Donors For Each "Everyday American" She Met Last Week www.americarisingpac.org/populist-hero-

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE

Hillary Clinton Walks Tightrope as Pressure Grows to Take Stance on Trade Deal // NYT // Amy Chozick – May 12, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Liberal Democrats are intensifying their pressure on Hillary Rodham Clinton to oppose President Obama's Pacific trade deal as detrimental to American jobs. But Mr. Obama's allies want her to endorse the accord, which the president has called a boon to the United States economy.

And Mrs. Clinton, stuck between the progressives she must woo in a Democratic nomination fight and the president under whom she served, has remained, for the most part, mum.

The issue has become the first major policy test in her fledgling campaign, with Mrs. Clinton under mounting pressure to pick a side in the delicate and heated debate over the Trans-Pacific Partnership deal, a 12-nation trade agreement that Mr. Obama has aggressively pursued and that is facing a critical vote in Congress on Tuesday.

Just 48 hours after Mrs. Clinton delighted liberal Democrats with a proposal to expand citizenship eligibility to immigrants who are in the country illegally, protesters on Thursday urged her to speak out against the trade deal.

Photo

Protesters outside a fund-raiser attended by Mrs. Clinton last week in Beverly Hills, Calif. Credit Damian Dovarganes/Associated Press

"Stop the TPP!" read one of the signs held by demonstrators who circled the mansion in Beverly Hills, Calif., where Mrs. Clinton attended a high-dollar fund-raiser.

The left wing has not been this agitated over a trade deal since the last time Mrs. Clinton ran for president, when her squishy position on the North American Free Trade Agreement, signed into law by her husband in 1993, ignited debate during the Ohio and Pennsylvania primaries.

"The fact is, she was saying great things about Nafta until she started running for president," Mr. Obama said of Mrs. Clinton during their 2008 fight for the Democratic nomination.

This time, in an odd twist, it is Mr. Obama's trade deal that haunts Mrs. Clinton's early candidacy. If her stance on immigration, which would go further than Mr. Obama's executive actions, offended the White House last week, any remarks she might make against the administration's trade accord could fracture her already delicate relationship with the president.

On Saturday, Mr. Obama vigorously pushed back against Senator Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts, who has said the trade accord will help Wall Street and hurt American workers.

"The truth of the matter is that Elizabeth is, you know, a politician like everybody else," Mr. Obama told Yahoo News.

"She's absolutely wrong," he added.

But even a tacit endorsement of the accord would put Mrs. Clinton on the opposite side of a very vocal liberal base of her party, which she has increasingly been courting in her campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The chances of pleasing both sides are slim.

Mr. Obama's allies — including congressional Republicans and business leaders who support the trade accord — as well as liberal Democrats, labor leaders, environmentalists and human rights advocates, have forcefully called for Mrs. Clinton to take a stance.

If there is one thing both sides agree on, it is that Mrs. Clinton needs to say more than the vague comment she made in New Hampshire last month: "Any trade deal has to produce jobs and raise wages and increase prosperity and protect our security."

"She can't sit on the sidelines and let the president swing in the wind here," John A. Boehner, the Republican House speaker, said on the NBC News program "Meet the Press" last week.

From the other side came this: "This is one you can't waffle. You're either for the T.P.P. or against it," Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont, who is seeking the Democratic nomination and opposes the deal, told MSNBC.

The Huffington Post reported that John D. Podesta, chairman of Mrs. Clinton's campaign, had jokingly bemoaned in private, "Can you make it go away?"

The Clinton campaign may not be able to make the issue go away, but it can be avoided until after a vote on Tuesday on legislation that would grant Mr. Obama the ability to "fast-track" talks on a final trade deal, which liberals vehemently oppose. Mrs. Clinton has no public events scheduled this week, only private fund-raisers and a summit meeting in Brooklyn with donors on Thursday. A spokesman for her campaign declined to comment.

"She hasn't taken any steps in the wrong direction, but she hasn't gone as far as many Democrats who have spoken out against 'fast track,' " Adam Green, co-founder of the Progressive Change Campaign Committee, said. "She's punted a little so far."

When she does finally weigh in, Mrs. Clinton's position could give the liberal wing of her party pause. Left-leaning Democrats have been encouraged by her recent campaign speeches about inequality and immigration, but many still harbor concerns that Mrs. Clinton's policies will not do enough to advance their causes.

The campaign had hoped to delay outlining her policy proposals until later this summer, but the pressure over the trade deal could prompt Mrs. Clinton to detail her domestic policies sooner.

The debate has remnants of her 2008 campaign, when Nafta became a litmus test for whether Mrs. Clinton had the liberal credentials of her opponents, Barack Obama and John Edwards.

Mrs. Clinton was accused of political posturing when she opposed Nafta, the signature trade deal of her husband's administration, which created the world's largest trading bloc, among Canada, the United States and Mexico. Coming out against the Trans-Pacific Partnership, which she supported as secretary of state under Mr. Obama, could generate similar criticism.

"She was working for President Obama, and you do what your boss does," Senator Sherrod Brown, Democrat of Ohio, said of Mrs. Clinton's past support for the partnership.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For Mrs. Clinton, coming out against the deal would be tantamount to a repudiation of not just a major legislative goal of Mr. Obama's, but also of Mr. Clinton's economic legacy. There are few policies Mr. Clinton is more defensive about than Nafta, which many on the left have come to see as the ultimate symbol of the perils of globalization.

More than two decades later, Nafta still haunts Mrs. Clinton (who opposed parts of the deal as first lady), and it ignites a visceral reaction on the campaign trail.

"If she really does stand with working and middle-class Americans, she needs to come out against the Trans-Pacific Partnership," said Arturo Carmona, executive director of Presente.org and one of the protesters outside Mrs. Clinton's fund-raiser on Thursday. He pointed to damage done by Nafta.

After a speech at the Nike headquarters in Beaverton, Ore., on Friday, Mr. Obama said liberal Democrats who opposed the trade deal — which would include Asia-Pacific nations and affect 40 percent of America's exports and imports — were stuck in the 1990s.

"Their arguments are based on fears, or they're fighting Nafta, the trade deal that was passed 25 years ago, or 20 years ago," he said.

Clinton Foundation Donors Fill Hillary's Campaign Coffers // AP // Lachlan Markay - May 12, 2015

High-dollar donors to Hillary Clinton's family foundation have hosted the majority of the Democratic presidential candidate's early fundraisers, data compiled by political spending watchdogs reveal.

Twelve of the 21 Hillary for America fundraising events reported by the Sunlight Foundation have been or will be hosted by donors to the Bill, Hillary, and Chelsea Clinton Foundation, according to Sunlight's Political Party Time website, which tracks fundraising events.

The foundation donors hosting fundraisers include some of the largest supporters of Clinton's past political efforts. Together, they have given as much as $90 million to the foundation, according to donor disclosures on its website.

The largest foundation donor to host one of the events is Chicago media mogul Fred Eychaner. Clinton will attend a fundraiser at his home on May 20. Eychaner has donated more than $25 million to the Clinton Foundation.

Clinton fundraisers' donations to the foundation have come by way of personal contributions as well as through foundations and private companies that they own or operate.

Last week, Clinton attended fundraisers at the San Francisco homes of billionaire environmentalist Tom Steyer and Susie Tompkins Buell, founder of the Esprit clothing brand.

Steyer has personally donated to the foundation. Buell has done so in a personal capacity and through her own eponymous foundation and a donor-advised fund of a separate philanthropic group. The latter has contributed as much as $5 million to the Clinton Foundation.

Hedge fund manager Marc Lasry has personally donated as much as $250,000. His firm, Avenue Capital

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Management II, LP, has chipped in another $25,000 to $50,000.

The foundation lists donations in ranges, making it difficult to know exactly how much each donor has contributed. It also declines to say when specific contributions were made. More than 1,000 donors to the group remain anonymous.

The foundation has become a source of controversy in recent weeks following revelations that Clinton, as secretary of state, may have taken actions that benefitted foreign governments and corporations that donated to the foundation.

Details of those transactions were revealed in a new book, titled Clinton Cash, by Hoover Institute fellow Peter Schweizer. Clinton's presidential campaign is going to extreme lengths to discredit Schweizer following the book's release.

In the book, Schweizer suggests the foundation has served to advance the Clintons' political aspirations since the end of Bill's presidency.

"Perhaps the most important function of the foundation is to bolster Bill and Hillary's reputations as global humanitarians by bringing relief and care to people all over the world," Schweizer wrote.

"This reputation not only flatters the ex-president's ego and benefits Hillary's political career, but it also has real value both in terms of global influence and financial reward."

Many of the foundation donors hosting Hillary for America fundraisers are long-time Clinton supporters. Haim and Cheryl Saban, whose foundation has given as much as $25 million to Clinton's, backed her 2008 presidential bid, as did Buell, Lasry, and Eychaner.

Some Clinton Foundation donors have also contributed recently to other groups expected to back her candidacy, formally or informally.

The TomKat Charitable Trust, the foundation run by Steyer and his wife, is a major donor to the Center for American Progress, which was founded by Clinton campaign operative John Podesta and is expected to play a major role in crafting Clinton's policy positions.

Steven Rattner and his wife Maureen White are also CAP donors. They have given as much as $75,000 to the Clinton Foundation personally and through their own foundation. They will host Clinton at their New York City home for a fundraiser on Wednesday.

CAP donor Elizabeth Bagley hosted Clinton last month for another fundraising event in Washington, D.C. Bagley and her husband have given as much as $5 million to the Clinton Foundation.

In addition to supporting the Clintons' political prospects, Schweizer says that donations to the foundation can be a means to ingratiate oneself with the powerful family in the hope of securing access to their inner circle.

"People look for ways to influence those in power by throwing money in their direction," Schweizer wrote. "Politicians are all too happy to vacuum up contributions from supporters and people who want access or something in return."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Clintons and their foundation vehemently deny any quid-pro-quos.

"The big question is whether taking such money constitutes a transaction," Schweizer wrote. "The Clintons would undoubtedly argue that it does not. The evidence presented in this book suggests otherwise."

Ohio lawsuit shows Clinton is already looking at battleground states // On Politics- USA Today // Gregory Korte - May 11, 2015

Lawyers for Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign and the Ohio Democratic Party have filed suit over Ohio's early voting laws, suggesting that Clinton is already looking downfield to what will be a key battleground state in the 2016 general election.

The lawsuit, filed late Friday in Columbus, alleges that Republican lawmakers in Ohio have specifically targeted key Democratic constituencies — young people, Latinos and African-Americans — by eliminating the so-called "Golden Week" during which voters could register and vote on the same day.

The lawsuit does not mention Clinton, and she is not a plaintiff. The plaintiffs include the Ohio Organizing Collaborative and three Ohio voters — an Ohio State University student with a California driver's license, a Democratic poll worker from suburban Cincinnati and an African-American minister from Akron.

The lawyers are more interesting. They include Don McTigue, a lawyer for the Ohio Democratic Party, and Marc Elias, who's the general counsel for Hillary for America. Elias is not licensed to practice law in Ohio and is seeking permission from the court to represent the plaintiffs in the case.

The Clinton campaign said it was aware of the lawsuit, but it wasn't filed on behalf of the campaign. "However, the campaign shares the concern about undue burdens being placed on the right to vote in states across the country, including Ohio," said Hillary for America Press Secretary Brian Fallon.

But Ohio Secretary of State Jon Husted, a defendant in the suit, called the plaintiff's lawyers "politically motivated, legal lap dogs" who were "simply intending to interject chaos into Ohio's nationally recognized voting system." Husted notes that Ohio recently settled a federal lawsuit over many of the same issues, and that Ohio still has more liberal early voting laws than New York, where Clinton lives.

Elias said the lawsuit was brought on behalf of the named plaintiffs, and is just one of many lawsuits his Washington law firm, Perkins Coie, has brought to defend the right to vote. "It is unfortunate that Secretary Husted chose to respond with a political attack rather than working to remedy the problems identified in our suit," he said in an e-mail.

Wall Street warns Hillary Clinton: Don't be like Ed Miliband // Politico // Ben White - May 11, 2015

NEW YORK — Wall Street has a message for bank-bashing U.S. populist politicians: Put down the pitchforks or you could wind up like Ed Miliband.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Senior financial executives say the Labour leader's anti-bank, soak the rich rhetoric helped sink his party in the U.K. elections and assured a surprisingly big reelection win for Prime Minister David Cameron and his Conservative party last week. Miliband resigned as Labour leader following the loss.

These bankers and their ideological supporters say if likely Democratic presidential nominee Hillary Clinton keeps tacking to the left on Wall Street issues — as Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren, other progressive Democrats and Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders are demanding — she could wind up facing the same fate.

"Cameron embraced the role of the financial sector in growing the U.K. economy and creating jobs, never once criticizing hedge funds, banks or the wealthy," said a top executive at one of Wall Street's largest firms. "Milliband ran against hedge funds and bankers, promising bonus and mansion taxes and lost big. Is that a lesson for Hillary as well?"

This executive, like several others who cited the U.K. election result as a warning to populists, declined to be identified by name or by firm for fear of eliciting a heavy backlash.

Another executive said Milliband's adoption of Warren's approach to the financial sector and banking regulation failed even though U.K. voters trust banks even less than U.S. voters, according to opinion surveys.

"Seems like there might be some political lessons for the U.S. out of the U.K. election — with Milliband's Warren style, anti-business, anti-bank rhetoric clearly falling flat with the general public even as the press ate it up," this executive from another of Wall Street's largest firms said. "And the Edelman trust barometer actually shows that British voters are more distrustful and wary of the banks than here in the U.S."

The financial executives cited Miliband's attacks on Cameron and the Conservatives as the "party of hedge funds" and his calls for higher taxes on the industry as failing to captivate U.K. voters. And they noted that despite polls showing a very tight race, Cameron and his party won 51 percent of the vote and 331 seats in Parliament to just 36 percent and 232 seats for Miliband and his Labour party.

Conservative analysts also said U.S. politicians including Clinton should take note of the U.K. result.

"There are two lessons here," said Douglas Holtz-Eakin of the American Action Forum. "One is the Miliband lesson. The U.S. has now seen that people in the U.K. don't really like this focus on inequality and redistribution. It's not where people are. And the second is that conservatives were very effective in saying they were for working people but keeping the focus on work not excessive government intervention and benefits."

Financial reform advocates in the U.S. say these executives and analysts are delusional and reading things into the U.K. results that are not really there.

"Backwards logic like this almost makes you understand why Wall Street executives are deluded enough to believe they shouldn't be held responsible for blowing up the economy in 2008 and fighting common sense legislation designed to prevent them from doing it again," said Neil Sroka, communications director for progressive group Democracy for America. "If these guys actually believe that Cameron won because he bear-hugged billionaire bankers or think that Democrats will do better in 2016 if they continue treating a thief on Wall Street differently than a thief on Main Street, I've got an tranche of decade-old, toxic mortgages I know they'll want to get in on."

Dennis Kelleher, head of financial reform group Better Markets, said many other factors were at play in the U.K.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Claiming the five-week sprint known as the U.K. election — and the Scottish freedom campaign — means anything for the US is nothing more than wishful thinking by Wall Street’s spinners,” he said. “Secretary Clinton will be spelling out pro-growth agendas that also protect the American people from Wall Street’s dangerous too big to fail banks. It’s not either/or. It’s both.”

The comments from Wall Street executives and conservative analysts come as some in the industry fear that Clinton will continue to move left on financial reform issues as her campaign progresses.

Clinton used her first trip to Iowa as an announced candidate last month to issue a fresh assault. “There’s something wrong,” she told Iowans, when “hedge fund managers pay lower taxes than nurses or the truckers I saw on I-80 when I was driving here over the last two days.”

In a fundraising note last month, Clinton wrote that “families have fought their way back from tough economic times. But it’s not enough — not when the average CEO makes 300 times what the average worker makes.”

Wall Street mostly shrugged off those comments, confident that Clinton, who has enjoyed heavy financial support from the industry, would ultimately govern as a pro-business pragmatist not inclined to bust up big banks or support higher taxes on financial transactions or new controls on executive pay.

But as the “Draft Warren” for president movement continues to gain steam and coalitions of left wing and right wing populists in Congress flirt with the idea of breaking up the biggest banks, Wall Street is getting a bit more nervous. And they are pointing to the U.K. results and Republican gains in 2014 in the U.S. as evidence that Clinton should focus on other issues or face a possible loss in 2016.

“I would say that this is the second major election in a row where bank bashing no longer seems to move voters,” said a lobbyist for the banking industry. “Even where voters may continue to have anger about banks, other issues seem to be driving their votes. We saw that last year in the U.S., and now we seem to be seeing an echo in the U.K.”

Arkansas: The Clintons Don't Live Here Anymore // Real Clear Politics // Rebecca Berg - May 11, 2015

HOPE, Ark. — Nearly a quarter-century after Bill Clinton introduced his small Arkansas hometown to America, Hope is a living shrine to its most famous native son.

Clinton’s first home, on South Hervey Street, has been preserved and converted into a museum. A few blocks away, a former train depot houses the town’s visitor center, filled with even more mementos of the 42nd president’s upbringing and his political rise. At the site where the Julia Chester Hospital once stood, a plaque commemorates Clinton’s birth there.

But there is no marker noting the birth there, nine years later, of another hometown hero: former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, a Republican, who returned to Hope this week to announce his second bid for the Oval Office.

In his speech to an overflow crowd of roughly 2,500 people at a community college, Huckabee said he hoped to bring America, as he had brought himself, “from Hope to higher ground.”

“Here in this small town called Hope, I was raised to believe that where a person started didn’t mean that’s where he had to stop,” Huckabee said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He did not mention by name either Bill Clinton, who famously invoked “a place called Hope” during his 1992 speech to accept the Democratic nomination for president, or Hillary Clinton, the likely Democratic nominee in 2016. He didn’t have to; the connection was obvious.

But the event served not only as a stark reminder of the Clintons, whom Huckabee will use as a foil in his White House race, but also of the Natural State’s sharp political transformation in their absence. The state that was once the last bastion for the Democratic Party in the South has become one of the most firmly Republican states in the country — so much so that even a beloved former Arkansas first lady might not be able to win the state in a general election.

“I do believe Hillary would have carried Arkansas in 2008,” said one Democratic strategist with deep ties to the state. “I think it’s unlikely she carries it in 2016.”

Such a dynamic would until recently have been unthinkable. During Bill Clinton’s nearly 12 years as governor, Hillary Clinton was an equal partner in policy and politics, and her popularity grew along with her husband’s.

When Bill Clinton entrusted his wife as chairman of a committee to enact education reforms, a priority of his administration, she traveled the state on an extended listening tour. In a meeting with lawmakers to discuss the committee’s work, a few of the good ol’ boys were stunned. “Gentlemen, we’ve elected the wrong Clinton!” state Rep. Lloyd George famously remarked.

Although Arkansas has on the national level supported Republican presidential candidates for most of the past three decades, with Bill Clinton twice as the exception, the state’s congressional delegation and statehouse were for most of those years dominated by Democrats.

Helping to keep Democrats in power were three legendary politicians at the top of the party: Dale Bumpers, David Pryor, and Bill Clinton. But, even as Clinton took office as governor for the second time, in 1983, Arkansas Democrats were paddling against a shifting tide. The state’s Republican areas were swelling with in-migration from white retirees, while Democratic populations stagnated.

Still, when Huckabee took office as governor in 1996, he did so as an outsider — the sole Republican statewide elected official, facing the most Democratic statehouse in the country. A video that played before Huckabee took the stage Tuesday recalled when he arrived at the statehouse to find the governor’s office door nailed shut.

Huckabee understood that he could not govern without Democrats, and so he worked extensively with them, enacting a host of policies that could well be used against him in this Republican primary: expanding Medicaid coverage for children, awarding in-state tuition to the children of illegal immigrants; and even pushing for a one-eighth cent tax to fund conservation efforts. Huckabee even enlisted Dick Morris, a former Clinton aide, as a top political adviser.

The political landscape in Arkansas did not truly turn in the GOP’s favor until 2010, when Republican John Boozman unseated Democratic Sen. Blanche Lincoln. During the next election cycle, in 2012, the state legislature flipped to GOP control.

Last year marked the watershed moment for Arkansas Republicans, as the state appeared to pass a point of no return. As Sen. Mark Pryor, a Democrat and the son of David Pryor, faced a tough re-election battle against Republican Tom Cotton, the Democratic Party unloaded its political ammo to the last, even enlisting Bill Clinton to campaign on the incumbent’s behalf.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At a rally in Hope, Clinton stood with Pryor outside of the visitor center and asked Arkansans for their support. But even the former president's star power was not enough to lift Pryor, who lost with 39 percent to Cotton's 57 percent.

The transition away from Clinton's Arkansas was complete — and the outlook for future Democrats remains dim. Because Arkansas lacks the growing minority populations of many Southern states, its political makeup now more closely resembles those of deep-red Kansas and Oklahoma.

"It wasn't that Arkansas was the last state to fall. Arkansas left the South," said Skip Rutherford, a longtime Clinton ally and dean of the University of Arkansas' Clinton School of Public Service. "While the South is trending to be more competitive for the Democrats, Arkansas is going in the other direction."

Following the 2014 election, the state's congressional delegation is now fully Republican, with two GOP senators for the first time since Reconstruction. Both statehouse chambers are also controlled by Republicans.

The Clinton name is still everywhere in Arkansas, adorning the Little Rock airport, the presidential library, the school of public service, just about every main drag. But the state's party loyalties appear to have finally, conclusively flipped.

When 2014 exit polls asked Arkansas voters whether Hillary Clinton would make a good president, just 39 percent said she would, CNN reported, while 56 percent said she would not.

On the eve of Huckabee's announcement, his top campaign staff and reporters met in the back room of Doe's Eat Place in Little Rock for a hearty meal of steak, shrimp and tamales. The walls are still adorned with Democratic artwork and memorabilia, including a poster depicting Ronald Reagan and his vice president, George H.W. Bush, as "the first couple," with Bush wearing a dress — a reminder of the Democrats who once frequented the space.

During Bill Clinton's first presidential campaign, the back room at Doe's was a favorite hangout for James Carville, George Stephanopoulos, Rahm Emanuel, and other top aides. Now, Huckabee campaign manager Chip Saltsman, his pollster Bob Wickers, and his communications aides Alice Stewart and Hogan Gidley were gathered around the table.

And, at least for this week, Mike Huckabee was Hope's hometown hero. The night before the kickoff, with his aides in Little Rock, Huckabee made the rounds at Dos Loco Gringos, a Mexican restaurant in Hope.

The next day, after the campaign launch, Hope visitor center director Guy Royston pulled up a photo on his phone of Huckabee at the restaurant. Royston, who interned in the past with former Sen. Blanche Lincoln and former Rep. Mike Ross, both Democrats, said he turned out for Huckabee's announcement speech, too — the second presidential campaign launch he's watched in person, after Clinton's in 1991.

"We root for the hometown guys," Royston said.

But when a couple from Los Angeles, in town for Huckabee's speech, stopped by the visitor center, there wasn't much to show he'd grown up in Hope, too. A photograph of Miss Marie Perkins noted that she was Clinton's kindergarten teacher, but not that she also taught Huckabee.

Earlier, on the way to Huckabee's announcement, a bus transporting reporters stopped outside of his childhood home. Unlike Clinton's, it is today a private home, not a museum, and there is no sign or other indicator of the politician who once lived there.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Huckabee might never get the chance to win Arkansas in a general election. Another Clinton likely will — but Arkansas has moved on.

California woman receives Mother's Day greeting from Hillary Clinton // LA Times // Seema Mehta - May 11, 2015

A California woman was among a handful of women whom Hillary Clinton phoned to wish a happy Mother's Day.

Sheila Frank, 73, said she felt honored to speak with the Democratic presidential candidate for a little over 10 minutes on Sunday.

"We congratulated each other on being mothers and grandmothers," said Frank, a retired psychologist who was straightening her bedroom in the gated community of Bear Valley Springs near Tehachapi when Clinton called.

Frank was one of five women Clinton called on Sunday, the winners of a Mother's Day contest on Clinton's campaign website. A friend entered Frank's name and she was randomly selected. No donation was required to enter.

Since announcing her presidential bid, Clinton has focused on her gender in ways she never did during her unsuccessful 2008 presidential campaign.

Frank, who has an adult son and two grandsons, noted that Clinton recently became a grandmother when her daughter Chelsea gave birth to a daughter named Charlotte.

"She of course adores her new granddaughter. I could tell she was very excited about that," Frank said.

But the bulk of their conversation focused on policy, Frank said, notably Frank's work with prisoners, the poor and the homeless. Mental illness, Frank told Clinton, was a scourge that was not being dealt with, and the situation was being made worse because of state budget cuts to rehabilitation programs.

Frank grew up in New Jersey and attended graduate school at UC Berkeley during the "Free Speech Movement," a milestone in her political development.

"That's where I was coming from. We thought we had the answers. We always saw a bright future," Frank said. "We were so naïve but we were committed. At 73, one is no longer so naïve."

Frank said she initially supported Clinton's 2008 presidential effort, until she grew enamored by then Sen. Barack Obama's speeches and the prospect of a black man being elected president of the United States. She believes Obama has been treated unfairly since being elected to the White House, and wholeheartedly supports Clinton's 2016 presidential bid.

"I do think a lack of experience has been an issue [for Obama] and Hillary doesn't have that – she comes with an incredible amount of experience, and I'm definitely supporting her," Frank said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Frank said that while she admires Democrats such as Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren, she believes Clinton is the party's best choice.

"I think that she can represent the middle class in a decent way. I love her husband, Bill. I told her that. She told me she does also, so that was fun," Frank said. "I think she will speak to support more of the middle class, whatever there is left of us."

Hillary Clinton Adds Latina From Labor Department To Oversee Hispanic, Black, Women's Media // Buzzfeed News // Adrian Carrasquillo - May 11, 2015

Hillary Clinton has filled a major communications position in the campaign, tapping Xochitl Hinojosa as director of coalitions press, five sources told BuzzFeed News.

Hinojosa, who served at the Department of Labor under Secretary Tom Perez for almost two years and is the daughter of Texas Democratic Party Chairman Gilberto Hinojosa, will oversee Hispanic, black, and women's media, among others.

Her last day in her current role is next week. The Clinton campaign declined to comment on the hire.

Democratic strategist Maria Cardona said Hinojosa has been in the mix as an early hire for a while. Cardona worked with Hinojosa on two projects with the Department of Labor and said she is someone who understands the nuances of the press landscape both in general media and Hispanic media.

"It's a rare mix to be able to get someone like her with experience, someone who can do it well and do it with grace," she said. "I was thrilled when they told me her name."

In her role, Hinojosa will not only work closely with the communications team but would also serve as a connection between field staffers organizing these coalitions on the ground — something that didn't always exist in the 2012 Obama campaign.

A former Obama staffer said that looking forward, you could envision a scenario where an organizer in Charleston, South Carolina, is working with a local hip-hop station to get information out to that neighborhood. A stronger link between coalitions on the ground and the national press team would "free up the opportunity for the field to communicate and leverage communications channels to send the most authentic message to voters they're working with," the Obama campaign veteran said.

Hinojosa also wouldn't be the person charged with, for example, doing the day-to-day work with black media. Hinojosa would have a team under her and there are plans to fill those roles as the campaign progresses.

Sources with campaign media experience said she will need a robust staff to ensure those coalitions aren't relegated to or feel like specialty media. For example, Univision, which is a top four network in the United States, regardless of language, doesn't want to be relegated to a secondary position in the campaign, said Jose Parra, a former senior adviser for Harry Reid.

Hinojosa's hire makes her the fourth high-profile Latino hire, and third Latina, along with Amanda Renteria, the political director and Emmy Ruiz, who returned to run the Clinton operation in Nevada. Jose Villarreal previously joined as campaign treasurer, as well.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The hiring continues the approach stressed by Clinton officials like Renteria of not just hiring, say, Latinos for Latino roles.

The early focus on strong Latino hiring and outreach operations has been repeatedly called for by Democrats who note that Clinton was popular among Latino voters in the 2008 primary against Obama, but must show she is serious about addressing their concerns during this campaign. Democrats have also worried that Republicans like Jeb Bush, who is fluent in Spanish and has a Hispanic family, and Marco Rubio, could compete for support from Latino voters.

Hinojosa followed very much in the footsteps of her father, Gilberto, who represented farm workers in class-action lawsuits "and made sure that the U.S. Department of Labor Employment Services Division provided farm workers with needed interstate employment services," according to the Texas Democratic Party.

She previously spent time at the Department of Justice's civil right division, as well as campaigns and senate offices before joining Labor, where she has been focused on issues like pay leave and the minimum wage.

Are Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama 'Affirmative-Action Presidents'? // NY Mag // Jonathan Chait - May 11, 2015

"If Hillary Clinton wins the presidency in 2016 she will not only be the nation's first woman president but our second affirmative-action president," writes Joseph Epstein. This may sound like Epstein is making the outlandish claim that Clinton and Obama are uniquely lacking in merit as compared to previous presidential candidates in American history. That is exactly what Epstein is claiming. In a bizarre, rambling essay that the Weekly Standard has deemed worthy not only of publication but of its cover, the esteemed conservative scholar asserts that presidential elections used to be based on intrinsic merit, until 2008. "How have we come to the point," Epstein asks, "where we elect presidents of the United States not on their intrinsic qualities but because of the accidents of their birth: because they are black, or women, or, one day doubtless, gay, or disabled — not, in other words, for themselves but for the causes they seem to embody or represent, for their status as members of a victim group?"

Yes, that's right. America used to elect presidents on "intrinsic qualities" rather than "accidents of their birth." And this process resulted in the election of forty-three consecutive white men, an outcome Epstein must regard as an extreme coincidence. The last president to be elected on the basis of intrinsic qualities rather than accidents of birth was George W. Bush, whose birth circumstances, Epstein apparently believes, had no bearing upon his career trajectory.

The whole essay is a remarkable testament to the level of delusion of right-wing identity politics. Epstein does not merely claim that pockets of left-wing thought in academia and elsewhere have allowed social-justice ideology to go too far, an argument with which I sympathize. He argues that white men as a whole have become a subaltern class. Epstein is attempting to intellectualize a sentiment coursing through the right and given daily expression in such places as Fox News and talk radio, but in so attempting serves only to demonstrate its sub-intellectual character.

On its face, the idea that white men have become a victim class is hard to square with the ethnographic composition of the economic and political elite, which remain far more white and male than the population as a whole. Epstein clearly believes this to be the case. Apparently unaware of a vast trove of evidence proving the continuing existence of traditional race and gender discrimination, he refers to it in the past tense. ("Everyone knows of the travails of slavery and beyond, the battles of women for equality in the workplace and elsewhere, the mocking and shunning of homosexuals, and the degrading of other victim groups; it was genuine, and painful." Emphasis added.) Epstein likewise asserts, "Today it is the victim who is doing the bullying."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

After a painful meandering tour through Epstein's view of contemporary America, he returns at the conclusion to his premise about Clinton as an affirmative-action hire, which he has not bothered to substantiate. Here is Epstein's evidence that Clinton plans to run a campaign based on victimhood:

Given the large constituency of victims in America, Hillary Clinton, as a woman, has already climbed aboard the victim train in the hope of riding it to the presidency. "When women are held back, our country is held back," she said in a recent speech. "When women get ahead, everyone gets ahead. Our mothers and sisters and daughters are on the front lines of all of these battles. ... But these are not just women's fights. These have to be America's fights and the world's fights. We have to take them on, we have to win them together." What a rich ragout of victimhood and virtue in those words!

Not only do these Hillary Clinton quotes contain no hint of personal victimhood, they contain an explicit appeal to common interest. The argument Clinton makes in this passage is that policies that prevent women from fulfilling their potential harm men and women alike, by depriving society of the ability to develop the potential talent of half its population. This is the most representative quote Epstein is able to find to support his thesis, and it instead makes the exact opposite of the point he claims.

In a larger sense, of course, the very existence of Epstein's piece serves to disprove its thesis. If it is still possible for a white man to write an incoherent farrago of self-pity whose only shred of evidence directly undercuts its thesis, and have such drivel thrown onto the cover of a national magazine, then white men are probably still doing okay.

The Hillary Clinton paradox: Progressives can't trust her — and that's a good thing // Salon // Elias Isquith - May 11, 2015

The Hillary Clinton paradox: Progressives can't trust her -- and that's a good thing

Because I care about my readers and don't want them to pollute their minds with meaningless political ephemera any more than being a good citizen absolutely requires, I hope this comes as news to you — but, last week, the New York Times and CBS published a new poll on how the public views former secretary of state and current presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton (HRC). There were two big takeaways for the 2016 frontrunner, both of which could be reasonably seen by left-wing activists as good omens for the months and maybe years to come.

The poll's most striking discovery pertained to how voters felt about Clinton's handling of her email while at Foggy Bottom, which was either unnecessarily secretive or downright sketchy. I got into some arguments with other folks in the media about how much voters actually cared about this story; so forgive me my vanity, but I can't help but note that during the weeks following the press's wall-to-wall coverage of "emailgate," Clinton's favorability actually went up. And it wasn't just a little statistical blip; it was an increase of nine full points. (On this score, then, picture me as Nelson Muntz.)

The poll's second notable finding, on the other hand, wasn't nearly so much of a boon to Clinton supporters. According to CBS and the Times, fewer than half of respondents described her as "honest and trustworthy"; and that number was only near the 50 percent mark because around 80 percent of Democrats answered in the affirmative. This issue of HRC's trustworthiness has been the thin reed on which many of the loudest promoters of the emailgate pseudo-scandal have hung their arguments. But as Ronald Brownstein writes in National Journal, a Clinton has already won the White House before while being seen as less than entirely untrustworthy.

However, just because American doubts about her honesty are unlikely to keep HRC out of the White House, that doesn't mean that her image on this score is irrelevant. What it means instead is that Clinton's low margin for error on trust will manifest in harder to perceive ways during her campaign and hypothetical presidency. For example, look at President Obama and Sen. Elizabeth Warren's argument over fast-tracking the Trans-Pacific Partnership

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(TPP). It's the kind of debate Obama is having with those on his left — a debate over progressive bona fides — that a President Clinton probably will not.

If you're unfamiliar with the battle over TPP and the fast-track option, I'd recommend this Wall Street Journal post as an OK, mostly objective primer. The short version, though, is that Obama wants Congress to grant him expanded powers to negotiate the biggest free-trade agreement since NAFTA and to do so without having to worry about folks in the House or Senate larding-up the agreement with amendments. Instead of letting Congress get into the weeds of the deal, Obama would prefer they leave it to him and then ultimately give what he comes up with a simple yea-or-nay vote. Along with most liberal and labor organizations, Warren is opposed.

Yet what matters for our purposes isn't the TPP so much as the way Warren and Obama, arguably liberal America's two favorite politicians, have been fighting about it through the media. From the very beginning, Obama has relied on a rhetorical strategy that can be boiled down to one essential question: Don't you trust me to do the right thing? "When people say that this trade deal is bad for working families," he said in late-April, "I take that personally. My entire presidency has been about helping working families." Just this weekend, he used similar phrasing, saying he'd "have to be pretty stupid" to support a deal that imperiled the middle class the way Warren claims the TPP does.

The biggest reason why Obama has been able to adopt this strategy can probably be found in a Gallup poll released earlier this month. On that question of trustworthiness, the president fares well, especially by the standards of our polarized era: 53 percent of respondents say "honest and trustworthy" applies to Obama, while just 45 percent disagree. That's not a Grand Canyon's worth of distance apart from HRC's 48 percent, of course. But it is enough to make the White House feel relatively confident that liberals are willing to trust the president — and to make Warren skip over Obama and raise concerns about what the next (possibly Republican) president might do with fast-track's powers.

On the trail (as well as in the White House, if she wins) Clinton will be much more constricted. Yes, she's very popular with self-identified liberals; and, yes, like Obama's, much of her negative numbers on trustworthiness are the product of overwhelmingly disdain from conservatives. But while Democrats may on the whole approve of HRC, they don't necessarily trust her, at least not yet. That means that Clinton will be much more poorly equipped to argue in the face of a challenge from her left that liberals should relax and trust her to do the right thing. For anyone who wants to see Sen. Bernie Sanders succeed in pulling her to the left during the primary — or see Sen. Elizabeth Warren pulling her to the left if she's in the White House — this is a plus.

All of that being said, there's still a good chance that, by the time 2016 really kicks-in and voters are paying attention, the reality of polarization in American politics will bump HRC's numbers on trustworthiness and honesty closer to where the president's are today. And even without that development, pushing Clinton from her left will be harder on issues where left-wing anger over her husband's record isn't quite so close to the surface (Obama is desperate to separate TPP from NAFTA for a reason). But if Brownstein is right, and HRC wins despite a majority of voters not exactly trusting her completely, it could be something of a win-win for liberal activists. Not only would they get a non-Republican president, but they'd get one with a stronger desire than the current incumbent to prove she's one of them.

Clinton campaign's dilemma: What to do with Bill? // WaPo // Phillips Rucker – May 11, 2015

MARRAKESH, Morocco — The scene that unfolded here last week as Bill Clinton convened world leaders for a philanthropic conference was hardly what his wife's champion-for-everyday-Americans campaign would have ordered up.

Gathered in Marrakesh for a Clinton Global Initiative confab, foreign oligarchs and corporate titans mingled amid palm trees, decorative pools and dazzling tiled courtyards with the former president and his traveling delegation of foundation donors — many of whom are also donors to Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When daughter Chelsea moderated a discussion on women's empowerment, the only male panelist was Morocco's richest person, Othman Benjelloun, whose BMCE Bank is a CGI sponsor. For the week's biggest party, guests were chauffeured across the city to an opulent 56-room palace that boasts a private collection of Arabian horses, overlooks the snow-capped Atlas Mountains and serves a fine-dining menu of "biolight" cuisine.

Ahead of that event, Bill Clinton greeted Saudi Prince Turki al-Faisal. "See you tonight, Turki," he told his royal highness.

It was a long way from Hillary Clinton's campaign-trail visits to Chipotle. The luxe week in Morocco highlighted the overarching question facing the Clintons and their coexisting circles of political advisers: What to do with Bill?

The question applies not only to the campaign but also to his role as first gentleman if she gets elected.

In a presidential race that could include two dozen candidates, none has a spouse like Bill Clinton — a former president whose sprawling charitable ventures are rife with potential conflicts of interest; an admired public figure whose common touch propelled his rise but who now charges up to $500,000 to give a speech; a curious ideas man whose penchant for speaking his mind drives news cycles; and a globe-trotting icon whose recognizable tuft of white hair draws onlookers everywhere, from his old Arkansas haunts to the bustling souks around Marrakesh's central square.

Bill Clinton is a political animal who logged 168,000 miles on the campaign trail in 2014. Yet senior aides say he does not plan to do any campaign activities for his wife in 2015, including fundraisers for her campaign or allied super PACs. He has said privately that she should lead the campaign on her own, aides said.

"He's completely focused right now on the foundation," said Tina Flournoy, Bill Clinton's chief of staff. "That does not mean that he does not realize his wife is running for president. But he is not directly engaged in the campaign. As he has said before, if his advice is asked for, he's happy to give it."

But even if he's off the campaign trail, Bill Clinton is never out of the limelight. He will remain prominent in the public eye with a busy schedule of appearances, including visits this week to a Harlem food festival and next month to Little Rock for a charity ball. In mid-June, he will be in Denver to host CGI America, a domestic-themed spinoff of his foundation conference.

On Tuesday, he'll be on the "Late Show with David Letterman."

He will also speak for pay at Univision's presentation to advertisers in New York on Tuesday. The prominent Spanish-language television network is owned in part by Haim Saban, a foundation and campaign donor who hosted a fundraiser for Hillary Clinton last week at his Beverly Hills mansion.

One strategist said Hillary Clinton, shown here with Bill Clinton and former senator Tom Harkin, should not campaign with her husband: "It's hard to shine when you're standing next to the sun." (Charlie Neibergall/ Associated Press)

"Bill Clinton is like nuclear energy," said David Axelrod, a strategist on President Obama's campaigns. "If you use it properly, it can be enormously helpful and proactive. If you misuse it, it can be catastrophic."

'A supporting spouse'

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Keeping the former president at a distance is one way the 2016 Clinton campaign is trying to prove it has learned from the mistakes of 2008. Although as her aides know well, it is impossible to truly isolate him from her campaign.

“He is a very smart political strategist and practitioner,” said Ann Lewis, a longtime Hillary Clinton adviser. “He has never thought that politics is beneath him. He believes that politics is the way that we govern ourselves.”

Bill Clinton has many assets. He is universally known and unusually popular; 73 percent of voters approved of his job performance as president in a Washington Post-ABC News poll in March, while his personal favorability rating stood at 65 percent in a CNN-ORC poll in March. He also is considered one of the Democratic Party’s most talented communicators; his 2012 convention speech was a standout moment in support of Obama’s reelection.

“Any conversation about Bill Clinton and his impact on the campaign has to start with the fact that Americans like him and they’ve liked him for a long time,” said Geoff Garin, a pollster for Hillary Clinton’s 2008 campaign who now works for Priorities USA, a pro-Clinton super PAC.

But as Bill Clinton showed in 2008, he can be an undisciplined and rogue surrogate. Some of the ugliest episodes in his wife’s campaign were his making, including his stray remarks about Obama that angered black voters in South Carolina and his behind-the-scenes meddling in the campaign’s strategy.

Rep. James E. Clyburn (D-S.C.), who feuded with Bill Clinton in 2008 over what he saw as race-baiting, said in a recent interview that the former president should be “a supporting spouse” this time around.

“He should refrain from doing anything or saying anything that would take the attention off of her candidacy,” said Clyburn, who has not endorsed anyone in the 2016 race. “It’s got to be about Hillary. It’s got to be about her vision, and he’s got to be supportive of that.”

Axelrod, recalling the Clintons’ joint appearance in the fall at retiring Sen. Tom Harkin’s steak fry in Iowa, said it would be foolish for them to campaign together regularly. “It’s hard to shine when you’re standing next to the sun,” he said recently. “He’s a luminescent character, and it is diminishing to have him out there at her side.”

Aides insisted that Bill Clinton is not calling up campaign aides, devouring polls or mapping out strategies. The campaign has no “Bill whisperer” tasked with managing him, although Flournoy is in regular contact with top aides at Hillary Clinton’s Brooklyn headquarters. The former president also has long-standing relationships with campaign chairman John D. Podesta and other advisers.

The Clintons speak to each other often, sometimes multiple times a day, but usually about personal matters and rarely about the nity-gritty of her race, aides said. Some days, he doesn’t know where she’s campaigning. And on the Africa trip, he was more attuned to the British elections — glued to the BBC — than to her campaign.

One afternoon in April, Bill Clinton looked up at a television in his midtown Manhattan office and saw the grainy security-camera photo of his wife and her aide, Huma Abedin, at a Chipotle in Ohio, appearing incognito in dark sunglasses. He turned to aides and wondered, “What are she and Huma doing? Are they robbing that place?”

Far away, but still making news

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As Hillary Clinton raised money in California last week, Bill Clinton was about as far away as he could get, visiting the family foundation's projects in Africa and convening the CGI meeting in Morocco.

Yet he was still making big headlines. In an interview with NBC News in Kenya, he appeared testy while defending the foundation's foreign fundraising. He also said he would continue giving six-figure paid speeches: "I've got to pay our bills," he said, sounding out of touch, considering he has reported earning $105 million in speaking fees over 12 years.

There were other awkward moments as well. As Bill Clinton wrapped up the CGI meeting in Morocco, a top Coca-Cola executive joined him onstage to announce a $4.5 million program to help African youths obtain job skills and career counseling.

Then Curtis A. Ferguson, the company's regional president, shifted to the sales pitch. "I hope they're thirsty," he said, referring to the young Africans. Then he said he wanted to "share a Coke with Bill," pulling out a Coke bottle inscribed with the former president's first name in Arabic. They posed for photos holding the bottle, smiling.

But much of the Africa trip — which stretched for 10 days and included stops in Tanzania, Kenya, Liberia and Morocco — was aimed at showcasing the good works of the foundation and its partners.

At a hearing-aid fitting in Kenya, Bill Clinton witnessed a young man hearing the voice of his sister for the first time. In Tanzania, he met farmer Wazia Chawala, a single mother with seven children, who with foundation help has improved crop yields with modern soil, seed and crop-rotation techniques.

Clinton also visited a drab Nairobi laboratory, where he listened to a presentation on tracking carbon emissions and rainfall patterns so farmers could improve their yields. When he asked the donors with him if they had any questions, Drew Houston, the chief executive of Dropbox, asked, "What were your biggest technical challenges?"

For Clinton and his staff, it was a proud moment of synergy — the founder of one of the world's largest cloud-computing companies asking a Kenyan lab technician a question about uploading data to the cloud.

Clinton, who declined a request to be interviewed for this report, is grappling with what the future might hold. He is continuing to raise money for the foundation, where his daughter has assumed a greater leadership role. Last year, the foundation raised a $250 million endowment to provide long-term stability in his absence.

His advisers understand that the foundation's activities could complicate a Hillary Clinton presidency.

"In his heart and mind, I think he wants there to always be a scenario where his foundation is doing the work that he's deeply invested in," Flournoy said. "How does that look, and what does experience and time and history mean you might have to change? We don't know. But this is his life's work."

'What does she want me to do?'

Bill Clinton says his role would be determined by his wife. "What does she want me to do?" he said in an interview last week with CNN's Christiane Amanpour. "I have no idea."

One option is that Hillary Clinton could draft him as a special envoy somewhere or give him a portfolio in her administration. He is continually fascinated by science, aides said, and lately has been thinking about creating a fairer economy. He also has talked about bringing together corporate partners to rebuild Baltimore after last month's riots.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A return of the Clintons to the White House would also usher in a blurring of traditional gender roles, not to mention titles: Bill Clinton's aides still refer to him as "the president."

"Even if he were assigned the responsibility of picking out china, I think others would probably overrule him on taste," said Skip Rutherford, a longtime adviser and friend. "People used to kid him about picking out his crazy ties. I can't imagine."

The closest historical parallel is Franklin and Eleanor Roosevelt. During Franklin's presidency, Eleanor earned personal income from paid speeches, newspaper columns and a weekly radio show, which was sponsored by Simmons mattresses, said Carl Anthony, a historian at the National First Ladies' Library. He said she gave most of her income to the March of Dimes Foundation, which her husband founded to combat polio.

"She made a lot of money on her own, but not without a congressional investigation and media attacks on her commercializing the presidency," Anthony said.

Fred Wertheimer, president of the reform group Democracy 21, said the couple should completely withdraw from the charity if Hillary Clinton wins: "Change the name of the foundation, and make a clean break."

Foundation supporters believe otherwise.

"It would probably be one of the greatest wastes of human talent in the history of the world" for Bill Clinton to withdraw, said Jay Jacobs, a major donor who traveled with him to Africa. "How do you say to these poor farmers, to mothers whose children can't hear, 'Sorry, no more because politics can't abide by it?' That would be morally wrong."

Kevin Sieff in Nairobi contributed to this report.

Former Clinton Advisor: Bill Looks 'Washed-Out And Washed-Up' // Daily Caller // Scott Greer - May 11, 2015

Former Bill Clinton advisor and television personality Dick Morris thinks his old boss isn't looking too good these days.

"I didn't recognize the character that was on TV," Morris said of Bill Clinton's recent interview with NBC News in a video released Monday. "He was washed-out, he was listless, he was apathetic, he was very slow-talking and even slower thinking!" (RELATED: MSNBC Panelists: Bill Clinton's Remarks 'Will Come Back To Haunt' Him, Are 'Out Of Touch' [VIDEO])

The man who helped manage Clinton's 1996 re-election campaign took particular issue with how the former president ineffectively responded to the issue surrounding his $500,000 salary from the Clinton Foundation — a question he should've anticipated.

"He tried a couple of others [answers] but then he settled on the pathetic answer: 'I have to pay my bills!'" Morris said. “C’mon? Who’s going to be taken in by that?”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The political consultant continued his criticism of the lackluster performance of Clinton and believes his “muddled thinking” is a result of someone who “is not all there.”

“His mind was not agile, it wasn’t energetic, he wasn’t forceful and I really just wondered what happened to the guy,” Morris commented. “I’m concerned about him, worried about him, I’m also disappointed. I think you’re dealing with somebody who really is not all there.”

The ex-Clinton confidant thinks this spells bad news for Hillary Clinton and her bid for the White House.

“She’s losing her best advisor, she’s losing her top consultant. They made quite the team and I don’t think Bill Clinton is up to this game.”

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE

O'Malley plans 4 stops in NH Wednesday // WMUR // May 11, 2015

MANCHESTER, N.H. —Former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley has four New Hampshire stops planned for Wednesday. The Democrat will begin the day with a diner stop in Manchester at a location to be announced, followed by a visit to the Alpha Loft, a business incubator, also in Manchester.

O’Malley will attend a private fundraiser for the New Hampshire House Democratic Caucus at midday and then attend a party at the Durham home of former executive councilor Dudley Dudley. Later, O’Malley will campaign in Rockingham County with Maureen Mann, a candidate for the New Hampshire House of Representatives in an upcoming special election.

De Blasio 'Can't Think of Anything More Important' Than going to D.C. // Observer // Will Bredderman - May 11, 2015

Mayor Bill de Blasio maintained that his trip tomorrow to the nation’s capital to unveil “The Progressive Agenda to Combat Income Inequality” with other leading liberals is important and appropriate to his duties as mayor, despite complaints that he is neglecting the bread-and-butter issues of every day New Yorkers.

Talking to the press today after an unrelated event in Queens, Mr. de Blasio defended making a two-day jaunt to promote his left-leaning ideals in Washington D.C.—viewed as a move to elevate his personal profile nationally—while making only infrequent visits to conservative enclaves of his own city, such as Staten Island. He asserted repeatedly that part of the trip was to call for the renewal of federal transportation funding, which is due to expire at the end of the month, as well as lobby for other policies such as progressive taxation reduce the gap between rich and poor.

“I can’t think of anything more important. I’ll be doing that over the next couple of days because now is the right time to do it,” he said, noting that many criticized his ambitious agenda as a mayoral candidate in 2013 as beyond the reach of a mayor. “We need a federal partner. And we are going to create, I think, some real critical mass tomorrow pushing for these bigger solutions in Washington.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. de Blasio argued that mayors since his hero Fiorello LaGuardia—whom he said he sought to emulate in his own "humble" way—have rallied with their counterparts from other cities to request federal money for urban concerns. The transportation bill push, he said, was simply part of that tradition.

"We have a real bipartisan effort with mayors from across the country on Wednesday, working with the business community, working with chambers of commerce from around the country, working with folks, businesses depend on better transportation, to push the Congress for more funding," he said. "Let's face it, where so much of the energy is, where so much of the resources are, they're in Washington. The situation now in Washington is unacceptable. It's not helping New York City, it's not helping cities across the country. We've got to break through in some way."

"We've got to change the dynamic so we can get the federal support we need, and we've got to do the work here every day, and my job is to do both," he continued.

Mr. de Blasio's approval rating has long hovered around 50 percent and is racially polarized. He is still popular with black voters but increasingly unpopular with whites.

Nonetheless, Mr. de Blasio will seek to take a national leadership role when he joins top liberals like Massachusetts Senator Elizabeth Warren and Nobel Prize-winning economist Joseph Stiglitz in unveiling a left-leaning agenda for the nation on Wednesday. He has maintained, however, that rumors he will launch a long-shot bid for the presidency next year are false—rumors he denied again today.

"No," he said resolutely. "I said I have one job: mayor of New York City. I look forward to running for re-election in 2017."

Bill De Blasio, Elizabeth Warren escalate pressure on Hillary Clinton // Politico // Gabriel Debenedetti - May 11, 2015

Like Elizabeth Warren, New York Mayor Bill de Blasio isn't running for president — he's running to influence the presidential race.

So when he and Warren appear together at the National Press Club in Washington before unveiling his Contract with America for the left, it will be the latest step in the Democrats' primary within the primary: liberals' effort to figure out how to push Hillary Clinton to the left.

The primary within the primary may prove more challenging for Clinton than the real thing, in which she's leading competitors by up to 50 points in some polls.

James Carville, the longtime Clinton adviser, compared de Blasio's efforts to the Club for Growth pressuring Republicans to move to the right on taxes: "It's a natural thing that happens in presidential politics," he said.

Nonetheless, the progressive mayor's swing through the capital is designed to kick the Democratic debate up a notch just as Warren escalates her own fight with President Barack Obama in a trade dispute that's also entangled Clinton. But it will also represent a balancing act, as de Blasio — Clinton's former Senate campaign manager — looks to influence the discussion without directly opposing the dominating front-runner.

After his joint appearance with Warren, de Blasio will stand alongside liberal lawmakers and labor leaders on Capitol Hill to roll out a policy wish-list. Progressives close to de Blasio say the hard part will be laying down an achievable marker for candidates — including Clinton — while still applying enough pressure to get their attention.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“The challenge is that a lot of this will just get a head nod” from Clinton, said one progressive Democratic leader.

As they maneuver for influence, Warren and de Blasio have taken up much of the oxygen from the party’s actual candidates, grabbing headlines and jumping in the policy trenches — in de Blasio’s case going as far as to effectively hit the campaign trail before revealing his “Progressive Agenda” on Tuesday.

But with the former secretary of state claiming commanding leads in national and state-level polling, in many cases performing better among liberals than among all registered Democrats, the question of how best to drag her to the left without alienating her is still outstanding.

Clinton’s team is quick to predict that another candidate will reach at least 30 percent of the vote in Iowa, the first state with a 2016 contest, much of it coming from Democrats who would like to see Warren run. That concern partially explains Clinton’s recent leftward shifts on issues including immigration reform and criminal justice. Meanwhile, her campaign has remained in contact with liberal groups like the Progressive Change Campaign Committee, which is encouraging Clinton to embrace expanding Social Security and a debt-free college plan.

But so far, Clinton stands far ahead of her likely competitors — Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley, former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb, and former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee — in polling, reducing pressure on her to appease liberals.

In that vacuum, Warren and de Blasio have sought to position themselves as king-makers among activists in early-voting and swing states, a role de Blasio has pursued by stopping in Iowa and Wisconsin. His “Progressive Agenda” is designed to be broad enough for Clinton and other Democrats to embrace whole-heartedly: he is expected to call for universal pre-kindergarten, a higher minimum wage, and a paid family leave policy — all of which Clinton has mentioned favorably in recent months.

And de Blasio’s Wednesday roll-out follows a similar speech in late April by AFL-CIO chief Richard Trumka — an address that read like a warning memo to Clinton about how to gain crucial union support.

“Standing with working people once in a while won’t work. Candidates can’t hedge bets any longer,” said Trumka on April 27.

The Clinton campaign named a Labor Outreach Director on April 28.

The mayor’s stop in Washington comes at a time when Clinton has been caught between Obama and Warren over supporting the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade agreement she helped negotiate as secretary of state. Warren and Obama traded barbs over the weekend, as the president told Yahoo News Warren is “a politician like everybody else” when trying to explain her opposition to the trade deal.

Clinton has avoided weighing in on the topic, only vaguely describing restrictions she would put on a deal rather than firmly opposing it.

Trade is just one policy where liberals are seeking to get more clarity from Clinton, particularly as Sanders intensifies his campaign schedule and O’Malley — who has recently focused on Wall Street reform and debt-free college — nears his expected late-May campaign launch.

The bar is low for Clinton to satisfy liberals in many cases, but she still faces some risk of alienating more centrist voters she might need in November 2016.

“Two areas where words alone do make a difference are expanding social security and debt-free college,” explained the PCCC's Adam Green, pointing to a recent interview where her campaign manager mentioned the latter. "If she were to give a speech or even send a tweet mentioning them, that would shift the entire national discussion."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Thus, Warren and de Blasio have shown few signs of letting up. The former mayor has pointedly refused to endorse her, and Warren has declined to ask the various organizations aiming to draft her into the race to stand down.

And de Blasio's national travels aren't ending on Tuesday. His next stop, on Wednesday, will be in Silicon Valley — 3,000 miles from Manhattan.

Elizabeth Warren fires back at Obama ... again // Politico // Karey Van Hall – May 11, 2015

The war of wrong continues.

Sen. Elizabeth Warren hit back at President Barack Obama in an interview published on Monday, saying she is justified in her criticism of trade negotiations that she believes could undermine the Dodd-Frank financial reform law.

The tit-for-tat comes after Obama over the weekend again asserted that Warren is "absolutely wrong" in arguing that fast-track authority for trade deals could be a boon for Wall Street.

Warren, in an interview with the Washington Post, said fast-track authority gives a future Republican president a better path for undermining financial reforms because it would only require 51 votes in the Senate instead of 60.

She also said Dodd-Frank can be undercut through other measures besides straight legislation, such as international agreements on capital standards and leverage ratios.

"It's possible to punch holes in Dodd-Frank without directly repealing it," she said.

Warren and Obama have been long-time allies in public on consumer issues, but the trade deal has seemingly eroded their relationship.

In the interview published on Monday, Warren again accused Obama of not being forthcoming about the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade pact that his administration is negotiating with 11 other countries.

"If the president is so confident it's a good deal, he should declassify the text and let people see it before asking Congress to tie its hands on fixing it," she said.

Why Hillary Clinton needs Elizabeth Warren // Vox // Ezra Klein - May 11, 2015

Elizabeth Warren has pulled off something remarkable in the Democratic primary: she's managed to set the terms of the challenge to Hillary Clinton without actually entering the race and challenging Clinton herself.

In part, this is because Warren's agenda has been defined down from very specific ideas about financial regulation to a pretty generic form of economic populism. When Hillary Clinton mentioned that "the average CEO makes about 300 times what the average worker makes" and said "the deck is stacked in favor of the powerful," the New York Times wrote that she was "embracing the ideas trumpeted by Ms. Warren."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This is really just standard-issue Democratic populism. As it happens, Clinton used that CEO pay statistic in her 2008 campaign, too. But Warren has become so synonymous with the populist wing of the Democratic Party that Democrats sounding like Democrats gets reported as Democrats sounding like Elizabeth Warren. And that's great news for Hillary Clinton, because it sets up a test she can easily pass.

On economic policy, Clinton is pretty liberal. Her last presidential campaign was full of rhetoric that you could imagine in any Bernie Sanders or Elizabeth Warren speech today:

Over the 12-month period that just ended in July, the slow growth in wages actually accounted for more than two-thirds of the increase in corporate profits. What does that mean? Well, the profits go up, but unlike every other time in our history, the CEOs and the boards of these companies are not sharing the wealth. So companies are actually profiting off of keeping workers' wages stagnant ... In 2005, the last year I could find the numbers for, all income gains went to the top 10 percent of households, while the bottom 90 percent saw their incomes decline. That is not the America that I grew up in.

"Hillary was talking about inequality and wage stagnation before it was in vogue," says Neera Tanden, who served as policy director on Clinton's 2008 campaign and now leads the Center for American Progress. "She was ahead of this debate, not behind it."

If the question of the 2016 Democratic primary is whether Hillary Clinton can sound like a populist, and adopt more populist policies, she's going to answer it with ease. Compared with the status quo, Clinton pretty much agrees with Sanders, with Warren, and with every other liberal: she wants higher taxes on the rich, more social spending, a tighter social safety net, a public option for health insurance, stronger financial regulations than what Congress actually passed, and so on.

There might be individual policies on which Warren or Sanders go further than Clinton — Sanders, for instance, supports single-payer health care — but on most economic issues, Clinton is well to the left of current policy and to the left of the average voter. And on specific issues like financial regulation, she's willing to go further than many expect: she has already named Gary Gensler, a tough financial regulator, to be her campaign's chief financial officer.

There's just not going to be that much room to her left on economic policy. But there is a lot of room to her left on other issues — and these are disagreements that the Warrenization of the Democratic primary is helping to obscure.

GOP

First GOP debate: Aug. 6 in Cleveland // Politico // Dylan Byers - May 11, 2015

The first Republican primary debate will take place on Aug. 6 in Cleveland, the Northeast Ohio Media Group reports.

The debate, sponsored by Fox News, will take place at the Quicken Loans Arena (or, "The Q"), home to the NBA's Cleveland Cavaliers. The Q is also the site of next year's Republican National Convention, which is scheduled for July 2016.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Fox News is expected to formally announce the date and venue within the next few days. Spokespeople for both Fox News and the Republican National Committee did not immediately respond to requests for comment late Monday night.

The RNC has sanctioned nine primary debates for the 2016 campaign, with the possibility of adding three more. It had previously announced that the first debate would take place in August in Ohio, though the exact day and location were unknown.

Last week, an NBC News spokesperson told the On Media blog that the last sanctioned Republican primary debate would take place in Houston on Feb. 26, 2016, just four days before Super Tuesday. That debate is being sponsored by NBC News and Telemundo in partnership with National Journal.

Fox News and CNN have each been granted two debates this cycle with the possibility of a third. The three broadcast networks — ABC, CBS and NBC — have each been given one debate, as have Fox Business and CNBC.

The Democratic National Party has sanctioned six primary debates, though it has yet to name the sponsors.

Jeb Bush Says He Wouldn't Repeal Obama's Immigration Actions Right Away // Bloomberg Politics // Michael C. Bender - May 11, 2015

He may be a staunch critic of President Obama's executive orders on immigration, but Jeb Bush wouldn't rush to repeal them if he's the next White House resident.

In an interview scheduled to air Monday night on Fox News, Bush suggested that he would wait until a new law was in place before overturning Obama's actions.

Noting the political difficulty of repealing the orders, host Megyn Kelly asked Bush how he would go about undoing them. "Passing meaningful reform of immigration and make it part of it," Bush answered, according to a transcript of the interview. The interview will air in full on The Kelly File at 9 p.m.

Bush, who hasn't yet formally entered the presidential race, also defended his support for giving undocumented immigrants driver's licenses and their children in-state tuition, saying, "If you've been here for an extended period of time, you have no nexus to the country of your parents."

"What what are we supposed to do? Marginalize these people forever?" Bush said.

Bush insisted that his support for providing undocumented immigrants a path to legalization wouldn't be a deal-breaker for voters in the GOP primary, saying Republican voters "can be persuaded." Bush suggested he's showing stronger leadership than the rest of the field by defending his position, which includes strengthening border security, limiting those who can immigrate because of family ties, and expanding the number of immigrants who come for economic reasons.

"Do you want people to just bend with the wind, to mirror people's sentiment whoever is in front of you? Oh, yes, I used to be for that but now, I'm for this. Is that the way we want to elect presidents?" Bush said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush has regularly criticized Obama's executive actions on immigration, saying the Democrat exceeded the constitutional authority of the nation's highest elected office, and has promised to repeal those changes, including one that protects those brought to the country as children, if he's elected president. But Bush, who is married to a Mexican American woman and supports legalizing many of the 11 million undocumented workers in the country, hasn't said whether he'd make those changes without Congress first passing a comprehensive immigration bill. Such a move, which House Republicans supported last year, would put millions of otherwise law-abiding immigrants at risk of deportation.

The Assets and Liabilities of Jeb Bush // WSJ // Gerald F. Seib - May 11, 2015

Five months ago this week, Jeb Bush got a beat on the world by announcing he was forming a committee to explore running for president. That means enough time has passed to frame the Bush paradox: He is the establishment favorite in a party that almost always picks that candidate, but has walked into an election cycle in which that isn't necessarily the case.

The powerful assets Mr. Bush brings to the table have been on full display since his December move. He can raise prodigious amounts of money from the party's business and finance wings, and enjoys the backing of many GOP power brokers and most of his family's network of supporters. He is an articulate candidate with a conservative record as Florida's governor, yet crossover appeal to moderates. He is better than other governors and former governors at discussing the national-security issues that are rising on GOP voters' priority list.

But as the weeks have gone by, it's also been easy to see Mr. Bush's problems within his party. Conservative skepticism is higher than some anticipated, based largely on his support for Common Core education standards and broad immigration reforms. Rival candidates— Mike Huckabee and Sen. Rand Paul in particular—have tapped into an antiestablishment strain within the party that works against Mr. Bush. The loss of two elections to Barack Obama has left some yearning for a generational change that is being exploited by—ironically enough—Sen. Marco Rubio, something of a Jeb Bush protégé.

Any rational analysis has to rate Mr. Bush as the slight favorite within an exceptionally crowded field of Republican contenders, though it's way too early to draw definitive conclusions. What is possible, based on an analysis of polling data and the shape of the race ahead, is to define two significant problems Mr. Bush faces, as well as two big advantages:

First, the problems:

The Republican party has changed. Since his brother and father were elected, the party has become more populist and has been altered by the rise of the tea-party movement and the absorption of its messages and foot soldiers.

In a broad examination of party-identification trends, Public Opinion Strategies, a Republican polling firm that helps conduct the Wall Street Journal/NBC News survey, found that the party's three largest subgroups now are tea-party supporters, self-identified conservatives and white Southerners. Moreover, in the last few years, the Republican party has become more male in composition.

These trends don't necessarily work to Mr. Bush's favor. In the latest Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, he is the top choice among Republicans overall, by a small margin, but scores somewhat better among women than among men, better among moderates than among conservatives, and is the top choice of just 6% of self-described tea-party supporters.

The Romney experience left a bitter aftertaste. The nomination, followed by the defeat, of Mitt Romney in 2012 has left some Republicans questioning the party's tendency to nominate the big name whose time has come. Democrats didn't do that when they picked Barack Obama over Hillary Clinton in 2008, the argument goes, and they won the White House twice as a result.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Bush isn't quite the same next-in-line choice that Mr. Romney was. Still, the Romney experience has opened the way for rivals such as Sen. Ted Cruz to argue that Republicans lose general elections because they don't excite and turn out their conservative base. While that analysis is open to question, the Journal/NBC News poll found Mr. Bush behind both Sen. Paul and Sen. Cruz among Republican primary voters who didn't vote for Mr. Romney.

Here are two big Bush advantages:

The conservative anti-Bush vote is being splintered. There is no single populist/antiestablishment/tea-party/evangelical alternative to Mr. Bush, but rather a whole series of them. That reduces the chances that any one rival can, at least for a while, reach the critical mass necessary to be seen as the singular alternative. Which leads to the second big advantage:

A long nomination contest benefits Jeb Bush. The longer a fight goes on, the more important it is to have a lot of money to wage it. Mr. Bush is tops in that category.

More than that, Mr. Bush has a plausible answer to conservative criticism of his support for Common Core education standards—that he's for high standards at the state level, not federal coercion in imposing them—that will benefit from more time and opportunity to deliver it.

And to the extent the nominating contest moves into big swing states on the March and April calendar—Ohio, Florida, Illinois, Missouri, Pennsylvania—it will reach relatively more natural Bush voters than may be found in some of the early states. A marathon may suit Jeb Bush just fine.

Jeb Bush leans on nonprofit group as he prepares likely presidential run // Washington Post // Ed O'Keefe and Matea Gold - May 11, 2015

A nonprofit group allied with former Florida governor Jeb Bush is playing a more expansive role in his current political operation than previously known, housing several top policy advisers who are expected to join his eventual campaign, according to people familiar with the structure.

At least four people with expertise on energy issues, foreign affairs and communications are working with Right to Rise Policy Solutions, a nonprofit advocacy group that can accept secret, unlimited donations from individuals and corporations.

Bush's reliance on the nonprofit as he prepares for a likely presidential bid puts him on untested legal ground, cloaking who is paying the salaries of his expected advisers. But a polarized Federal Election Commission is unlikely to scrutinize the maneuver, campaign finance experts said.

The latest hire was announced Monday: Michael Steel, a top spokesman for House Speaker John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), said that he was moving to Florida to take a role with the nonprofit group. If Bush officially launches a presidential campaign, Steel would join it, according to people familiar with the plans who were not authorized to speak publicly.

At least three others working for the group are expected to make similar moves. Marcus Peacock, a former staffer with the Senate Budget Committee, is working with the group on environmental and energy issues. Former congressional staffers Robert S. Karem and John Noonan are advising the former governor on foreign policy issues as paid consultants to Right to Rise Policy Solutions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a statement, William Simon, the group's founder, said that if Bush launches a campaign, his entity "will continue its education efforts independent of such campaign." He confirmed in a separate e-mail that "some of our policy team are on short-term contracts to help get up to speed building policy and creating an informational Web site. As the year progresses I expect that some will move on to other opportunities."

Simon is a former Wal-Mart executive and was head of Florida's Department of Management Services during Bush's second term as governor. In February, Simon established Right to Rise Policy Solutions as a nonprofit corporation in his home state of Arkansas.

Having Simon's nonprofit group temporarily house a team of Bush aides means that the public may never know who is paying the salaries of those helping craft Bush's policies right now. Tax-exempt "social welfare" groups such as Right to Rise Policy Solutions can accept unlimited funds from individuals and corporations and are allowed to keep the names of the contributors secret. Simon has said he may end up disclosing the donors to the group, but it is unclear when that might happen.

"The beauty of nonprofits from the standpoint of some donors is that the source of the money will never see the light of day," said Kenneth Gross, who heads the political law practice at Skadden Arps. "The entire process is going to be even less transparent than it has been in the past."

Campaign finance experts said the nonprofit's relationship with Bush is legally risky. A landmark 2002 law bans a candidate from directly or indirectly establishing an organization that is not subject to federal contribution limits.

It is unclear, however, how that would apply to Bush, since he has not yet declared his candidacy for the White House. And the FEC is mired in intense partisan gridlock, making it unlikely that the six-member panel would agree to pursue the issue.

"It seems to me that it is pushing the envelope, but I don't know whether the FEC is going to take any action," said Gross, a former associate general counsel at the commission.

Advocates for tougher enforcement of campaign finance rules said that Bush's aggressive use of a nonprofit in his political operation undermines the federal contribution limits, which permit individuals to give up to $2,700 to a candidate per election. The former governor has also been raising money at an intense clip for his allied super PAC, also called Right to Rise.

"This is another example of how he is running roughshod over campaign finance law," said Larry Noble, senior counsel at the Campaign Legal Center. "He is outsourcing what will normally be campaign activity, and he's not even admitting he's testing the waters, which is absurd."

Kristy Campbell, a spokeswoman for Bush, said in an e-mail Monday that his team is "fully complying with the law in all activities Governor Bush is engaging in on the political front and will continue to do so."

Bush is not the first presidential contender to have an allied tax-exempt organization. A super PAC set up to back President Obama in 2012 had a smaller nonprofit arm, Priorities USA, which ended up giving most of its money away to groups such as Planned Parenthood and Hurricane Sandy relief efforts before being dissolved, according to tax documents.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Other 2016 Republican contenders — including Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida, former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee, former Texas governor Rick Perry, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal and former senator Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania — have aligned nonprofits groups that have conducted polling, developed policy and covered travel expenses.

But Bush's advisers appear to have gone further by parceling out a specific function to a tax-exempt group that is expected to flank his eventual campaign.

Steel has served as Boehner's press secretary since 2008, chiefly responsible for handling daily interactions with the congressional press corps and implementing a broader communications strategy, especially during high-stakes negotiations over formation of the "super committee" in 2011, the 2012 "fiscal cliff" and the 2013 government shutdown.

Boehner has voiced support for Bush generally in the past but is not expected to endorse any candidate before a nominee is chosen. He praised his outgoing spokesman in a statement on Monday, calling him "a pro's pro."

Bush favorability rating suffers in new poll // The Hill // Jonathan Easley - May 11, 2015

Former Gov. Jeb Bush (R-Fla.) has the worst favorability rating of any of the prospective Republican presidential candidates and a majority of voters nationwide say they won't even consider voting for him, according to a new poll.

The George Washington University poll released on Monday found that only 35 percent of voters say they have a favorable of view of Bush, against 48 percent who view him negatively.

Only 36 percent of voters said they would consider voting for Bush, while 60 percent said they would not consider voting for him.

The rest of the GOP field has better favorability ratings, but remains largely unknown.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R) is viewed favorably by 22 percent of voters, against 19 percent who say they view him negatively. However, 47 percent said they don't know enough about Walker, compared to only 6 percent who said the same about Bush.

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) is the only other GOP candidate with a positive favorability rating, with 31 percent saying they view him positively, against 30 percent who have a negative view of him. Twenty-six percent of voters said they don't know enough about Rubio to have an opinion.

Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee (R) breaks even on favorability with a 34-34 split, while Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) is 4 points underwater at 33 percent positive and 37 percent negative. Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) comes in at 25 percent positive and 33 percent negative.

But it's not just Bush that faces deep skepticism from the electorate at large – 55 percent of voters said they wouldn't consider voting for Paul, Huckabee or Cruz, while 50 percent said the same about Rubio and Walker.

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton (D) is viewed positively by 48 percent of voters, while 49 percent say they have a negative view of her. Forty-seven percent of voters said they would consider voting for Clinton, against 51 percent who said they would not.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"These GW Battleground Poll results show that the American electorate's deep, broad and chronic pessimism about jobs and economic security translates into across-the-board hostility toward the 2016 presidential candidates," Michael Cornfield, the research director for the GW Global Center for Political Engagement said in a statement.

"In each and every case, more respondents said they would not consider voting for them than would," he added. "Campaigners face stiff suspicions and a preference for political effectiveness over ideological affinity."

The poll of 1,000 registered voters, conducted between May 3 and 6, has a margin of error of 3.1 percentage points.

John Boehner press aide Michael Steel takes job with Jeb Bush // Politico // Jake Sherman - May 11, 2015

Michael Steel, one of Speaker John Boehner's top aides, is moving to Miami to work in a "leadership role" for Jeb Bush's political action committee.

Steel has worked as the press secretary for Boehner since 2008, when the Ohio Republican was the minority leader of a battered Republican party in the House. He has guided Boehner's communications operation for seven years, helping craft the strategy that made the Ohio Republican speaker, and subsequently playing a key role advising him in day-to-day governing, including high-stakes negotiations with President Barack Obama.

Steel will be an adviser to Bush's Right to Rise Policy Solutions PAC, "with a leadership role in policy and communications," according to a source familiar with the role. Right to Rise is the precursor to Bush's all-but-certain presidential campaign.

"Ask anyone in the Capitol – Republican, Democrat, or otherwise – about Michael Steel, and they will tell you the same thing: he is a pro's pro," Boehner said in a statement to POLITICO. "For more than seven years, I have relied on his ability to dissect an issue, win a debate, and deal openly and honestly with the press. He brings nothing but class, decency – and even cheer – to his work no matter how tough the situation. We would not be where we are today without him. All of Boehnerland is sorry to see him go, but we wish Michael the best of luck and we thank him for his service."

Boehner has been clear that he himself is a fan of Bush, and wants the former Florida governor to run for president.

Steel, a graduate of the University of North Carolina and Columbia University's graduate program in journalism, has worked on Capitol Hill for a dozen years. He started in 2003 as the press secretary for former Arizona Rep. John Shadegg.

Steel has frequently taken leaves of absence from the Hill to hit the campaign trail. He was Rep. Paul Ryan's (R-Wis.) press secretary during the 2012 presidential campaign. In 2014, he was a senior adviser to the Republican Party of North Carolina and helped Sen. Thom Tillis defeat Kay Hagan.

This time, he is leaving Capitol Hill behind.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jeb Bush's disastrous defense of the Iraq War // Washington Examiner // Byron York - May 11, 2015

Is it possible that in 2016, more than a decade after the invasion of Iraq, the Republican party's presidential nominee could become bogged down in debating whether the war was the right thing to do? The answer, a depressing one for many in the GOP, is yes — if the nominee is Jeb Bush.

Fox News' Megyn Kelly asked Bush a straightforward, concise question: "Knowing what we know now, would you have authorized the invasion?" Bush's answer was an unhesitating yes.

"I would have, and so would have Hillary Clinton, just to remind everybody," Bush said, "and so would have almost everybody that was confronted with the intelligence they got."

"You don't think it was a mistake?" asked Kelly.

"In retrospect, the intelligence that everybody saw, that the world saw, not just the United States, was faulty," Bush answered.

Bush's view of the war is considerably less clear-eyed than that of his brother, former President George W. Bush, the man who ordered the invasion. In his memoir, Decision Points, W. wrestled with the dilemma of his decision to start a war on the basis of bad intelligence. Only W. did not call the intelligence "faulty," as Jeb had. W. called the intelligence "false."

"The reality was that I had sent American troops into combat based in large part on intelligence that proved false," George W. Bush wrote.

Even though W. still argued that the world is "undoubtedly safer" without Saddam Hussein, he knew the failure to find the weapons of mass destruction that he used to justify the invasion was "a massive blow to our credibility — my credibility — that would shake the confidence of the American people."

"I had a sickening feeling every time I thought about it," George W. Bush wrote. "I still do."

As for whether Hillary Clinton would have authorized the invasion "knowing what we know now" — it's hard to believe that Jeb Bush is serious when he says she would. Of course she wouldn't.

Nor would others involved in the decision. For example, look at the account of another key player in the 2002-03 Iraq debate, top presidential advisor Karl Rove. "Would the Iraq War have occurred without WMD?" Rove asked in his book, Courage and Consequence. "I doubt it: Congress was very unlikely to have supported the use-of-force resolution without the threat of WMD. The Bush administration itself would probably have sought other ways to constrain Saddam, bring about regime change and deal with Iraq's horrendous human rights violations."

So no, Congress would not have authorized war if lawmakers knew there were no WMDs.

If Jeb Bush sticks to his position — that he would still authorize war knowing what we know today — it will represent a step backward for the Republican Party. Other candidates before Jeb have grappled with the issue and changed their position. Look at the evolution of the 2012 GOP presidential nominee, Mitt Romney.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In January 2008, Romney said, "It was the right decision to go into Iraq. I supported it at the time; I support it now." In 2011, Romney said: "Well, if we knew at the time of our entry into Iraq that there were no weapons of mass destruction — if somehow we had been given that information, why, obviously we would not have gone in."

So now Jeb Bush takes a step back to support an invasion even in the absence of WMD.

Jeb's statement is likely to resonate until he either changes his position or loses the race for the Republican nomination. Should he become the nominee, the issue will dog him into the general election campaign.

To his credit, George W. Bush wrestled with the consequences of his decision to invade Iraq. Other war supporters were forced to re-think their positions, too. In coming days, Jeb Bush will likely have to do the same.

Jeb Bush's Revisionist History of the Iraq War // New York Times // Andrew Rosenthal - May 11, 2015

Last week, a spokesman for Jeb Bush, who used to be governor of Florida and is now vacuuming up as much dark money as he can without actually announcing a run for president, tried to unspin a comment Mr. Bush made in a private gathering that suggested he was taking advice about the Middle East from his brother, former President George W. Bush.

Since it's hard to think of a foreign-policy success by George Bush in that region, it was alarming that the would-be president would take his brother as his role model. Turns out it's much worse. Jeb Bush doesn't seem to have learned anything from his brother's failures and he is blithely parroting the worst propaganda about the war in Iraq.

Asked on Fox News (in an interview to be aired tonight) if he would have authorized the invasion of Iraq, knowing what the world now knows, Jeb Bush replied: "I would have and so would have Hillary Clinton, just to remind everybody. And so would almost everybody that was confronted with the intelligence they got."

Let's leave aside for a moment that Mr. Bush has no clue what Mrs. Clinton would have done given her knowledge now about the lack of a security threat to the United States from weapons of mass destruction or anything else in Iraq. What he appears to be referring to is the fact that Mrs. Clinton, like most of the Senate, voted in favor of a war resolution after George W. Bush presented Congress with a National Intelligence Estimate that said Saddam Hussein had active programs in nuclear, chemical and biological warfare.

The former president likes to say Congress had the "same intelligence" he had when they voted to authorize the war, which sounds good, but is not exactly true. George Bush decided to invade Iraq long before the National Intelligence Estimate was ever even drafted. Its purpose was not to inform policymaking, but to fool Congress, the United Nations, the American people and the rest of the world into supporting the war.

The world now knows that the document was reverse-engineered to suit a policy that had already been created. The assessments of Saddam Hussein's weapons programs were wrong, and hotly disputed within the intelligence community at the time; the Bush administration just conveniently forgot to mention that to Congress.

Mr. Bush said in his interview: "Once we invaded and took out Saddam Hussein we didn't focus on security first," a stunning understatement of the incompetent way Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld planned the invasion. Jeb Bush added that his brother "thinks those mistakes took place as well."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That may set a new standard for passive shifting of responsibility — even worse than the classic dodge, “mistakes were made.”

All in the Family // Slate // Jamelle Bouie - May 11, 2015

Hillary Clinton is sprinting away from Bill. In the short month since she’s been an official candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination, she’s renounced his criminal justice policies—pledging an end to the “era of mass incarceration” her husband helped usher—and adopted a careful skepticism on free trade, versus the enthusiasm of the Clinton administration. She hasn’t abandoned the former president—Bill will almost certainly campaign for Hillary—but she’s begun to put space between her career and his legacy.

The other dynastic candidate in the presidential race, Jeb Bush, is moving in the opposite direction. “If you want to know who I listen to for advice, it’s him,” said Bush of his brother, President George W. Bush. In this instance, speaking to a group of Manhattan financiers, he was referencing his proposed policy toward Israel. But it’s clear Jeb has taken sibling wisdom on a variety of topics. Not only does he sound like his brother on immigration—he wants a path to “earned legal status” for 11 million unauthorized immigrants—but he’s on board with his foreign policy as well. When asked if, “knowing what we know now,” he would have authorized the invasion of Iraq, Jeb Bush said yes. “I would have,” he told Fox News anchor Megyn Kelly, “and so would have Hillary Clinton,” he added.

Because the question was whether Bush would go to war with today’s information—as opposed to 2002’s intelligence—this wasn’t really an answer. Clinton’s vote to authorize the war with the information she had doesn’t mean she would do the same with the information she now has (though, someone should ask). But that’s secondary to the astonishing fact that Bush has embraced the most disastrous choice of his brother’s administration.

To that point, Kelly also asked if Bush thought the war was a mistake. And here, his reply was even more interesting. “In retrospect,” Bush said, “the intelligence that everybody saw, that the world saw, not just the United States, was faulty. And in retrospect, once we invaded and took out Saddam Hussein, we didn’t focus on security first, and the Iraqis, in this incredibly insecure environment turned on the United States military because there was no security for themselves and their families. By the way, guess who thinks that those mistakes took place, as well? George W. Bush. So, news flash to the world, if they’re trying to find places where there’s big space between me and my brother, this might not be one of those.”

Either Bush is dodging the question—and looking for ground to defend his brother—or he doesn’t understand that the mistake of the war was the decision to launch it, not the shoddy aftermath. Even with a more competent administration in charge, it’s likely the Iraq war would have remained a disaster: a needless diversion against an overblown threat that claimed tens of thousands of lives, committed the United States to a long destructive occupation, and destabilized the Middle East in ways that still reverberate. And if Bush doesn’t grasp the error of the invasion, then he’s liable to make a similar mistake if elected president.

Bush has to know this is toxic to the general public. Even with the gruesome violence of ISIS, pluralities—and sometimes majorities—of Americans oppose further major involvement in Iraq. Last June, in a poll from Quinnipiac University, 61 percent of Americans said the Iraq war was the wrong thing to do, and that October, in a poll from NBC News and the Wall Street Journal, 66 percent of Americans said the war was “not worth it.”

But at this moment in the election, Bush isn’t speaking to the public. He’s speaking to Republicans. And even now, most Republicans think the war was a good idea. Last year, in a poll from USA Today and the Pew Research Center, 52 percent of Republicans said it was “right to use” military force in Iraq. And in the aforementioned Quinnipiac survey, 56 percent of Republicans agreed that the war “was the right thing for the United States.” In that instance, Republicans were the only group to show majority support.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If Bush were running unopposed—or with marginal opposition—there might not be an imperative to embrace the Iraq war. But he's running in a crowded field of legitimate competitors, where most are hawkish (Sen. Rand Paul is the notable exception) and one, Sen. Marco Rubio, has the belligerent posturing of George W. Bush in his first term. In his 2010 campaign for Senate, Rubio praised the Iraq war for making the world "better off," and in a 2013 speech in London, he called the war a "vitally important achievement" of America's relationship with the United Kingdom. He's pushed interventions in Syria (he would have armed the rebels), opposed withdrawal in Iraq and Afghanistan, and wants a more aggressive stance toward Iran. As Eliana Johnson wrote for National Review last year, Rubio is the neoconservative candidate for 2016: "To this group, beating back the rising tide of non-interventionism in the Republican party is a top priority, and they consider Rubio a candidate, if not the candidate, capable of doing so."

You can chalk up Jeb Bush's Iraq position to familial loyalty, if you want. But you shouldn't ignore the politics of it. Bush needs to distinguish himself from a younger, more popular competitor in a congested presidential field. Embracing the Iraq war—and his brother's legacy on foreign policy—is one way to challenge Rubio on his own turf, at least among donors and elites. Likewise, over on the left, Clinton is rejecting the triangulation of her husband and adopting progressive positions on criminal justice and immigration reform, to bolster her position and preclude a repeat of the 2008 primary.

Most observers assumed Clinton and Bush would be forced to make some moves because of the political legacy of family members. What's ironic is that they've moved opposite of expectations. Bill Clinton is among the most popular presidents of recent memory, and George W. Bush is among the most disliked. But Hillary, eager to define herself and reconstitute the Obama coalition, has distanced herself from her husband while Jeb, fighting to build stature in a melee of a Republican primary, has pulled closer to his unsuccessful brother.

PolitFact NH: Jeb Bush says he met NH man who founded only U.S. bank since Dodd-Frank // Concord Monitor // Clay Wirestone - May 10, 2015

At an appearance in Concord in mid-April, former Florida governor Jeb Bush talked banking -- and the legislation meant to reform it.

"On my last trip to New Hampshire I think I met the guy who founded the first and only bank since Dodd-Frank passed, since the financial crisis," Bush said at his speech at Saint Anselm College's Politics and Eggs event April 17. "One bank in the country."

The banking reform legislation known as Dodd-Frank became law on July 21, 2010, nearly five years ago. We decided to look into Bush's statement that only one bank had been founded since that time.

We checked with Bush's camp and according to spokesman Matt Gorman, Bush met with businessman Bill Grenier when he was in the state March 14. Greiner, of Bedford, filed last year with the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to charter an entirely new bank named Primary Bank.

"We're going against the grain, and we're okay with that because we see a need," he told the Wall Street Journal in December.

So would Primary Bank be the nation's "first and only" since Dodd-Frank? Not exactly. Depending on the data set you choose, it's either the second, fourth, ninth or 20th.

The Journal and other media sources have said the first bank founded after the law's passage is in fact the Bank of Bird-in-Hand, Pa. It mainly serves the area's Amish community. And yes, it includes a drive-through window for horse-and-buggy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This was included in the information forwarded to us by Bush's spokesman.

But we decided to ask the FDIC itself. Greg Hernandez, an agency spokesman, offered further details. First, off, when Bush and others talk about new banks, they're referring to de novo banks, or banks issued a new charter by the agency.

Not counting Grenier's startup, the FDIC actually lists three banks issued charters since 2010. The oldest, Lakeside Bank of Lake Charles, La., had its charter approved in October 2009, before Dodd-Frank's passage. But the charter wasn't consummated until late July 2010, after the bill was signed into law.

The next bank on the FDIC's list is Start Community Bank of New Haven, Conn. While its charter was approved in December 2010, the bank itself says its origins date to 2004, with the founding of its parent company.

The Bird-in-Hand bank's charter was both approved and consummated in November 2013.

It seems fair to call Primary Bank the second of all-new bank approved by the FDIC since Dodd Frank's passage. But if you include the two others that the agency itself lists, Primary Bank would come in fourth.

The FDIC lists five other banks as having been established since mid-2010, including one in Kansas City, Mo.; Brockton, Mass,; and Easley, S.C., according to Hernandez. These banks, however, didn't apply for new charters.

"Other banks can be established through a shelf charter from the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency," Hernandez wrote in an e-mail. "That would be when a private equity group purchases a failed bank. Also, (newly) established banks can be the result of a merger or acquisition."

If you use that criteria, and include the five other banks mentioned, Primary Bank would be the ninth bank started after Dodd-Frank.

And finally, while they're not called banks and are regulated by a different agency, consumers generally see credit unions as the equivalent of banks (and credit unions are affected by the law, too). According to John Fairbanks of the National Credit Union Administration, there have been at least 11 credit union charters approved since the start of 2011. That would make Primary Bank at least the 14th and at most the 20th such institution started since Dodd Frank overhauled the banking industry.

None of these different contexts would make Grenier's bank the first one established since the passage of Dodd-Frank.

And there's the implication that new banks aren't being created because of Dodd-Frank, which raises the question:

What does the law actually do, and why is it important?

The full name of the law is the Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act, and it passed on July 15, 2010. President Obama signed it into law on July 21. While the financial crisis mentioned by Bush predated the law by a couple of years, Dodd-Frank itself has been fiercely criticized by Republicans, who say it stifles growth in the financial sector.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The law itself was meant to prevent another financial meltdown like that of 2008-9. According to an overview from CNBC, the law was meant to avoid banks becoming “too big to fail,” regulate risky trading and created new oversight bodies such as the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau.

The banking industry blames the law, in part, for the lack of new banks.

Frank Keating, president and CEO of the American Bankers Association, criticized government regulations on the financial sector in a recent column for The Hill. After mentioning the New Hampshire bank, he gets down to business.

“Investors are reluctant to shoulder the cumulative regulatory burdens -- both from new laws and from a more stringent approach by regulators themselves -- and the rising legal risks associated with running a bank these days.”

Keating doesn’t mention Dodd-Frank by name, but the implication is clear. He also highlights the dropoff of bank creation post-2010, pointing out that “the average from 2002 to 2008 was closer to 100” per year. According to a Motley Fool explainer piece, “between 1990 and 2006, the FDIC approved an average of 152 bank and thrift charters a year.”

That being said, there isn’t universal agreement that regulation is behind the drop in new bank creation.

Keating acknowledges that in his column, noting toward the end that “the low interest rate environment is challenging for bank startups. And the number of banks has been steadily falling for decades due to a wave of mergers and acquisitions.”

According to a report from the Richmond Federal Reserve bank, there could be several factors at work. One is the Federal Reserve’s policy of keeping interest rates low. That lowers interest rates overall, making it harder for banks to earn money. (The Motley Fool suggests that’s the main reason for the drop.) The research raises the possibility that the cost of complying with regulations has gone up, but says “it is unclear” whether that is driving down the creation of new banks.

Finally, though, it mentions that the FDIC itself has changed its policies for new banks, in a move that predates the passage of Dodd-Frank.

“In 2009 the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation increased the length of time -- from three to seven years -- during which newly insured depository institutions are subject to higher capital requirements and more frequent examinations,” the paper’s authors write.

Our ruling

Former Florida governor Jeb Bush said “I met the guy who founded the first and only bank since Dodd-Frank passed, since the financial crisis. One bank in the country.”

He’s certainly got a point that there has been a sharp dropoff of newly chartered banks since Dodd-Frank became law in the summer of 2010, but it’s incorrect to say Primary Bank would be the first in the country. There is at least one other in the nation, and possibly several more. It is certainly the first bank chartered in New Hampshire during that time.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The suggestion that Dodd-Frank has caused the drop-off in new bank formation is also debatable. While regulation has perhaps played a role, FDIC policies set before the law's passage may have had a more direct effect. And the overall economic picture, with incredibly low interest rates, has simply made it difficult for banks to make money.

We rate Bush's statement Mostly False.

First on CNN: Ted Cruz to host fundraiser along U.S.-Mexico border // CNN Politics // Theodore Schleifer - May 11, 2015

Washington (CNN) Ted Cruz will raise money for his presidential campaign along the U.S.-Mexico border next month.

The Texas senator -- who has made beefing up border security a calling card of his presidential campaign -- will visit McAllen, Texas, for a $1,000-a-head fundraiser on June 9, according to an invitation obtained by CNN.

Cruz deplores the White House's executive actions on immigration and has proposed tripling the size of the U.S. Border Patrol. On the stump, he frequently jokes about staffing the border with reassigned Internal Revenue Service agents.

"Imagine you had traveled thousands of miles in the blazing sun. You're swimming across the Rio Grande and the first thing you see is 90,000 IRS agents. You'd turn around and go home too," Cruz said to applause at the South Carolina Freedom Summit this weekend.

Cruz has been criticized by local officials and business leaders for speaking extensively about the border but visiting relatively infrequently.

Steve Ahlenius, the head of the McAllen Chamber of Commerce, told the Texas Tribune earlier this year that too many politicians like Cruz prioritize "parachuting" in over spending meaningful time on the ground.

"They don't come in with viable solutions that really kind of take into account the feedback, comments and ideas coming from the local area, as opposed to what they think someone in Iowa is going to want to hear," he said.

The Rio Grande Valley, a Democratic stronghold in a solidly Republican state, is about 90% Hispanic and is currently represented by only Democrats in Austin and Washington. Hidalgo County, where Cruz will raise money next month, gave 70% of its vote in 2012 to Barack Obama.

Much of the early money Cruz has raised has come from Texas, even though the state's business community was originally hostile to him when he first entered the political scene. The Republican firebrand has worked hard to win over much of the state's traditional donor base, but he now finds serious competition from a crowded field of presidential candidates with ties to the Lone Star State, led by Jeb Bush, the former Florida governor.

The Cruz campaign declined to confirm the event to CNN.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rand Paul Plans To Filibuster Patriot Act // Huffington Post // Igor Bobic – May 11, 2015

Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) said this week that he intends to mount a fight against the reauthorization of the Patriot Act, the post-Sept. 11 law that gives the National Security Agency much of its authority to conduct surveillance programs.

"I'm going to lead the charge in the next couple of weeks as the Patriot Act comes forward. We will be filibustering. We will be trying to stop it. We are not going to let them run over us," Paul told the New Hampshire Union Leader on Monday.

The Patriot Act expires June 1, but Congress must effectively renew the law by May 22nd because of a scheduled weeklong break. Paul, a civil libertarian who hopes to capture the 2016 Republican nomination for president, has consistently spoken against reauthorizing the law, going so far as to oppose a 2014 bill that would have ended controversial NSA phone record collection because it left the government's broad authority to conduct surveillance intact.

It's unclear whether Paul plans to vote to block reauthorizing the surveillance law, or whether he intends to mount a traditional "talking" filibuster that would eat up valuable time on the Senate floor. A request with the senator's spokesperson for more details was not immediately returned.

The Kentucky Republican isn't the only member of the Senate with objections to the Patriot Act. On the other side of the aisle, Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.), who is one of the most persistent critics of U.S. surveillance programs, has said that he, too, plans to wage war over some of the law's most controversial provisions. In an interview with MSNBC on Sunday, Wyden threatened to mount a filibuster if Congress reauthorizes Section 215 of the act, upon which the government has built its rationale for the bulk data collection revealed in 2013 by NSA leaker Edward Snowden.

Wyden and Paul have teamed up on national security issues in the past. In 2013, the senator from Oregon lent his voice to Paul's filibuster of the nomination of John Brennan as CIA director.

A request for comment with a spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), who is a strong supporter of the Patriot Act, was not immediately returned on Monday.

Rand Paul Battles the PATRIOT Act (and Fellow Senators Who Miss Votes) // Bloomberg // David Weigel - May 11, 2015

Last night, before arriving for a short and busy visit to New Hampshire, Kentucky Senator Rand Paul published an op-ed in Manchester's conservative Union Leader newspaper.

"As President of the United States, I will immediately end the NSA’s illegal bulk data collection and domestic spying programs," said Paul. "I will take my responsibilities seriously and protect the Fourth Amendment rights of all Americans. I believe the overreaching NSA spying program represents the worst of the 'Washington Machine.'"

He'd touched on some of the same themes Saturday, on a visit to San Francisco. Paul, having been accused of a light touch when drone strikes and police brutality were forced into the news cycle, was taking the opposite approach to the NSA. He would talk about it whenever he could, and focus on the June battle over whether to reauthorize the PATRIOT Act.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Before his big public event of the day in Londonderry, Paul joined a small group of New Hampshire state legislators who planned to endorse him. They wanted to hear his critique of the NSA. As soon as he arrived at the Londonderry Lions Club, Paul walked into a scrum of waiting cameramen and started talking about how a New York court's ruling against the NSA's bulk metadata collection would define his race.

"I'm the only Republican and the only Democrat who said I'd end this program on day one," said Paul. "It's illegal. We can catch terrorists by using the Constitution. We can use warrants, with a judge writing the warrant, with someone's name on the warrant."

Inside the Lions Club, Paul gave a truncated stump speech to around 100 voters, several of whom had been in the crowd for his April campaign announcement speech, just down the road. "We're getting ready to have a big fight over the PATRIOT Act," said Paul. "I was walking down the hallway with another senator, three years ago, when I led the fight to get rid of the PATRIOT Act. He said, 'What will happen? It will expire tonight? If you filibuster, it will expire.'"

One voter started applauding, even before Paul's punchline.

"I said: 'Maybe for a few hours, we can just use the Constitution!'"

Paul's town hall queries veered from common core to VA hospital funding to Social Security, but it ended with a question about spying. James Bellamy, a 28-year old law student at Western New England University, asked Paul if he'd vote for the USA FREEDOM Act. Some libertarian-minded Republicans, like Representative Justin Amash, were already promising to oppose that bill, a supposed fix to the data collection program that allowed the government to make bulk requests through alternate means.

"I sued the NSA," said Paul. "I'm a leader in trying to stop this. My bill would end it, and not replace it. The USA FREEDOM Act ends it, but then replaces it with another program. My concern is whether or not they'll have individualized suspicion to get your records. USA FREEDOM says the government is not going to collect your records in Utah, but the government can get them from the phone company. I'm okay with the government getting them from the phone company if they have your name on the warrant. I'm not okay with them saying, we need everybody in Londonderry's stuff, so even though it's not being held in Utah, they can get in from the phone company."

The answer to Bellamy's question wasn't easy. "I'm not perfectly at home with the USA FREEDOM Act," Paul said. "I voted against it once. The reason I voted against it was that it reauthorized the PATRIOT Act."

In other words, Paul's vote would depend on the Senate's debate. That was where he'd be heading next—to the Senate, to debate. Before Paul even took questions, State Senator Andy Sanborn, an early endorser, made joking reference to Florida Senator Marco Rubio and Texas Senator Ted Cruz.

"We don't want to mention anyone else who might be living in Texas or in Florida," said Sanborn, explaining why Paul might have to run out early. "He's actually going to go back and do his job as a senator and vote."

On the way to the pick-up truck that would spirit Paul to the airport, NH1 reporter Paul Steinhauser asked Paul if he agreed with Sanborn's snark.

"I get paid by the taxpayer, and I figure I need to vote, so I'm working very hard to do this and also vote at the same time," Paul said. "I'll not only be back there for a vote this afternoon, I'll be back and voting and leading the effort against the PATRIOT Act, and leading the vote to try to end bulk collection of your phone records."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rand Paul supports bird flu role of agency he tried to cut // USA Today // Christopher Doering - May 11, 2015

WASHINGTON — Presidential candidate Sen. Rand Paul as recently as 2013 proposed cutting an Agriculture Department agency responsible for studying the spread of poultry diseases such as bird flu, a virus that has killed millions of birds in Iowa the past two weeks.

Paul, a Kentucky Republican, had proposed budget plans as recently as two years ago that backed scrapping the USDA's Foreign Agricultural Service, the National Institute of Food and Agriculture and the Agricultural Research Service, which includes a division responsible for studying ways to predict, treat and control poultry diseases.

Steve Grubbs, Paul's chief Iowa strategist, declined to address specific spending reductions at the USDA or whether the senator continues to support cutting those agencies as he has in past budget proposals.

But Grubbs said Paul favors the government playing an active role in working with farmers to combat bird flu because the virus has spread throughout several states. As a result, the outbreak triggers what's known as the commerce clause in the Constitution, effectively giving the government the power to get involved, he said.

"Sen. Paul recognizes that there are important programs in the USDA related to food safety and disease control that need to be protected and potentially enhanced," said Grubbs. Bird flu and other diseases are "a perfect place for the USDA and other federal agencies to play a role."

Former Lt. Gov. Patty Judge brought the budget items to the attention of the Des Moines Register.

On May 1, Gov. Terry Branstad declared a state of emergency in Iowa — an action that could help state agencies assist in the disposal of birds stricken by the virus. The virus, which can kill a poultry flock within 48 hours, has struck in 14 states.

In Iowa, more than two dozen cases of avian influenza have been identified, affecting an estimated 20 million birds that have been infected or must be destroyed to contain the disease.

Government officials are still trying to determine how the disease is spreading and find ways to bring it under control.

Paul has pushed for smaller government, sparring with some GOP leaders during his first term in the Senate, blaming them for being part of the problem. Political analysts believe that if elected president, Paul would move to cut the federal government. He has proposed eliminating several Cabinet-level departments including Commerce, Education and Energy.

A spokesman with the USDA declined to comment on Paul's previously proposed cuts.

Ed Schafer, a former agriculture secretary in the George W. Bush administration and a one-time governor of North Dakota, said agencies such as the Agricultural Research Service are especially vulnerable when lawmakers are looking to rein in spending because their results are difficult to measure right away.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Research programs, he said, are vital to helping agriculture thrive by discovering new advancements in yields, improving water management and finding ways for crops to handle weeds and pests.

"I'm all for Rand Paul's efforts to say we need to trim the cost of government. What the trick is is identifying the priorities and putting the money there," Schafer said. "(Research) is an easy one to cut because there is no immediate benefit seen. It comes in minute, little advances but over the long-term you increase the food supply, you make it safer and more affordable. Research, to me, is more important than some other programs."

Ken Blanchard, a professor of political science at Northern State University in Aberdeen, S.D., said it's almost impossible to remove or drastically overhaul a Cabinet department. He noted that President Ronald Reagan campaigned for the presidency in 1980 by promising to abolish the Education Department, which was signed into law by President Jimmy Carter a year earlier.

"Cabinet agencies are like Dracula. No matter how many times you draw the stake in their heart or expose them to light they are always back again for the next movie," Blanchard said. "You've got so many vested interests that the agency manages to put its tendrils into in so many parts of the rest of the country and various private interests. It's just almost impossible" to make a major change to a Cabinet department, he said.

Rand Paul's 'Fast Track' Dilemma // WSJ // Bob Davis – May 11, 2015

Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky has emerged as a top spokesman for a view on trade legislation that could complicate President Barack Obama's push to pass a major Pacific trade pact.

The 2016 presidential candidate says he is a "big believer in free trade" but has qualms about the legislation, known as fast track, designed to help pass major trade deals with limited involvement by the Senate. Some other Republicans are expressing similar misgivings in both the House and Senate.

With a key Senate procedural vote on fast track set for Tuesday, Mr. Paul is in the crosshairs as groups on both sides of the issue vie for his vote. Last week he said he hadn't made up his mind on fast track.

But on Monday, Mr. Paul told WMUR in New Hampshire that he opposed fast track, in part, because of his frustration about the secrecy surrounding the Trans-Pacific Partnership.

"I've told leadership I'm a 'no' vote on trade promotion authority," Mr. Paul told the station, according to an account on WMUR.com. "I'm hesitant to give blanket authority on stuff we haven't seen." He said he might be persuaded in the future to back fast track if he approved of provisions in the TPP.

At a Heritage Foundation forum earlier this year, he indicated sympathy for arguments that the procedure weakens congressional authority and that trade pacts should be treated like treaties—meaning they would need a two-thirds majority of the Senate for approval, as opposed to the simple majority the Pacific pact requires.

His business allies in Kentucky and elsewhere are strong fast-track supporters, and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce has made winning his vote a priority. "His vote is important, given his credibility with conservative-leaning folks," said Christopher Wenk, the Chamber's executive director of international policy. The Chamber is working with four big Kentucky business organizations to woo Sen. Paul.

But many of Mr. Paul's grass-roots supporters are trade skeptics—and outright hostile to fast track. In a late April Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, Paul supporters by a 41% to 36% margin said free trade had hurt the U.S.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

With Mr. Paul, “you have mixed elements and motivations,” said conservative legal scholar Bruce Fein, a Paul adviser who opposes fast track. “He’s an unorthodox candidate.”

President Obama is trying to rally Democratic support for the Trans-Pacific Partnership. What would this trade pact do? How is Mr. Obama answering critics from within his own party? WSJ’s Jason Bellini has #TheShortAnswer.

Under fast track, formally called trade promotion authority, Congress agrees to vote yes or no on a trade pact but not to amend it. All major trade deals for decades have passed Congress that way. That is because trade partners won’t reveal their bottom lines in negotiations if they think Congress could step in afterward and rewrite the contents of a trade deal.

With fast track, U.S. Trade Representative Michael Froman has said, the 12-nation Trans-Pacific Partnership, which includes the U.S., Vietnam and Japan, could be concluded in a few months.

But a number of conservative lawmakers, even those who say they back trade expansion, oppose fast track as an abrogation of congressional power.

GOP Rep. Steve Russell of Oklahoma, who calls himself a “constitutional conservative,” says opening up trade is “not a bad thing,” but won’t vote for fast track. Rep. Walter Jones (R., N.C.), who opposes fast track, called Mr. Paul the “national spokesman on the issue of sovereignty.”

Four Senate Republicans opposed fast track when it last came before Congress under President George W. Bush. Two other GOP 2016 presidential candidates, Sens. Ted Cruz of Texas and Marco Rubio of Florida, both back fast track.

Mr. Paul’s openness to free trade and the Pacific pact has made him a target of intense business lobbying. The Kentucky Chamber of Commerce is dispatching a top representative, Bryan Sunderland, to make a personal appeal, as well as asking its members to lobby Mr. Paul themselves.

“Our hope is that when he hears from Kentucky business leaders who have been with him for years, that will resonate,” said Trey Grayson, president of the North Kentucky Chamber of Commerce, which also is lobbying Sen Paul.

But the squeeze is coming from the other side, too. One Paul supporter, Robert Berry of Broomfield, Colo., who calls himself a libertarian activist, said fast track could be a “make or break vote” for Mr. Paul.

“It seems a little cute that you’d be for a [trade] pact that much of your base despises, but you are wavering on legislation that would make it a reality,” Mr. Berry said.

Rand Paul Campaign Takes a Licking in New Hampshire // TIME // Philip Elliott - May 11, 2015

It’s unlikely many people in the audience at a New Hampshire town hall meeting noticed anything amiss Monday. But a 90-second confrontation between an aide to Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul and a Democratic operative jumped out immediately online.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As shown in the brief video, a tussle between the two ended with the Paul staffer licking the camera.

"Just when you thought Rand Paul's campaign couldn't get any stranger, his senior staffer in New Hampshire decided to taste our tracker's camera lens today," said Preston Maddock, a spokesman for American Bridge 21st Century, the liberal group that had sent the operative. "It was truly bizarre, creepy and unprofessional."

Despite American Bridge's indignation, it was exactly the type of moment they were looking for: embarrassing, awkward and buzzworthy.

Opposition researchers, as the practitioners call themselves, have long been part of campaigns, digging up dirt on rivals and passing it to reporters and activists. But in recent years, they've become active participants as well, sending one-person camera crews to document as many of the rival candidates' campaign stops as possible and maybe even unintentionally provoke them.

The same American Bridge tracker from the New Hampshire town hall last chased former Massachusetts Sen. Scott Brown as he canoed on the Contoocook River during his failed attempt to return to the Senate representing New Hampshire.

It's an equal opportunity pastime. American Bridge and its Republican counterpart, America Rising, are each million-dollar organizations dedicated to documenting the stumbles of the presidential candidates and those around them. The goal is to discredit the candidates to voters and to amplify their errors with raw footage of candidates behaving oddly.

The biggest catch—and one that only encouraged the trend—was in August of 2006, when then-Sen. George Allen of Virginia introduced his audience to a tracker from Democratic rival Jim Webb's campaign. The tracker's name? S.R. Sidarth.

"This fella here, over here with the yellow shirt—Macaca, or whatever his name is—he's with my opponent. He's following us around everywhere," said Allen, who went on to lose to Webb.

Critics said "macaca" was a slur against the tracker, who is Indian-American.

Other campaigns and political parties quickly identified the value of sending a staffer to tail rivals with a video camera, just in case they fumbled or responded to harassing questions. The addition of YouTube and other video sharing services only hastened the ease with which campaigns could share video to supporters and reporters alike.

It has changed how candidates interact with voters and reporters alike.

In 2010, Senate hopeful Sharron Angle fled journalists in Reno. Trackers from the Nevada Democratic Party documented the Republican's refusal to answer questions from reporters. The video of reporters chasing Angle from an event, and her speeding away in a white SUV, reinforced opponents' arguments that she was not up for the job.

In 2012, Republican Rep. Allen West of Florida was asked during a town hall appearance how many lawmakers were Marxists or socialists. West took the question seriously: "There's about 78 to 81 members of the Democrat Party that are members of the Communist Party." The local news carried his comments, but the addition of video—easily shared online—made it a topic on social platforms such as Twitter and Facebook. West narrowly lost his re-election bid.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Candidates can even get in trouble for trying to avoid confrontation.

In 2014, as cameras rolled, immigration activists confronted Paul while he was campaigning in Iowa with Rep. Steve King. The activists, who were brought to the country illegally as young children and want to be treated as citizens now, confronted King about his views on immigration.

Paul, who was sitting across from King, looked to communications aide Sergio Gor. Taking his cue, Paul put down his burger, pushed back his plastic picnic chair and walked quickly away from the table. King, meanwhile, stayed and sparred with the DREAMer. The video quickly ricocheted around the Internet.

American Bridge officials were hoping Monday's licking incident would have similar viewership.

Asked about Mondays incident, Gor declined to identify the licker or say if he worked for the campaign in an official capacity. Instead, he issued a statement completely unrelated to the incident.

"Sen. Rand Paul visited New Hampshire today to accept the endorsement of 20 New Hampshire state representatives who support his run for the White House, and to visit with and take questions from the voters," Gor said. "It was a great day of events."

Chris Christie Racked Up $300k of Food and Alcohol on Expense Account // TIME // Sam Frizell - May 11, 2015

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie spent $300,000 of a government state allowance over five years in office to buy food, alcoholic drinks and desserts, according to a new analysis of state records.

In addition to his $175,000 salary, Christie receives $95,000 a year for purposes vaguely defined in the state budget for official purposes like state receptions, operating an official residence, or other expenses.

And numbers published by local website New Jersey Watchdog show Christie, a Republican presidential hopeful, took full advantage of the stipend over his five years as governor. He spent $76,373 during 53 shopping runs at Wegmans Food Markets, and $11,971 in purchases at ShopRite supermarkets during 51 visits, in addition to another $6,536 in seven visits to ShopRite's liquor stores. The site is published by the Franklin Center for Government & Public Integrity.

All the food purchases were for official purposes, an aide in Christie's office said, including receptions and general upkeep at the governor's mansion.

During the 2010 and 2011 NFL football seasons, Christie also spent a total of $82,594 at the MetLife Stadium, where the New York's Giants and Jets play their home games. The New Jersey Republican State Committee later reimbursed the money Christie spent at MetLife to the state.

Gov. Christie's office said the money was used for official political functions to host dignitaries and legislators.

"Whenever the Governor hosts an event in his official capacity, the discretionary account is available to pay for those costs associated with official reception and hosting and related incidental expenses," said Christie's press secretary Kevin Roberts in a statement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Nonetheless in early 2012, the Governor made the decision that costs associated with hosting at the sporting venues were better paid with non-state funds, and those expenses incurred during 2010 and 2011 were reimbursed by the NJGOP."

Christie every year returns leftover funds from the $95,000 allowance to the state. The amount Christie returned annually to the state increased from $2,716 in 2010 to $30,377 last year.

Marco Rubio Pushes Extension of NSA Phone Metadata Program // Bloomberg // Ali Elkin - May 11, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Marco Rubio continued his tough talk on national security on Sunday, saying the risk of a terrorist attack in the United States is at a post-9/11 high.

Arguing for an extension of the National Security Agency's phone metadata program in light of threats like those from the Islamic State, the Florida senator wrote in a USA Today op-ed, "The government is not listening to your phone calls or recording them unless you are a terrorist or talking to a terrorist outside the United States." He added, "There is not a single documented case of abuse of this program."

His comments follow a Saturday appearance at the South Carolina Freedom Summit, where he emphasized a hard line on terrorism. "Have you seen the movie Taken? Liam Neeson. He had a line, and this is what our strategy should be: 'We will look for you, we will find you, and we will kill you,'" said Rubio, who sits on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and Select Committee on Intelligence, at the cattle call for White House hopefuls.

As Bloomberg's Bob Van Voris reported last week, a recent federal appeals court ruling against the data collection comes as the Patriot Act's Section 215, "under which intelligence agencies have justified the phone surveillance, is set to expire June 1 unless Congress passes a bill backed by Senate Republicans to extend it through the end of 2020. Because the court didn't rule on the program's constitutionality, lawmakers could choose to amend the act to explicitly authorize the data collection."

We Can't Turn To The Leaders Of Yesterday // Medium // Marco Rubio - May 11, 2015

You've seen "A New American Century" everywhere since I announced for President. But what does that really mean? Let me tell you.

Families are working harder than ever, but living paycheck to paycheck. Students are doing exactly what we told them to do and getting a college education. Yet they are graduating with mountains of debt and a degree that has no career path.

The news says evil is winning and we are less capable than ever to stop it.

Is it decline? Is it the normal course of history?

No.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's a direct result of our leaders who have trapped us in the past.

Leaders from yesterday still believe in outdated economic policies. They have forgotten one of the timeless truths of our world: Jobs and prosperity are tied to our ability to compete internationally.

Today we face a fundamental economic transformation that leaves us with a choice.

We can embrace the future or be left behind by history.

In the New American Century we will reform our tax code and update our economic policies to make America the best place in the world to work, start a business and cultivate innovation.

It's time to leave yesterday behind.

Scott Walker Helps Journalists in Wisconsin Cover His Trip to Israel // NYT- First Draft // Nick Corasanti – May 11, 2015

Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin was adamant that his trip to Israel this week be a "listening tour" that focused exclusively on Israel, not about his presidential-campaign-in-waiting.

"We wanted to make it an educational focus, not just a media trip," he told reporters before he left. That meant no reporters, no video cameras, no photographers, nada. Just Mr. Walker, his team and members of the Republican Jewish Coalition, a pro-Israeli group heavily financed by the casino billionaire Sheldon G. Adelson.

That doesn't mean they want the news media at home to be left in the dark, however.

Mr. Walker has been sharing photographs and updates from his Twitter account. And Matt Brooks, the coalition's executive director, has been posting pictures of Mr. Walker's tour on Twitter as well.

What Ben Carson's Flat Tax Would Do to the Poor // Bloomberg // Peter Coy – May 11, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Ben Carson told Fox News Sunday that it's "very condescending" to poor people to tax them at lower rates than rich people. He called for a flat tax along the lines of a biblical tithe, in which rich and poor alike pay a tenth or so of their income in taxes.

"Now, some people say it's not fair because, you know, the poor people can't afford to pay that dollar," Carson told host Chris Wallace. "That's very condescending. You know, I grew up very poor. I've experienced every economic level. And I can tell you that poor people have pride, too. And they don't want to be just taken care of," Carson said.

What does economics have to say about Carson's flat tax? It's hard to say because the retired neurosurgeon (profiled here by Bloomberg Politics) hasn't fleshed out his concept. Also because "very condescending" isn't a term that economists use very often.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What's sometimes forgotten is that there's no giant increase in taxes when your income climbs.

One thing is indisputable: An unadulterated flat tax—which Carson may or may not favor—would raise taxes on the poor and reduce them on the rich. That would almost certainly decrease net national happiness. The reason is obvious: People who are just barely getting by, living from paycheck to paycheck, would find it very hard to pay more in taxes than they do now. People who make a lot of money have far more breathing room. They may not enjoy paying the taxes they pay now, but paying any given dollar in tax is easier for them than it is for someone at the bottom of the income scale. The implication is that the benefit to them of paying less tax would be less than the loss to the poor of paying more. (This is the economic concept of "marginal utility.")

The theory of the flat tax is that it preserves incentives to work and invest because people don't have to pay punishingly high rates on each extra dollar of income. What's sometimes forgotten is that there's no giant increase in taxes when your income climbs into a new bracket. You pay the highest rate only on the portion of income that's above the threshold. The rest of your income continues to be taxed at lower rates—which are detailed here.

There are ways to keep a flat tax from pinching the poor. One is to create a generous per-person exemption—so, for example, the first $25,000 of income per person isn't subject to tax. The granddaddy of flat taxes, proposed in the early 1980s by Robert Hall and Alvin Rabushka of the Hoover Institution, provided that the first $25,500 of wage and pension income for a family of four would be tax-free. A more complicated way is to exempt from the flat tax certain necessities such as food and medicine.

Carson may have some kind of break for the poor such as these in mind. If so he didn't tell Chris Wallace. "It's a distinct possibility that he hasn't fully developed his tax plan," says Tax Foundation economist Kyle Pomerleau.

Whether an unadulterated flat tax would be less "condescending" to the poor than today's tax code is more of a value judgment than an economic question. The staff of the bipartisan Joint Committee on Taxation—which serves both Republicans and Democrats in Congress—delved into questions of fairness in a March 3 report called "Fairness and Tax Policy" (available for download here).

Carly Fiorina Changes Mind On Amending Constitution To Bar Same-Sex Marriage // Huffington Post // Amanda Terkel – May 11, 2015

Scott Olson via Getty Images

GOP presidential candidate Carly Fiorina said she does not support amending the U.S. Constitution to ban same-sex marriage, a reversal of a position she held a few years ago.

"I think the Supreme Court ruling will become the law of the land, and however much I may agree or disagree with it, I wouldn't support an amendment to reserve it," Fiorina said Saturday. "I very much hope that we would come to a place now in this nation where we can support their decision and at the same time support people to have, to hold religious views and to protect their right to exercise those views."

The former Hewlett-Packard CEO made her comments in an interview with the conservative blog Caffeinated Thoughts after a speech to the Dallas County Republicans in West Des Moines, Iowa.

As Right Wing Watch noted, Fiorina previously supported such an amendment. While running for Senate in 2010, Fiorina filled out a Christian Coalition survey and indicated that she backed a federal marriage amendment.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Although Republican support for marriage equality is growing, the GOP presidential candidates still oppose it.

Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) recently introduced two bills to stop same-sex marriage, including one that would establish a constitutional amendment to protect states that define marriage as being between one man and one woman from legal action.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R), who is exploring a run for president, has said that although he personally does not support same-sex marriage, he has little appetite for working to repeal it.

TOP NEWS

DOMESTIC

Administration Gives Conditional Approval for Shell to Drill in Arctic // New York Times // Coral Davenport - May 11, 2015

WASHINGTON — The Obama administration gave conditional approval on Monday for Shell Gulf of Mexico, Inc. to start drilling for oil and gas in the Arctic Ocean this summer.

The approval is a major victory for Shell and the rest of the petroleum industry, which has sought for years to drill in the remote waters of the Chukchi seas, which are believed to hold vast reserves of oil and gas.

“We have taken a thoughtful approach to carefully considering potential exploration in the Chukchi Sea, recognizing the significant environmental, social and ecological resources in the region and establishing high standards for the protection of this critical ecosystem, our Arctic communities, and the subsistence needs and cultural traditions of Alaska Natives,” Abigail Ross Hopper, director of the Interior Department’s Bureau of Ocean Energy Management, said in a statement. “As we move forward, any offshore exploratory activities will continue to be subject to rigorous safety standards.”

The Interior Department decision is a devastating blow to environmentalists, who have pressed the Obama administration to reject proposals for offshore Arctic drilling. Environmentalists say that a drilling accident in the icy and treacherous Arctic waters could have far more devastating consequences than the deadly Gulf of Mexico oil spill of 2010, when an oil rig explosion killed 11 men and sent millions of barrels of oil spewing into the water.

The move came just four months after the Obama administration opened up a portion of the Atlantic coast to new offshore drilling, adding a new chapter to the president’s environmental legacy.

On some fronts, President Obama has pursued the most ambitious environmental agenda of any president, issuing new regulations intended to curb climate change, working toward an international global warming accord, and using his executive powers to put public lands off-limits from development. But he has also sought to balance those moves by opening up untouched federal waters to new oil and gas drilling.

The Interior Department’s approval of the drilling was conditional on Shell’s receiving approval of a series of remaining drilling permits for the project.

“The approval of our Revised Chukchi Sea Exploration Plan is an important milestone and signals the confidence regulators have in our plan,” said Curtis Smith, a spokesman for Shell. “However, before operations can begin this summer, it’s imperative that the remainder of our permits be practical, and delivered in a timely manner. In the meantime, we will continue to test and prepare our contractors, assets and contingency plans against the high bar stakeholders and regulators expect of an Arctic operator."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Environmental groups denounced the move and said that Shell had not demonstrated that it can drill safely in the Arctic Ocean.

Both industry and environmental groups say that the Chukchi Sea is one of the most dangerous places in the world to drill. The area is extremely remote, with no roads connecting to major cities or deep water ports within hundreds of miles — which makes it difficult for clean-up and rescue workers to get to the site in case of an accident.

The closest Coast Guard station with equipment for responding to a spill is over 1,000 miles away. The weather is extreme, with major storms, icy waters, and waves up to 50 feet high.

The sea is also a major migration route and feeding area for marine mammals, including bowhead whales and walruses.

"Once again, our government has rushed to approve risky and ill-conceived exploration in one of the most remote and important places on Earth," said Susan Murray, a vice president of Oceana, an environmental group. "Shell's need to validate its poorly planned investment in the U.S. Arctic Ocean is not a good reason for the government to allow the company to put our ocean resources at risk. Shell has not shown that it is prepared to operate responsibly in the Arctic Ocean, and neither the company nor our government has been willing to fully and fairly evaluate the risks of Shell's proposal."

The Obama administration had initially granted Shell a permit to begin offshore Arctic drilling in the summer of 2012. However, the company's first forays into exploring the new waters were plagued with numerous safety and operational problems. Two of its oil rigs ran aground and had to be towed to safety. In 2013, the Interior Department said the company could not resume drilling until all safety issues were addressed.

In a review of the company's performance in the Arctic, the department concluded that Shell had failed in a wide range of basic operational tasks, like supervision of contractors that performed critical work.

The report was harshly critical of Shell management, which acknowledged that it was unprepared for the problems it encountered operating in the unforgiving Arctic environment.

But the administration contends that as long as Shell passes a final set of permit reviews, it can proceed to drill this summer.

The Obama administration has also issued new drilling safety regulations intended to prevent future accidents like the explosion on the Deepwater Horizon oil rig on April 20, 2010. Last month, the Interior Department proposed new rules to tighten safety requirements on blowout preventers, the industry-standard devices that are the last line of protection against explosions in undersea oil and gas wells.

The 2010 explosion was caused in part when a section of drill pipe buckled, which led to the malfunction of a supposedly fail-safe blowout preventer on a BP well.

Wellmark spurns Obamacare exchange, but two competitors don't // Des Moines Register // Tony Leys - May 11, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Moderate-income Iowans who want to use Affordable Care Act subsidies to purchase health insurance still won't be able to choose policies from Wellmark Blue Cross & Blue Shield next year. But they should be offered policies from at least two competitors.

UnitedHealthcare, the nation's largest health-insurer, confirmed Monday evening that it plans to start selling policies to Iowans this fall on the online public marketplace, known as HealthCare.gov. Coventry Health Care, which this year is most Iowans' sole choice on the system, said it will continue marketing plans on the public marketplace. The online system, also known as an exchange, is the only place where Americans can buy policies that qualify for the Obamacare subsidies.

The addition of UnitedHealthcare means Iowans who want subsidized insurance could choose from plans offered by at least two companies. That allows consumers to compare prices, benefits and the networks of doctors and hospitals enrolled in each plan.

Insurance Commissioner Nick Gerhart said he expects a third, unidentified company to file an application this week to sell policies to Iowans on the exchange. Companies must declare this week whether they will be selling plans to Iowans on the public exchange.

"It's good news. People are going to have some choices," he said.

Wellmark, which dominates the state's health insurance market, disclosed Monday that it has decided for the third straight year not to offer policies on the online public marketplace.

"It's not a matter of if we will participate, it is really a matter of when," Wellmark Vice President Laura Jackson said in a conference call. She said the decision was made to protect the 1.8 million Iowans who already have Wellmark insurance.

UnitedHealthcare spokeswoman Jessica Kostner said her Minnesota-based company expects "to have a competitive product available for Iowa consumers that will be valuable in terms of quality, access, affordability, innovative design and service excellence."

Most Iowans who make less than 400 percent of the poverty level — or about $47,000 for a single person — can qualify for Affordable Care Act subsidies to help pay for premiums. But only about 38,000 Iowans — about 1 percent of the population — have received such subsidies, averaging $260 per month. Iowa has one of the lowest participation rates in the country, and a national expert said that's partly because the state's main insurer is not participating.

Larry Levitt, senior vice president of the Kaiser Family Foundation, said Iowa, South Dakota and Mississippi are the only states where the major Blue Cross insurance plan is declining to participate in the Obamacare marketplace. Wellmark also is the main Blue Cross carrier in South Dakota.

A Kaiser Foundation analysis found that just 20 percent of Iowans who could have qualified for premium subsidies last year took advantage of them, which was the lowest level in the country. South Dakotans, at 21 percent, were the second-least likely. "That seems like more than a coincidence," Levitt said. The national average was 42 percent. Mississippi's rate was 37 percent.

Levitt said some Iowans probably made a rational choice to maintain their unsubsidized Wellmark plans rather than accept a small public subsidy to switch to an unfamiliar carrier. But he said other consumers might not be aware of their options because the main insurer in the state is not using its marketing muscle to promote the subsidies.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Levitt said competition from multiple insurance carriers helps keep costs down and gives customers options of networks of enrolled health care providers. "More choice means consumers have a better chance of being able to go to the doctors and hospitals that they want," he said.

Consumers can still purchase Wellmark's individual insurance policies off the public marketplace, but those plans don't qualify for subsidies. However, the new plans must meet all new federal rules, including that they don't ask whether applicants have pre-existing health problems.

Jackson also disclosed Monday that her company is seeking to raise premiums by an average of 28 percent for about 30,000 individual customers who bought Wellmark policies since the Affordable Care Act took full effect in 2014. She said her company lost money on that group of customers, mainly because they used more health care, including prescription medications, than expected.

She said Wellmark and other insurers had expected the new customers would use relatively large amounts of health care, because many of them were previously uninsured. But the demand for services was even greater than predicted, Jackson said. The company also had to pay bills for 135 people who bought policies, used services and then canceled their policies, she said. A few of those people died, but many of them simply canceled after receiving pricey care, such as having a baby or undergoing hip-replacement surgery, she said.

The rate increase would not affect most Wellmark customers, who purchase insurance via employers or who bought individual policies before 2014. The premium increase also would not affect people who purchase Medicare supplement policies from Wellmark.

The proposed increase for individual, Affordable Care Act-compliant plans will be the subject of a July 25 hearing organized by the Iowa Insurance Division, a Wellmark spokeswoman said. She added that the company plans to raise premiums on small-employer plans by 5.9 percent to 10.7 percent. The company has until June 8 to propose increases on 110,000 individual policies that predate implementation of the Affordable Care Act.

Levitt, the Kaiser Foundation expert, said it's too soon to tell whether Wellmark's 28 percent proposed increase will be unusual for 2016. However, he said there is reason to think that Wellmark faces especially large costs in the pool of people in its new plans. The carrier retained many relatively healthy people in its old pools of customers, who could pass now-banned inquiries into their health status. And it isn't offering the carrot of public subsidies to attract other relatively healthy people into its new plans, he said. So the people most likely to buy the carrier's new plans are those with serious health problems, he said.

Most Iowans this year only had one carrier to choose from on HealthCare.gov. That carrier, Coventry, told the Register it intends to continue selling policies on the exchange for 2016. Another carrier that sold on the exchange, CoOportunity Health, went belly-up last winter after selling thousands of subsidized policies to Iowans.

Brian Gillette, chief operating officer of the Iowa insurance agency Group Benefits Ltd., said he wasn't surprised to see Wellmark continue to stay out of the Obamacare marketplace, especially as the U.S. Supreme Court is considering a major challenge to the law. That case, known as King v. Burwell, calls into question whether it's legal for the federal government to pay subsidies for policies purchased on the federal version of the exchange, which Iowa and many other states are using. The Supreme Court is expected to rule next month. No one is sure what would happen if the justices declare the subsidies illegal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Insurers must cover a wide range of contraceptive methods at no cost to consumers, the Obama administration said Monday in new guidance to health insurance companies.

The guidance from the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) makes clear that insurers are obligated under the Affordable Care Act to cover at least one version of each of the 18 federally approved birth control methods.

“Today’s guidance seeks to eliminate any ambiguity,” HHS said. “Insurers must cover without cost-sharing at least one form of contraception in each of the methods (currently 18) that the FDA has identified for women in its current Birth Control Guide, including the ring, the patch and intrauterine devices.”

The agency made the announcement after a series of reports indicated insurers had conflicting policies on covering contraceptives, despite ObamaCare’s requirement that contraception be offered at no cost.

The Kaiser Family Foundation, a nonpartisan health research group, reported last month that some insurers were not providing all 18 forms of contraception at no charge. Five of 20 insurance plans it reviewed charged women for a vaginal ring, and one plan did not cover the contraceptive at all.

A separate report from the National Women’s Law Center found problems with coverage of the vaginal ring, the patch and an intrauterine device (IUD). In some cases, insurance companies would "even suggest that a woman switch methods if she does not want any out-of-pocket costs," according to the report.

America's Health Insurance Plans (AHIP), the insurers’ trade group, had condemned that study as presenting a "distorted picture of reality."

“Today’s guidance takes important steps to support health plans’ use of medical management in providing women with safe, affordable health care services," AHIP President Karen Ignagni said in a statement. "Health plans are committed to promoting evidenced-based decision-making and to ensuring all consumers understand how their coverage works.”

AHIP is happy that the new guidance allows insurers to still use so-called medical management techniques, aimed at controlling costs. So while insurers have to cover one of each of the 18 types for free, they can still take steps like charging patients for more expensive brand-name versions instead of generics.

Democrats in Congress, led by Sen. Patty Murray (Wash.), had been pushing the administration to clarify the rules for birth control coverage.

“I’m pleased that with this announcement [HHS] Secretary Burwell is acting to address these violations as well as others that have become barriers to accessing critical preventive care, especially for those in the transgender community,” Murray said in a statement.

The guidance makes clear that insurers cannot limit preventive services for transgender people based on their sex assigned at birth.

The 18 federally approved types of birth control that now must be offered free include morning-after pills and IUDs, which have been controversial and labeled by conservatives, such as the owners of Hobby Lobby stores, as “abortifacients,” meaning they cause abortion.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The 18 types of contraception are:

• Sterilization surgery

• Surgical sterilization implant

• Implantable rod

• Copper intrauterine device

• IUDs with progestin (a hormone)

• Shot/injection

• Oral contraceptives (the pill), with estrogen and progestin

• Oral contraceptives with progestin only

• Oral contraceptives, known as extended or continuous use that delay menstruation

• The patch

• Vaginal contraceptive ring

• Diaphragm

• Sponge

• Cervical cap

• Female condom

• Spermicide

• Emergency contraception (Plan B/morning-after pill)

• Emergency contraception (a different pill called Ella)

Last updated at 1:43 p.m.

Tex. bill would bar local officials from issuing same-sex-marriage licenses // Washington Post // Sandhya Somashekhar - May 11, 2015

Texas Republicans are pushing legislation to bar local officials from granting same-sex couples licenses to marry, launching a preemptive strike against a possible U.S. Supreme Court ruling next month that could declare gay marriage legal.

Supporters of the measure, which is scheduled for a vote as soon as Tuesday in the Texas House, said it would send a powerful message to the court. Taking a cue from the anti-abortion movement, they said they also hoped to keep any judicially sanctioned right to same-sex marriage tied up in legal battles for years to come.

The measure, by Rep. Cecil Bell, a Republican from the outskirts of Houston, would prohibit state and local officials from using taxpayer dollars “to issue, enforce, or recognize a marriage license . . . for a union other than a union between one man and one woman.”

Bell said the bill “simply preserves state sovereignty over marriage.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Gay rights advocates condemned it as mean-spirited and discriminatory.

“It’s shocking that Texas lawmakers would pursue a path that would set up this showdown between the Texas legislature and the courts,” said Rebecca Robertson, legal and policy director for the American Civil Liberties Union of Texas.

The move comes as the Supreme Court is poised to rule on whether there is a constitutional right to same-sex marriage or if states have the authority to define marriage as exclusively between a man and a woman, as the Texas Constitution does.

If the court finds a universal right to same-sex marriage, that provision of the Texas Constitution would be swept aside. But a legislative ban on the issuance of marriage licenses could stand, resulting in a potentially costly and drawn-out confrontation between the state government and the federal courts.

As of late Monday, more than half the members of the Texas House had signaled support for the measure, virtually ensuring its passage if it overcomes potential procedural hurdles and reaches the floor before a Thursday deadline. If it passes the House, the measure would move to the Texas Senate, where it is also likely to be favorably received.

Conservatives’ battle

The measure’s passage would represent a big victory for social conservatives, who have been freshly invigorated by the fight over same-sex marriage and are laying plans to use every tool at their disposal to thwart it.

Earlier this year, the Alabama Supreme Court ordered county officials not to issue marriage licenses to same-sex couples, directly contradicting the ruling of a federal judge who struck down that state’s same-sex-marriage ban. Other states have enacted laws aimed at protecting religious objectors who do not want to participate in gay weddings.

“This is indicative of this clash that we’re seeing and will see at an increased level with the Supreme Court ruling coming,” said Mat Staver, president of the Liberty Counsel, a public-interest law firm that promotes conservative Christian stances.

Still, opponents of same-sex marriage face ever more difficult odds. Gay marriage is now legal in 37 states and the District, and support for it is rising. Nationally, a record 6 in 10 people said they supported same-sex marriage in a Washington Post-ABC News poll conducted last month.

Even in Texas, opposition to gay marriage is dwindling. Polling conducted by the Public Religion Research Institute in 2014 shows that nearly half of Texans, 48 percent, support same-sex marriage, and 43 percent oppose it.

In a teleconference with reporters, critics of the Texas measure predicted that it would provoke a backlash like those that roiled Indiana and Arkansas this year, after those states attempted to enact religious protections that were viewed as anti-gay.

But gay rights advocates are worried about the bill. The state’s legislative session is scheduled to end in just three weeks, leaving little time to rally opposition. Meanwhile, they fear that a victory in Texas could prod other states to copy the approach.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That could lead to a standoff much like the conflict that arose in the 1950s over school desegregation, gay rights advocates said. That battle eventually ended in the capitulation of resistant Southern states — but only after years of litigation slowed the advance of civil rights.

“Texas is pioneering a new strategy to prevent equality for its LGBT residents, to ignore the U.S. Supreme Court and even roll back gains that have been made in the state,” said Chuck Smith, president of Equality Texas, a gay rights group.

The measure “seeks to subvert any ruling this summer by the U.S. Supreme Court that would allow the freedom to marry for loving, committed lesbian and gay couples in Texas and around the country,” Smith said.

Abortion analogy

Supporters of the legislation said the proper analogy is not school desegregation but abortion rights. Abortion has been legal since 1973, when the Supreme Court ruled in a landmark Texas case, Roe v. Wade. In recent years, however, conservative lawmakers have enacted a slew of bills that have reduced access to the procedure — for example, by requiring clinics to be built to expensive hospital-like standards or putting restrictions on the use of abortion-inducing drugs.

Many of these measures have been challenged in the courts, with mixed results, and some are likely to end up before the Supreme Court. But in Texas, they have already contributed to the closure of more than half of the roughly 40 clinics operating in the state just two years ago, according to the Texas ACLU.

“Texas, above all states, has . . . done everything we can to eliminate abortion,” even as it remains technically legal, said Steven Hotze, president of Conservative Republicans of Texas, a political action committee that pushed for the same-sex-marriage bill.

“By taking a stand on homosexual ‘mirage’ — and I call it ‘mirage’ because it’s counterfeit, it’s false, it’s a lie — it will send a loud signal and be a rallying cry across the country for those who do not want to redefine marriage.”

INTERNATIONAL

Pakistanis Knew Where Osama Bin Laden Was, U.S. Sources Say // NBC News // Matthew Cole, Richard Esposito, Robert Windrem and Andrea Mitchell – May 11, 2015

Two intelligence sources tell NBC News that the year before the U.S. raid that killed Osama bin Laden, a "walk in" asset from Pakistani intelligence told the CIA where the most wanted man in the world was hiding - and these two sources plus a third say that the Pakistani government knew where bin Laden was hiding all along.

The U.S. government has always characterized the heroic raid by Seal Team Six that killed bin Laden as a unilateral U.S. operation, and has maintained that the CIA found him by tracking couriers to his walled complex in Abbottabad, Pakistan.

The new revelations do not necessarily cast doubt on the overall narrative that the White House began circulating within hours of the May 2011 operation. The official story about how bin Laden was found was constructed in a way that protected the identity and existence of the asset, who also knew who inside the Pakistani government was aware of the Pakistani intelligence agency's operation to hide bin Laden, according to a special operations officer with prior knowledge of the bin Laden mission. The official story focused on a long hunt for bin Laden's presumed courier, Ahmed al-Kuwaiti.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While NBC News has long been pursuing leads about a "walk in" and about what Pakistani intelligence knew, both assertions were made public in a London Review of Books article by investigative reporter Seymour Hersh. Hersh's story, published over the weekend, raises numerous questions about the White House account of the SEAL operation. It has been strongly disputed both on and off the record by the Obama administration and current and former national security officials.

The Hersh story says that the "walk in," a Pakistani intelligence official, contacted U.S. authorities in 2010, that elements of ISI, the Pakistani intelligence agency, knew of bin Laden's whereabouts, and that the U.S. told the Pakistanis about the bin Laden raid before it launched. The U.S. has maintained that it did not tell the Pakistani government about the raid before it launched.

On Monday, Pentagon spokesman Col. Steve Warren called Hersh's piece "largely a fabrication" and said there were "too many inaccuracies" to detail each one. Col Warren said the raid to kill bin Laden was a "unilateral action." Both the National Security Council and the Pentagon denied that Pakistan had played any role in the raid.

Pakistani media personnel and local resiAAMIR QURESHI / AFP/Getty Images

Pakistani media personnel and local residents gather outside the hideout of al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden in Abbottabad, Pakistan after the U.S. raid that killed him.

"The notion that the operation that killed Osama Bin Laden was anything but a unilateral U.S. mission is patently false," said NSC spokesman Ned Price. "As we said at the time, knowledge of this operation was confined to a very small circle of senior U.S. officials."

The administration's responses do not address the specific allegations in the Hersh article, including the existence of the "walk in" asset.

Sen. John McCain, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, dismissed Hersh's account. "I simply have never heard of anything like this and I've been briefed several times," said McCain, R.-Arizona. "This was a great success on the part of the administration and something that we all admire the president's decision to do. "

The NBC News sources who confirm that a Pakistani intelligence official became a "walk in" asset include the special operations officer and a CIA officer who had served in Pakistan. These two sources and a third source, a very senior former U.S. intelligence official, also say that elements of the ISI were aware of bin Laden's presence in Abbottabad. The former official was emphatic about the ISI's awareness, saying twice, "They knew."

Another top official acknowledged to NBC News that the U.S. government had long harbored "deep suspicions" that ISI and al Qaeda were "cooperating." And a book by former acting CIA director Mike Morrell that will be published tomorrow says that U.S. officials could not dismiss the possibility of such cooperation.

None of the sources characterized how high up in ISI the knowledge might have gone. Said one former senior official, "We were suspicious that someone inside ISI ... knew where bin Laden was, but we did not have intelligence about specific individuals having specific knowledge."

Multiple U.S. officials, however, denied or cast doubt on the assertion that the U.S. told the Pakistanis about the bin Laden raid ahead of time.

Nepal Rattled by Powerful New Earthquake East of Capital // NYT // Austin Ramzy – May 12, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HONG KONG — A powerful earthquake shook Nepal on Tuesday, less than three weeks after a devastating temblor there killed more than 8,000 people. Early details were scarce, but some deaths and collapsed buildings were reported.

Residents of Kathmandu reported that buildings swayed in the earthquake, which was felt as far away as New Delhi. The United States Geological Survey assigned the quake on Tuesday a preliminary magnitude of 7.3, with an epicenter about 50 miles east of Kathmandu, near the border with China. The April 25 earthquake registered magnitude 7.8 and was centered west of Kathmandu.

“We’re obviously hearing of buildings destroyed, buildings collapsed, buildings falling, we’re hearing about casualties, but the numbers are not known yet,” said Jamie McGoldrick, Nepal resident coordinator for the United Nations Development Program. He said several international rescue teams, including American and Indian teams, were still in Kathmandu but had not yet been asked to deploy.

Four people died in Chautara, a town in the Sindhupalchowk district northeast of Kathmandu where several buildings collapsed, said Paul Dillon, a spokesman for the International Organization for Migration. “A search and rescue crew of some locals and international groups are digging through rubble as best they can,” Mr. Dillon said.

“We are seeing huge damage in our district,” said Krishna Prasad Gaiwali, the chief district officer in Sindhupalchowk. “It was terrible, really terrible. Buildings were shaking too much for too long.”

Since the April 25 quake, people across Nepal have feared another powerful one, in part because the first one left many buildings cracked and unstable. An American structural engineer who examined buildings in Bhaktapur, a city near Kathmandu, said that he believed one-third of the buildings he had seen would have to be demolished.

Nevertheless, many families have moved back into their apartments, after living under tents for the week after the first quake.

Kunda Dixit, the editor of The Nepali Times, described “some degree of panic” in Kathmandu as the tremor “just became bigger and bigger and bigger, started rocking more and more and more.” He said that office workers ran into the street and that electric power was out and telephones were jammed.

“It started slow, it kept on swaying, and the birds were up in the air,” he said. “I looked outside and the electricity polls were just swaying from side to side, the wires were swaying.”

Bikash Suwal, a trekking guide in Kathmandu, said that he and other colleagues had fled from an office on the fourth floor of a building and sought safety in the open. He said that he had not seen any buildings fall or people injured, but residents worried that the damage closer to the epicenter could be serious. Cellphone calls to that area were not going through, he said.

He said that residents in Kathmandu would face a choice of staying outside overnight, and risk being caught in the rain, or going indoors and risk another quake. “I will stay at home, but other people, I don’t know,” he said.

Dhruba Prasad Ghimire, an aid worker who had been distributing food in a village west of Kathmandu, said buildings there shook and residents ran into the open in fear as the quake triggered landslides on nearby hills. But he said he had not seen anybody injured among the residents, and the buildings still standing in the village had not fallen down.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"It was very frightening again, but we will keep giving out food," he said in a brief telephone interview. "We are O.K., but there were landslides and more of the aftershocks — you could see the ground falling down on the hills."

He said, "People will be frightened. We don't know if there will be more of these earthquakes."

John Kerry and Vladimir Putin to Hold Talks in Russia // TIME // Matthew Lee - May 11, 2015

(WASHINGTON) — The State Department says Secretary of State John Kerry will travel to Russia this week for talks with Russian President Vladimir Putin.

It will be his first trip to Russia since the start of the Ukraine crisis, which has badly damaged relations between Moscow and the west, and only his second since taking office.

The State Department said Kerry will meet Putin and Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov at the Black Sea resort of Sochi on Tuesday.

After his brief stop in Russia, Kerry will travel to Turkey for a meeting of NATO foreign ministers and return to Washington for a summit of Gulf Arab leaders that President Barack Obama is hosting at Camp David.

Kerry last visited Russia in May 2013.

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS

Clinton clobbers Rubio on immigration // The Hill // Brent Budowsky – May 11, 2015

Hillary Clinton's bold initiative last week to call for a path to citizenship and other dramatic reforms of immigration policies creates a brilliant contrast to the incoherent and weak immigration position of Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) and the hostile negativity of leading Republicans to immigration reform.

Don't believe what you read about the GOP making significant inroads in the Hispanic vote in 2016. The Democrats have the upper hand on issues important to Hispanic voters, ranging from economics to immigration to healthcare and both Bill and Hillary Clinton have long had a special relationship with Hispanic voters.

Last week, Hillary Clinton took forceful command of the immigration issue, a smart move that dramatizes the substantial advantage that Clinton and Democrats have over Rubio and Republicans.

When the Senate passed historic immigration reform, in part because of the great leadership of Rubio, I applauded him for a profile in courage that demonstrated real leadership.

What has happened since? Rubio has disowned his former position, disavowed his greatest legislative accomplishment in the Senate and destroyed his credibility on immigration.

It is sad to see. Rubio's profile in courage became a profile in cowardice. Rubio now opposes his previous good work on immigration and says he has learned his lesson. The lesson he learned is apparently to never show courage or leadership without obtaining permission from the right wing of the Republican Party.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Let's see if former Gov. Jeb Bush (R-Fla.) — who sometimes seems to support historic immigration reform, sometimes seems to waffle about it, and sometimes seems to oppose it — has the courage of his convictions and defies the Republican right on a matter the right sadly considers a holy grail of modern conservatism.

I respect Rubio, have at times praised him and consider him a serious candidate for the presidency. Yet, to my knowledge, no candidate has ever been elected president after disowning the major achievement in his career; one which would have been an argument in favor of presidential stature and now diminishes it.

America is a nation of immigrants. Historic immigration reform is urgently needed. Sen. Harry Reid (D-Nev.), the leader of Democrats in the Senate, understands this. Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), the leader of Democrats in the House, understands this. Hillary Clinton, the front-runner for the Democratic nomination for president, understands this and leads the charge for it. Republican leaders in Congress reject this and the junior senator from Florida was for it — before he was against it.

Clinton's claim that illegal immigrants pay more in taxes than some corporations // Washington Post // Glen Kessler - May 11, 2015

"In New York, which I know a little bit about because I represented it for eight years and I live there now, our undocumented workers in New York pay more in taxes than some of the biggest corporations in New York."

–Hillary Clinton, roundtable in North Las Vegas, May 5, 2015

Several readers contacted The Fact Checker asking about this assertion by the former secretary of state, made as she discussed her policy goals for tackling illegal immigration. They wanted to know how this statement was possible.

Her statement is vague enough that one could interpret it as meaning that individual workers pay more in taxes than corporations, but Clinton's campaign said that she was talking about undocumented workers as a group. Even so, is her claim possible?

The Facts

The Clinton campaign initially pointed to an opinion column by Albor Ruiz in the Daily News, dated April 20, 2015, titled, "Corporate giants often get huge tax breaks, while poor, undocumented immigrants have paid billions in state taxes."

We often warn that opinion columns are not necessarily as good a source of information as articles based on straight news reporting. Ruiz, for instance, relied on facts on corporate taxes from the Web site of Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), which does not disclose sources for its assertions. Ruiz claimed that although "many of these corporate behemoths pay zero taxes, the eternally vilified undocumented immigrants in New York paid $1.1 billion in state taxes in 2012."

The figure about taxes paid by undocumented workers comes from a report issued by the left-leaning Institute for Taxation and Economic Policy. We have no major issues with the methodology used in that report, except to note that it is a very broad estimate, based on assumptions about the number of immigrants, the average size of immigrant families, the range of income of immigrant workers, the number of homeowners and effective tax rates. A change in any one of those assumptions would alter the result.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For New York, for example, the report estimated that in 2012 there were 873,000 illegal immigrants, with an average family income of $32,600. Eighteen percent were estimated to be homeowners. They supposedly paid $566 million in sales and excise taxes, $186 million in state and local income taxes, and $342 million in property taxes, for a total of more than $1 billion. (Note that more than 50 percent of the figure comes from sales taxes, which every person and company pays just anytime something is purchased.)

But the most important aspect of the report is that it looks at state, local and property taxes paid by immigrants — not federal taxes. The Sanders Web site is about federal taxes. So Ruiz — and Clinton by extension — are mixing apples and oranges.

Thus, for the purposes of this fact check, we are not going delve deeply into the question of whether some big corporations do not pay much – or even zero — in federal taxes. The issue is very complicated and not very well reported in the U.S. media. (See, for example, how Fortune documented flaws in a New York Times report on General Electric.)

A company's annual 10-K filing in March generally will only have estimated numbers, as the actual tax return generally is not filed until later in the year. Total tax numbers can be determined from looking at cash flow statements, but one generally cannot figure out what taxes are being paid. Yet it is silly to assert that these companies pay no taxes at all, because at the very least they are paying property taxes, sales taxes and employment taxes.

The only New York-based companies mentioned in Ruiz's column were Verizon and Citicorp, so let's take a closer look at them. Verizon, for instance, announces how much it expects to pay in such taxes. In 2012, it says it paid $1.7 billion in property and other taxes and $1.3 billion in employment taxes. The income tax bill in 2012 was relatively low — $351 million — but it jumped to $4 billion in 2014. That brought Verizon's total tax bill above $7 billion in 2014.

As for Citicorp, spokeswoman Molly Millerwise Meiners said the company in 2012 paid nearly $1 billion in U.S. taxes (not including sales and excise taxes), including $300 million in state and local taxes, at least $110 million in property and use taxes, and $500 million in employment taxes. Sales taxes would bring the number even higher. Citi, of course, had enormous losses during the financial crisis which wiped out its federal income tax bill in 2012, but in 2014, she said, federal income taxes alone were about $1 billion.

David Kallick, director of the Immigration Research Initiative at Fiscal Policy Institute, which co-released the ITEP report, said that Clinton was trying to make the point that undocumented immigrants pay more in taxes than most people recognize. But he acknowledged that "if you really want to make a thorough comparison, you would have to include other taxes corporations may pay."

Indeed, the accounting firm Ernst & Young estimates that that state and local business taxes totaled $643 billion in 2012. About one-third of the total stemmed from property taxes and one-fifth from sales taxes. There were also tens of billions paid in public utilities taxes, excise taxes, business license taxes, unemployment insurance taxes and other state business taxes.

Matt Gardner, executive director of ITEP and a co-author of the report, said it's correct that many big companies pay no income taxes in certain years but it makes little sense to compare those numbers to a group of people. "If she means undocumented workers as a group, it's not an apples-to-apples comparison," he said. "You could pick any large segment of the population and state, probably correctly, that that group pays more taxes than certain specific corporations. It's just not obvious why that's a very meaningful comparison to make."

"The point she was making is that undocumented immigrants pay more in state and local taxes alone than some of our biggest companies pay in either state or federal corporate income tax," said Clinton spokesman Josh

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Schwerin. “That is a striking fact. And that’s why she raised it.”

The Pinocchio Test

Even if Clinton incorrectly stated her talking point, this is a tendentious argument that is probably made even less relevant by 2014 tax data. (Note how the taxes paid by Verizon and Citicorp increased as the economy began to pick up.) If she is only talking about state and local income taxes, that’s just $186 million, according to the ITEP estimate for New York. Verizon and Citicorp still exceed that number on state and local taxes alone.

Undocumented immigrants obviously pay a lot of taxes, especially sales taxes. Clinton would have an even stronger case to highlight the tax contribution of illegal immigrants if she mentioned that the Social Security actuary estimated that illegal immigrants paid $12 billion in Social Security taxes in 2010 alone, with little hope of ever receiving benefits. (They used false or duplicative Social Security numbers.) That’s even more than the ITEP estimate for state/local income taxes, sales taxes and property taxes paid by illegal immigrants across the nation.

But comparing the taxes of hundreds of thousands of people to the tax bill of one corporation is a stretch and fairly misleading. Even the companies that pay little or no federal income taxes end up paying lots of other taxes. So it’s a nonsense comparison.

We wavered between Three and Four Pinocchios, but ultimately settled on Four. As a former senator, Clinton should know better.

Hillary Clinton hasn’t answered a question from the media in 20 days // Washington Post // Chriz Cillizza - May 11, 2015

Welcome to day 29 of the Hillary Clinton 2016 presidential campaign!

In those 29 days – including April 12, the day she announced, and today – Clinton has taken a total of eight questions from the press. That breaks out to roughly one question every 3.6 days. Of late, she's taken even fewer questions than that. According to media reports, the last day Clinton answered a question was April 21 in New Hampshire; that means that she hasn't taken a question from the media in 20 straight days.

Carly Fiorina, one of the many newly minted Republicans running for president, is doing everything she can to shine a light on Clinton's close-mouthed approach with the press. This came from Fiorina deputy campaign manager Sasha Isgur Flores this morning:

In the last eight days, Carly has been interviewed almost 30 times and answered well over 300 questions. She continues to impress voters, pundits, and reporters alike with her willingness to share her thoughts and ideas – and to answer any question, from whether she likes hot dogs to how she would tackle the crisis in the Middle East. ... This is in stark contrast to many other candidates – and most especially to Hillary Clinton.

And it's not just the Republican candidates attacking Clinton on her silence. The New York Times posted an item on its "First Draft" blog last week titled "Questions for Hillary Clinton: Immigration" in which Amy Chozick wrote: "This is the first installment of a regular First Draft feature in which The Times will publish questions we would have asked Mrs. Clinton had we had the opportunity." And, late last month, I offered up seven questions Clinton should answer.

The Clinton campaign's response to all of this? Blah. Reporters whining – like they always do. And, as every

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton staffer is quick to note, she has answered questions from lots of regular people during her first month as a candidate – holding roundtables in Iowa, New Hampshire and Nevada. They are also quick to note that she makes opening statements at these roundtables.

She's taking questions from voters! She's talking about policy! You guys just don't like it because she's not falling all over herself to jump through your hoops!

So, for roughly the billionth time, let me make two points in response to that way of thinking.

1. Making policy statements/opening statements does not remove the need to answer actual questions from reporters.

2. While answering questions from hand-picked audience members is not without value, no one could possibly think it is the equivalent of answering questions from the working press.

As I have written before, Clinton needs the media at this point in the campaign far less than someone like Carly Fiorina does. Clinton is not only universally known but also has a huge primary lead and is ahead of all Republican contenders in general election matchups as well. Fiorina, on the other hand, is known by roughly no one, and to the extent anyone does know her, it's for the way she left HP.

Still, this is the new Clinton campaign, right? The one where she and the people around her pledged to deal differently with the press? Little did we know that "different" in this case meant "next to not at all."

Yes, we are one month into the campaign. And yes, Clinton and her team wanted to start very low-profile this time around – to avoid making the mistakes she made in 2008. So, it's possible things could change. But if past is prologue, I wouldn't bet on it.

I Am A Dreamer Who Met Hillary Clinton // Lets Talk Nevada // Blanca Gamez - May 11, 2015

This past Tuesday, six undocumented individuals — Astrid Silva, Erika Castro, Rafael Lopez, Betsaida Frausto, Juan Salazar and myself — had the opportunity to have an open and honest conversation with Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton at Rancho High School in Las Vegas. The fellow participants and I looked forward to not only sharing our stories, but to have the chance to ask Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton questions surrounding the topic of immigration. Prior to speaking with Secretary Clinton, we were told this was an un-rehearsed conversation, to not hold back, and to ask questions so we could get her stance on the various issues that plague the undocumented community.

As the six of us waited in anticipation for Secretary Clinton's arrival, we shared our stories with one another as a means to calm our nerves. Secretary Clinton has been scrutinized in the media due to her comments in the past on the topic of immigration, unlike the Republican presidential candidates who make comments about not following through with President Obama's executive orders and their critical stance on comprehensive immigration reform with a pathway to citizenship. Secretary Clinton has taken the opposite approach, agreeing to follow through with President Obama's plans and she will urge Congress to pass comprehensive immigration reform.

Once we were seated, the conversation commenced with Secretary Clinton sharing her own immigration story. She said that when she was young girl she visited the labor camps of migrant workers. She recalled witnessing the workers returning home from a hard day out in the fields and how the children would run to welcome home their fathers, the same way she would when her father came home from work. She further discussed that we do not need a second-class system; this is a country where people should be treated with respect.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Following her introductory speech, she turned to each of us and asked us to share our own stories which entailed when we arrived in the United States, background on our families and how the President's executive actions impacted our lives. As we shared our stories we asked questions. Our questions varied, as we all have different ways immigration impacts us.

Examples of these questions included members of the trans-community who are not provided adequate legal representation when they are detained in detention facilities, the 3 to 10 year unlawful presence bars for when an individual enters the country without inspection (illegally) and faces leaving the country for 3 to 10 years as they fix their status, and what would be done to include those who did not qualify under the President's executive orders?

I was completely surprised by Secretary Clinton's responses to the various questions that we asked from her. She not only answered the questions, but delved deeper into the issues, which are rarely spoken about.

Secretary Clinton spoke about the injustices faced by inmates in the detention centers, as large corporations fund these centers and have a bed mandate which requires a certain amount of beds to be filled every day. This is something that many are unaware is happening. Additionally, she shared that she plans to find a solution for the 11 to 12 million undocumented immigrants in this country, even if she has to go further than President Obama's executive actions. The conversation then shifted into re-unification of those who have become separated from their families, to raising the minimum wage, and to student loan debt.

I think all of us, including the audience members and the media, thought we were going to hear the same old talking points. Yet, during the conversation, Secretary Clinton took a problem solving detailed approach to the topic of immigration, something she had not done in the past and she delved further than any of the other presidential candidates. Her answers stunned me as they were not the usual answers you'd expect to hear from someone. Rather, they were answers that were accompanied by facts.

Leaving the conversation, I can say I was very pleased with Secretary Clinton's answers. Yet we Dreamers must hold her to them as she continues on the campaign trail, and if she is elected as our next President of the United States.

Barack Obama's Hillary Clinton Problem // Roll Call // Steven Dennis - May 12, 2015

You knew it was coming: The White House is starting to get a case of Clintonitis.

With Hillary Rodham Clinton the overwhelming favorite to carry the Democratic torch next year — and now an official candidate starting to spout policy positions — the White House has been forced to parry an ever-increasing barrage of questions.

Speaker John A. Boehner got the ball rolling by asking President Barack Obama to enlist Clinton's help to pass fast-track trade authority. That had White House Press Secretary Josh Earnest retaliating, suggesting such a move would signal desperation from the GOP.

"It seems a little early for a pretty desperate act like that, to basically suggest that you need a candidate for office from the other party to help you advance the agenda when you've got the majority in the House of Representatives," Earnest said.

He later had to use all the rhetorical tools in his arsenal to avoid commenting on Clinton's push to set up a deferred action process for the parents of “DREAMers,” who brought their children to the United States illegally years ago, so they can avoid deportation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Reporters asked if an expansion of Obama’s executive actions would be legal. “That will be something for future presidents and ultimately future courts to decide,” Earnest replied.

What about Clinton’s plan? “I’m not a judge and I didn’t go to law school, so I’m not going to be in a position to render a legal opinion …” he said.

But the White House has already issued its legal opinion that the president went as far as he could go.

The strategy seems to be: When in doubt, refer to Clinton’s team.

“I’ll let Secretary Clinton and her campaign describe exactly what steps they envision taking, and I’ll allow them to make the case about why it’s legal,” Earnest said.

Senators on Capitol Hill face a similar dynamic, with DREAM Act sponsor Sen. Richard J. Durbin, D-Ill., claiming ignorance as to what might be possible with executive orders when asked whether he agrees with the president’s assertion he has done everything he can — or if he agrees with Clinton there’s room to go further.

Then there are the missing Clinton emails and foreign donations to the Clinton Foundation while she was secretary of State.

Earnest — and Obama — have done their best to keep the presidential campaign at bay, aided by a Clinton campaign that, until very recently, had been sandblasted of anything approaching serious policy proposals. (Her website still doesn’t have an issues page.)

The White House has even kept meetings Obama has held with Clinton — and former President Bill Clinton — off the public schedule.

That’s only going to get more awkward as the campaign gears up and Clinton starts laying out an agenda, which necessarily will include either new items or recycled Obama proposals that failed to launch (universal pre-school, anyone?).

The president can expect a lot of “Why didn’t Obama do that?” questions. If the White House simply blames Congress — a standard fallback — that would undercut Clinton’s ability to claim she’ll get things done. Unless, of course, she and her team were to join in on the chorus of criticism about Obama’s congressional relations.

The New York Times reported last month that while Clinton was campaigning in Iowa, she told lawmakers privately she could do a better job working with Congress. The Times reported it was one of her best-received lines.

“One of her biggest messages was, ‘I know how hard it is to work with Congress; I’ve done it before, and I will continue to when I’m in the White House,’” state Rep. Mary Mascher of Iowa City, who attended the closed-door meeting, told the newspaper.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There's also the potential for moments that could have the feel of Vice President Joseph R. Biden Jr. going off-script and endorsing gay marriage ahead of the president. The bolder Clinton and her team become, the more awkward the non-answers from Earnest and company will be.

There also is the real possibility of Clinton undermining the remaining parts of the Obama agenda that can get through a GOP Congress as she seeks to rally the Democratic base and shore up her left flank against the likes of Sen. Bernard Sanders, I-Vt., former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and, maybe, New York Mayor Bill de Blasio. That includes the trade agenda and assorted other messy compromises to come.

A senior administration official minimized the issue, saying there's no daily call with the Clinton team yet to vet issues, although the two camps keep in touch. Many Clinton hands are veterans of the administration, including former Obama Communications Director Jennifer Palmieri.

"They have been focused on driving a contrast with GOPers, not with us," the official told CQ Roll Call. "That's not just a testament to our shared values and priorities. It's a reflection of the president's political standing."

Obama, after all, remains very popular within the Democratic Party and his national poll ratings have nudged higher.

Indeed, his approval ratings lately have eclipsed Clinton's.

Smart Social Programs // New York Times // Jason Furman - May 11, 2015

WASHINGTON — DO government efforts to support low-income families work? Since the War on Poverty in the 1960s, skeptics have argued that even if these programs provide temporary relief, the only long-term impact is increased dependency — witness, they say, the persistent lack of mobility in places like inner-city Baltimore.

But a growing body of research tells a very different story. Investments in education, income, housing, health care and nutrition for working families have substantial long-term benefits for children.

Consider Moving to Opportunity, an experiment in the 1990s that gave families housing assistance, in some cases contingent on their moving to less poor neighborhoods. Initial evidence from the randomized trial was disappointing, finding little or no improvements in test scores for children or earnings for adults. A new paper by the Harvard economists Raj Chetty, Nathaniel Hendren and Lawrence F. Katz, however, followed the children for another decade. It found that traditional rental vouchers had increased their earnings as adults by 15 percent, and experimental vouchers, which required people to move to less poor neighborhoods, by 31 percent. The additional tax revenue from these higher earnings was enough to repay the program's cost.

This is only the latest in a number of recent studies that use big data to understand the longer-term effects of a range of government programs.

One intriguing recent study by the economists Anna Aizer, Shari Eli, Joseph P. Ferrie and Adriana Lleras-Muney examined the records of 16,000 children whose families applied for a temporary income-support program that was in effect from 1911 to 1935. By comparing the outcomes of those who received the benefit to those of similar children who were denied, the researchers found that the program resulted in more education, higher earnings and lower mortality. Social Security data were used to follow program beneficiaries until as late as 2012, allowing researchers to show that the benefits of receiving even a few years of assistance as a child could persist for 80 years or more.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Although we do not have 100 years of follow-on data from today's programs, recent research following children as they entered their 20s and 30s has produced similarly striking findings.

Studies show that the earned-income tax credit, one of the government's largest tools to reduce child poverty, may also reduce the incidence of low birth weight, raise math and reading scores and boost college enrollment rates for the children who benefited. The Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program, formerly known as food stamps, has been shown to have similar benefits for child recipients that can last decades.

Receiving Medicaid in childhood makes it substantially more likely that a child will graduate from high school and complete college and less likely that an African-American child will die in his late teens or be hospitalized at 25. For women, Medicaid participation in childhood is associated with increased earnings.

A body of research on the long-term effects of high-quality preschool programs and other early-childhood interventions, like home visits by health professionals, consistently finds that they improve a range of adult outcomes, from higher earnings to reduced crime rates. Other research has found that Head Start achieves similar results.

There are three noteworthy elements in this new research. First, the benefits often are not captured by short-term outcomes like improvements in children's test scores, which typically last only a few years before fading.

Second, while program design certainly matters — and can matter a lot — much of the benefit appears to derive from helping low-income families pay for basic needs like food, housing or health care, or simply reducing the intense economic pressure they face. This relates to findings that poverty may increase intense stress, inhibiting young children's cognitive development.

Third, in many cases, the additional tax revenue from the higher long-run earnings generated by the program is sufficient to repay much or even more than all of the initial cost.

In addition to long-term benefits, the safety net, of course, supports many Americans right now. In 2013, income and nutrition assistance programs lifted 46 million people, including 10 million children, out of poverty, while health programs benefited tens of millions more. As a result, the proportions of Americans who are poor and uninsured have fallen over the past several decades.

Moreover, safety-net programs do not discourage work in any big way. Instead, the E.I.T.C. rewards low-income parents for working. And child care and pre-K programs make it easier for parents to work in the first place, while also putting children in a better position to succeed.

President Obama's goal is greater mobility and higher incomes. We know that the large cuts to nutrition assistance, health care, housing vouchers and other programs contained in the recent congressional budget resolution would not only hurt the poor today but also shortchange our economy's future. In contrast, the evidence strongly supports making child care and preschool available to all families with young children, restoring housing vouchers that were cut during the sequester and expanding tax credits for working families.

We cannot solve poverty or lack of mobility overnight, but contrary to what the skeptics say, investing in families works — not just for them, but for all of us.

HBO's Veep Just Got Very Real About the Hillary Clinton Campaign // Vanity Fair // Joanna Robinson - May 11, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

No matter what, Veep—HBO's satirical comedy about a fictional female president—was going to draw comparisons to Hillary Clinton's bid for the Oval Office. As perhaps the most prominent female political figure in U.S. history, Clinton is an inevitable inspiration for the show. But while last night's episode didn't specifically put Clinton and her campaign in its satirical crosshairs, it did frankly address the stakes of a potential Hillary Clinton presidency.

When this season kicked off with Julia Louis-Dreyfus's character Selina Meyer out of the vice president role and not only acting as commander-in-chief, but also running for reelection, creator Armando Iannucci knew Clinton and her campaign would be on everyone's mind. "We weren't consciously aping Hillary when we wrote Selina. It's inevitable now I suppose that Hillary is campaigning as Selina is president that there will be comparisons made," he said on a recent episode of Sirius XM's Pop Politics. But that's likely not a coincidence. Iannucci— the canny satirist behind political properties like In the Loop, In the Thick of It, and, oh yes, Clinton: His Struggle with Dirt—said in the same interview that he tries "to make a couple of guesstimates as to where reality might be when the show goes out," in order to keep his political commentary fresh.

But the hilariously inept and craven Selina only bears a very superficial resemblance to Hillary. (Louis-Dreyfus uses Clinton's make-up artist and last season's haircut plot was based on a Hillary incident.) This isn't exactly John Travolta doing a Bill Clinton impression in Primary Colors. So when Selina's campaign manager Amy Brookheimer (Anna Chlumsky) let her long-simmering rage boil over at her inept boss, it's not a condemnation of Hillary the politician in any way. (In fact, Iannucci has said that "talking to people at the State Department, they only had good things to say about [Hillary] as a boss.") But what Amy said is a piercing reminder that, like it or not, a Hillary Clinton presidency has incredibly high stakes. As she quit the Meyer campaign, Amy said, through gritted teeth:

You have made it impossible to do this job. You have two settings—no decision and bad decision. I wouldn't let you run a bath without the Coast Guard and the fire department standing by, but yet here you are running America. You are the worst thing that has happened to this country since food in buckets and maybe slavery. I've had enough. I'm gone.

You have achieved nothing apart from one thing. The fact that you are a woman means we will have no more women presidents because we tried one and she fucking sucked.

Other than those literally superficial hair and makeup aspects above, Veep has avoided taking on Hillary directly while still touching on other members of the Clinton clan. Selina's big teleprompter gaffe that opened Season 4 is actually based on a Bill Clinton incident from 1993. And Ianucci asked actress Sarah Sutherland—who plays Selina's daughter Catherine—to "have a look at footage of Chelsea [Clinton] doing public stuff." But while Ianucci may claim that vice presidents like Biden, Gore, and Cheney are all inspirations for Selina, there's no doubt Hillary has always been there in the background. He recently connected the dots between Louis-Dreyfus's Selina and Kate McKinnon's portrayal of an eager, campaign-ready Clinton on Saturday Night Live. He referred to it as "That air of 'I am going to be the first woman president of the United States. You do know that. Have you forgotten that?'" No one's forgotten, and with the political landscape still starved for female representation, the stakes on that first female commander-in-chief will, to paraphrase the more eloquent Amy Brookheimer, be sky high.

--
Alexandria Phillips
Communications | Press Assistant
Hillary for America
https://www.hillaryclinton.com

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace" <info@centerpeace.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 9/3/2015 12:29:13 AM
Subject: News Update - September 3, 2015

S. DANIEL ABRAHAM
CENTER FOR MIDDLE EAST PEACE

Israel and the Middle East News Update

Thursday, September 3

Click here for a printer-friendly version.

Headlines:

- Israeli Official: We Assessed it's a Done Deal
- Netanyahu to Continue Vocal Opposition to Deal
- Iran Deal Reigniting Israeli Fears Over U.S. Arms Sales
- Knesset Advances Controversial Anti-Terror Bill
- IDF Strikes Gaza After Sniper Fire Hits Israeli Homes
- France Drops Investigation Into Yasser Arafat's Death
- NGO Petitions High Court to Prevent Closure in Silwan
- SodaStream Chief Accuses Boycotters of Anti-Semitism

Commentary:

- The New Yorker: "Iran- a Done Deal"
  - By Robin Wright
- Ha'aretz: "Netanyahu Understands Nothing About U.S. in 2015"
  - By Barak Ravid

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Galey Tzahal

Israeli Official: We Assessed it's a Done Deal

A government source admitted that Israel had soberly assessed that the chances were slim that it could shoot down the nuclear agreement with Iran in the American Congress but said that it was Israel's duty to say its piece in this argument. He said that there was a sense that Israel was not paying a price for the public clash with the Obama administration, and in fact, Israel's great opposition to the agreement had increased what it would receive in exchange. He also said that there was great value to Israel's insistence on sticking to its position and to the warnings it issued because there was no doubt that the world would be stricter about Iran and would be suspicious of it.

See also, "Gov't finds victory in defeat on Iran, says official" (Ynet News)

Jerusalem Post

Netanyahu to Continue Vocal Opposition to Deal

Prime Minister Netanyahu, who has argued fiercely against the Iran nuclear deal, will continue to speak out strongly against it, government sources said, even though US President Barack Obama on Wednesday secured the 34th vote needed to sustain a presidential veto. "The prime minister has a responsibility to speak out against the deal that threatens this country, the region and the world," one government official said. "And he will continue to do so." Despite US Sen. Barbara Mikulski (D-Maryland) providing Obama with the vote necessary to prevent an override of his veto if Congress votes, the official said the accord "remains a dangerous deal."

Ha'aretz

Deal Reigniting Israeli Fears Over U.S. Arms Sales

The confrontation between the Netanyahu government and the Obama administration over the nuclear agreement brings to mind a row that took place 34 years earlier: the battle between the Begin government and the Reagan administration over the sale of AWACS (airborne warning and control systems) to Saudi Arabia. Back in 1981, the new Reagan administration decided to sell AWACS to Saudi Arabia, which provoked great dismay in Israel. While Washington viewed the AWACS deal as an opportunity to promote a strategic dialogue with moderate Arab states and to provide them with means of self-defense as the Iran-Iraq War was in full swing, Israel's government was fiercely opposed to strengthening the offensive capacity of any Arab state.

Times of Israel

Knesset Advances Controversial Anti-Terror Bill

The Knesset advanced late Wednesday night a controversial bill that significantly broadens the definition of terrorism and toughens punishment for many offenses deemed terror-related. The parliament voted 45 in favor and 14 against the legislation on its first reading. The bill widens the definition of terrorist acts and organizations and lengthens punishments for terror-related offenses, including providing for equal punishment for perpetrators of terrorist attacks and their abettors. The bill now heads to the Knesset's Constitution, Law and Justice Committee.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Times of Israel

IDF Strikes Gaza After Sniper Fire Hits Israeli Homes

The IDF struck a Hamas target in the northern Gaza Strip early Thursday morning in response to sniper fire at an Israeli town a day earlier. The IDF confirmed that Israeli jets struck a Hamas military base from which the shooting supposedly came. A Hamas media outlet in Gaza reported that Israeli helicopters fired two missiles. There were no immediate reports of injuries in the strike. The stray bullets were apparently fired from a Hamas training camp in the Gaza Strip, and hit an Israeli home in a kibbutz adjacent to the Palestinian enclave Wednesday evening, causing damage but no injuries.

Ha'aretz

France Drops Investigation Into Yasser Arafat's Death

French investigating magistrates have decided to drop an inquiry into the death in France of former Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, whose widow alleged he was poisoned, the prosecutor's office said on Wednesday. A lawyer for his widow Suha Arafat, who has argued that his death in 2004 was a political assassination, told Reuters that they would challenge the decision in an appeals court. Arafat, who signed the 1993 Oslo interim peace accord with Israel but led an uprising after subsequent talks broke down in 2000, died aged 75 in a French hospital four weeks after falling ill. The official cause of death was a massive stroke, but French doctors were unable at the time to determine the origin of the illness and no autopsy was carried out. An investigation was opened in August 2012 at the request of Suha Arafat, and his remains were exhumed for tests that were examined separately by French, Russian and Swiss experts. The Swiss reported their results were consistent with but not proof of poisoning by reactive polonium. The French concluded he did not die of poisoning and experts were reported to have found no traces of polonium in his body.

Jerusalem Post

NGO Petitions High Court to Prevent Closure in Silwan

Emek Shaveh, a consortium of archeologists representing residents of Jerusalem's Silwan neighborhood, petitioned the High Court on Wednesday to prevent the closure of "Area G" of the City of David archeological site, located south of the Old City. Emek Shaveh said the petition was filed against the Nature and Parks Authority, which it accuses of colluding the Ir David Foundation (Elad) to close off public and archeological areas previously open to all residents and visitors of Silwan. Elad operates the City of David National Park, adjacent to Area G. "The closing of Area G, which has been open to the public since the British Mandate in the 1920s, began two months ago with construction of fences and gates around the area, making it possible to lock it," the petition states.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

AP

SodaStream Chief Accuses Boycotters of Anti-Semitism

The CEO of SodaStream, the beverage maker that is shuttering its West Bank factory in the face of international boycott calls, accused his company's critics Wednesday of anti-Semitism and hurting the interests of the Palestinian workers they claim to protect. SodaStream has been targeted by an international campaign calling for boycotting, divesting and sanctioning Israeli companies. Citing financial reasons, SodaStream announced it was closing the West Bank factory last year, but the so-called BDS movement declared victory and said its pressure was behind the decision.

The New Yorker – September 3, 2015

Iran: A Done Deal

By Robin Wright

The riskiest gamble of the Obama Presidency, the nuclear agreement with the Islamic Republic of Iran, was basically won today. A rancorous congressional debate is still to come, but thirty-four senators have now vowed to support the deal, effectively blocking efforts on the Hill to eventually kill it. The diplomacy will almost certainly be the centerpiece of Obama's foreign-policy legacy.

Opponents haven't given up. The Republican Presidential candidate Donald Trump, the Texas senator Ted Cruz, and the conservative talk-show host Glenn Beck are planning a "Stop the Iran Deal" rally at the Capitol, on September 9th, the day after Congress returns from recess and begins to debate the terms. The rally is co-sponsored by Tea Party Patriots, the Zionist Organization of America, and the Center for Security Policy. It's likely to be as colorful as it is combative. On "Meet the Press" last month, Trump warned that the deal would be a boon to the Iranians. "They are going to be such a wealthy, such a powerful nation," he said. "They are going to have nuclear weapons. They are going to take over parts of the world that you wouldn't believe. And I think it's going to lead to nuclear holocaust."

Former Vice-President Dick Cheney has joined the debate. He is scheduled to give a major address on Iran in Washington next week, at the American Enterprise Institute. "Nearly everything the president has told us about his Iranian agreement is false," Cheney wrote on Friday, in a Wall Street Journal piece adapted from his book. "He has said it will prevent the Iranians from acquiring nuclear weapons, but it will actually facilitate and legitimize an Iranian nuclear arsenal. He has said this deal will stop nuclear proliferation, but it will actually accelerate it, as nations across the Middle East work to acquire their own weapons in response to America's unwillingness to stop the Iranian nuclear program."

The focus in Washington is already shifting, however, to whether the Democrats might be able to win seven more endorsements—for a total of forty-one—to invoke a filibuster that would prevent the deal from even coming to a vote in the Senate. Republicans, with limited Democratic support, have been hoping to pass a Resolution of Disapproval in both the Senate and the House by September 17th. Obama pledged that he would veto it. Support from thirty-four senators now means that the President would be able to sustain his veto—if it comes to that.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“We’ve always said that our goal was for the Administration to be able to implement this deal—whatever that took in Congress,” a senior Administration official told me Wednesday. Taking a swipe at Republicans, the official added, “We appreciate those who have taken this seriously, as opposed to, for example, the forty-seven senators who announced their opposition in a letter to the Ayatollah, months before the agreement was even finalized.”

So far, the prospects of the Democrats blocking a vote altogether are sketchy. Even support for the nuclear agreement—announced on July 24th, after twenty months of tortured diplomacy between Iran and the world’s six major powers—is either tepid or reluctant in both houses of Congress. Senator Barbara Mikulski, a Democrat from Maryland who retires next year, became the decisive thirty-fourth voice in the Senate on Wednesday. Her views reflected those of many fellow-Democrats.

“No deal is perfect, especially one negotiated with the Iranian regime,” Mikulski said. “I have concluded that this Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action is the best option available to block Iran from having a nuclear bomb. For these reasons, I will vote in favor of this deal.” She, like many others, had caveats. “However, Congress must also reaffirm our commitment to the safety and security of Israel,” she said.

Democrats have forty-four seats in the Senate. Ten members have not yet declared how they will vote. The lobbying has been ferocious, the media blitz of anti-deal television ads sometimes apocalyptic. Two Democratic senators—Charles Schumer, of New York, and Robert Menendez, of New Jersey—have announced opposition to the deal. The New Jersey Democrat Cory Booker is among those facing particular pressure from constituents and donors on both sides. Maryland’s Ben Cardin is also reportedly torn.

Secretary of State John Kerry, in a push to mobilize more votes, sent separate letters to the Senate and the House today, pledging to work with Congress on new legislation that would guarantee the security of allies, notably Israel and the Gulf countries, as well as check Iran’s behavior in the region. Israel’s security, Kerry wrote, is “sacrosanct.”

Kerry also made an emotional final pitch for the deal, before congressional debate begins next week, in a speech in Philadelphia. “The outcome will matter as much as any foreign-policy decision in recent history,” he said. “To vote down this agreement is to solve nothing. . . . To oppose this agreement is—whether intended or not—to recommend . . . a policy of national paralysis. It is to take us back directly to the very dangerous spot that we were in two years ago—only to go back there devoid of any realistic plan or option.”

The White House has long claimed that the deal with Iran was about only one issue and does not represent an attempt at rapprochement between Washington and Tehran. But the Administration’s arguments increasingly hint at future possibilities. “The Iran agreement is not a panacea for the sectarian and extremist violence that has been ripping that region apart,” Kerry said in Philadelphia. “But history may judge it a turning point, a moment when the builders of stability seized the initiative from the destroyers of hope, and when we were able to show, as have generations before us, that when we demand the best from ourselves and insist that others adhere to a similar high standard—when we do that, we have immense power to shape a safer and a more humane world."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Iranian officials have begun using similar language to sell the deal. Ali Larijani, the Speaker of Parliament, is in New York for meetings at the United Nations. In an interview with CNN's Christiane Amanpour on Tuesday, he called the agreement "a beginning for a better understanding for other issues as well." A more "realistic approach and attitude" by the United States toward Iran would be reciprocated, he said. Larijani is a powerful figure and a conservative. The son of a grand ayatollah, he is a former Presidential candidate. One of his brothers heads the Iranian judiciary, while another heads a human-rights council. Larijani also met Tuesday with a few former congressmen and discussed possible exchanges, according to two people who were present at the meeting.

The White House hopes that the congressional debate will be resolved before the opening of the U.N. General Assembly at the end of September, when President Obama and Iran's President Hassan Rouhani are both scheduled to speak, on the same day.

Ha'aretz– September 3, 2015

Netanyahu Understands Nothing About U.S. in 2015

In his headlong crash into the wall vis-à-vis the Iran deal, Netanyahu took with him many innocent victims; one might have hoped that this would cause him to reevaluate his policies, but this is not likely to happen.

By Barak ravid

The announcement by veteran U.S. senator Barbara Mikulski that she supports the nuclear accord with Iran marked President Obama's victory in his attempt to pass the deal through the U.S. Congress. It was also testimony to the rout of senior figures in the Republican Party, the pro-Israel lobby AIPAC, Israel's ambassador to the U.S. Ron Dermer and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who have all tried in recent months to use every means at their disposal to thwart ratification of the accord.

Netanyahu's defeat may be even greater. In the time remaining until the Senate vote, expected to take place around September 10, Obama and his people will try to recruit the support of seven additional Democratic senators. If they succeed and get 41 senators on board, they could conduct a filibuster in the Senate. That way, there will be no vote on the proposition to oppose the accord and Obama won't need to use his veto. Given his present momentum, such an achievement is not unthinkable.

As on many previous occasions, Netanyahu knowingly or unknowingly embarked on a futile course that led him to a resounding debacle in the arena most dear to him. In recent weeks, Netanyahu has told cabinet ministers, American Jewish leaders and journalists that he believes there is a chance to block the nuclear accord in Congress. Dermer, who met more than 200 senators and congressmen in recent months, also radiated optimism.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In conversations with right-wing journalists a few weeks ago he explained that the trending sentiment in the Senate is against the accord and that people in Israel don't understand U.S. politics. Some journalists bought into this and echoed him at every opportunity, creating the impression that Congress will very soon cast the deal into history's dustbin.

If Netanyahu and Dermer didn't mean what they were saying, they were brazenly lying. But that is apparently not the case. More likely, as in the past, the Netanyahu-Dermer duo seriously miscalculated political realities in the United States. Their failure in understanding congressional dynamics was a replay of their misreading of the situation during the 2012 presidential elections when, together with their patron, casino magnate Sheldon Adelson, they put all their chips on Republican candidate Mitt Romney.

In sessions dealing with security-diplomatic issues since 2009, Netanyahu repeatedly told cabinet ministers or senior officials who ventured to give him advice on relations with the United States: "Leave America to me." Netanyahu believes he is the foremost expert on American politics, but it again turns out that the America he knows has changed. He is familiar with the Republican and conservative America of the 1980s, but knows nothing about the Democratic and progressive America of 2015.

The problem is that in his headlong crash into the wall, he took with him many innocent victims. With his forceful interference in Congress' approach to the accord, he turned Israel into a divisive issue in U.S. politics. In his calls on American Jews to support him and not their president, he ripped the fabric of American Jewry. His fight with Obama caused grave damage to U.S.-Israeli relations, with implications that will be apparent in the coming year.

One might have hoped that Wednesday's events would stop Netanyahu and cause him to take stock, to examine where he went wrong and formulate new policies. Apparently, this will not happen. The first reactions from his bureau indicated the opposite. He intends to continue fighting the deal.

After failing in Congress, he will take the fight to American public opinion. We can expect to see him on every possible U.S. media outlet in the next few weeks, with one message: Obama may have won on technicalities, but if the public doesn't support him, the deal has no legitimacy and will collapse or be altered when Obama leaves office.

S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace
633 Pennsylvania Ave. NW, 5th Floor, Washington, DC 20004
www.centerpeace.org

2015 S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace, All rights reserved.
YOU ARE RECEIVING THIS EMAIL BECAUSE YOU SIGNED UP FOR OUR NEWS UPDATES.

unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 6/7/2015 3:21:06 AM
Subject: H4A News Clips 6.7.15

H4A News Clips
June 7, 2015

TODAY'S KEY STORIES..... 3

Hillary Clinton Traces Friendly Path, Troubling Party // NYT // Jonathan Martin & Maggie Haberman – June 6, 2015 3
On the economy, is Clinton prepared to take her stand? // WaPo // Dan Balz – June 6, 2015 7

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 9

In 2008, Clinton couldn't buy Iowans' love. So she bought them snow shovels. // WaPo // David A. Fahrenthold – June 6, 2015..... 9
Hillary Clinton talks education, health care at New Haven fundraiser // New Haven Register // Mary O'Leary – June 6, 2015..... 15
America may not understand the Clintons — but Wall Street does // Business Insider // Linette Lopez – June 6, 2015 17
Malloy makes it official: His choice is Hillary // CT Mirror // Mark Pazniokas - June 7, 2015 19
GOP Has Reason To Fret As Clinton Leads Bush 47-40 In North Carolina // Politicus // Keith Brekhusmore – June 6, 2015 20
Experts Fear Messy Consequences if Hillary Clinton's Automatic Voter Plan Is Enacted // The Blade // Fred Lucas – June 6, 2015..... 21
Hillary has Roosevelt Island officials in the palm of her hand // NY Post // Bill Sanderson – June 7, 2015 22

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 23

O'MALLEY..... 23
O'Malley makes a pitch to younger voters // The Baltimore Sun // John Fritze – June 6, 2015..... 23
SANDERS..... 27
Exclusive–Iowa Gop Chairman Reacts To Bernie Sanders' And Martin O'Malley's Reception In Iowa: 'Socialism Is So Odd To Us' // Breitbart News – June 6, 2015..... 27
Bernie Sanders isn't a "crackpot" — and the progressive agenda isn't "left-wing" // Salon // Bill Moyers And Michael Winship – June 6, 2015..... 27
OTHER..... 30
Obama, Clintons join mourners at Beau Biden's funeral // AP – June 6, 2015..... 30
Can You Be a Latino Politician If You Don't Speak Fluent Spanish? // NBC News // Suzanne Gamboa – June 6, 2015 32

GOP..... 34

BUSH..... 35
For Jeb Bush, the challenge remains making it about 'Jeb,' not 'Bush' // WaPo // Ed O'Keefe – June 6, 2015 35
A foreign policy checkmark for Jeb Bush // AP // Thomas Beaumont – June 6, 2015..... 37
RUBIO..... 39
Rubio's real estate dealings often a drag on his finances // AP // Nicholas Riccardi – June 6, 2015 39
Marco Rubio Is Now Channeling JFK — Explicitly // The National Journal // Shane Goldmacher – June 6, 2015 43
Marco Rubio is what Republicans hope the future looks like // VOX // Dara Lind – June 6, 2015.. 44
Rubio seeks to rebut skeptics on the experience factor // The Hill // Rebecca Shabad – June 6, 2015 45
PAUL..... 45
Paul: Laws on sexuality could be more 'neutral,' but all should be protected // WaPo // Katie Zezima – June 6, 2015 45
Rand Paul on Transgender Rights: "Government Shouldn't Ask About Your Personal Life" // David Weigel – June 6, 2015 46
Paul: 'We have come to take our liberty back' // The Union Leader // Dan Tuohy – June 6, 2015... 47
Rand Paul demands White House release trade deal text immediately // The Hill // Rebecca Shabad – June 6, 2015 49
Ron Paul: 'I don't want to distract' from Rand // The Hill // Mark Hensch – June 6, 2015..... 49
WALKER..... 50
Scott Walker Riding With Joni Ernst in Iowa as Rivals Give Chase // NYT // Trip Gabriel – June 6, 2015 51
Scott Walker's Effort to Weaken College Tenure // NYT // The Editorial Board – June 6, 2015 53
Iowa's 'Roast and Ride': 5 takeaways // Politico // Katie Glueck – June 6, 2016..... 54
Republican Walker is leader of 2016 election pack in Iowa // Reuters // John Whitesides – June 6, 2015 56
Scott Walker: Hillary Clinton "firmly out of touch" on voting rights // CBS News // Reena Flores – June 6, 2015 58

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Scott Walker in Iowa: 'We did not inherit fame or fortune' // The Hill // Rebecca Shabad – June 6, 2015 59
CHRISTIE..... 60
Christie slams Clinton on voter IDs: 'She doesn't know what she's talking about' // Washington Examiner // Sean Higgins - June 6, 2015..... 60
PERRY..... 60
Can Rick Perry close the deal? // WaPo // Stephanie McCrummen – June 5, 2015..... 60
Perry touts experience as gov ernor // The Hill // Mark Hensch – June 6, 2015..... 67
Rick Perry announces Iowa presidential campaign team // The Des Moines Register // William Petroski – June 6, 2015..... 69
HUCKABEE..... 70
Huckabee: I'm 'only person' to take on Clinton machine // The Hill // Mark Hensch – June 6, 2015 70
KASICH..... 71
Hillary Clinton draws ire of John Kasich on voting // The Columbus Dispatch // Darrel Rowland – June 6, 2015..... 71
CARSON..... 73
Ben Carson's Nascent Campaign Faces Personnel Turmoil // NYT // Ashley Parker – June 6, 2015 73
Dick Morris: Ben Carson's Fame Helps GOP Run, But More Is Needed // Newsweek // Todd Beamon – June 5, 2015..... 73
Why is Ben Carson doing so well in the polls? // WaPo // Amber Phillips – June 5, 2015..... 75
Carson: Political experience not needed to be a good president // The Hill // Mark Hensch – June 6, 2015 76
JINDAL..... 77
As he nears a 2016 bid, Louisiana's Bobby Jindal hits political bottom // WaPo // Tyler Bridge – June 6, 2015..... 77
FIORINA..... 79
Fiorina: Gov ernment is 'giant, bloated, unaccountable' // The Des Moines Register // Grant Rodgers – June 6, 2015..... 79
OTHER..... 80
Presidential Hopefuls Descend on Iowa, Courting Favor With Joni Ernst // NYT // Ashley Parker – June 6, 2015..... 80
A First for Snapchat // NYT // Ashley Parker – June 6, 2015..... 81
In Iowa, pork, patriotism and presidential politics // WaPo // Jenna Johnson & Dan Balz – June 6, 2015 84
Can conservatives find their footing in Hollywood in 2016? // CNN // Maeve Reston – June 5, 2015 87
GOP hopefuls blame Obama's China policy for data breach // The Hill // Cory Bennett – June 6, 2015 88

TOP NEWS..... 90

DOMESTIC..... 90
Marriage today: rich-poor gap, later vows, gays gain access // AP // David Crary – June 6, 2015 ... 90
GOP-led states trying bolster budgets by limiting gov ernment assistance programs // Fox News – June 6, 2015..... 95
INTERNATIONAL..... 96
Behind Tough Talk on Russia, G-7 Leaders Face Tough Reality // AP // Julie Pace – June 6, 2015. 96

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS..... 98

Running Against Hillary // NYT // Ross Douthat – June 6, 2015..... 98
Hillary the Tormentor // NYT // Frank Bruni – June 6, 2015..... 100
Why Join the Military With a Reckless (Meaning Republican) Commander-In-Chief? // HuffPo // Doug Bandow – June 6, 2015..... 103

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Hillary Clinton Traces Friendly Path, T roubling Party // NYT // Jonathan Martin & Maggie Haberm an – June 6, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton appears to be dispensing with the nationwide electoral strategy that won her husband two terms in the White House and brought white working-class voters and great stretches of what is now red-state America back to Democrats.

Instead, she is poised to retrace Barack Obama's far narrower path to the presidency: a campaign focused more on mobilizing supporters in the Great Lakes states and in parts of the West and South than on persuading undecided voters.

Mrs. Clinton's aides say it is the only way to win in an era of heightened polarization, when a declining pool of voters is truly up for grabs. Her liberal policy positions, they say, will fire up Democrats, a less difficult task than trying to win over independents in more hostile territory — even though a broader strategy could help lift the party with her.

This early in the campaign, however, forgoing a determined outreach effort to all 50 states, or even most of them, could mean missing out on the kind of spirited conversation that can be a unifying feature of a presidential election. And it could leave Mrs. Clinton, if she wins, with the same difficulties Mr. Obama has faced in governing with a Republican-controlled Congress.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Should Hillary Rodham Clinton win the Democratic nomination for president in 2016, she would most likely follow the path that Barack Obama took to victory in 2008 and 2012.

Already, it is causing consternation among Democrats in conservative states that could be given short shrift by her campaign or bypassed altogether.

When Bill Clinton reclaimed the presidency for Democrats in 1992, his road to the White House ran through Southern and Southern-border states filled with what were then a precious commodity: swing voters.

Twenty years later, Mr. Obama convincingly won a second term without competing in states like Kentucky, Louisiana, Tennessee or West Virginia that powered Mr. Clinton. And because of his strong appeal among liberals, Mr. Obama did so even while losing among independent voters.

As Mrs. Clinton intensifies her campaign for the Democratic nomination, it is clear from her left-leaning policy stances, her hiring and her focus on data-driven organizing that her strategy is modeled on Mr. Obama's, not her husband's.

If she won, it would suggest that the so-called Obama coalition of young, nonwhite and female voters is transferable to another Democrat. And it would validate the idea that energizing core supporters is more important in presidential contests than persuading those still undecided.

To the architects of the Obama strategy, Mrs. Clinton's approach is not mere homage: It is unavoidable, given that there are few genuine independents now and that technology increasingly lets campaigns pinpoint their most likely voters.

"If you run a campaign trying to appeal to 60 to 70 percent of the electorate, you're not going to run a very compelling campaign for the voters you need," said David Plouffe, a top Obama strategist who has consulted informally with Mrs. Clinton.

Mrs. Clinton has said repeatedly that she does not want a lonely victory in 2016; she wants to elect Democrats down the ballot. A group of her senior aides met recently with officials at the Democratic House, Senate and governor campaign arms to brief them on the aides' research and plans for her message and organization. And Senate Democrats are hopeful that she will lift their prospects, because there is considerable overlap in crucial states: The results in Colorado, Florida, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Carolina, Ohio and Wisconsin will almost certainly determine both who wins the White House and which party controls the Senate.

Bill Clinton, then the Democratic nominee for president, greeted supporters in 1992 in Carrollton, Ky. His road to the White House took him through many Southern and border states, where he won the support of swing voters.

House Democrats, while realistic about the difficulty of retaking control, are also counting on Mrs. Clinton to drive turnout for their candidates. There will be contested races in some presidential swing states, but Democratic strategists say Mrs. Clinton could also help the party unseat House Republicans in deep-blue states like New York and California.

So to Democrats in states where Mrs. Clinton is unlikely to compete, her relying on Mr. Obama's map would be worrisome. It would not only further diminish beleaguered state parties, but also leave Mrs. Clinton with a narrower margin for error.

"Go ask Al Gore," Senator Joe Manchin III, Democrat of West Virginia, said about the risk of writing off states such as his, where Democratic presidential candidates prospered until 2000. "He'd be president with five electoral votes from West Virginia. So it is big, and it can make a difference."

Centrist Democrats also worry that focusing on liberal voters could lead to a continuation of the problems Mr. Obama has faced with a Congress elected by a vastly different subset of the nation.

"That's not good for the country," Mr. Manchin said, adding that he hoped Mrs. Clinton would "come to the middle" if she became president.

Of her campaign, he said, "If they get her too far over, it's going to be more difficult to govern, it truly is."

Other rural-state Democrats are sending not-so-subtle messages.

"I think that we always appreciate when people want to kind of talk to the whole country and listen to concerns, and I think farm country is critically important," said Senator Heidi Heitkamp, Democrat of North Dakota.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A larger risk of a tailored strategy is that by taking advantage of polarization, a candidate could lose some of the authority that comes from the civic exercise of appealing to much of the nation.

“The president is the one person who potentially could be the unifying figure in the country,” said H. W. Brands, a historian at the University of Texas at Austin. “And if the president or a presidential candidate basically writes off 40 states, then how in the world do the people in those 40 states feel like they have a stake in that person or that election?”

Mrs. Clinton’s strategists appear mostly unmoved.

“I think everybody understands how tough it’s going to be next year if we get through the primary,” Robby Mook, Mrs. Clinton’s campaign manager, said. “So I’m not concerned about hand-wringing on the strategy.”

Aides acknowledged that Mrs. Clinton’s map would closely resemble Mr. Obama’s, with roughly the same eight or so key states as in the last two presidential elections, and with the possibility of competing in historically Republican states like Arizona where the demographics increasingly favor Democrats.

But given the Clintons’ deep ties to party leaders, including in many red states, and their instinct for building up party machinery, some Democrats wonder whether Mrs. Clinton will be able to resist old friends who press her to at least test the waters in Republican-leaning areas.

Gov. Steven L. Beshear of Kentucky said he had reminded Mr. Clinton this year that he carried Kentucky twice — and said Mrs. Clinton could win it, too.

Many in Mr. Obama’s orbit are watching closely to see which impulse wins out: an Obama-style faith in the data or a temptation to acquiesce to the familiar. So far, Mrs. Clinton is heeding her mostly new team of advisers.

“One of the hardest things to do in politics is dispense with old behavior,” said Dan Pfeiffer, a former Obama adviser. “That will be a challenge. But they’re setting themselves up to avoid that.”

Mrs. Clinton and her husband expressed concern last year when Democratic turnout fell precipitously. Recognizing that Democrats had to be galvanized to show up at the polls, Mrs. Clinton’s advisers used surveys and focus groups to assess the risks of running a strongly liberal campaign. They concluded that there were few.

So she is embracing the central lesson of the Obama school: that voters turn out when they believe that an election makes a difference and that their party’s standard-bearer is a champion on issues important to them.

By emphatically staking out liberal positions on gay rights, immigration, criminal justice, voting rights and pay equity for women, Mrs. Clinton is showing core Democratic constituencies that she intends to give them a reason to support her.

The stoke-the-base approach is a hallmark of Mrs. Clinton’s young campaign manager, Mr. Mook. He used similar tactics to lift Gov. Terry McAuliffe of Virginia to victory in 2013, in a race both Clintons watched closely.

It is a starkly different style from that of Mrs. Clinton’s 2008 campaign, when she was often concerned about being seen as too liberal to appeal to centrists.

This time, Mr. Pfeiffer said, “she hired people with a sense of where the electorate is now, not where it was in 1992.”

Mrs. Clinton’s strategic intentions are also evident in her focus on organizing. Mr. Mook noted twice in an interview that her campaign already had supporters in all 50 states mustering volunteers to register voters and ensure Mrs. Clinton is on the ballot. That is partly why the campaign postponed her first rally: so her team could have time to make it more of an organizing event.

That kickoff in New York next Saturday will be an important test of enthusiasm for Mrs. Clinton’s candidacy, and of her campaign’s ability to use big events to build the machinery that will identify and turn out voters.

What Mrs. Clinton says there will matter. But the organizing around the rally, and around the events her campaign is holding that night to build a volunteer network, will be just as consequential.

It is a far cry from her husband’s campaigns.

“The highest-premium voter in ’92 was a voter who would vote for one party some and for another party some,” said James Carville, Mr. Clinton’s chief strategist in 1992. “Now the highest-premium voter is somebody with a high probability to vote for you and low probability to turn out. That’s the golden list. And that’s a humongous change in basic strategic doctrine."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On the economy, is Clinton prepared to take her stand? // WaPo // Dan Balz – June 6, 2015

In a week, Hillary Rodham Clinton will take the next step in her campaign for president with a big rally in New York. Her aides say that she will offer a fuller description of where she would take the country. On economic policies, will she stand with President Obama or apart from him and closer to her populist rivals on the left?

The answer depends in part on how Clinton diagnoses the state of the economy and on the effect of the president's policies. Friday's employment report showed an increase of 280,000 jobs in May, the best this year. As White House officials noted, the economy has added private sector jobs for 63 consecutive months. In the past two years, more than 5.6 million jobs have been added to the economy and 12.6 million since the consecutive-months streak started.

The employment report provided a helpful offset to the recent report that showed the economy had contracted during the first quarter of the year, because of severe winter weather and other factors.

That may be just one bad quarter. But for all the jobs added over the past five years, the economy continues to grow slowly, and many Americans continue to say that they haven't seen much benefit. More than 7 in 10 Americans say they remain worried about the future direction of the economy, according to the latest Washington Post-ABC News poll.

Clinton has said that the economy is not working for everyone, that the deck is stacked against ordinary Americans and in favor of those with power, influence and financial wealth. In one form or another, she is saying that, after more than six years with a Democratic administration and despite the number of jobs added, the economy still isn't working the way it should.

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) and former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley have launched their candidacies with a populist critique of the economic status quo. As they, like Clinton, aim their toughest criticisms at Republican policies, their economic analyses also represent at least a partial rebuke of their own party's policies.

When she announced her candidacy in April, Clinton highlighted the economic unease of many American families and said she wanted to be a champion for the middle class. What she has not done is offer an explanation of why Democratic policies have failed to adequately address the factors that contribute to middle-class angst.

Sanders and O'Malley have argued that the administration has not been vigorous enough in taking on entrenched economic power in behalf of workers. They also have said that officials have been negligent in not trying to bring some in the banking community to justice for their contributions to the collapse of the financial system in the fall of 2008. Both call for significant increases in government spending for infrastructure and other domestic initiatives.

Sanders and O'Malley also see the pending 12-nation Trans-Pacific Partnership as emblematic of the administration's upside-down values when it comes to workers. They have come out against the agreement (which is still being negotiated) as being bad for American workers. But that's not so with Clinton, who promoted a Pacific trade deal as secretary of state. Until there is or isn't an agreement, she is reserving judgment, keeping a foot in both camps.

Rhetorically, Clinton often has sounded like Sanders and O'Malley and Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.), who is credited with pushing populist themes into the national debate. In policy terms, Clinton has been holding back, but that time may be coming to an end.

Will she embrace the president's policies, arguing that they simply need a bit of tweaking and some more time to begin spreading benefits more widely? Will she claim that the Republicans have blocked the Democrats' policies from being fully realized and provide evidence that she would have greater success than Obama in getting them implemented? Or will she acknowledge implicitly or explicitly that the policies haven't worked by setting a different course?

Right now, the 2016 president election appears to be headed toward a stale rerun of the two-party economic debate of the last campaign. Republicans see Obama's policies — spending, taxing and regulatory — as inhibiting growth. They see big government as an obstacle and would pare away at it size and reach. Democrats see Republicans as offering a return to policies that favor the wealthy and that provide little for working families, policies that would cut spending and create pain.

This debate played out in 2012 as a "who-do-you-trust" choice. Obama cast himself as the empathetic protector of the middle class and attacked Republican rival Mitt Romney as an out-of-touch business executive who cared only about profits for corporations and their owners and not for average people. Romney described Obama as someone who understood little about how the economy really worked.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Voters split over who would be better at handling the economy (49 percent for Romney, 48 percent for Obama), but on the question of who cares about "people like me," 81 percent cited the president. Case closed.

But a "who-do-you-trust" frame isn't sufficient. As the recovery has failed to produce a more equitable distribution of benefits, and as overall growth rates remain well below what they were a generation ago (through both Republican and Democratic administrations), it's clear that something more is needed in the coming election. The prospect of another predictable economic debate between the two parties is hardly what the country needs.

Republicans have their own questions to answer about how they would change their policies. It is popular now for Republican candidates to talk about the lack of economic mobility and the gap between Wall Street and Main Street. They are trying to avoid the trap Romney fell into in the last election. But voters have a right to know whether they have fresh thinking behind their rhetoric. So far there's been only a little of that.

Among Democrats, party progressives are clamoring for something more than more of the same. But 21/2 years after Obama defeated Romney, some Democrats plainly think that empathy alone will not solve the problems of a struggling middle class. The possibility of an engaged Democratic-nomination contest provides the vehicle for a debate that would examine what has and hasn't worked.

Sanders, O'Malley and the others who are joining the race might not be equipped politically to deny Clinton the nomination. Still, their presence makes it more likely that Democrats will get the debate that many say they would like to see.

No one, including Clinton, argues for a return to the policies of her husband's presidency, though the economy was strong then. But neither is she likely to want to run as a third term of the Obama presidency. If Clinton thinks the president's economic policies have been and are working, she could say so directly. If she thinks they have been inadequate regarding the size and complexity of the economic ills that she describes, she can say that. She now has an open forum in which to engage those questions.

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE

In 2008, Clinton couldn't buy Iowans' love. So she bought them snow shovels. // WaPo // David A. Fahrenthold – June 6, 2015

In Phyllis Peters's garage, there is a snow shovel. A nice one: green, shiny, with an ergonomic steel handle. It came from Hillary Rodham Clinton.

And it plays a part in a modern-day political legend, about some of the strangest money a candidate has ever spent.

Eight years ago, Peters was a volunteer for Clinton's first presidential run. She had been an admirer of Clinton since her time as first lady. But just before Clinton lost the Iowa caucuses, her staffers did something odd: They bought shovels for Peters and the hundreds of other volunteers.

"If you're in Iowa, you have a snow shovel" already, Peters said. But she accepted. To be nice. This is Iowa. "We're not rude people," Peters said.

Today, the story of Clinton's snow shovels is being told again in Iowa, as supporters worry that her second campaign could repeat the mistakes of the first. For both those who gave out the shovels and those who received them, they came to symbolize a candidate who never quite got their home state.

Clinton doesn't face near the same challenge in Iowa in 2016. But the state still matters as a test of basic politics, a gauge of whether she has gotten any better at connecting with the people she wants to vote for her.

Last time around, Clinton tried to win over Iowans with bloodless logic, touting her résumé and her grinding work ethic. When that fell short, Clinton's well-funded campaign — unable to buy her love — started buying everything else.

An expensive chartered "Hill-a-copter." A $95,000 order of deli sandwiches. And 600-odd new snow shovels, some of which still sit, unused, in basements and garages across Iowa.

The idea behind them seemed to be that Clinton's own voters might be so old, or so un-enthused, that they wouldn't leave the house if it snowed. And that Clinton's own Iowa volunteers — if sent on a voter-rescue mission — might not be prepared for . . . winter. In Iowa.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It’s sort of like, ‘Yeah, I’ll take a snow shovel,’ ” said Marisue Hartung, one of Peters’s fellow Clinton volunteers in Ames. “But why?”

The story of the snow shovels starts way back in the fall of 2007. At that time, Clinton — a second-term senator from New York — was crushing Barack Obama in national polls,up 20 points. In Iowa, she was up by a handful.

But already, Clinton staffers were discovering a problem here:

Their voters.

There were large numbers of elderly people. Shift workers. Single mothers. All people who might be too tired, or too busy, to come out and vote the way Iowans vote: with their feet, in a gym, in a long caucus night of speechifying and waiting around.

“We left, and we all wanted to go drink. It was like, ‘I don’t know what a caucus is,’ ” said one Clinton staffer from the 2008 campaign. “We realized that, like, we were going to lose because we weren’t going to be able to get out all of these Hillary supporters” to stay as long as it took to be counted.

So Clinton needed more people. New people. She was pouring resources into Iowa. But so was Obama, and his soaring message of hope and change was spreading among the kind of people who really would come to a caucus and stay.

To Clinton, by contrast, politics was not about soaring. It was about grinding — a constant, incremental struggle — and she was the candidate who could succeed at it. That might have been true. But it was hardly the stuff of joy.

“We all want change,” she would say. “Some people believe you bring it about by hoping for it. I believe you bring about change by working really, really hard for it.”

The other problem was Clinton’s distance — both emotional and real. Even when she was in Iowa, it felt as if she wasn’t.

Obama “would get on a bus, and he would go from town to town to town, and people would ride on the bus with him. People would get to know him,” said Chris Gowen, who was part of Clinton’s advance team. “Whereas we would fly into Des Moines . . . then dart back to the airport, and fly to northern Iowa, then dart back to the airport.”

“We were spending all this money,” he said. “And you’d never really connect with people.”

As the Jan. 3 caucuses approached, Iowa seemed to be slipping away from Clinton. But her campaign still had money coming in — on some days, more than $1 million.

And money is for spending. With Iowa still theoretically in play, there would be no prizes for saving it.

“The reality is, the closer you get to an election day, the harder it is to spend money in a smart way,” said Karen Hicks, a senior adviser to Clinton’s 2008 campaign. It was getting too late to buy ad time on television, or print up new fliers, or train new staff, before the caucuses. “It gets harder to spend in a way that you can tie to an incremental vote or caucus victory.”

At a time like that, Hicks said, “you probably should stop spending.”

The campaign didn’t.

It spent big on the “Hill-a-copter,” a Bell 222 with leather seats that the campaign chartered, trying to hit 16 Iowa counties in five days. News reports put the cost at thousands per day.

Even when it worked, this was not a perfect idea. Clinton — seeking to project a common touch — would meet voters by descending from the sky.

An even more last-minute purchase was the $95,384 order of deli sandwiches from the Hy-Vee grocery chain. The Iowa tradition was to bring munchies, not meals. But the Clinton people were worried about their young mothers and shift workers. Would they skip the caucuses if it meant waiting hours to eat?

And then: the shovels.

“I remember when they were ordered. There was an actual conversation about is there anything else, you know. ‘We are sure that we can’t purchase any more phone time?’ ‘Are we sure that we can’t purchase any more flights of mail?’ ” said the former Clinton campaign staffer, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to preserve relations with the current campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The shovels were bought, and they were distributed to offices and precinct captains by campaign staff. It's not clear, from campaign-finance records, what they cost — but it seems certain to have been at least $10,000.

In hindsight, there is debate about why snow shovels appeared to be a better choice than nothing.

Some people saw them as a metaphor: a physical reminder that Clinton's volunteers were needed to get their people out, come hell or high water — or snow.

"I think the same thing could have been accomplished by giving out a key chain with a snow shovel on it that costs 30 cents," said the former Clinton staffer.

Hicks said this was a preemptive maneuver, grabbing a valuable resource before the enemy did. And if voters didn't stay home, there was another worry: caucus sites. Snowy walks. Voters might not make it to the door.

Maybe. But, again, if you live in Iowa, you probably have a shovel.

Neither Obama nor Sen. John Edwards (N.C.), the other two top contenders, seem to have bought snow shovels. Did they laugh when Clinton did? "I'm not going to answer that on the record," said Jen O'Malley Dillon, Edwards's Iowa state director.

To the Iowans who got them, they did not make much sense. Either as a metaphor or as a shovel.

"All down the hallway in the office are these brand-new snow shovels," said Justin Sharp, then a University of Iowa student volunteer. He asked. Somebody explained. Sharp thought it was the same kind of thinking that had led Clinton's campaign to tell him to knock on doors in Iowa City on Saturdays, during Iowa Hawkeyes football games.

"If they're going to go to the caucus, they're going to go," Sharp remembered thinking. "And if they're not, they're not going to go — even if you shovel them."

In West Des Moines, Clinton volunteer Tom Laughead, who admired the candidate for her work on health-care reform, actually tried to put his gift to use. A few days before the caucuses, he cleared old snow off a walkway at one woman's house.

Just to show that he, and Clinton, were serious.

"She said, 'Oh, well, thank you very much,' and then she just kind of like, uhhh," Laughead said, miming a woman trying to avoid eye contact with a Clinton volunteer.

"I just hope to see you there," Laughead remembered saying.

And?

"I don't remember seeing her there."

When caucus night came at last, Clinton's volunteers saw what Clinton's staff had feared. Their well-funded campaign — so flush it could give shovels to people who had shovels — was going to lose.

"It was like, 'This half of the room is where the Obama delegates are going to be, and everybody else go in this half of the room,' " said Sharp, the University of Iowa volunteer. In his college town, Clinton's supporters were in the "everybody else" part, lumped in with the other losers. "They never told us that this could happen. We were just expecting that the support was going to be there."

The sandwiches didn't seem to help much. "The Obama people, and the Edwards people, I think they ate as many as the few Hillary people did," Sharp said.

And the shovels didn't help much, either. On caucus day, it did not snow anywhere in Iowa.

"The Obama people had these shirts. And everyone loved these T-shirts, and people were running around like madmen to get these shirts," said Gowen, the advance man. In the caucus environment, where people can watch each other vote, the red T-shirts signaled to undecided voters that Obama's strength was strong and catching. "Had we gone with T-shirts over shovels," Gowen said, "we might have had a different president right now."

Okay maybe that's a little strong.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Had we gone with T-shirts, I think we would at least have come in second,” Gowen said.

Instead, Clinton came in third, behind Edwards.

Now, Clinton is back in Iowa. Some supporters here say she doesn’t need to change her logical, résumé-based appeal. The problem in 2008 was Obama and the wellspring of frustration with the Bush administration that he tapped.

Both are out of the picture now.

“It’s sort of an urban myth that the Clinton campaign didn’t do well in Iowa in 2008. The truth is that she got more votes than anybody in the history of the Iowa caucuses,” said Jerry Crawford, her Midwestern co-chair in 2008 and still a close adviser. “It just wasn’t as much as the other two.”

But many in Iowa, and on Clinton’s campaign staff, say they are determined to do some things differently.

For her first Iowa event, in April, she arrived in her “Scooby” van, not in a Hill-a-copter. And she has held a series of small events — house parties and roundtables — to emphasize her desire to start small and listen first.

“Hillary made it very clear to us that she wanted to have a conversation with Iowans and hear their thoughts, concerns and ideas for the future,” Matt Paul, Clinton’s Iowa state director, said in an e-mail interview. “The caucus is about relationships, and to build those, you’ve got to listen — and that’s exactly what she’s been doing.”

But elements of the old approach remain.

For one thing, Clinton’s small events have still been stiffly staged, with attendees often pre-screened by staff or by the Secret Service. “We passed the deadline for a security clearance, so we didn’t get to go,” said Nancy Sweetman, a green-shovel owner who saw too late an invitation to a “house party” with Clinton in Mason City. “But you know, living in Iowa, we’ll see her again.”
Chuck and Nancy Sweetman of Mason City were staunch supporters of Clinton’s 2008 campaign. They have two souvenir snow shovels. (Jabin Botsford/The Washington Post)
Clinton still focuses on her résumé and work ethic, casting herself as “a champion” for the middle class. That means her appeal can still be tied to the idea that politics is a grind.

“She’s got the strength to take the criticism right now from the press on avoiding questions from the press,” said Dean Genth, a Clinton supporter who hosted the Mason City house party.

“She’s going to have to connect at a very different level if she wants to be president,” said Janelle Rettig, a Clinton precinct captain in 2008 who is now a county supervisor in Johnson County. “It’s very hard for me to go against a woman who’s smart, who’s qualified and who’s experienced. But I also need somebody who I’m passionate about. And that’s not there, yet.”

A few weeks ago, one of Clinton’s new campaign staffers came to Ames to ask advice from three locals who had seen the last campaign up close. All three owned green snow shovels. Whatever else happened, they wanted Clinton to know that they didn’t need more.

“The snow shovels aren’t necessary,” Hartung said. Iowans come to caucus, whether it snows or not. “We were going to get there anyway.”

Hartung recalled the staffer’s response: “She sort of said, ‘You know, I’ve heard other comments about this. . . . ’ ”

Hillary Clinton talks education, health care at New Haven fundraiser // New Haven Register // Mary O’Leary – June 6, 2015

Hillary Clinton was late for her fundraiser in New Haven, stuck with all those other Connecticut drivers who regularly curse the congestion on Interstate 95 through Fairfield County.

It was her second fundraiser of the day, having first picked up contributions at the Greenwich home of philanthropist Malcolm Weiner and his wife, Carolyn Weiner.

The ask at both the Greenwich event and the one in New Haven at the home of Yale Law School professors Judith Resnik and Dennis Curtis was the same: $2,700 per person.

To be a co-host to the invitation-only event and receive membership in her Hillstarters Program, individual supporters were given the task of raising $27,000, according to the Greenwich Times. Host of these private fundraisers are asked to raise $50,000, which then puts them in the Clinton’s Hillraisers Program.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton is among three Democrats who have announced their intention to run for president in 2016, a campaign that has already attracted nearly a dozen Republicans for their primary fight.

One of those rivals, U.S. Sen. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., was in Stamford Thursday night, the honored guest at the GOP's Prescott Bush Awards Dinner. He picked up some $50,000 at a fundraiser prior to the dinner, according to the Greenwich Times.

U.S. Sen. Richard Blumenthal, D-Conn, U.S. Rep. Jim Himes, D-4, and U.S. Sen. Chris Murphy, D-Conn., were among the estimated 100 people at the Greenwich event, as was former Connecticut Secretary of the State Susan Bysiewicz.

Blumenthal, who attended the Yale Law School at the same time as Clinton and former President Bill Clinton, was at both events.

Bysiewicz, who said she was helping Clinton with grassroots organizing and fundraising, did the same thing. She also brought her 93-year-old aunt, Mary Stewart, a World War II Coast Guard vet. "She was hoping to meet her," Bysiewicz said.

Many in attendance from New Haven were associated with the Yale Law School, with former Dean Harold Koh acting as one of the organizers.

Koh served as the legal adviser to the State Department during President Barack Obama's first term, when Hillary Clinton was secretary of the state.

The head count in New Haven was also around 100, according to Charles Pillsbury, a neighbor of the hosts, who attended with his wife, the Rev. Allie Perry.

Connecticut Democratic Party Chairman Nick Balletto showed up on time for the New Haven event in the East Rock neighborhood, where the guests started arriving just before 4:30 p.m. Mayor Toni Harp was also a guest.

"I think her values and the things she stood for over a lifetime and in public life are things that would be good for our country," Harp said.

Everyone was first checked off on an invitation list and then had to pass through security set up on the front lawn at the home on St. Ronan Street.

The guests mingled inside and on a rear porch as they waited for Clinton, who arrived around 6:15 p.m. by a back entrance, avoiding the small press contingent assembled across the street.

Gov. Dannel P. Malloy and the state party are expected to endorse Clinton for president this weekend in Hartford.

Pillsbury said he feels Clinton "is our best hope."

He said she spoke about the importance of early childhood education and said the tension between the public schools and the charter schools is a false dichotomy.

The former secretary of the state said the public and charter schools should be working together. She offered the example of schools in Houston, where the successful elements of the charters have been incorporated into the public school system, Pillsbury said.

He said Clinton, who first conducted a listening tour before declaring her candidacy, told the donors that she learned two things on that tour, that she might not have stressed beforehand.

The candidate said families told her how drug addiction was ruining the lives of their children, with heroin the problem in New Hampshire and meth the scourge in Iowa.

The other issue was the lack of mental health practitioners. While there is more coverage under the Affordable Care Act, there are not enough professionals to serve the population, she told them.

Clinton, according to Pillsbury, talked of supporting a constitutional amendment to overturn the Citizens United court ruling. The court found that corporations and unions can pay for political ads made independently of candidate campaigns. That finding and others have opened up a flood of campaign spending, where often the names of donors are hidden.

Rubio on Thursday took a shot at the fundraising efforts of the Clintons, according to press reports.

"I don't have a family foundation that raised over $2 billion from Wall Street and foreign nations," Rubio said at the dinner.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On environmental issues, Clinton said in the move away from coal, something will have to be done to replace those jobs now performed by miners.

Pillsbury said the candidate recalled her trip to Indonesia when she was secretary of state and a talk show host had asked how she could work for Obama who had said such harsh things about her in the campaign.

She said she did it because she loved her country. Clinton said she realized that often people's loyalties are to regions or tribes. The concept of patriotism expressed in the United States was foreign to them, Pillsbury recalled.

After having sat in traffic in Connecticut, Clinton, as she left the St. Ronan Street home, was shouted a question as to whether she would advocate for funds for the state to fix its commuter nightmare.

"Absolutely. I believe in infrastructure," she said before getting back into the black Explorer with Secret Service agents.

America may not understand the Clintons — but Wall Street does // Business Insider // Linette Lopez – June 6, 2015

Here are some things the Clintons do that most of America doesn't understand:

Using a separate email server at the State Department.
Borrowing your friend's private plane.
Owning shell companies.
Answering questions about your family foundation.
You know who does understand all that?

Wall Street does.

That's why the recent so-called scandals Hillary Clinton is facing in her presidential campaign won't necessarily impact the money she collects from The Street.

"The Clintons are not dirty," one young portfolio manager told Business Insider this week.

"They make appearances, get money, put it in the fund, build schools. It's not going into their personal bank accounts. It's the way the world works; I find nothing wrong with it."

Lots of people on Wall Street are familiar with the hoops they and their companies must jump through to give to the Clinton Foundation. All donations must meet AML and AB+C requirements.

(That's anti-money laundering and anti-bribery and corruption for all us civilians.)

For people who are used to giving to charitable organizations, this whole rigmarole is rather familiar.

Big donors on Wall Street are also people who may have borrowed a friend's private plane at one point — or known someone who knows someone who has.

One thing that Clinton could do to upset Wall Street — that in fact any candidate can do to upset the industry — is talk about its money (or its taxes, or its lawsuits). That's a no-no.

Clinton has touched on the no-no.

"There's something wrong when hedge fund managers pay lower tax rates than nurses or the truckers that I saw on I-80 as I was driving here over the last two days," Hillary Clinton said while on the road in America's heartland last month. "Something is wrong when CEOs earn more than 300 times than what the typical American worker earns and when hedge fund managers pay a lower tax rate than truck drivers or nurses," she added.

And that was more than enough. Masters of the Universe, you see, are very sensitive.

Lee Cooperman, a billionaire hedge fund manager and Goldman Sachs vet went off on these in an interview with CNN this week.

"I don't need anybody crapping all over what I do for a living," Cooperman, 72, told CNN Money's Cristina Alesci.

He added that Clinton "hangs out with these people in Martha's Vineyard and in the Hamptons, and the very first thing she does is criticize hedge funds."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cooperman felt that Clinton's comments were "bogus."

"This notion of crapping all over hedge funds is so bogus it makes me nauseous. The only thing that makes me more nauseous is those hedge funds that support her," he said.

If you think that this may be a bit of an over-the-top reaction from people who have drivers, hire private security, and live in gated communities, that's your opinion. Obama went through this. Every politician goes through this. After Occupy Wall Street it only got worse, and it's not going to change.

All of this is means that Clinton's campaign probably won't go all in on populism by any means.

However, given that America is really focused on economic inequality right now, it also means you probably won't see Clinton throwing any big parties at Goldman Sachs (where employees are actually pretty split down the middle in terms of party affiliation).

When she courts Wall Street it will be done quietly. At private dinners sponsored by bundlers who will assure the oh-so-sensitive Masters of the Universe in attendance that her populism is just popular, and that at the end of day Clinton understands their way of life.

That's all they really want anyway — to be understood.

Malloy m akes it official: His choice is Hillary // CT Mirror // Mark Pazniokas - June 7, 2015

Malloy embracing Bill Clinton at a rally in 2014. He is returning the favor, endorsing Hillary Clinton for president.

It's not a recent decision, nor is it a surprise. But the time has come to go public: With the legislative session over, Gov. Dannel P. Malloy is endorsing Hillary Clinton for president Sunday.

"I've been an admirer of hers for many years, going back to when she was first lady. I want to see her get elected president. I also think she is the best candidate the Democrats could run. I think she is one of the most experienced candidates that any party has run," Malloy said.

Clinton was elected U.S. senator from New York in 2000 as her husband's presidency was winding down. After losing the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008, she joined the administration of Barack Obama as secretary of state.

"I've known the Clintons for a long time. I think she is the best prepared candidate, and I'm really excited about helping her get elected president," Malloy said.

Malloy's national profile will grow next year as becomes chairman of the Democratic Governors Association, a role likely to win him a slot as a speaker at the Democratic National Convention.

One of his friends and DGA predecessors, former Gov. Martin O'Malley of Maryland, announced his candidacy last week, but Clinton already has wrapped up key endorsements, even in O'Malley's home state. O'Malley should not be surprised by Sunday's news, Malloy said.

"The governor and I had discussion about this in the past, where I had made it clear if Hillary was a candidate I would support her," Malloy said. "And I have had the opportunity more recently to indicate I would be supporting Hillary. But I don't think there was an expectation I would be supporting him over Hillary."

Malloy was to announce his endorsement at an event promoting the kickoff of the Democratic Party's municipal election season.

"I think it's an opportunity to talk about two races at once, the municipal races which are coming in November, followed by the first primaries and caucuses that will play out," he said. "They automatically overlap, so why not admit that and do the two things together?"

He also talked about the endorsement in a taped segment to air Sunday morning on WFSB, Channel 3's "Face the State."

In 2008, when Malloy was mayor of Stamford, Barack Obama defeated Hillary Clinton in the Connecticut primary. Malloy's two successful runs for governor in 2010 and 2014 benefitted from get-out-the-vote rallies headlined by Obama and Bill Clinton.

Bill Clinton is the Democrat who ended the GOP's run of carrying Connecticut in six consecutive presidential years. Beginning with his win in 1992, Connecticut has gone blue in six straight presidential elections.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GOP Has Reason To Fret As Clinton Leads Bush 47-40 In North Carolina // Politicus // Keith Brekhusmore – June 6, 2015

A Public Policy Polling (PPP) survey released on June 4th, found Democrat Hillary Clinton enjoying a modest 47-40 lead over Republican presidential hopeful Jeb Bush in North Carolina. The Tarheel State is a crucial battleground state that Republicans cannot afford to lose. Barack Obama won North Carolina in 2008, but lost the state to Mitt Romney in 2012.

The poll also found Clinton leading or tied with eight other GOP candidates. Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker and Kentucky Senator Rand Paul fared best of the Republican candidates. Walker managed a 45-45 tie with Clinton, and Rand Paul tied her 44-44. Ben Carson, Chris Christie, Ted Cruz, Carly Fiorina, Mike Huckabee and Marco Rubio all trailed Clinton by margins ranging from one to seven percentage points.

Clinton polled especially strong with women voters and African-Americans in North Carolina. Although Jeb Bush held a slight 45-41 advantage with male voters, Clinton held a dominant 51-37 lead with women voters. Clinton also had a crushing advantage with black voters. The poll found Clinton garnering 86 percent support from African-American voters compared to a pitiful 3 percent who backed Jeb Bush.

While the election is still 16 months away, Hillary Clinton's strong numbers in North Carolina bode well for Democratic prospects in 2016. By amassing overwhelming support from black voters and a decisive edge with women voters, Hillary Clinton is well positioned to lock down North Carolina's 15 electoral votes.

The poll also points to Jeb Bush's weakness if he becomes the Republican nominee. His 7-point deficit to Clinton in North Carolina matched fringe candidate Ted Cruz's poor numbers in the state. Rather than being one of the strongest GOP candidates, Jeb Bush appears to be one of the weakest candidates in the Republican field.

Republicans have reason to fret about the poll numbers in the Tarheel State, because without carrying North Carolina the GOP has no path to victory in the 2016 presidential election. If the current polling numbers continue to hold in North Carolina, Hillary Clinton would not only carry the Tarheel State but the nation as well, becoming the 45th U.S. President.

Experts Fear Messy Consequences if Hillary Clinton's Automatic Voter Plan Is Enacted // The Blade // Fred Lucas – June 6, 2015

Hillary Clinton's call for national automatic voter registration, if enacted, could create messy consequences for ballot integrity, according to some election law experts.

"Automatic registration, I'm afraid, would result in increasing the number of ineligible registrations as well as duplicate registrations," Hans Von Spakovsky, a former member of the Federal Elections Commission and now a senior legal fellow at the Heritage Foundation, told TheBlaze.

"Many people are on government databases in more than one state," he said. "We already have a problem in the current system with people being registered to vote in more than one state."

During a speech Thursday in Houston, Clinton called for "universal automatic voter registration" and declared that "every citizen in every state in the union should be automatically registered to vote when they turn 18 – unless they choose to opt out."

In May, Oregon became the only state to enact automatic voter registration, placing every adult with a driver's license on a list to get a ballot in the mail several weeks before Election Day. The new law is expected to add another 300,000 registered voters, The Atlantic reported. Oregon was the first state to move to all mail-in balloting in 1998.

"In light of legislative efforts around the country to make voting more difficult, we are pleased that Oregon's leadership to ensure voting access for all eligible voters is receiving national attention as a model for other states and the nation," Oregon Secretary of State Jeanne P. Atkins told TheBlaze in a statement.

During her speech, Clinton criticized voter ID laws and claimed concerns about voter fraud was "fear mongering."

But such a law could pose challenges for frontline election workers.

"How would it be automatic? Just show up to vote with a driver's license or proof you are 18?" Susan Gill, a board of directors member of the National Association of Election Officials, asked.

The NAEO represents state and local election officials involved in voter registration and election supervision. "What's the mechanism to make it workable?" she also wondered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Gill, also the supervisor of elections of Citrus County, Florida, asked how Oregon will handle eligible voters without driver's licenses. Contrary to making voting more difficult, Gill contended that basic voter integrity laws ensure that votes count.

"The right to vote is so sacred we need reasonable safeguards against fraud. Verification and ID are important parts of keeping the vote safe," Gill told TheBlaze. "But it is not like the 1960s or earlier. Because of computers we are now far less likely to have large-scale voter fraud. We are most likely to see it today in absentee voting."

Clinton's proposal is also similar to a measure enacted in Canada, which adopted an automatic voter registration law in 1997 — but without the desired effect.

A higher percentage of Canadians vote than Americans, but the nation to the north has still seen a steady decline in voter participation since the 1970s that continued after the 1997 law, Von Spakovsky said.

He along with journalist John Fund coauthored the 2012 book, "Who's Counting? How Fraudsters and Bureaucrats Put Your Vote at Risk."

"Low turnout has nothing to do with voter registration rules. It is easy to register to vote," Von Spakovsky noted. "Canada went to automatic voting in 1997 and it hasn't done a thing to increase turnout."

Hillary has Roosevelt Island officials in the palm of her hand // NY Post // Bill Sanderson – June 7, 2015

Whatever Hillary wants, Hillary gets from the poobahs who oversee Roosevelt Island's memorial to Franklin Roosevelt.

Hillary Clinton will officially launch her campaign next Saturday with a big event at the state-owned Franklin D. Roosevelt Four Freedoms Park, on the southern tip of Roosevelt Island.

The rally displaced an "Imagination Playground" event for kids, which had to be rescheduled for October.

The park is overseen by a conservancy with a board of directors packed with prominent Democrats.

The conservancy's president, Sally Minard, is a longtime Clinton fan and fund-raiser. She was a "coordinator" on Clinton's 2000 Senate campaign and gave $6,900 to her 2008 presidential campaign, federal records show.

Minard was also a big "bundler" of donations to President Obama's presidential campaigns, gathering a total of $511,098 from various donors, the campaign-finance monitoring Web site OpenSecrets.org reports.

So far, public records don't show any donations by Minard to Clinton's 2016 campaign. The Upper East Side resident took no salary from the conservancy in 2013, records show.

The conservancy board's chairwoman, Barbara Shattuck Kohn, is also a longtime Clinton supporter. She also contributed $6,900 to Clinton's 2008 campaign, records show.

Other Democrats on the conservancy's board include former City Council member Jessica Lappin, former Ambassador William vanden Heuvel and his daughter, Katherine vanden Heuvel, editor of The Nation, a liberal magazine.
Conservancy officials could not be reached Saturday.

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE

O'MALLEY

O'Malley makes a pitch to younger voters // The Baltimore Sun // John Fritze – June 6, 2015

Martin O'Malley came to this New England college town bearing pizza, and a message he hopes will click with the young voters who could be critical for his long-shot bid for president.

"One thing I've been struck by is a big generational shift underway in our country," O'Malley told about 100 students gathered May 31 in a small library meeting room at Dartmouth College last week. "I've rarely met someone under 40 who denies climate change is real. I rarely meet anyone under 40 who wants to scapegoat immigrants."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The line brought murmurs of agreement from the crowd of young Democrats.

As the former two-term Maryland governor sets out on an ambitious campaign for president, he is courting the type of young voters who fueled Barack Obama's victories in 2008 and 2012. He relies on words like "this generation" and "new leadership" to make a not-so-subtle point about his opponents, who are not only older but have spent more time in Washington.

But the 52-year-old guitar-slinging politician faces stiff competition for the under-30 set. Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont are also working to lock down the potentially powerful constituency.

Whoever inspires them will have an important advantage in the Democratic primaries next year, and the general election in November. In 2014 there were 46 million eligible voters under 30, compared with 39 million seniors, according to the Center for Information & Research on Civic Learning and Engagement at Tufts University.

One display of their ability to influence an election: If Republican Mitt Romney had managed to just split the youth vote with Obama in 2012, he would have won Florida, Virginia, Pennsylvania and Ohio — and the presidency.

Obama carried at least 60 percent of the young voters in each of those states.

So it was little surprise that O'Malley planted himself in the Dartmouth library a day after announcing his campaign on Federal Hill in Baltimore. He spoke about college affordability, climate change and the job market that some of the students listening are anxiously preparing to enter.

"I'm for moving us to a point as a country where we have debt-free college," O'Malley told the group. "You can finance a home at less than you can finance your college education. And sadly, if you can't finance your college education you're never going to be able to buy a home."

Plenty of O'Malley's lines drew applause, and several students said they would follow his campaign more closely.

Connie Lee, an 18-year-old freshman from Houston, said she was "vaguely" aware of O'Malley before the event.

"It's interesting that he's taking the direction of appealing to the younger audience in contrast with Hillary Clinton," she said. "He addressed a lot of the social issues this younger generation cares about. I think it was effective that he highlighted that."

Charlotte Blatt, also 18 and a freshman, is vice president of the Dartmouth College Democrats.

"As a college student, it's important to hear politicians speaking about the issue of college loans and student debt," she said. "It's really crippling."

Because students arrive on campus from across the country, many do not necessarily vote in the state where they study. But young voters are often an important part of a campaign's volunteer base.

Turnout among young voters can be fickle, and it is frequently lower than other age groups' rates.

O'Malley launched his long-expected bid for the Democratic nomination in Baltimore on May 30. Polls show him in the single digits in Iowa, New Hampshire and nationally — but he has managed to capture headlines when he takes on Clinton. Most recently, that criticism has manifested itself as an attack on Wall Street, and its ties to the Clinton campaign.

But as far back as last summer O'Malley was using words like "fundamentally newer" and "new way of leadership" to describe his approach.

On the campaign trail, those phrases have become sharper, and they have taken on added meaning in the context of a race that includes Clinton, a former first lady, senator and secretary of state who has spent decades in Washington.

O'Malley has never directly made an issue of Clinton's age — at 67, she is 15 years his senior — and he has demurred when asked about it directly. Yet he has sought to project an image of youth by appearing more often with his Celtic rock band and by talking about the data-focused management he employed as Baltimore's mayor and Maryland's governor.

Clinton, by contrast, often touts her status as a new grandmother — as in Houston last week, when she welcomed Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee to "the grandmothers' club."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"As a member of now a little over eight months," she said, "it is the best club you will ever be a member of."

But Clinton also used the words "young people" three times.

"Now what possible reason could there be to end preregistration for 16- and 17-year-olds and eliminate voter outreach in high schools?" Clinton asked. "We should be doing everything we can to get our young people more engaged in democracy, not less."

Sanders is 73.

O'Malley has "got to say something," said Charlie Cook, editor and publisher of the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. "But right now it doesn't matter what Martin O'Malley is saying. The ball's in Hillary Clinton's court. She's either resonating or she's not."

Early polling indicates that she is.

Clinton is viewed favorably by more 18- to 34-year-olds than she is by the electorate as a whole. Among that group, 55 percent have a favorable impression of her, according to a CNN/ORC poll released Tuesday. Among those over 50, 42 percent have a favorable impression of Clinton.

That's a remarkable shift from the results of the 2008 Democratic primaries. Obama received 57 percent of young voters in the first 16 primaries that year, compared to Clinton's 41 percent, according to exit polls analyzed by the Pew Research Center.

He won the youth vote in every one of the early primary states except California, Arkansas and Massachusetts.

A CNN/ORC poll from last month showed that just more than half of Americans believe Clinton "represents the future." For O'Malley, a 42 percent plurality said he "represents the past."

A quarter of respondents in the poll had no opinion of the former governor.

But there may be a sliver of good news for O'Malley in the polling from Maryland, where he is known best. Though his approval slipped during the 2014 gubernatorial election, he does slightly better among young voters in the state — though the difference is within the margin of error.

A Goucher Poll from October found than 18- to 34-year-olds in Maryland had a slightly better impression of O'Malley than older age groups did.

"I think he will try to use his youthfulness as a way to attract those voters," said Mileah Kromer, director of the Sarah T. Hughes Field Politics Center at Goucher. "While in Maryland we have seen this shtick before and it's old news to us, it's not old news to the rest of the United States."

Alex Doser, president of the Iowa State University College Democrats, heard O'Malley speak in April. If O'Malley becomes better known, Doser said, his message could appeal to young voters.

"I see a lot in O'Malley's rhetoric that can connect to young people but he hasn't really gotten his name out there yet," he said. "He hasn't made the kind of dent on the Internet that Sanders has and he's not featured in the media like Clinton has been.

"People are losing faith in the idea that their voice makes a difference in Washington. So there's a lot of room to bring in young voters if you can convince them that you are sincerely fighting for them."

In other words, O'Malley's broader challenge — and perhaps also his opportunity — lies in raising awareness of his campaign.

A few minutes after he left the Dartmouth event, two young men wearing baseball caps walked by the room where he had spoken. One asked why all of the desks had been pushed aside.

"Martin O'Malley was here," the one student said.

His friend's response: "Who?"

SANDERS

Exclusive–Iowa Gop Chairman Reacts To Bernie Sanders' And Martin O'Malley's Reception In Iowa: 'Socialism Is So Odd To Us' // Breitbart News – June 6, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The self proclaimed socialist, "Sanders attracted overflow crowds in Ames and Davenport, then Sanders capped his three-day trip with a Saturday night stop in Kensett, where more than 300 people greeted him," Radio Iowa's O. Kay Henderson wrote earlier last week.

"To a certain degree, I think socialism is so odd to us – I think there would be people that want to hear how in the world an American could promote socialism," Iowa GOP Chairman Jeff Kauffman told Breitbart News – adding that he is interested in how Sanders will put his campaign message all together.

Breitbart News questioned if Iowans were interested in both Sanders and O'Malley because they aren't Clinton – as Clinton's honesty and trustworthiness has been crumbling among independent voters, a recent poll suggests.

"The Democrats I know certainly are – I don't know if a socialist is going to provide that – but you know, if you look at Hillary's voting record she's a socialist in the making – and wait until she gets in the Obama White House and picks up whatever he leaves, in terms of his policies," Kauffman added.

Breitbart News noted how Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker is the favorite in Iowa in many recent polls but that former Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee and Sen. Rand Paul (R-KY) were the only two candidates in a recent poll that Iowans selected in an individual match up with Clinton.

"These polls are going to be so fluid ... I listen to the polls obviously – you know, I'm not going to get real serious about the polls at least for the top ten until – I'll tell you it's going to almost have to be October before I start listening," he said.

Kauffman said it's hard to believe anything in a June or July poll can be of any predictive value of what is going to happen in February.

Bernie Sanders isn't a "crackpot" — and the progressive agenda isn't "left-wing" // Salon // Bill Moyers And Michael Winship – June 6, 2015

Congressman John K. Delaney, what the hell are you talking about?

In a recent Washington Post op-ed piece, headlined, "The last thing America needs? A left-wing version of the Tea Party," the Democratic congressman from Maryland scolds progressives and expresses his worry "about where some of the loudest voices in the room could take the Democratic Party."

He writes, "Rejecting a trade agreement with Asia, expanding entitlement programs that crowd out other priorities and a desire to relitigate the financial crisis are becoming dominant positions among Democrats. Although these subjects may make for good partisan talking points, they do not provide the building blocks for a positive and bold agenda to create jobs and improve the lives of Americans."

Rep. Delaney even implies that a freewheeling, open discussion of "these subjects" could lead to the election of a Republican president.

Good grief, John. A trade agreement that favors multinational corporations over working people? Cutting "entitlement programs" such as Social Security, Medicare, Medicaid, worker's compensation? Letting Wall Street off the hook for crashing the economy and costing millions of Americans their jobs and homes? These are Republican policies, bought and paid for by plutocrats. If Democrats simply mimic them, there would be no need to bother with voting for a Republican president; we could cancel the election and put the billions saved in campaign contributions straight into the Clinton Foundation.

The progressive agenda isn't "left wing." (Can anyone using the term even define what "left wing" means anymore?) The progressive agenda is America's story — from ending slavery to ending segregation to establishing a woman's right to vote to Social Security, the right to organize, and the fight for fair pay and against income inequality. Strip those from our history and you might as well contract America out to the US Chamber of Commerce the National Association of Manufacturers, and Karl Rove, Inc.

At their core, the New Deal, Fair Deal, and Great Society programs were aimed at assuring every child of a decent education, every worker a decent wage, and every senior a decent retirement; if that's extreme, so are the Declaration of Independence and the Preamble to the Constitution.

But such is the level of what passes for discourse inside the Beltway these days. The cushioned political and media elites who eat, drink, and make merry with each other at the annual White House Correspondents & Celebrity Ball are so cozy up there in the stratosphere that they dismiss as the lunatic fringe any voice from below that challenges the status quo.

And by the way, John, the "loudest voices in the room" aren't populists or progressives; they belong to the auctioneers selling our government to the highest bidders.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Can you believe this? Rep. Delaney even thinks that progressives are too engaged "in time-consuming rhetoric attacking banks that has little chance of producing more financial reform and distracts from far more consequential areas of economic risk…" Yet his words come on the heels of another round of billions in fines against the big banks for perpetrating fraud, an ongoing attempt by Republican Senator Richard Shelby and his Wall Street-funded colleagues on the Senate Banking Committee to eviscerate the reforms of Dodd-Frank, and an updated report from the University of Notre Dame and law firm Labaton Sucharow that says, "Nearly seven years after the global financial crisis rocked investors' confidence in the markets and financial services in general, our survey clearly shows that a culture of integrity has failed to take hold. Numerous individuals continue to believe that engaging in illegal or unethical activity is part and parcel of succeeding in this highly competitive field." (And why not, when the chances of going to prison for your blatant misdeeds are virtually nil?)

But Rep. Delaney seems to think any objection to these behaviors and other misdeeds just jams the works and keeps the grownups from taking care of business. So does former Mitt ("47 percent") Romney advisor and George W. Bush (slash taxes on the One Percent!) speechwriter Peter Wehner, who recently warned in The New York Times that many Democrats "are placing a very risky bet that there are virtually no limits to how far left they can go."

How about far enough left to reach Main Street?

Just take a look at the initial press reaction to Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders' presidential candidacy. As Steve Hendricks observed in the Columbia Journalism Review, "For not going with the flow, and for challenging Hillary Clinton, the big fish many elites have tagged as their own, Sanders's entry into the race was greeted with story after story whose message — stated or understated, depending on the decorum of the messenger — was 'This crank can't win.'"

Hillary Clinton's "corporatism," Hendricks writes, "wed to her social liberalism and her imperial hawkishness appeals to those in the moneyed Second and journalistic Fourth Estates who would embrace Republicanism but for its misogynistic, homophobic, racist, science-denying core." And so Sanders was tarred at the outset as a doomed crackpot candidate, followed then by article after article that fixated not on ideas and policies but on various idiosyncrasies, Sanders' age and hippie past, the ideology of democratic socialism, and for heaven's sake, his flyaway hair.

But if Senator Sanders is a crackpot, so are the majority of Americans. The ideas and policies he espouses have far more public support than the journalist habitués of Capitol Hill and Pennsylvania Avenue would have you believe.

Juan Cole of the blog Informed Comment pulled together some of the figures:

Some 63 percent of Americans agree that the current distribution of wealth is unfair. And in a Gallup poll done earlier this month, a majority, 52 percent, think that government taxation on the rich should be used to reduce the wealth gap… A majority of Americans oppose the Supreme Court Citizens United ruling, one of a number of such rulings that have increased the ability of the super-wealthy to influence politics. A good half of Americans support federally financed political campaigns so as to level the playing field… Some79 percent of Americans believe that education beyond high school is not affordable for everyone. And some 57 percent of people under 30 believe student debt is a problem for youth… According to a very recent Yale/Gallup poll, some 71 percent of Americans believe global warming is occurring, and 57 percent are sure that human activity (emitting greenhouse gases like carbon dioxide) is causing it…

There you have it: Far from being an outsider, Sanders is paddling his way along the mainstream of American public opinion. Look at the crowds that are gathering to hear him speak: More than 3,000 in Minneapolis, Minnesota on Sunday, standing room only in Ames, Davenport and Iowa City, Iowa. Reporters can't help but take notice now. "At campaign stops in early states and elsewhere, the firebrand from Vermont is drawing enthusiastic crowds that are several times larger than those that gather for [fellow presidential aspirant Martin] O'Malley," notes The Washington Post. And The New York Times: "The crowds at Mr. Sanders's Iowa events appeared to be different from the state's famously finicky tire-kickers. Many said they had already made up their mind to support Mr. Sanders. They applauded his calls for higher taxes on the rich to pay for 13 million public works jobs, for decisive action on climate change and for free tuition at public colleges."

Oh, how the mighty tremble when they hear such things! The murmuring crowd is their worst nightmare. So plutocratic Republican apologists like Peter Wehner, the corporate Democrats of Clinton, Inc., and killjoys like Congressman Delaney will double down against Bernie Sanders, just as they have against all those in politics before them who champion bottom-up democracy. If that means turning "left," so be it. For Democrats, it's the way home. They would do well to remember that apocryphal saying, usually attributed to Gandhi: "First they ignore you, then they laugh at you, then they fight you, then you win."

OTHER

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama, Clintons join mourners at Beau Biden's funeral // AP – June 6, 2015

Mourning a loss that touched people on Delaware street corners and far beyond, President Barack Obama on Saturday remembered Beau Biden, the vice president's son, as a public servant who learned through early tragedy what mattered most and resolved to "live a life of meaning."

"He was a scion of an incredible family who brushed away the possibility of privilege for the harder, better reward of earning his own way," Obama said in a deeply personal eulogy. The president described Beau Biden as a son, a father, a soldier and a politician who didn't cut corners in his efforts to serve his country and others.

Obama reflected on the "cruel twist of fate" that killed Beau Biden's mother and infant sister in a car crash four decades ago and left 3-year-old Beau and younger brother Hunter hospitalized.

Out of that tragedy, Obama said, Beau as a "very young boy made a very grown-up decision: He would live a life of meaning. He would live a life for others."

Vice President Joe Biden, who did not speak at his son's funeral, embraced Obama at the funeral's start, after crossed himself solemnly as he entered the church to the strains of "Bring Him Home," from "Les Miserables."

Obama's eulogy reflected the strong bonds that Joe Biden and the president have developed after more than six years together in the White House, with the president declaring his family to be "honorary members" of the extended Biden clan.

Speaking directly to the vice president and his wife, Jill, Obama said, "Michelle and I thank God you are in our lives. Taking this ride with you is one of the great pleasures of our lives. Joe, you are my brother."

The overflow crowd of 1,000 at St. Anthony of Padua Roman Catholic Church included Michelle Obama, Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton, an array of state and national political figures, as well as people from across Delaware and beyond who lined up hours in advance, drawn by their strong bonds to the Biden family.

"Joe Biden is Delaware, and his son is also Delaware to me," said Lisa Rial, 54, who grew up in Delaware but lives in Pennsylvania. "They're synonymous with Delaware." Outside, along the route to the church, residents held up signs reading "Rest in Peace, Beau."

Gen. Ray Odierno, the former top U.S. commander in Iraq, where Beau Biden once served, eulogized him as a dedicated soldier and selfless friend. Odierno suggested that the presidency could even have been within Beau Biden's reach as he spoke of his dedication to "a nation that I believed one day Beau Biden would someday lead."

The vice president's two surviving children, Hunter and Ashley, also spoke, and Coldplay lead singer Chris Martin, a favorite of Beau Biden, sang the meditation at the end of the service, "'Til Kingdom Come"

Joe Biden had just been elected senator in 1972 when his wife and baby daughter were killed in a car crash. He developed a reputation over the years for possessing a deep ability to comfort those in grief.

Often, Biden is called upon to eulogize fellow American leaders. Now, it was Obama's moment to speak words of comfort to the vice president and his family and friends.

The president described Beau Biden as very much his father's son.

"His dad taught him that everybody mattered. He even looked and sounded like Joe a although I think Joe would be the first to acknowledge that Beau was an upgrade a Joe 2.0," Obama said to chuckles from those in the audience. "But as much as Beau reminded folks of Joe, he was very much his own man. He was an original."

Beau Biden served two terms as attorney general before setting his sights on the governor's mansion. Many imagined his career would mirror that of his father, who represented Delaware for decades in the U.S. Senate before becoming vice president.

But in 2010, at age 41, Beau Biden suffered a stroke. He was diagnosed with brain cancer three years later. He returned to work after what doctors said was a successful operation to remove a small lesion, but his illness returned, and he died last Saturday, less than two weeks after being admitted to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center in Bethesda, Maryland.

Can You Be a Latino Politician If You Don't Speak Fluent Spanish? // NBC News // Suzanne Gamboa – June 6, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The prospect that he might be a running mate to Hillary Clinton made Housing and Urban Development Secretary Julián Castro a target over his Spanish speaking skills, something that many Latino politicians are all too familiar with.

In a story published Thursday, Politico paraphrased an unnamed source saying Castro's ethnic background "may not be as effective in appealing to Hispanic voters as some believe."

"Tim Kaine speaks Spanish much better than Julian Castro does," the Clinton ally told Politico. Kaine is a Virginia Democrat who spent a year working in Honduras with Jesuit priests.

Castro is considered by many to be a potential running mate for Clinton, a 2016 presidential candidate.

Castro spokeswoman Betsaida Alcantara said she would not comment on the criticism saying, Castro is "laser-focused on ending homelessness, expanding responsible homeownership, tackling the affordable housing crisis and creating communities of opportunity across the nation, not on 2016."

But what appeared to be a flippant matter to the "Clinton ally" is one that can be agonizing and even embarrassing to some Latinos, something that opens them to questioning about their Latino identity.

Former U.S. Rep. Charles Gonzalez of Texas experienced painful ridicule and embarrassment over his Spanish speaking skills, often at the hands of other Latinos.

"There were people who tested me all the time when I was in office, just to see if I spoke Spanish," said Gonzalez, whose parents and grandparents spoke Spanish and who like Castro is from San Antonio.

"I'm not sure if you are supposed to be shamed into some sort of apology that you don't (speak Spanish) ... It's expected of us and I don't think we should have that expectation. As you move forward in the generations we are no different than those groups that come from this country."

The focus on Castro's Spanish skills and the comparison of them to the speaking ability of a white politician reflect a continuing struggle in the country to understand the diversity of the Latino community and what it takes to reach them politically, a struggle found even within the Democratic party that won the Latino vote by 2-1 margin in the last election.

Gonzalez acknowledged that speaking Spanish is an asset, something to strive for, but said it cannot be something that determines how a person votes. In the end, what matters is the substance of what is being said to the Latino community in English or Spanish, he said.

"Our community should be be more engaged and involved in the substance," Gonzalez said.

Castro was born in the United States and is the son of a U.S.-born mother fluent in English and Spanish.

Like a number of Latinos, his family can trace its presence in the U.S. for several generations. Some Latinos had famiies in the U.S. Southwest when it was still Mexico or family who were native Americans, or both. Castro's maternal grandmother is from Mexico.

Castro is a Stanford University graduate who served as mayor of San Antonio, the nation's seventh largest city with a large, long established Hispanic population. He understands and speaks some Spanish but is not fluent.

"Those kinds of comments from someone who is trying to get Hillary Clinton elected are not helpful, not productive and misinformed," said Larry Gonzalez, a Washington, D.C. lobbyist who is Mexican American, grew up in a bilingual household but expanded his Spanish in school (he is not related to Charlie Gonzalez.)

"While yes, Spanish is helpful with certain audiences in certain parts of the country, it is his story and his family's story and their plan to help the Latino community - their being Hillary as a potential president and him as a potential vice president - that matter," said Gonzalez, who speaks Spanish.

The criticism comes even as some are questioning the ability of Latinos to weave themselves into the fabric of the country and demands are being made for immigrants to be English proficient as a qualification for citizenship.

Republican Marco Rubio, the son of Cuban immigrants, can move easily between Spanish and English; Jeb Bush regularly uses his fluent Spanish.

Sen. Ted Cruz, a Texas Republican of Cuban descent who lived part of his life in Canada, admits his inability to speak Spanish, which also exposed him to questioning about whether he was truly Hispanic.

Castro has had to contend with other references to his heritage. The Washington Post last August apologized after it was swiftly criticized for a "We'll need more fajitas" subhead over a column item about Castro dining with Bill Clinton. And while Castro might not be fully fluent in Spanish, it hasn't stopped others from using Spanish when talking to him. While testifying at a House hearing in February, Castro found himself unable to quickly locate Rep. Steve Pearce of New Mexico, the committee member who was about to ask him questions. As he looked around the dais, Pearce said "Aquí! Right here" to get Castro's attention.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Recent waves of Latino immigrants, combined with the growth of Spanish-language media as well as technology have boosted the language. Progress has been made since recent decades when Jim Crow laws were applied to Spanish speakers, prohibiting them from speaking the language in school and segregating them into Mexican schools.

But as with previous generations of Latinos and other immigrant groups, English takes over as time passes. Pew Research Center recently reported that a record 33.2 million Hispanics speak English proficiently while the share who speak Spanish at home is the lowest it's been in 13 years.

Former San Antonio Mayor Henry Cisneros said he does think it's important for a Latino candidate to speak Spanish. He said it's an act of respect to one's heritage and often instills a degree of pride in Latinos watching someone use their "heritage language."

Cisneros spoke only Spanish at home as young boy until his father, a World War II veteran who was bilingual and born in the U.S., decreed English would be spoken at home so they would not be at a disadvantage in school.

By high school, he said, he had forgotten most of his Spanish and took Latin. He revived his speaking when he was in Washington, D.C. as a graduate student and he taught citizenship classes to Latinos. His ability to speak Spanish grew when he was a city council member and did Spanish-language interviews and later in his role as president of Univision.

"All of us can improve. All of us educated in U.S. schools can work at it," Cisneros said. "It's something to work on and Julián will be just fine in that regard in due course."

Charlie Gonzalez joked that he has a single recommendation for people who are truly bilingual or not. Reaching into the language of Chicanos, he said: "End each sentence with con safos," which can loosely mean the insult can't come back to you.

GOP

BUSH

For Jeb Bush, the challenge remains making it about 'Jeb,' not 'Bush' // WaPo // Ed O'Keefe – June 6, 2015

A banner in the town square says "Happy 90th Barbara Bush." Postcards read "Kennebunkport: 2 presidents, 1 town." A local gift shop is selling unofficial Jeb Bush 2016 magnets.

In this coastal hamlet made famous by George H.W. Bush and his cigarette boat, it is hard to escape the Bush family — but Jeb Bush is trying hard to do so.

After festivities this weekend to celebrate his mother's 90th birthday, Bush will jet overseas for a foreign-policy tour and then launch his 2016 presidential campaign 1,500 miles to the south, in Miami.

The iconic family compound here, called Walker's Point, is a fitting metaphor for what has emerged as Jeb Bush's central political challenge: how far to distance himself from his family's political legacy.

The past month has brought into stark relief the fundamental dilemma posed by Bush's lineage, even as his front-runner status fades. He repeatedly stumbled to answer questions about the now-unpopular Iraq war started by his brother and has been visibly conflicted about whether to embrace or play down the policies and reputations of his closest relatives.

Former Florida governor Jeb Bush's vacation home is seen under construction on Walker's Point in Kennebunkport, Maine, on May 24. (Joel Page/AP)
He conceded last weekend to CBS that distancing himself from his brother George W. Bush "is not something I'm comfortable doing."

But when asked last Tuesday by Fox News whether he'll use his brother on the campaign trail, he said: "Absolutely. I will use my brother, my sister, every relative, every person I can."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On paper, Jeb Bush's record — two terms as governor of a large swing state with a conservative governing record — seems exactly what Republicans would want. But the party faithful are increasingly seeking younger, fresher candidates — they're "Bushed out," as Barbara Bush has told visitors here in recent years.

And so when Jeb Bush's anticipated presidential bid begins June 15, he will seek to set himself apart from his brother and father — an effort that will form one of the abiding themes of the impending campaign, according to aides and close friends.

He will make his announcement at a Miami community college under the moniker of his nickname, leaving the surname behind. There probably won't be "Bush" on the "Jeb 2016" campaign paraphernalia. On stage will be his Mexican-born wife, Columba, and their three grown children. Neither of Bush's parents will attend the announcement, and aides won't say whether any of his siblings will, either.

Later, his two sons — not his father or brother — are expected to play active and visible roles in the campaign.

Al Cardenas, a longtime Bush friend, said that polls have tightened because media attention is too focused on Bush's family history and not on his record as Florida governor. "It's about Bush, not Jeb," he said.

Former president George H.W. Bush, then-President George W. Bush and then-Florida Gov. Jeb Bush walk from the 18th green after playing an early morning round at Cape Arundel Golf Club in Maine on July 7, 2001. (Kevin Lamarque/Reuters)
But once people learn more about his time as governor, Cardenas said, "then it will become more about Jeb, not Bush."

Bush has told voters repeatedly in recent months, "I have to show what's in my heart" regarding his family. But he also said recently that a presidential run "can't be about the past; it can't be about my mom and dad, or my brother, who I love. It has to be about the ideas I believe in to move our country forward."

Here in Kennebunkport, the prospect of another Bush in the White House intrigues local residents, many of whom say they don't know George and Barbara's second-oldest son that well.

Jeb Bush usually visits Maine once a year to see his parents, play early-morning rounds of golf and visit local haunts such as the HB Provisions general store. He has told voters that he rarely takes lengthy vacations and — unlike his brother's Crawford, Tex., ranch — he has no vacation estate at the moment. He and his family usually spend their Christmas vacation on Gasparilla Island in southwest Florida, sometimes joined by his parents.

"I think Jeb's the only one I really don't know," said John Downing, who served as the local York County, Maine, chairman for the George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush presidential campaigns. "I've not seen him around."

"From everything I can gather, he's been nothing but a good governor of the state of Florida, certainly a good father and husband," Downing said about Jeb Bush. "I think those things are very positive about him."

Downing, who is also a real estate agent, said local businesses are pondering how a third Bush presidency might provide another jolt of economic activity.

"We'll take anything that helps the home values go up," he said.

Despite not coming often, Bush appears to feel the pull of the family's coastal headquarters. After this weekend, Bush is expected to return July 9 for a two-day "retreat" with fundraising "co-chairs" who help him secure at least $27,000 in donations, according to people who have received invitations. The hope is to raise as much as $5 million for his campaign by the end of July, said one Bush supporter, who was not authorized to speak publicly about the plans. By then, a new home being built for him at the family compound will probably be ready for guests.

On Thursday at Walker's Point, construction workers could be seen climbing ladders around the new home being built for Jeb's use. A large, yellow truck was seen backing away from the site, while a bulldozer was parked behind it.

The $1.4 million, two-story cottage — in most places it would be called a large house — sits on a 1.3-acre plot just south of several much smaller cottages also used by Bush family members. Aides said that the new home will be occupied by other relatives and guests when Jeb isn't in town.

To the south of the new home is a ranch-style structure housing George H.W. Bush's office. On the southernmost point sits the iconic family home, where the 41st president and former first lady live with unobstructed views of the Atlantic Ocean.

Above it all flies an American flag, with the flags of Maine and Texas billowing beneath. If the Lone Star state's colors are flying, George and Barbara are in town. They're usually here every May to October, family spokesman Jim McGrath said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Elizabeth Spahr, a member of the Kennebunkport Conservation Trust, was at a nearby overlook weeding and pruning a planter next to a memorial built by locals to honor George H.W. Bush.

Spahr said she has met several of the family members and is most fond of Laura Bush. Barbara Bush is seen most mornings walking her dogs on a nearby beach.

Looking over at the compound, she said: "I guess they're building a new home for Jeb. It's awfully big."

When asked about Jeb Bush's presidential ambitions, she turned back to her weeding. "I don't have an opinion on that," she said.

A foreign policy checkmark for Jeb Bush // AP // Thomas Beaumont – June 6, 2015

Jeb Bush heads to Europe next week to put a checkmark in a final box before making his 2016 Republican presidential campaign official: an overseas visit to catch up with a few of America's friends.

All of his hosts, Germany, Poland and Estonia are stalwart U.S. allies, and they're calmer destinations than the cauldron of the Middle East. But the last name Bush still stirs anger in parts of Europe — a legacy of former President George W. Bush's invasion of Iraq.

For this Bush, the trick with his first trip overseas as a White House hopeful is to avoid spending too much time making the same case to European leaders he's had to make at home to American voters — that he's not his brother.

"If he tries to make this trip about see-how-I'm-not-like-George W. Bush, if that's the story line of the trip, it will not have been a success," said Peter Feaver, former head of strategic operations at the National Security Agency and now a professor at Duke University.

The trip comes at a key time for Bush. He will return a day before kicking off his campaign with an event in Miami, fresh from a journey he hopes will show he's ready to step onto the world stage.

"A Republican doing a listening tour of American allies, that makes sense," said William Inboden, who served as senior director for strategic planning with the National Security Council under President George W. Bush. "But you're also wanting to demonstrate the ability to be proficient in personal diplomacy."

Bush's six-day trip begins with a speech in Berlin on Tuesday to the economic council of the Christian Democratic Union, the conservative party led by German Chancellor Angela Merkel. A mix of public and private events there and in Poland and Estonia follow.

The early days of the Republican campaign suggest much of the party's presidential primary debate will focus on foreign policy, given the ongoing unrest in Iraq, civil war in Syria and a preliminary agreement — deeply unpopular among Republicans — between Iran and the U.S. and five allies aimed at curbing Iran's nuclear program.

There's also the prospect that next year the party's nominee will face Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton, who was secretary of state in President Barack Obama's first term.

Bush's early discussions about foreign policy have often drifted into his brother's decision to invade Iraq in 2003, which some critics cite as the cause of regional unrest that helped lead to the rise of the Islamic State.

Jeb Bush's effort to avoid publicly criticizing his brother led him into a twisted series of answers about whether he would have made the same invasion decision, making for his roughest political week since he expressed interest last December in running for the White House.

While he still plans to talk about the threat posed by the Islamic State during his trip, he'll do so in a place where the discussion can be about how the extremist group is one of several shared threats faced by America and its Western allies.

Aides said Bush aims to underscore the early themes of his approach to global affairs during his visit, namely that the U.S. ought to reinforce its relationships with its allies and demonstrate solidarity with the democratic success stories in Eastern Europe.

Expect a lot of talk about Russia and its president, Vladimir Putin.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We need to restore the relationships with Europe and encourage them to be part of their own national defense, as we see Russia engaged in parts of the world they shouldn't be," Bush said in Michigan last week.

It's a message that will resonate most loudly in Poland and Estonia, two nations paying particularly close attention to Putin's actions in Ukraine.

"At a time like this, when we have a rather unpleasant and difficult situation with Russia, Poles are becoming more pro-American than they would have been otherwise," said Marcin Zaborowski, the head of the Polish Institute of International Affairs. "And having a presumed presidential candidate to come and talk to the Poles about security, defense and the relationship with the United States will be more than welcome."

RUBIO

Rubio's real estate dealings often a drag on his finances // AP // Nicholas Riccardi – June 6, 2015

During Marco Rubio's first year in the Florida Legislature in 2000, the 29-year-old lawmaker filled out the required forms detailing his personal finances. On the line listing his net worth, Rubio wrote: "0."

Since then, he has risen to lead the state House as speaker, won election to the U.S. Senate and earned at least $4.5 million at a series of six-figure jobs and by writing a best-selling memoir. Yet his net worth has improved only modestly.

Like many Americans in the days since the recession, Rubio and his family — he has four children — have struggled in the housing market.

Factor in some questionable moves with money and a hefty load of student loans, and it's clear that the Republican presidential candidate's real estate dealings often have been a drag on his finances despite an income most would relish.

"He's like any normal American with four kids that has a mortgage," said Bernie Navarro, a past president of the Miami-based Latin Builders Association, who has advised Rubio on his real estate transactions. "He goes through what any normal family goes through, living with a salary, and he has to make adjustments."

Rubio made two in the past few weeks:

—he sold a home in Tallahassee, Florida, that he owned with a former colleague. That freed Rubio from a monthly payment on an interest-only loan and the cost of upkeep. But he lost money on the deal.

—he consolidated the debt on his primary residence in West Miami, Florida. The original mortgage required only payments of interest on the principal in its first decade. Rubio has only paid off about 4 percent of overall principal since buying the house.

At end of last year, Rubio was worth no more than $355,000, according to an analysis of his personal financial disclosures records filed with the Senate. That does not include any equity he may have in his West Miami home or proceeds expected from his second book, published in December.

Rubio, 44, has written and spoken of being torn between a drive for public service and the need to support his family. At times, he has made decisions that put politics ahead of his personal comfort or financial security.

He and his wife, Jeanette, moved in with his mother-in-law to make ends meet at the start of his career. Late last year, he liquidated a retirement account, saying he might need the cash for everything from a new refrigerator to college for his eldest daughter.

At other points, Rubio's political connections have helped financially.

One of Rubio's biggest political backers, Miami billionaire Norman Braman, hired Rubio as his lawyer after Rubio left the Florida Legislature in 2008, and Braman funded a teaching position at Florida International University that Rubio still holds.

Braman's foundation also pays Rubio's wife to advise it on charitable giving.

Rubio isn't shy about his relative lack of wealth, which is a far cry from the financial standing of his fellow Floridian and rival for the Republican nomination, former Gov. Jeb Bush.

Rubio told conservative activists in Nevada last week that "the latest one I've heard now from some is I'm not rich enough to be president."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In an interview, Rubio said, "The cost of living goes up, and you can just imagine how people who make a quarter of what I do face today."

Rubio's career began in politics, and he rarely has not held office or worked for those who do.

After graduating from the University of Miami's law school in 1996, the then-25-year-old worked as the South Florida coordinator for Bob Dole's presidential campaign. Dole lost soundly to President Bill Clinton, but Rubio impressed Florida GOP powerbrokers; one, Al Cardenas, offered him a job.

Rubio had planned to join a local prosecutor's office after the election, but the job paid less than $30,000. Cardenas was offering $57,000.

Rubio wrote in "An American Son," his 2012 memoir: "I wanted to be a prosecutor. I wanted to gain courtroom experience. I relished the excitement of trying cases and had little interest in the land use and zoning law that Al practiced. But I had student loans to repay. I wanted to get married. And I wanted to help support my family so my father could at last retire."

Despite the financial incentive, the job at Cardenas' firm couldn't hold Rubio's interest. Less than two years later, he was running for office, winning a seat on the West Miami city commission and landing a job at another law firm. Roughly a year after that, he moved up to the Florida House, but his new firm deducted Rubio's $27,000-a-year lawmaker's salary from his paycheck.

In his book, Rubio said he was unsure he could keep his full-time job while spending months at the state Capitol. In 2000, he listed the value of his household furnishings at $5,000 on state records but reported more than $160,000 in student loan debt plus $30,000 in "assorted credit + retail debt."

To save $1,500 a month in rent, Rubio and his wife moved in with her mother. He was climbing the GOP ranks, but, "I imagined telling my children someday that I had been the majority whip of the Florida House but ... had to leave politics to make a living," he wrote in his book.

A headhunter helped Rubio land a new job, this one with a $93,000 salary at a law firm that wouldn't hold his time in Tallahassee against him. It was enough for the Rubios, who had their first child in 2000, to buy a 1,200-square-foot three-bedroom house in the working-class West Miami neighborhood where Rubio grew up.

The Rubios would sell that house near the peak of the Florida real estate bubble for more than twice what they paid for it. The buyer was the mother of a neighbor — a chiropractor who unsuccessfully lobbied Rubio to extend a state insurance provision and was later prosecuted for violating campaign finance laws unrelated to Rubio.

A few years later, in 2003, Rubio secured the votes needed to become state House speaker. Not long after that, he moved up to a new, politically connected law firm and a much bigger salary: $300,000 a year. He was moving homes, too.

In March 2005, Rubio and a fellow state lawmaker, David Rivera, went in together on a house in Tallahassee to live in while in the state capital, making no down payment and taking out a $135,000 mortgage that initially only required interest payments. Meanwhile, the Rubios upgraded to a newly built four-bedroom 2,600-square-foot home with a pool in West Miami.

Real estate records show the Rubios made a 10 percent down payment to buy that $550,000 house. He says he paid cash for upgrades to the home before construction finished.

A little more than a month after the Rubios closed on the house in December 2005, a bank owned by one of his political supporters appraised the house at $735,000 and gave Rubio a $135,000 home equity loan. Rubio has said the add-ons to the house, plus Florida's heated real estate market, justified the appraisal.

It was around this time that other issues in Rubio's finances started to surface.

He shut down two political groups — one run out of his house — that had come under scrutiny for tens of thousands of dollars in poorly explained expenses. In his book, Rubio acknowledged the committees were "an accounting mess."

Rubio also gained access to a state Republican Party charge card in 2005, which he says he inadvertently used at times to pay for personal items.

Records from 2007 and 2008 show Rubio charged about $160,000 to the card, including $1,000 for repairs to the family minivan after it was dented by a valet at a political event, a $134 bill at a hair salon and numerous meals and airline flights.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rubio has said most of the spending was the legitimate expense of building party infrastructure, but he paid $16,000 of the charges personally.

They became a campaign issue when Rubio ran for the U.S. Senate in 2010, but not one that kept him from winning handily.

Once in Washington and making a $174,000 salary as a senator, Rubio still felt the bite of his old real estate transactions.

The bank moved in 2010 to foreclose the house in Tallahassee after Rubio and Rivera fell behind on the payments. Rivera paid $9,200 to bring the house out of foreclosure, and the pair sold the house for $117,000 last week — $18,000 less than the original purchase price.

(Federal prosecutors have said Rivera, who served one term in Congress, is being investigated by a grand jury in a campaign finance case unrelated to Rubio.)

The collapse of the housing market in Florida haunts Rubio, too.

The home next to his in West Miami was foreclosed, which he says is part of the reason why the county has assessed the value of his current house at $400,000 — well below the price Rubio sought when he put it on the market in 2013. The asking price was $675,000, but it didn't sell.

"We wanted to see if we could get the right price," Rubio said. "We had offers, but I'm not going to give it away."

He decided to refinance his initial mortgage and the separate home equity loan. On May 26, Professional Bank in Coral Gables, Florida, wrote Rubio a $604,000 mortgage at 4.5 percent interest, according to records and Rubio's campaign.

Navarro, the Rubio backer who owns a real estate firm and helped him with the refinance, said that lowers Rubio's monthly payment by about $1,000 a month.

"It was a good financial move for him," Navarro said.

Marco Rubio Is Now Channeling JFK — Explicitly // The National Journal // Shane Goldmacher – June 6, 2015

Sen. Marco Rubio has slipped a symbolically significant new passage into his stump speech, linking his candidacy to that of another youthful and charismatic 40-something politician: John F. Kennedy.

From the start, Rubio, 44, has wrapped his campaign in the rhetoric of youth. "Yesterday is over," he said the day of his launch in Miami. Campaigning near Iowa State on Saturday, Rubio railed against "outdated leaders" and declared, "If we keep promoting the same people we'll be left behind by the future."

But it was a new line he began road testing in Iowa that stood out. Rubio presented the 2016 campaign as a generational pivot point, likening his vision for a "New American Century" — the tagline of his campaign — to Kennedy's 1960 challenge to the nation to embrace a "New Frontier."

"This election isn't about what laws we're going to pass. It's about what kind of country we're going to be," Rubio said to a packed Holiday Inn conference room. "And we've made that choice before. Asked six decades ago, this nation and that generation chose to embrace a New Frontier. In fact, they took up the challenge of a then young president who said, 'Ask not what your country can do, ask what you can do for your country.'"

"And here's the hard truth," Rubio continued. "For far too long, leaders in both parties have been campaigning on the promise of what your government can do for you. But my campaign is built on the idea of what together we can do for America. Because America doesn't owe us anything. But every single one of us, especially me, has a debt to this country we will never repay."

The line broke through.

"He's got it like Kennedy got it!" said an unprompted Ed Enright, a 70-year-old Republican who was clutching a copy of Rubio's book and wearing a "Marco Rubio for president" t-shirt.

Asked if he had caught the reference to Kennedy's New Frontier, Enright smiled. "Maybe he's sending us a little message there," he said. "Fresh ideas, fresh youth."

Jack Whitver, Rubio's Iowa campaign chairman, said the Kennedy comparison was apt. "He is a person who can reignite the Republican Party and unite it," Whitver said. "Like JFK, he can inspire the country."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If elected, Rubio would be the youngest president since Kennedy, who took office at 43. Rubio turned 44 a little over a week ago.

But, as he said to laughs on Saturday, "I feel 45."

Marco Rubio is what Republicans hope the future looks like // VOX // Dara Lind – June 6, 2015

Florida Senator Marco Rubio is a presidential candidate Republicans can feel good about. He's young and relatively handsome; he has a compelling biography (his parents emigrated from Cuba to make a better life in America, with his father working as a hotel bartender and his mother working as a cashier and housekeeper) that he's spun into an optimistic stump speech; and he is, by most accounts, an extremely compelling public speaker.

He's also firmly in line with the Republican establishment on the issues — which sets him apart from some of the other candidates running for the 2016 nomination. He's best known for his break with the GOP base to support comprehensive immigration reform in 2013, but he's reversed his position and is vocally opposed to it now (unlike, say, Jeb Bush). He's hawkish on foreign policy and reliably conservative on social issues. And he's pushed some innovative reforms, notably on tax and education policy, but is clearly trying to appease traditional Republican tax-cutters.

In other words, Rubio is a fresh face who doesn't pose much of an ideological challenge to his party. From the standpoint of the Republican establishment, it would be great if the future of their party were fresh and forward-thinking while continuing to advocate its current stands on the issues.

But is 2016 too soon for the future? In Washington, Rubio's still seen as a little young and callow. It doesn't help that he's spent the past two years trying to distance himself from his only major legislative accomplishment, the comprehensive immigration reform bill passed by the Senate in 2013.

Rubio shares a support base with his fellow Floridian and former mentor Jeb Bush — the people who'd be most excited about Rubio in any other year are Bush backers in 2016. And Rubio's appeal to the GOP base beyond Florida is untested. So many political insiders assume he's running for the VP spot on the ticket.

But Rubio's likely to stay in the race for a while. Thanks to his foreign policy hawkishness, he's likely to get support from Republican megadonor Sheldon Adelson — which could be enough to keep him in the race for a certain amount of time. And he's done well in polls since announcing the start of his campaign in April. It's possible that he's been underestimated by observers who've called him "the perfect second choice for GOP voters."

Rubio seeks to rebut skeptics on the experience factor // The Hill // Rebecca Shabad – June 6, 2015

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) on Saturday took aim at those skeptical of his qualifications to lead the White House.

At the inaugural “Roast and Ride” hosted by Sen. Joni Ernst (R-Iowa) in Boone, Iowa, the GOP presidential candidate defended his experience and his ideas.

“I’ve had some people say i’m not old enough or I haven’t been in government long enough, and I heard that, too, when I was speaker of the Florida House, but let me tell you what we did,” Rubio said.

As speaker, Rubio said the Florida legislature balanced the third largest state budget without raising taxes and increased school standards without Common Core.
“I’m 44 years old, but I feel 45. And I’ve been in government long enough to know that what we’re doing now doesn’t work anymore,” he said.

The latest criticism Rubio received, he said, is that he’s “not rich enough.” He then used the statement to jab at Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton and the Clinton foundation.

“It’s true I don’t make $11 million a year giving speeches to special interests. And I don’t have a family foundation that’s raised $2 billion, a lot of it from foreign interests,” he said. “But my wife and I work to ensure that we have enough money to send our kids to have a Christian education at a private school and we have a mortgage we pay every month.”

“We have all of these leaders, especially on the left, that are stuck in the past,” he said.

Rubio’s campaign theme focuses on a “New American Century” because he says the economy and world have changed too much to keep using ideas from the 20th century.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

PAUL

Paul: Laws on sexuality could be more 'neutral,' but all should be protected // WaPo // Katie Zezima – June 6, 2015

Sen. Rand Paul said Saturday that he thinks the issue of sexuality is one that should be left behind closed doors.

"And I think if we did a little more of that then maybe the law doesn't have to engage in stuff that's really personal, and the law could be more neutral, but I think the law ought to be fair to people and ought to provide equal protection for everybody," he said.

Paul was asked about Bruce Jenner coming out as a woman named Caitlyn. Social conservatives in the Republican Party have felt isolated by the nation's acceptance of Jenner, a change they see as immoral. Paul said he hasn't given Jenner's transition much thought but said that sexuality should remain private.

"We've exposed so much of our lives that were at one time private, and if it were private, than maybe the law wouldn't have to take a position on it, you know what I mean?" Paul said in an interview here.

Paul said that if he goes to a cocktail party, "most of us don't talk about our personal sexuality, our sex lives, why does it have to be part of public discourse?"

Rand Paul on Transgender Rights: "Governm ent Shouldn't Ask About Your Personal Life" // David Weigel – June 6, 2015

A news week that started with Caitlyn Jenner's debut in Vanity Fair ended with another transgender rights milestone. On Thursday, the United States Air Force announced that it would no longer discharge recruits with gender dysphoria, and that "identification as transgender, absent a record of poor duty performance, misconduct, or a medically disqualifying condition, is not a basis for involuntary separation."

Republican candidates for president did not exactly sprint for the microphones. The two veterans in the contest, South Carolina Senator Lindsey Graham and former Texas Governor Rick Perry, served in the Air Force Reserve and Air Force, respectively. Neither commented on the new ruling; neither has said much, generally, on the frontiers of LGBT policy.

On Friday, I asked Kentucky Senator Rand Paul if, as president, he'd continue the Obama administration's approach to transgender rights. Since December, the Department of Justice has interpreted Title VII of the Civil Rights Act to include gender identity.

"I don't know why we have to talk about our sex life."

On the question of the Justice Department's move, Paul didn't exactly endorse the policy but, interestingly, he didn't exactly repudiate it either. He speculated that government could bar discrimination, but wondered about the legal implications.

"I think that government should not ask about your personal life," said Paul. "I would make that a rule – government shouldn't ask about your personal life when you apply to anything. It would be wrong for the government to discriminate based on anything like that. But then, I don't know what that exactly means. You get into [questions like] can you sue over it? The government ought to be as neutral as possible."

Asked about the Air Force's new transgender rule, Paul continued speculating about a way the law could be fair without getting into the thorniness of identity.

"The thing that's weird about this was that there was a time when it was nobody's business," he said.

New Hampshire State Senator Andy Sanborn, a supporter of Paul who sat in for the interview, suggested that this was the defunct "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" policy.

"We had rules, and these rules went back to the beginning and could be applied in a non-discriminating way," said Paul. "It's behavior. It's fraternizing. No matter what it is, you're not supposed to do it in the barracks, because that disrupts discipline. So it wouldn't have to be that specific. You'd still have rules about it."

Paul had not quite endorsed either of the new non-discrimination policies; as he finished, he suggested that the subject might be a little overheated.

"I don't know why we all have to talk about our sex life," he said. "I'm just not interested in other peoples' – I never go to anybody's house and everybody wants to talk about it. Why do we have to talk about it?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Paul: 'We have come to take our liberty back' // The Union Leader // Dan Tuohy – June 6, 2015

Rand Paul shouted to supporters as press huddled around and asked him yet again about the Patriot Act.

"Hey, anybody here think it's a good idea for the government to have all of your phone records?"

"No!" came the anticipated response.

Paul, the Republican presidential hopeful and Kentucky senator, boasted of his work to end the National Security Agency's "illegal spying program," even as he says the USA Freedom Act, which replaces expired Patriot Act provisions, still threatens constitutional rights.

Paul acknowledged it was a partial victory during remarks at his campaign office opening Friday in Manchester.

Some of his colleagues in the U.S. Senate called Paul's filibuster of the Patriot Act a political stunt because he has used the issue to raise donations. Other critics called Paul an isolationist, a tag he has rejected in the past.

Paul, in an interview with the Union Leader on Friday, said national defense is the federal government's most important function.

"I believe in a robust national defense," Paul said. "I believe in a national defense that is strong enough to deter and repel all attacks. I'm a Reagan Republican. And I don't think any of that speaks to any, or in anyway resembles any of those critiques. I think there are a lot of candidates, some of them grasping for relevancy, and so they will hurl ad hominem and names at people. But the bottom line is I don't think there's anything more important that we do than national defense and it doesn't just stop at the water's edge. There are international and there are American interests around the world that have to be defended."

The bulk collection of phone records was illegal and unconstitutional, and even the government says it is not getting any useful information from those surveillance provisions, according to Paul.

U.S. Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., who announced Monday he is running for the Republican nomination for President, is one of Paul's critics. In an interview with the New Hampshire Union Leader on Tuesday, Graham called Paul "ill-prepared" for the White House.

Paul dismissed criticism from political rivals and the establishment, saying most Americans agree with him on this issue.

"I'm not so sure I like all of the replacement (Freedom Act) where the phone companies may well be doing some of the same thing," Paul said in the interview. "My understanding is the NSA works at the phone companies, snatches up all the data and sends it to Utah. I'm worried that they'll still be doing the same thing, they just won't be pressing the 'send' button."

Paul said he supports the NSA looking into information for those suspected of terrorist acts, with appropriate, individualized warrants.

Paul spoke to a packed office in Manchester, and greeted an overflow crowd outside his office at 50 Bridge St. His schedule included stops Saturday at Joe's Diner in Amherst, MaryAnn's Diner in Derry, "Politics & Pie" at the Snow Shoe Club in Concord, and a town hall event at Turbocam in Barrington.

In his remarks in Manchester, Paul said he is the Republican best positioned to beat Democratic candidate and former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton in battleground states.

Following the event, he criticized Clinton for answering few press questions.

"If she ever pops her head up and takes questions, we should ask Hillary Clinton: Knowing what you know now, was it a good idea to topple Gaddafi and get involved in Libya. I think all of the objective evidence shows that things are more chaotic, worse, and that there's more of ISIS influence in Libya, and we are more threatened by having toppled the government there."

Rand Paul demands White House release trade deal text immediately // The Hill // Rebecca Shabad – June 6, 2015

Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) said Saturday it "boggles the mind" that the White House has not yet released the text of trade deal it's pushing, known as the Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP).

"It kind of boggles the mind," Paul said in an interview with Breitbart News. "Who's in charge of the administration that decides to keep a trade treaty secret? To keep it classified makes no sense at all."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Paul said the administration should immediately release the text of the trade deal so members of the Senate can decide how to vote later on.

The Senate recently voted to fast-track the trade deal, which would allow an up-or-down vote on it. House GOP leaders could hold the fast-track vote as early as next week despite opposition from groups in both parties.

"To me, it's kind of you put the cart before the horse to give the permission to do something you haven't seen," Paul said. "They claim you'll get to see it, again but you'll only get an up-or-down vote with no amendments. Also, they get rid of some of the rules on — I guess it's not, you can't filibuster it either. It passes with a simple majority."

Paul explained he has proposed legislation that would require the Senate to wait one day before a vote is held for every 20 pages of legislation.

"So 800-page legislation [like Obamatrade] would wait 40 days. You'd wait 40 days so we'd have adequate time to read it. Yeah, I'm a believer that we should read legislation before we vote on it."

Last month, Secretary of State John Kerry said the final text of the trade deal would be made public at a minimum of 60 days before President Obama would sign it.

Ron Paul: 'I don't want to distract' from Rand // The Hill // Mark Hensch – June 6, 2015

Former Rep. Ron Paul (R-Texas) said Saturday he did not want to steal attention from his son's 2016 GOP presidential campaign.
"There's no plans for it," Ron Paul told CNN host Michael Smerconish when asked whether he would stump for Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) on the campaign trail.
"I went to his announcement and supported him there," he said. "But it's his show right now. And I don't want to distract from what he's doing. So it's one of those things that I think will work its way out."
Rand Paul launched his White House bid April 7 in Louisville, Ky.
Ron Paul praised his son's performance Saturday amid one of the most crowded GOP presidential fields in recent memory.
"He's the only one that, from my viewpoint, is talking any commonsense," he said.
"I think he is able to talk more to the American people than the other candidates because I think he has a set of principles, which means that he'd much rather see smaller government and not make excuses for expanding the surveillance state and not expanding our military presence around the world."
Ron Paul also praised his son's repeated battles to reform the National Security Agency (NSA) and its intelligence-gathering methods.
"When he did the NSA thing, people said, you know, 'he's done – he's finished,' " he said. "And Republicans and Democrats all in the Senate – everybody in Washington – jumped on him."
"Yet when you did a poll of the national people, they were with him and not with McConnell," Ron Paul added, citing Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) and his opposition to NSA reforms.
The Senate approved the USA Freedom Act on Tuesday.

It ended the NSA's controversial warrantless bulk collection of individual phone records while reauthorizing less divisive counterterrorism measures.
Ron Paul also expressed concern with how the media would handle 2016's large Republican presidential field for televised debates.
"I'd take it out of the hands of the media because that becomes very biased," he said, noting his own problems appearing on a Fox News debate in New Hampshire while on the 2012 campaign trail.
"So, no, I don't think they should have as much clout," Ron Paul added.
"I think it was better when the League of Women Voters or some other independent group, a truly independent group, would schedule the debates, rather than the media outlets, because I think they're very, very slanted."
Ron Paul retired in January 2013. He sought the White House twice while in office, in 2008 and again in 2012.

WALKER

Scott Walker Riding With Joni Ernst in Iowa as Rivals Give Chase // NYT // Trip Gabriel – June 6, 2015

When Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin throws his leg across his beloved Harley-Davidson Road King for a celebration of motorcycles and Iowa pork on Saturday, the political symbolism will be as thick as the smoke from the roasting pits.

Mr. Walker, who first broke from the pack of other Republican presidential hopefuls thanks to a speech in Iowa, will be alone among seven declared and likely candidates on a chopper alongside Senator Joni Ernst, a fellow biker and one of Iowa's most popular Republicans.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The other 2016 candidates will be left in the dust for the initial 28-mile ride of "Joni's Roast & Ride," a daylong political fund-raiser.

Mr. Walker, whose early surge in national polls has receded, still enjoys a decisive lead in Iowa, thanks to an unflashy style that resonates with Iowans' Midwestern sensibilities and to an unusual appeal across a wide ideological swath of Republicans.

But that head-of-the-pack status has come with high expectations and a target on his back.

Two challenges loom on the near horizon for Mr. Walker, who has said the path to the presidency "comes through the Midwest." They are the first Republican debate, in Ohio on Aug. 6, in which he could be the target of the nine other candidates on stage, and a decision on whether to compete in Iowa's straw poll in Boone two days later.

Several top-tier candidates, including former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida, Senator Marco Rubio of Florida and former Gov. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas, have said they will skip the straw poll, a gathering of thousands of Iowa Republican activists that does not award any delegates for the party's nomination. It is costly for campaigns to organize and bus in supporters, and the poll's reputation as a predictor of victory has tumbled in recent years.

The decisions of others gives Mr. Walker cover if he, too, takes a pass. His Iowa advisers declined to say if he would participate in the straw poll, noting he has yet to declare his candidacy. (An announcement is expected late this month or early July.)

If Mr. Walker skips the event, Republican strategists in Iowa said, he risks allowing another candidate to steal some of his momentum. Party insiders unaffiliated with other candidates said he was in a lose-lose situation.

"If you don't participate, it's going to be viewed as a sign of weakness by some, and you're going to turn off some of the party establishment and key activists," said Craig Robinson, who ran the straw poll for the state Republican Party in 2007. "And if you do it, he has no choice but to win and win convincingly." He could end up spending time and money to compete against long shot candidates like Senator Ted Cruz of Texas and Ben Carson, the retired neurosurgeon.

Mr. Walker's favorability rating among likely Republican caucusgoers in Iowa was higher than any other candidate, 67 percent, in a poll conducted at the end of May for The Des Moines Register and Bloomberg Politics (with a five-point sampling error). He enjoyed a solid seven-point lead, an opening he first created with a passionate speech to conservatives in Des Moines in January.

"I had never heard him before; I was blown away," said Sam Clovis, a prominent Iowa conservative who is state chairman for former Gov. Rick Perry of Texas, who entered the race Thursday.

At a reception after a recent fund-raising dinner for the state Republican Party, Mr. Walker, in an apron, served Wisconsin cheese to a long procession of admirers, many of whom signed pledge cards to support him.

His support in Iowa, as elsewhere, traces to his reputation for winning conservative fights against state employee unions in 2011 and Democrats who mounted a recall effort against him in 2012.

"There were an awful lot of folks riveted to that whole recall thing," said Eric Woolson, a senior adviser to Mr. Walker in Iowa. "They watched it every night on Fox or wherever else. It was high political drama."

So far, Mr. Walker has had an unusual ability to draw support from both the social conservatives and the business-oriented wing of the party.

The social conservatives embrace his signing of bills as governor to defund Planned Parenthood, and his strong expression that prayer is central to his life. Business conservatives admire that he cut taxes and dealt crippling blows to unions.

But his ability to span the wings of the party — to win the argument that he is the most conservative candidate capable of winning the general election — could become a weakness if enough voters decide they would rather go with a purer expression of their ideal candidate.

He is competing for social conservatives against Mr. Huckabee, who won the caucuses in 2008, as well as Mr. Carson, Senator Ted Cruz of Texas and others.

Among business-focused candidates he must fight for supporters with Mr. Bush, who is expected to announce his candidacy this month, and Mr. Rubio

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Each of those lanes within the caucus electorate are crowded with other credible options," said Matt Strawn, a former chairman of the Iowa Republican Party. "So the challenge going forward is how well Governor Walker can balance support from two distinct factions that rarely align behind the same candidate."

Mr. Walker may lead the pack on two wheels on Saturday, but his competitors are not ready to stay behind.

Scott Walker's Effort to Weaken College Tenure // NYT // The Editorial Board – June 6, 2015

Gov. Scott Walker's proposal for weakening tenure at Wisconsin's highly respected state university system and undermining the faculty's role in campus governance will appeal to conservative voters whose support he needs to win the Republican presidential nomination.

But if this proposal becomes law, it will damage the university, perhaps irreparably. It will make it harder to recruit top-tier faculty members, who have the pick of other institutions that respect academic independence and where they do not have to fear dismissal for taking controversial views or for doing research that might be frowned upon by politicians.

It has become fashionable to portray academia as a haven for people who enjoy job security while others are subject to layoffs and downsizing. But most college instructors are not protected by tenure. According to federal data, only 20.35 percent of instructional faculty at American colleges are full-time, tenure-track workers (down from 45 percent in 1975). Colleges rely heavily on miserably paid part-timers who flee the campus when class is finished so they can get to the next job.

Tenure protections were devised in the mid-20th century to protect academics from political reprisals. Current Wisconsin state law respects this tradition, allowing tenured faculty to be fired for just cause or in financial emergencies.

A committee of state lawmakers last week approved a new proposal that would remove tenure from state law, leaving the matter to the university system's 18-member Board of Regents, 16 of whom are appointed by the governor with the confirmation of the State Senate. Under the proposal, the board would be able set new, vaguer standards for firing tenured faculty: "when such an action is deemed necessary due to a budget or program decision requiring program discontinuance, curtailment, modification or redirection." Another provision would weaken the faculty's voice in policy and personnel decisions.

Faculty members have ample reason to suspect Mr. Walker's motives. Earlier this year, he issued a budget containing devastating spending cuts that also sought to amend the university's mission statement to make it sound more like a trade school than a prominent research institution. He backed away from the new language after the state erupted in protest.

The Legislature, which will take up the new proposals later this month, can still reject them. Rubber-stamping them would set the state university on a course that Wisconsinites could regret for decades to come.

Iowa's 'Roast and Ride': 5 takeaways // Politico // Katie Glueck – June 6, 2016

Seven presidential prospects showed up but it was Harley-riding Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker who stood out.

BOONE, Iowa — The Iowa caucuses are a long eight months away, but a gaggle of presidential hopefuls descended on a field here Saturday anyway, eager to work the crowd, hone their organizing skills and build out their volunteer lists. For the candidates who made it to Sen. Joni Ernst's first annual "Roast and Ride" event — Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham, former Hewlett-Packard head Carly Fiorina, neurosurgeon Ben Carson, former Texas Gov. Rick Perry and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee — it was a chance to pay their respects to Ernst, the state's freshman senator and a newly influential figure in state politics.

Yet it was also an opportunity to connect with hundreds of Iowans and the state's political establishment in an informal, festival-like setting, one without the pressures and expectations of the next big event on the state political calendar — the Iowa Straw Poll in August.

Here are POLITICO's five takeaways from the event:

This was Scott Walker's day

The "Roast and Ride" event was tailor-made for Walker, the neighboring Wisconsin governor who's already leading the field in Iowa polls. He stood out Saturday by being the only candidate to suit up and ride with Ernst on the optional 38-mile motorcycle journey from Des Moines to Boone — he's a motorcycle owner himself. And as an aficionado of the iconic Wisconsin manufacturer Harley-Davidson, Walker naturally showed up to the ride's kick-off in a leather jacket and boots bearing the brand's name.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The governor basked in media attention for the first half of the day as he fielded questions about his frontrunner status, leading the influential Drudge Report website to feature a photo of Walker with the banner headline: “Leader of the Pack.”

At the pig roast portion of the event, Walker’s PAC’s booth was consistently busy, offering more goodies and swag — including beer coozies that read “Go big. Go bold” and candy — than any of the other campaigns. Walker’s remarks didn’t deviate much from his standard stump speech, but they were well-received. It was a day that offered a good, high-profile opportunity for down-home retail politicking, and Walker seized it.

There’s room for Rubio in Iowa

The Florida senator is still introducing himself to the state after skipping several other cattle calls here. But the reception he received Saturday suggests that Iowans are interested in learning more, and they like what they hear so far. When he arrived, Rubio was mobbed by attendees who asked for meetings, talked policy and clamored for pictures. One voter asked Rubio to record a message for his girlfriend, and the senator obliged, while several people who were volunteering in Carson’s tent left their posts to take pictures with Rubio, saying they hadn’t decided whom to support yet. The crowd was receptive to Rubio’s speech, including his swipes at critics and his implicit jabs at Jeb Bush and Hillary Clinton.

Rick Perry’s still got it

The former Texas governor’s stump speech didn’t stand out, but when it comes to glad-handing and working a crowd, Perry still sets the gold standard even if he trails in the polls. When he arrived in Boone, fresh off of a separate motorcycle ride he did for an organization that supports veterans, attendees and cameras swarmed him. The Texan posed for pictures, put his hands on peoples’ shoulders and clasped attendees’ hands as he worked his way across the field as voters praised him as a “patriot.” He also got the rare shout-out from Ernst, who was asked how she felt about his organizing another motorcycle event.

“I do want to thank him, actually, for doing this because he is riding with a number of military veterans” and those are the beneficiaries of his ride, she said, adding that she was “grateful” for his effort.

It’s clearly not 2011, when Perry entered the presidential race as the frontrunner before flaming out shortly after, but don’t underestimate his retail politicking skills. There’s a reason he’s the longest-serving governor in Texas history, and he gave a taste of that Saturday.

Carly Fiorina continues to gain traction

Fiorina often gets rave reviews from conservative activists for her pointed criticism of Hillary Clinton — and she continued to impress with that message Saturday.

“There was recently a poll this week that asked Americans who they most wanted to see debate Hillary Clinton,” she said, as someone appeared to shout, “you!” To applause and laughter, Fiorina continued, “I was gratified that I won that poll, and so I was thinking this morning, I really would be tempted, on that general election debate stage, to ask Hillary, if she’s ever ridden on a John Deere tractor [something Fiorina did that morning.]. I know she’s had a few photo ops. But the truth is, the question we need to ask Hillary Clinton now is, ‘Mrs. Clinton, what else don’t we know?’”

Fiorina also scored points in talking about Israel, the Veterans’ Administration and the size of government. She received loud applause when she said her first phone call as president would be to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, “a man I’ve known a long time.”

At the moment, Fiorina isn’t yet guaranteed a place in the upcoming debates because of her low station in the polls. But if she continues to use her Clinton zingers to stand out and energize crowds — as she did here — it’s hard to imagine she’ll remain at the bottom of GOP polls.

Noted in Iowa — who wasn’t there

A few top-tier contenders failed to make the scene — Jeb Bush, Rand Paul and Ted Cruz all skipped the event.

Bush had a family obligation — it’s his mother’s 90th birthday weekend —and Paul and Cruz were both campaigning elsewhere, in New Hampshire and North Carolina respectively. Paul, in particular, has missed a slew of cattle calls, opting to campaign on his own schedule instead.

This one stands out as a missed opportunity, though. It’s not that attendees were lamenting their absence. Rather, they didn‘t seem to be missed at all. Voters were too distracted by, and excited about, the face-time they were getting with the other 2016 candidates — and that’s exactly the problem for Bush, Cruz and Paul. At the Roast and Ride, even candidates who barely register in the polls, like Lindsey Graham, were generally surrounded by curious voters, and all of the candidates in attendance used the event as an organizing tool to build out their Iowa lists. Given the uncertainties about who will participate in the Iowa Straw Poll in August, it's unclear when another Iowa politicking opportunity this good will come along.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican Walker is leader of 2016 election pack in Iowa // Reuters // John Whitesides – June 6, 2015

Scott Walker, a likely Republican presidential contender who is riding high in polls in the early voting state of Iowa, was literally the leader of the pack on Saturday at a gathering of 2016 White House hopefuls.

Walker, the governor of neighboring Wisconsin, joined U.S. Senator Joni Ernst at the head of a parade of about 300 motorcycle riders who traveled 39 miles (62 km)to Ernst's inaugural "Roast and Ride," a political event combining barbecue and the roar of Harley-Davidsons.

The spot in front was appropriate for the new front-runner in Iowa, the state that in seven months holds the first nominating contest to pick the party's presidential candidate before the November 2016 election.

Walker, who built his reputation by taking on labor unions, has led the five most recent polls in Iowa, including the respected Des Moines Register poll. The Register showed him with a seven-percentage point lead over four tightly bunched rivals and found he was viewed favorably by two-thirds of likely Iowa caucus-goers.

"If the caucuses were today, he would win. Unless he really screws up, he should win," said Doug Gross, state chairman for Mitt Romney's 2008 campaign and former chief of staff for longtime Governor Terry Branstad.

Iowa political veterans say Walker's popularity stems from his Midwestern background and his appeal to all elements of the state's Republican base, from pragmatic establishment voters looking for a winner to the social and religious conservatives who play an influential role in the state's politics.

But things will get tougher for Walker as he moves into the daily grind of face-to-face campaigning in a state where voters are accustomed to being wooed.

"The next test for Governor Walker is transitioning from the big stage, multi-candidate events to the hand-to-hand combat of retail campaigning and organizing in Iowa," said former state party chairman Matt Strawn.

Walker has not formally declared his candidacy, and he told reporters on Saturday he would make the announcement "probably soon after the end of this month."

The governor also dodged questions about whether he would participate in the state's straw poll in August, a test of strength that traditionally winnows the field. The poll has been criticized for being too expensive for candidates.

Several other contenders, including former Florida Governor Jeb Bush, have said they will skip the straw poll. Without Walker, the state party might be forced to drop it.

Walker, a motorcycle enthusiast who addressed Saturday's crowd in his black Harley-Davidson t-shirt, was one of seven declared or likely Republican presidential contenders to give brief speeches at Ernst's barbecue.

Texas Governor Rick Perry led his own motorcycle ride to the fairgrounds. U.S. Senators Lindsey Graham and Marco Rubio, former Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee, former business executive Carly Fiorina and retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson spoke but did not participate in the motorcycle ride, although each contender put up a tent at the site to woo voters.

Walker pushed back at criticism from Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton about Wisconsin's voting laws.

"In our state, we have a law that makes it easy to vote but hard to cheat," he said. "It's another example of how Hillary Clinton is squarely out of touch with mainstream America."

Republicans at the barbecue said Walker's record of battling public sector labor unions to restrict bargaining rights was a strong selling point - along with his two election wins and a victory in a recall effort in Democratic-leaning Wisconsin.

"My No. 1 thing is I want to support a Republican who can win in 2016, and I think Walker can win," said Ron Tekippe, a computer programmer from Ankeny who likes Walker but is still undecided.

Scott Walker: Hillary Clinton "firmly out of touch" on voting rights // CBS News // Reena Flores – June 6, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Potential Republican presidential candidate and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker knocked Hillary Clinton for being "firmly out of touch" on the issue of voting rights just days after the former secretary of state announced her proposals championing minority access to voting.

"In our state we have a photo ID requirement that would make it easy to vote and hard to cheat," Walker told reporters Saturday at Iowa Sen. Joni Ernst's Roast and Ride event. "And I think that's a good example where her statements of late show that she's firmly out of touch with I think where mainstream America is."

When asked by a reporter about universal voter registration for the state of Wisconsin, Walker shrugged and shook his head, pointing instead to Wisconsin's turnout records.

"From our standpoint, we think we've got one of the most effective systems right now where we have one of the highest levels of voter participation," Walker said. "We've got a pretty good system."

In the 2012 general election, Wisconsin had the second-highest voter-turnout rate in the nation with 73 percent of the population participating. The state trailed just behind Minnesota, which had a 76 percent turnout rate. Wisconsin also ranked second in the nation during the 2008 general election.

In a speech Thursday calling on Congress to restore portions of the Voting Rights Act, Clinton singled out the Wisconsin governor for cutting back early voting and signing legislation that would make it more difficult for college students to vote.

"Today, Republicans are systematically and deliberately trying to stop millions of American citizens from voting," Clinton said Thursday at Texas Southern University in Houston, a historically black college. "What part of democracy are they afraid of?"

Clinton specifically named three other current and former Republican governors who, the former first lady says, enacted policies that limited minority voting opportunities.

"We have a responsibility to say clearly and directly what's really going on," Clinton said. "What is happening is a sweeping effort to disempower and disenfranchise people of color, poor people and young people from one end of our country to the other."

When Walker was asked Saturday about the changes his administration had done in Wisconsin, he said the reforms were "just common sense."

"I can pull out my driver's license right here," Walker said, drawing out the ID card. "Again, we make it available for people to get a driver's license or a state-issued ID card. I think most Americans regardless of party overwhelmingly think that's a common sense reform."

Clinton also attacked former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, who recently declared his candidacy for president, and criticized other potential GOP contenders like New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush.

Christie told CBS' "Face the Nation" this week that the former secretary of state "doesn't know what she's talking about" on voter fraud.

"In New Jersey, we have early voting that are available to people," the Republican governor said. "I don't want to expand it and increase the opportunities for fraud. And maybe that's what Mrs. Clinton wants to do. I don't know. But the fact is that the folks in New Jersey have plenty of an opportunity to vote."

Scott Walker in Iowa: 'We did not inherit fame or fortune' // The Hill // Rebecca Shabad – June 6, 2015

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker told voters in the key early-voting state of Iowa on Saturday he didn't inherit fame or fortune, but worked hard to achieve the American dream.

"I look back on my life, and my brother and I realized we did not inherit fame or fortune from our family. What we got was more important, and that is the belief that if you work hard and play by the rules, you can do and be everything you want in America," Walker said in a short speech at an event hosted by Sen. Joni Ernst (R-Iowa).

"That's the American dream!" he said.

The Wisconsin governor, who has not yet officially launched a 2016 presidential bid, has been leading other GOP contenders in recent Iowa polls.

On Saturday, Walker led a pack of 300 motorcyclists on a 28-mile route with Ernst for the "Roast and Ride" event.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Walker said his first jobs were washing dishes and flipping hamburgers at McDonalds. His dad was a small-town preacher and his mom was a bookkeeper.
“We understand that true freedom and prosperity does not come from the mighty hand of the government," said Walker, who was dressed in jeans, a black t-shirt and a baseball cap.

Walker slammed President Obama’s foreign policies, calling for a president who will view radical Islamic terrorism is a threat.

"We’re going to stand up and fight it,” he said. “We need a leader in America that Israel is actually an ally and should start treating it as such.”

“We need to lead from the front again in America,” he added.

Walker was the only speaker at the "Roast and Ride" event to note launch a 2016 White House campaign.

The other speakers were former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, Sen. Lindsey Graham (S.C.), Sen. Marco Rubio (Fla.), former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, Dr. Ben Carson and former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina.

CHRISTIE

Christie slams Clinton on voter IDs: 'She doesn't know what she's talking about' // Washington Examiner // Sean Higgins - June 6, 2015

New Jersey Governor Chris Christie, R-N.J., slammed former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, the Democratic frontrunner, over her recent remarks that Republicans were using voter ID laws in an effort to discourage legal voters.

"Well, first, she doesn't know what she's talking about. ...[T]he fact is that the folks in New Jersey have plenty of an opportunity to vote. And maybe, you know, if she took some questions some places and learned some things, maybe she wouldn't make such ridiculous statements," Christie told CBS's "Face the Nation." The interview was recorded Friday and set to air tomorrow, according to Politico.

In a speech Thursday in Houston, Clinton attacked the push for voter ID laws, mostly initiated by Republican governors.

"What is happening is a sweeping effort to disempower and disenfranchise people of color, poor people and young people from one end of our country to the other," Clinton said.

Suggestions include: taxes and spending, environmental laws, govt research, Medicaid and infrastructure.
She singled out Christie for vetoing a bill that would have allowed in-person early voting at polling places. New Jersey does not have a voter ID law.

Republicans counter that the laws are modest protections to prevent fraud. The Supreme Court said in 2008 that state could adopt laws requiring a photo ID, such as a driver's license, to vote. In March, it refused to hear an appeal regarding a Wisconsin law.

PERRY

Can Rick Perry close the deal? // WaPo // Stephanie McCrummen – June 5, 2015

*W*hen it happens, Rick Perry is speaking to a friendly crowd in a plaid-and-paisley living room in Greenville, S.C. He appears relaxed. His suit fits perfectly. Hair: just great. Glasses: starting to seem more natural.

He’s gotten nods talking about jobs in Texas, laughs with the line about flunking organic chemistry and claps when he says a brighter future “starts right here . . . today!”

Then a man poses a question about the importance of speaking plainly, and Perry pauses a moment before he answers by asking rhetorically, which is to say confidently: “Did I say anything today you couldn’t understand?”

Because Rick Perry is a winker, and has been for a long time.

“It’s something he’s always done,” said a friend who has known Perry since he was a Texas state legislator in the 1980s. “I’ve seen him do it at an inaugural, from a podium. It’s a way he communicates. He’s very good at it, and it’s very disarming. It’s real natural to him. Like some people can whistle with their fingers? Actually, he can do that, too.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It could be argued that the Perry persona comes down to the wink, which friends and supporters describe as part of a broader repertoire of natural-born gifts that makes the 65-year-old former Texas governor one of the most instinctive retail politicians in the 2016 GOP field.

Other notable political winkers: George W. Bush, who winked at Queen Elizabeth II after he accidentally suggested she helped America celebrate its birthday in 1776 rather than 1976; Sarah Palin, who winked during 2008 vice-presidential debates; President Obama, who winked in his State of the Union speech earlier this year, after dressing down the congressmen who clapped when he alluded to the end of his term.

More recently, Australian Prime Minister Tony Abbott apologized for winking at the host of a call-in radio show as a retiree explained that she was surviving by working for an adult sex line, an incident that came to be called “winkgate.”

The Rick Perry wink, though, comes with its own set of associations.

On one hand, it evokes his bona fide country upbringing, Texas swagger and ability to say things such as “I’m gonna love on you,” meaning flatter you, without sounding as though he is laying it on thick. Only a winker could sell T-shirts with his own grinning mug shot, as Perry did after being indicted last year on felony abuse-of-power charges that he has dismissed as politically motivated.

More fundamentally, the wink can seem to reveal a certain sensitivity — an ability to read a room, to feel for the right moment to reach in for the handshake, touch an elbow or a shoulder and close the deal.

On the other hand, a wink can evoke the overconfidence and cheap tricks of the used-car salesman, the sort of character that Perry’s critics have often cast him as, especially after his performance in the 2012 Republican primary. The infamous debate when Perry froze — trying for 45 seconds to remember the third federal agency he would abolish, before he finally gave up with an "oops" — has been read not just as a human fumble but the moment he was exposed as a lightweight.

All of which leads to the question: Which is it?

Is the wink the mark of Perry’s essential authenticity, possibly his greatest asset? Or does it represent his biggest challenge — overcoming the perception that he’s all flash and little substance? Or is it something more complicated?

What is the meaning of the Rick Perry wink?

Part of the answer lies in Greenville, where the wink is playing well in a friendly room.

For one, Perry’s timing is impeccable. He deploys the wink at the moment the audience seems most with him, as they’re still laughing. Second, the wink isn’t strained; it seems natural, even through the lenses of his hipster glasses. Third, he aims it not at the man who asked the question but in the opposite direction — toward a cluster of women, including Racine Cooper, the bylaws chairwoman of the Greenville County Republican Women’s Club, who says later that he struck her as “a simple person who knows what it is to say something plainly. He’s not full of it.”

After the wink, Perry grins and shifts back into a more serious tone.

“Good,” he says as the laughs die down. “All right. Hey, listen. I’m telling ya. We’re on the verge of the greatest days in America’s history. That’s not rhetoric.”

He thanks South Carolina for sending soldiers to defend the Alamo, then steps into a red-walled room for the meet-and-greet.

“Watch him,” says Katon Dawson, state chairman of Perry’s political action committee. “Whether you’re with Rick or not, you can’t not like him.”

“C’mon, man, get in here!” Perry is saying to a man in a blue blazer, shaking his hand then pulling him in for a photo, arm around his back in what seems less like a pose than a one-armed hug. “All right.”

To a man in a button-down shirt: “Get in here. . . . What kind of work you do?”

“I’m in property,” the man says.

To the man in khakis: “How old?”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Twenty-nine,” the man says.

“Twenty-nine,” Perry repeats, taking the arm of a woman next in line while keeping eye contact with the man. “I got a daughter who’s 29 . . . ”

He turns to the woman, who shakes his hand with her two and holds it.

“We watched you in Spartanburg last time,” she says gravely, referring to the last days of his 2012 campaign. “Good to see you again.”

“Well,” Perry says, upbeat, “I’m healthy and prepared this time.”

He gives her shoulder a squeeze and moves on to a woman who says she is from Colombia.

“Medellin?” Perry guesses.

“Yes!” the woman says.

To a man with a buzz cut who appears to lift weights: “I bet I can guess your line of work.” Then Perry guesses correctly: security.

To a couple: “And who are you?”

“Seth and Mariah,” the husband says.

“And the wind was named Mariah,” Perry sings for a moment, riffing on lyrics from a Broadway musical far older than them, “Paint Your Wagon.”

“Pretty name,” he says to the woman, then turns to a young man. “C’mon in here!”

It all suggests an extroverted personality, and yet when asked how he prefers to spend his free time, Perry answers like an introvert.

“I’d rather spend time with my dogs,” he says in an interview at a Hyatt Place hotel in Greenville the morning after the fundraiser. “I just like being in the country and being with the dogs. It’s fun to watch the dogs.”

Asked about how he reads a room, or closes a deal, Perry shrugs.

“I don’t have a checklist I go down,” he says.

He grew up in the dusty flat sprawl of Paint Creek in West Texas, where his father, Ray Perry, was a cotton farmer and longtime county commissioner, so politicking was always in the air.

Perry’s mother, Amelia, told the Dallas Morning News that when Ray and other men would gather to talk before service at the Methodist church, her 7-year-old son was always there, trying to work his way into the circle. “He wanted those men to recognize him,” she said.

In elementary school, he campaigned for Halloween king by handing out candy.

There is the often-told but unverified story that when Perry, a popular high school football player, once got knocked flat out on the field and the coach went to ask if he was okay, Perry replied that he was fine but wanted to know how the fans were taking it.

At Texas A&M, Perry was known for elaborate pranks, such as dropping an M-80 firecracker down a toilet pipe.

He was popular, but he also wanted to be popular, winning election to be one of five “yell leaders,” a prestigious position at the school that is essentially like being a cheerleader.

Then there was his first job: as a Bible-book salesman.

During college, Perry worked for the Southwestern Co. in Festus, Mo., where he was dropped off with a friend from college, John Brieden, at a gas station with nothing but his dad’s old Army bag and a box of Bible encylopedias, dictionaries and Wycliffe commentaries.

The young men rented a room in town, ate breakfast at a diner and split up for long, hot days of knocking on doors in their sections of town, making the sales pitch they were taught during a week of training in Nashville.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“You’d do it so many times it became normal,” recalls Brieden, who went on to become an insurance salesman and is now a county judge in Texas. “We had a case we carried a set of books in. So you’d set the book on the case, hold the book so you’re looking at it upside down, flipping the pages, and then ask them to buy.”

At night, the two young men would sit at the diner and compare notes.

“John and I, we would support each other every evening when we got in,” Perry says in the interview, then leans in and lowers his voice to reenact the dinner-table scene. “ ‘You know how many super-sets I sold today? A bunch.’ And we might not have sold any.”

The former governor of Texas is a good bluffer.

“Got told no a lot,” Perry says, asked about whether selling came easily.

He pauses and leans in again.

“But I got told yes enough to buy a 1967 Catalina Pontiac!” he says, grinning. “I want to say it was $2,700, which, that is a huge amount of money in 1969!”

Perry always had a well of ambition underneath the charm, Brieden says, recalling a conversation at the washateria that summer. Perry asked Brieden whether he had goals; Brieden said he wanted to pay for college.

“He said, ‘No, no, what are your goals?’ ” Brieden recalls. “He said, ‘I’ve got three goals.’ ”

One was to graduate, which the chemistry-challenged Perry knew was no guarantee for him; two was to be a yell leader; three was to be a member of the Ross Volunteers at Texas A&M, an elite group of cadets who served as honor guard for the Texas governor.

“He did all of those three things,” Brieden says.

Perry talks to a Fox News reporter via speakerphone in December in his Austin office, a few weeks before the end of his term. (Julia Robinson for The Washington Post)
After college, Perry joined the Air Force and flew C-130 cargo planes, duty that included rotations in England and Germany and missions to Saudi Arabia and South America.

Then something happened that could be considered out of character for someone as driven and cocky as Perry seemed: In 1977, he came home to Paint Creek, moved into his childhood bedroom and spent six years adrift.

“I couldn’t understand why I wasn’t happy,” Perry has said of that time, describing himself as “lost.”

He helped on the cotton farm, but Perry’s parents also recalled in an interview with the Dallas Morning News how their son would disappear for days with nothing but a bedroll, his horse and his dog. A neighbor recalledhow Perry would borrow his plane and just take off somewhere.

Eventually, he decided to apply for a pilot job with Southwest Airlines. But before he got hired, a group of young Texan politicos convinced him there was a better use for his rugged good looks and obvious gifts, and Perry entered a profession that chose him as much as he chose it.

He was elected as a Democrat to the state legislature, and then was persuaded to run as a Republican for agriculture commissioner, a campaign that included the famous “Marlboro Man” ad in which Perry is filmed in chaps, saddling up a horse and silhouetted at sunset.

He won, and kept on winning, eventually becoming the longest-serving governor in state history, a job he approached the way he knew best: as a salesman.

Perry’s critics and admirers alike say that his central achievement has been to sell Texas, luring companies from Toyota to eBay to Latex Foam International to the state with billions in incentives, face-to-face pitches and radio ads.

“This is Texas Governor Rick Perry, and I have a message for California businesses,” began one that aired in the state in 2013. “Come check out Texas . . . and see why our low taxes, sensible regulations and fair legal system are just the thing to get your business moving. To Texas.”

Perry set up the controversial Texas Enterprise Fund, which critics called a massive slush fund that has rewarded Perry’s political allies and which Perry called “the largest deal-closing fund of its kind in the nation.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Look, in powers of persuasion, he is among the top of all the governors, and I’ve worked with a lot,” says Dennis Cuneo, a former vice president for Toyota who was in charge of site selection for a new pickup-truck assembly plant soon after Perry became governor in 2000. “It’s his whole demeanor. The way he shakes your hand, how he looks you in the eye. He says, ‘I’m here to make you successful.’ ”

Cuneo says he was struck by the governor’s unbridled enthusiasm.

“Texas was a long shot,” he says. “So I paid a visit to Perry in 2002. It was supposed to be a half-hour meeting and turned into two hours.”

Cuneo says Perry knew he had grown up in Pennsylvania and struck up a long conversation about Pittsburgh. Perry told him that the pickup was “born in Texas” and that moving there would help with Toyota’s marketing. He upped the incentive package. He mentioned that he had spoken to the family that needed to sell the land for a potential site. He gave Cuneo his cellphone number, and when Cuneo called later, Perry answered.

“He’s governor of a pretty big state — that doesn’t happen often,” he says, laughing slightly at Perry’s aggressive pitch. “He knows how to close the deal.”

At the start of the 2012 GOP primary, Perry was closing deals all over the place, raising millions from the business community, winning the support of conservative Christians, bounding out of his bus in the South Carolina sun and soaring to the top of the polls.

The wink and all the confidence and swagger it embodied seemed to be working again — until the oops, and an especially animated speech in New Hampshire that was odd enough that some speculated that Perry was drunk or high on painkillers for a back condition, all of which Perry denied.

There was a last, awkward swing through South Carolina in which Perry wandered through an empty antique shop and, finally, in a moment that was the opposite of a wink, announced he was dropping out and returned to Texas.

Rick Perry in his own words: His take on guns, Obamacare and more

Only now here he is again, trying to get it all back.

He’s at a Pizza Ranch in Indianola, Iowa, where some voters say they can get past the oops if Perry can.

He’s at the conservative gathering called CPAC in Maryland, walking on stage to AC/DC’s “Back in Black” and delivering a speech during which his body language appears stiffer than it does in a small room. As he often does, he begins by saying the world is more dangerous now than ever before, and that “on three points, we must be clear” — and then successfully reels off the three.

And he’s in Greenville, at the Hyatt Place hotel, saying that he didn’t learn everything about retail politics in one place, and talking about Paint Creek, dust storms and his parents, the well-worn stories of his stump speech.

“So,” Perry is saying, “watching your—”

He stops himself. He pauses. Five seconds pass. Six. He’s squinting into the corner of the room. Seven seconds. Still pausing.

And this is the other thing about Rick Perry: As confident and swaggering as he can seem these days, there are still moments when he can seem lost. Not exactly lost in thought. Just lost, not unlike he appeared to be on stage during the debates in 2011 — far from Texas and the persona he created there, standing before crowds that were not always friendly, not necessarily buying what he was selling.

“We never had a lot of new things,” Perry says finally, and now he’s back to the familiar persona and stump-speech stories, talking about how the harsh life of west Texas taught him how to handle adversity, his father’s stoicism, and on until an aide tells him that it’s time to go.

And it is somewhere between then and Perry’s closing argument — that he’s better prepared this time, and that he’s certain voters “will see a very different individual when it comes to my performance” — that it happens again.

Perry winks and, a little while later, heads to New Hampshire.

Perry touts experience as governor // The Hill // Mark Hensch – June 6, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican presidential candidate Rick Perry said Saturday his time governing Texas made him the best candidate for the White House in 2016.
"This is going to be a 'show me, don't tell me' election," Perry told listeners at the inaugural "Ride and Roast" event in Boone, Iowa.
Perry cited the diverse range of challenges he had faced while governing Texas as proof he was ready to lead the nation.
"No one gave me a manual that says, 'Here's how you deal with Ebola when it shows up on the shores of America and in your state,' " he said.
"No one gave me a manual when tens of thousands of people showed up on our borders and our federal government failed in its constitutional duty to keep it secure," Perry said. "If you elect me president, I will secure that border."
Perry said he would authorize the Keystone XL oil pipeline as a means of making the U.S. "energy secure."
He also promised he would lower the nation's corporate taxes, regulations he called the "highest corporate tax rate in the Western world."
"Let's make 2016 the great year of getting America back to being America again," Perry told listeners.
"America's freedoms are the greatest in the world, and we need to fight for them every day," Perry added. "If you elect me the president of these United States, that is exactly what I will do for you."
Perry touted past U.S. history as proof of American exceptionalism.
"We've been through a Civil War, we've been through two World Wars, we've been through a Great Depression," he said.
"We've been through Jimmy Carter, we can make it through a President Obama," he quipped.
The former Texas governor remarked that the right president could make 2016 the starting point of America's brightest future yet.
"We are just a few policy changes at the top from the greatest days of our nation," Perry said.
"This is an incredible country," he added. "I am excited about the future of America."
Perry launched his 2016 campaign Thursday from an airplane hangar outside Dallas.
"We have the power to make things new again," he said Thursday, flanked by Marines, Navy SEALs and Medal of Honor recipients. "And that is why I am running for the presidency of the United States of America."
Perry vowed he would approach the campaign trail with renewed resolve after his failed 2012 bid.
He has made his gubernatorial experience a central part of his campaign rhetoric since joining the race.
"Leadership is not a speech you give on the Senate floor," he said Thursday. "It's not what you say, it's what you do."
"I have been tested," he added. "I have led the most successful state in America."

Rick Perry announces Iowa presidential campaign team // The Des Moines Register // William Petroski – June 6, 2015

Former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, who announced his candidacy for the Republican presidential nomination on Thursday, said Saturday his Iowa caucus campaign will be headed by Sam Clovis, a prominent Republican activist from northwest Iowa.

Clovis, who supported Rick Santorum for president four years ago, unsuccessfully ran for the GOP nomination for U.S. Senate in a June primary last year and then lost a November bid for state treasurer. Clovis served 25 years in the Air Force as a fighter pilot and now is an economics professor at Morningside College in Sioux City. He is also well-known in northwest Iowa for his work as a radio talk show host.

Robert Haus, senior strategist. Haus was co-chairman of Perry's 2012 Iowa campaign. He has helped oversee the Iowa presidential caucus campaigns for Steve Forbes, Fred Thompson and Phil Gramm. He is a New Hampton native who has also led several statewide and congressional races in Iowa.

Jamie Johnson, senior director. Johnson will work with conservative leaders in Iowa, South Carolina, and New Hampshire. He has spent three decades in local, state and federal politics across the United States, including work on Santorum's 2012 campaign. Johnson is an ordained Anglican minister.

Sheila Murphy, Iowa consultant focusing on coalition building. Murphy is a longtime GOP activist in Iowa and Nebraska. She was campaign manager for Brenna Findley's attorney general campaign in 2010 and political director of Rod Robert's 2010 governor's campaign.

Andy Swanson, Iowa state director. An Iowa native, Swanson has experience in Iowa, having worked on two previous presidential campaigns and several statewide efforts. He is originally from Dayton.

Dane Nealson, eastern Iowa political director. He is a native of West Liberty and has more than a decade of campaign experience. He worked for Perry in 2012. Nealson is also the former chairman of the Story County GOP.

Kip Murphy, western Iowa political director. Murphy is a longtime Iowa grassroots activist, having worked in the field for several congressional and statewide candidates. Murphy is also the former chairman of the Harrison

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

County GOP.

Quentin Marquez, Iowa field director. He worked with Americans for Prosperity in 2014, and has held executive positions with the University of Iowa College Republicans and Iowa Federation of College Republicans.

Christina Bettini, Iowa field director. Bettini worked with the Iowa House Majority Fund in 2014 and has been a legislative clerk in the Iowa Statehouse.

HUCKABEE

Huckabee: I'm 'only person' to take on Clinton machine // The Hill // Mark Hensch – June 6, 2015

Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee said Saturday he was the only 2016 GOP presidential candidate who had experience facing off with the Clintons in past elections.
"I fought the Clinton political machine in every election I've been in," he said at the first annual "Roast and Ride" in Boone, Iowa.
"If you want someone who has fought the Clinton political machine and won, you're looking at the only person who has lived to tell about it," he said of Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton and her husband, former President Bill Clinton.
Huckabee encountered the Clintons while serving as Arkansas' governor between 1996 and 2007.
He charged Saturday that they represent the kind of political power he would avoid should he win in 2016.
"America is a great country, but we are losing this nation because we have failed to understand that when we elect people, they have to serve us," Huckabee said. "We are not supposed to serve them."
Huckabee argued that a government divorced from its people put its own interests before theirs.
He cited the economy as an example of imbalance he would fix upon taking the Oval Office.
"People are working harder than ever before and have less to show for it," Huckabee said. "There are a lot of people in this country that are sweating through their clothes and lifting heavy things every day."
Military veterans struggling for their benefits, he added, was another example of failed leadership.
"It is a shame they have to beg and plead to get their veterans' benefits from" the Department of Veterans Affairs, he said.
"This is a government that has broken a lot of its promises," he added.
Huckabee also ripped Social Security as a program the federal government was badly mismanaging.
"We're not talking about an entitlement," he said. "This is an earned benefit you paid for."
The former Arkansas governor doubled down on his recent criticism of the Supreme Court for abusing its powers.
"Nine unelected, black-robed judges do not get to determine what's right or wrong," he said, calling their decisions "judicial tyranny" if left unchecked.
Huckabee concluded his remarks by mentioning that the birth of his fifth grandchild was expected on Sunday.
He said he wanted to ensure a vibrant future for his family's latest addition by winning the White House next year.
"I'm on a mission to make this country a better one for my five grandchildren than it would be if we keep going down the direction we're heading on," Huckabee said.

KASICH

Hillary Clinton draws ire of John Kasich on voting // The Columbus Dispatch // Darrel Rowland – June 6, 2015

Ohio Gov. John Kasich chastised Hillary Clinton on Friday for engaging in "pure demagoguery" on voting rights when the country is struggling with racial issues.

"We live in a time when race relations are very sensitive, and to be using that kind of reckless language is not helpful to this country," Kasich said before his final event of the two-day swing through the state that holds the nation's first primary election.

"To be saying that Republicans are intent on cutting people off to vote — that's targeted at folks that feel very vulnerable."

Clinton, speaking at a historically black college in Texas on Thursday, blasted voting restrictions imposed by the GOP in Ohio and other states.

"We have a responsibility to say clearly and directly what's really going on in our country, because what is happening is a sweeping effort to disempower and disenfranchise people of color, poor people, and young people from one end of our country to the other," the former secretary of state said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Kasich fired back: “It’s downright divisive to say that there is a plot to take away your right to vote. That’s the kind of thing in this campaign that will further divide America, and I’m not in this to divide the country, I’m in this to help be a uniter.”

The jousting with Clinton came the day after he warned fellow Republicans about criticizing her over issues such as Benghazi and the Clinton Foundation.

He defended the latest remarks by noting they did not touch on any of the areas he warned about. “I said there’ll be a time and place. Unfortunately, the time has come because of those comments. It’s outrageous.”

The back-and-forth began with an appearance on Fox News where Kasich said Clinton’s language “ was really offensive to me. And I like Hillary and I haven’t been attacking Hillary, OK? But for her to say that there are Republicans who are deliberately trying to keep people from voting? It’s just pure demagoguery.”

He said it was “silliness” for Clinton to criticize Ohio for repressing the vote when the state has 28 days of early voting and New York (where Clinton lives) has only Election Day.

Daniel Wessel, press secretary for the pro-Clinton group Correct the Record, said, “Gov. Kasich is trying to distract from the many efforts of Republicans in his state to make it more difficult for Ohioans to vote — including limiting early-voting locations and attempting to limit early-voting hours. Hillary Clinton’s proposals would make it easier for all eligible voters to vote, unlike Gov. Kasich, who has turned this fundamental right of Americans into a partisan issue.”

Kasich’s comments echoed those made by other Ohio Republicans on Thursday — including Secretary of State Jon Husted — who noted that Clinton’s proposal to require at least 20 days of early voting in every state already is exceeded in Ohio.

Last month, an attorney who represents the campaign of Clinton and several other Democrats filed a federal lawsuit against Husted and Attorney General Mike DeWine, saying that GOP officials’ actions were designed “to bolster artificially the likelihood of success of Republican candidates in Ohio elections,” which “threatens the very bedrock of our democracy.”

Ohio Democratic Chairman David Pepper said in a statement: “When Gov. Kasich says it’s ‘ demagoguery’ to fight for expanded access to the polls, he’s the one being divisive. The act of voting is essential to our idea of America, and our democracy is better when every citizen can participate. Wanting more people to vote and modernizing elections doesn’t divide Americans; it unites them.

“When Kasich and Secretary of State Jon Husted tout Ohio voting laws, they leave out a key fact: Ohio’s voting laws are what they are today because civil-rights groups, community leaders and Ohio Democrats have taken Husted and the state to court over and over again to stop numerous attacks on voting rights.”

CARSON

Ben Carson’s Nascent Campaign Faces Personnel Turmoil // NYT // Ashley Parker – June 6, 2015

Ben Carson, a retired neurosurgeon and Tea Party folk hero, has emerged as one of the most talked-about Republican candidates for president in 2016, buoyed by the strength of his outsider’s appeal and captivating life story.

But the very political greenness that has made Mr. Carson such an attractive candidate to his fans is also proving problematic as he tries to ramp up his campaign organization.

Since officially declaring himself a candidate in Detroit last month, Mr. Carson’s organization has unraveled, with the loss of four top staff members: his campaign chairman, national finance chairman, deputy campaign manager and general counsel. The Washington Post first reported the turmoil on Saturday.

But walking into Senator Joni Ernst’s “Roast and Ride” here on Saturday, Mr. Carson showed up with an easy smile and ready set of talking points, brushing off the reports. He breezily described the recent staff departures as a “planned exodus” and said his campaign was “running as smoothly as it possibly can be.”

“Things could not be better,” Mr. Carson said, listing his more than 140,000 donations, social media presence and standing in the polls. “It’s hard to imagine how we could be doing any better, so if that’s what chaos is, bring it on.”

Yet the struggles of Team Carson appear to be both internal and external. Two outside “super PACs,” Run Ben Run and One Vote, have found themselves competing with each other, and the Carson campaign, to attract money and volunteers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Terry Giles, who resigned as Mr. Carson's campaign chairman last month, plans to start yet another super PAC; he told The Post he hoped to convince the other two groups to stand down and coordinate with his effort, the goal of which is to complement the official campaign more seamlessly.

Asked about the tension between his outside groups, Mr. Carson noted that he was, by law, not allowed to coordinate with them. But, he added, in an ideal world, "I would like to see everybody singing 'Kumbaya.' "

Dick Morris: Ben Carson's Fame Helps GOP Run, But More Is Needed // Newsweek // Todd Beamon – June 5, 2015

Presidential candidate Dr. Ben Carson has so far successfully translated his fame as a world-renowned neurosurgeon to politics, but the biggest challenge he faces is trying to "convince Republicans that he can take on Hillary Clinton," political analyst Dick Morris told Newsmax TV on Friday.

"You're asking someone who's never been around a heavyweight boxing match to get into the ring with Muhammad Ali," Morris, who served in the Bill Clinton administration, told "Newsmax Prime" host J.D. Hayworth. "There is nobody that has more experience at doing this than Hillary.

"All of the debates she had while running for Senate, running for president, and all the primaries and now again," he added. "It's scary to think of somebody who has never been around, been fighting for a round, to be in that match.

"He has to convince people that he can hold his own — and that's the big obstacle."

Carson's soft-spoken, easygoing style could prove daunting for a White House run, Morris said as he reflected on Arizona Sen. John McCain in the 2008 presidential race.

"It didn't work with McCain. You're always sort of wanting to turn up the volume when he was speaking," Morris said. "I don't think it's going to be an effective approach. He's got to be much more forceful and much more dynamic.

"Politics is its own occupation — and I don't think I could do neurosurgery, and it takes some adjustment of skills to do politics.

"Dr. Carson's approach is a very good one in a vacuum, but when it comes to fighting someone and going head-to-head, toe-to-toe, that's harder — and that kind of a low-key approach sometimes will get run over by a truck," Morris said.

But there's another reality that could work against Carson: President Barack Obama.

"We all have in the back of our minds have Obama, who had almost no experience, more than Carson, but not much — and look at how ineptly he's governed," he told Hayworth.

"I'm just concerned about bringing someone in who's got nothing, doesn't know anything about the process."

Throughout the campaign trail, Carson has noted the pressure involved in separating conjoined twins and other sensitive pediatric operations around the world during his nearly four decades as a physician, but politics requires a different set of skills, Morris cautioned.

"What's important here is the give and take, because there's always a subtext going on. One is who's wining the debate, who's making the points. The other is who's a strong and forceful leader?

"That's the one strength that Hillary has — and going against Carson without Carson being more aggressive is going to be difficult to watch," Morris said.

The analyst's advice to Carson: distinguish himself from other Republican candidates.

"It is important that Carson takes one or two issues, preferably issues where he disagrees with the other Republicans," Morris told Hayworth. "Maybe it's free trade fast-track deal, maybe the NSA reform bill that just passed — maybe he wants to go further.

"It's important that he takes a political issue and use it to define his advocacy, his strength, and his position. Because you can't run for president just on a resume."

Why is Ben Carson doing so well in the polls? // WaPo // Amber Phillips – June 5, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He has compared Obamacare to slavery, thrown around words like bestiality and pedophilia while arguing against same-sex marriage and said our society resembles Nazi Germany.

He's basically the longest of long shots to run our country in 2017, and there are signs his nascent presidential campaign is struggling with this reality.

So why is retired pediatric neurosurgeon, political novice and presidential candidate Ben Carson near the top of almost every recent poll of the 2016 race?

A recap:

A Washington Post-ABC News poll out this week had Carson tied for sixth among Republican-leaning voters -- but in a statistical tie for the lead in the crowded field. He was at 7 percent alongside Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, while the leader, Jeb Bush, was at 13 percent.

A Fox News poll released Wednesday of likely GOP primary voters found Carson third among 16 candidates, at 11 percent. That's just behind Bush and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, each at 12 percent. Again, a statistical tie for the lead.

The Real Clear Politics average of national polls has Carson tied with libertarian-leaning Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul for fourth place overall.

The answer has less to do with Carson's skill as a candidate and more to do with his background and fortunate timing. Carson has arguably the best non-political background in the field, and he's running for president in an election in which there are so many candidates on the GOP side that it's going to be incredibly tough for one person to command much of a lead.

In contrast, around this time before the 2012 presidential elections, seven GOP candidates were in the race. Eventual nominee Mitt Romney led the field with 17 percent of the vote, according to the Real Clear Politics average. And even that was pretty low for a frontrunner.

At this point, any candidate who has a small, committed group of supporters is going to stand out. And Carson definitely has street cred among tea party supporters.

He earned star power and fueled presidential buzz in conservative circles back in 2013, when he criticized President Obama at a National Prayer Breakfast with the president sitting just a few feet again. Since then he's elevated himself to celebrity status among conservatives.

There's a big difference between getting 10 percent of the vote and competing to win states -- a far taller hurdle for a political novice like Carson. But being at 10 percent also means Carson will look like a contender until other candidates start actually rising from the mess of a crowded field that exists.

But we shouldn't expect that 10 percent support to dry up, no matter how badly his campaign struggles. After all, he got it with very little skill as a candidate, and the things that give him a niche today aren't really going away.

Carson: Political experience not needed to be a good president // The Hill // Mark Hensch – June 6, 2015

GOP presidential candidate Ben Carson argued Saturday that a lifetime of private-sector success was just as valuable as a political background for running the nation.
“I’ve had decades of experience on corporate boards seeing how things work efficiently and inefficiently,” he said at the inaugural “Roast and Ride” in Boone, Iowa.
“Our government is incredibly inefficient at this stage right now,” he said.
“There are a lot of people in politics who are wise and can solve our problems,” Carson added. “But there’s some people in politics I wouldn’t let tie my shoes.”
Carson, a retired neurosurgeon, hit back at claims his medical career meant he was unqualified on issues like finances or foreign policy.
“The government is not supposed to tell us what to do,” he said, citing ObamaCare as an example. “If we accept that, it will continue to erode our freedoms.”
Carson said the economy offered proof that the “experts” did not always have the correct lawmaking solutions.
“One of our most severe problems is the stagnant economy,” he said. “As we go forward, something has to give.”

JINDAL

As he nears a 2016 bid, Louisiana’s Bobby Jindal hits political bottom // WaPo // Tyler Bridge – June 6, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Just weeks before he is expected to announce his presidential campaign, Bobby Jindal is at the nadir of his political career.

The Republican governor is at open war with many of his erstwhile allies in the business community and the legislature. He spent weeks pushing a "religious freedom" bill that failed to pass, while having little contact with legislators trying to solve Louisiana's worst budget crisis in 25 years.

Jindal is now so unpopular in deep-red Louisiana that his approval rating plunged to 32 percent in a recent poll — compared with 42 percent for President Obama, who lost the state by 17 percentage points in 2012.

"This is very much a low point for Bobby Jindal," said Pearson Cross, a political science professor at the University of Louisiana at Lafayette who is preparing a book on the governor.

Much of the trouble swirling around Jindal is connected to his unannounced presidential campaign and his regular travels to early primary states, which have angered many of his fellow Republicans in the GOP-controlled legislature.

In recent months, Jindal has focused his political energy here on trying to appeal to social conservatives nationally by pushing the Marriage and Conscience Act, which would have prohibited the state from taking "adverse action" against those opposed to same-sex marriage. But the measure died last month in the legislature amid opposition from major corporations that feared boycott threats by gay rights groups viewing such measures as sanctioning discrimination.

The legislature is also in the final days of grappling with the budget crisis, which was caused, in part, by personal and corporate tax cuts passed under Jindal's watch that haven't paid for themselves.

Yet he has kept up his thinly veiled 2016 travels, having appeared at political events Monday in New Hampshire and Tuesday in Florida. Jindal will announce his plans in New Orleans on June 24.

Jindal will need a serious bump in popularity if he hopes to compete: Currently, he doesn't make the Top 10 cut in national polls to participate in the first Republican presidential debate, to be held Aug. 6 in Cleveland.

But Jindal told reporters recently that he is merely paying the price for making hard choices in cutting the number of state employees and refusing to raise taxes. He also vowed to do the same if he won the White House.

"If I were to run for president, it would certainly be based on the premise that this country needs big changes," Jindal said. "We need somebody who will go to D.C. and rescue the American Dream from becoming the European nightmare. This president has presided over an expansion in federal government spending, taxing, borrowing and regulating that is hurting our economy."

A Rhodes scholar long described as a whiz kid, Jindal headed Louisiana's state Department of Health and Hospitals at 24, moved on to a series of high-level government jobs, was elected to Congress at 33 and now, at 43, is completing his second and final term as governor. Until recently, he was described as a rising star in the Republican Party.

"A lot of people disapprove of his national travel at a time of a budget crisis," said Bernie Pinsonat, whose firm, Baton Rouge-based Southern Media & Opinion Research, conducted the poll showing Jindal at 32 percent favorability.

"There's been no end in sight to the red ink and headlines over concerns about state cuts to public hospitals and universities," Pinsonat said.

The governor has championed a business-friendly environment in Louisiana, supporting tax breaks for companies, revamping the state's worker-training programs to better suit the needs of businesses and depleting a $450 million economic-development fund to subsidize new plants and facilities.

But his rightward turn ahead of a likely presidential run has also put him in conflict with the business community. Jindal dropped his support of the business-backed Common Core education standards and this year pushed the legislature to abandon them; state lawmakers paid him no heed.

With Louisiana facing a projected $1.6 billion budget deficit this year — 20 percent of the state's general fund — Jindal sought to eliminate $526 million per year of tax refunds given to businesses.

Nixing the refunds — which Jindal calls "corporate welfare" — adheres to the guidelines of Americans for Tax Reform, the influential anti-tax group run by Grover Norquist. But business leaders say Jindal is trying to raise their taxes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the meantime, Jindal made passage of the Marriage and Conscience Act one of his three legislative priorities this year. He said it would protect those who oppose same-sex marriages.

“In Indiana and Arkansas, large corporations recently joined left-wing activists to bully elected officials into backing away from strong protections for religious liberty,” he wrote in a New York Times op-ed in late April. “It was disappointing to see conservative leaders so hastily retreat on legislation that would simply allow for an individual or business to claim a right to free exercise of religion in a court of law.”

IBM, Dow Chemical, the New Orleans Convention & Visitors Bureau and gay rights groups all opposed Jindal’s bill, and lawmakers wanted no part of the controversial legislation in an election year. They gave it a single committee hearing late in the session before it was killed on a 10-to-2 vote.

Two hours later, Jindal issued an executive order prohibiting the executive branch from taking action against anyone who opposes same-sex marriage.

“We perceive this as largely a political statement by our conservative governor in support of his national position on the issue,” the convention bureau said in a statement, adding that the order was not likely to have any practical impact.

Buddy Roemer, a former Republican governor, said many are disappointed in Jindal and doubt his ability to mount a credible presidential bid.

“Several times a day, I get phone calls from business people who are concerned,” Roemer said. “They are irate, angry and bewildered at how he thinks he can amass a national political following. The next governor will have to spend four years making tough decisions that Jindal hasn’t made.”

FIORINA

Fiorina: Government is 'giant, bloated, unaccountable' // The Des Moines Register // Grant Rodgers – June 6, 2015

"You got it going on, girl," Carly Fiorina told a young admirer after her Roast & Ride speech, pointing to the girl's painted toenails.

Unlike six other candidates at Saturday's event, the former software CEO waited until after her 10-minute speech to mingle with the audience. An enthusiastic group met her moments after she stepped off stage and snapped photos in front of a trailer stacked with hay bales.

Between photos, she autographed a man's Harley-Davidson baseball cap. "We need your brain in office," another supporter shouted.

The former Hewlett-Packard CEO is keen to point to her career in business to separate herself from competitors. A successful showing at the Iowa GOP's Lincoln Dinner in May and earlier multi-candidate cattle calls has created hype around her long-shot candidacy.

Best moment: Two women wearing buttons supporting Ben Carson, the conservative former neurosurgeon who also spoke Saturday, asked to have pictures taken with Fiorina.

"I mean, I love Ben, too, but you gotta have a picture without that button," she jokingly told the women.

Quote: "There was recently a poll earlier this week that asked Americans who they most want to see debate Hillary Clinton. I was gratified that I won that poll. ... I think what we need to ask Hillary Clinton now is, 'Mrs. Clinton, what else don't we know?'"

On stage: Fiorina highlighted what she called the federal government's inept response to foreign hack attacks.

The remark came a day after the U.S. government announced that personal data of 4 million federal employees had been breached in a hack from China. It's just one example of vulnerabilities created by a "giant, bloated, unaccountable" federal government, Fiorina said.

Reaction: One of Fiorina's biggest applause lines came when she said she'd call Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on her first day in office. "We need to reassure our allies that a friendship with the United States means something," she said.

OTHER

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Presidential Hopefuls Descend on Iowa, Courting Favor With Joni Ernst // NYT // Ashley Parker – June 6, 2015

Arriving at the kickoff of her inaugural "Roast and Ride" event here, fresh off a two-hour ride up from Red Oak on her 2009 Soft Tail Deluxe Harley-Davidson Saturday morning, Senator Joni Ernst of Iowa grinned as a friend pressed a Monster Energy drink into her hand.

"I need the caffeine," she enthused.

Indeed, monster energy was on the agenda Saturday, as no fewer than seven 2016 Republican candidates descended on the state for a day heavy on the hogs (both the bikes and the pork) and an opportunity to make their pitch to primary voters.

Early caucus and primary states like Iowa and New Hampshire have recently found themselves facing the threat that the look-every-candidate ethos on which they have long prided themselves may be slipping away. A confluence of factors, including the national polling criteria to qualify for televised debates and the waning influence of the Iowa straw poll, are pressuring candidates to focus on raising their national media standing instead of greeting voters one Pizza Ranch and town hall at a time.

But Saturday's overcast skies promised a day of retail politics on overdrive — with heaping plates of ribs and coleslaw; lawn games like cornhole and horseshoes; and white-topped candidate tents giving away candy as if it were Halloween, in an effort to attract new supporters.

Before leading bikers on a 39-mile ride from the Big Barn Harley-Davidson (where the event began) to the fairgrounds in Boone, Ms. Ernst — clad in black motorcycle boots, snug blue jeans, and a black leather vest with a bald eagle on the back — made sure to say "Iowa is a great cross-section of America." She dismissed questions that had implied her state may be losing its coveted influence, but said that the nature of campaigning here, including the premium placed on the Iowa straw poll, may be changing.

"I think it's important that they participate in one way or another," Ms. Ernst said. "Maybe they won't be able to be there physically, but I hope they have some sort of presence here in Iowa."

After greeting her fellow bikers like old friends — "This is so fun!" she said excitedly, "You look wonderful!" — Ms. Ernst demurred when asked whether Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, a motorcycle aficionado who participated in the ride alongside Ms. Ernst, had a leg up on the other candidates.

But she noted that motorcyclists possess some of the traits she would like to see in a future president: "I think you have to be a leader and you have to make decisive determinations of what path you take," she said. "Whatever that path his, you have to follow it."

Ms. Ernst had also offered several other candidates, including Senator Marco Rubio of Florida, a ride on the back of her bike, but none took her up on the offer. (Arriving at the main event, clad in a plaid shirt and khakis, Mr. Rubio said his schedule simply had not worked with hers, but joked, "Can't wait until they do the Jet Ski one. I'll be here for that one.")

The day, after all, was Mr. Walker's to lose. Asked if he was the front-runner, the Wisconsin governor said he was going to be riding behind Ms. Ernst.

And, in fact, Mr. Walker's joke held more than an Iowa kernel of truth. As the bikes pulled out, there he was, just behind Ms. Ernst as promised — but just close enough to her left shoulder to be visible in all the media shots.

A First for Snapchat // NYT // Ashley Parker – June 6, 2015

The fast-growing social media platform Snapchat just landed its first political ad.

The American Action Network, an outside group closely associated with the House Republican leadership, placed a 10-second ad on Snapchat pegged to Senator Joni Ernst's inaugural "Roast and Ride" here on Saturday.

The buy is part of a larger, $900,000 campaign by the network urging Congress to pass trade promotion authority.

The ad will appear as part of a Snapchat-curated "live story" — which will include a variety of photos and videos from Ms. Ernst's event — and will be promoted to users in Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Washington, D.C.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We're excited to be the first in the political space to utilize the growing medium for advertising," said Dan Conston, communications director for the American Action Network. "A.A.N. is using Snapchat because its allowing us to deliver an engaging ad experience to an audience of influencers and younger, hard to reach voters."

Indeed, Snapchat users not only trend younger but, to view any content on the app, including ads, users must hold a finger on the screen — meaning, says Snapchat, they are the highly engaged audience that advertisers covet.

"Users watching the Roast and Ride story today are likely interested in politics but may be surprised to see our direct appeal to pass T.P.A. in the story," Mr. Conston said. "We think that will resonate and be memorable with this key audience."

Grilling, but no flare-ups, at Ernst's 'Roast and Ride' // Politico // Katie Glueck – June 6, 2015

Scott Walker rode a Harley, Marco Rubio jabbed his rivals and Rick Perry rolled up with an entourage of veterans.

Seven presidential candidates and likely contenders came to a field here in this rural part of the state, about 45 minutes from Des Moines, for freshman Iowa Sen. Joni Ernst's first "Roast and Ride." The event featured a significantly longer and more prominent guest list than the Iowa Straw Poll currently has, making the Saturday gathering potentially the biggest retail politicking event here of the year.

It was an opportunity for the candidates to gladhand, take shots at Hillary Clinton and show off their barbecue skills in a very casual setting, where attendees listened to speeches from lawn chairs and candidates — some sporting jeans — traipsed through muddy grass to greet voters.

Each candidate was given eight minutes to address the crowd — a timeframe they more or less stuck to — and the speeches focused heavily on veterans, the American Dream and praising Iowa and especially its junior senator, the host of the event. The 2016ers in attendance were Walker, Rubio, Perry, Ben Carson, Lindsey Graham, Carly Fiorina and Mike Huckabee.

"I love a senator who knows how to castrate a pig, ride a hog and cut the pork from Washington, D.C.," Walker said, referencing an Ernst ad from her 2014 Senate race in which she discussed castrating hogs and making Washington "squeal." "Wouldn't it be nice if she had an ally in the White House to help get the job done?"
The Wisconsin governor was the only candidate to join Ernst on the "Ride" part of the event — a 38-mile motorcycle jaunt from Des Moines up to Boone, to honor veterans.

"I'm riding behind Joni today in the ride so I guess that makes me second to her," Walker, in a leather Harley Davidson jacket, motorcycle gloves and Harley Davidson boots, told reporters when asked whether he was the frontrunner in Iowa.

Graham, the South Carolina senator who opened his address in Boone with one joke after another, said of Ernst, "Joni rocks … She promised to make people [in Washington] squeal. They're squealing. Mainly the men," before going on to praise her military service.

Most of the content in the addresses from the candidates was typical GOP campaign fare: calls to rein in government, tackle radical Islam and embrace American exceptionalism.

Rubio, the Florida senator, made those points as well, but he also used his speech to sharpen his rebuttal to criticism from some, including those within his own party, who say he's too inexperienced to run for president. Some Republicans had expected Rubio to step aside for fellow Floridian Jeb Bush and hold onto his Senate seat instead.

"I've heard the voices, some have said I shouldn't run, I should have waited my turn," Rubio said, adding he heard the same at the beginning of his successful 2010 Senate race. In a veiled swipe at both Bush and Hillary Clinton, he said to applause, "I ran then for the same reason I run now. If we keep promoting the same people, we get the same results and the future leaves us behind."

"The latest one is that I shouldn't run for president because I'm not rich enough," continued Rubio, whose personal finances have come under some scrutiny. "And it's true I don't make [millions] from speeches and I don't have a family foundation that's raised [billions], a lot of it from foreign donations. But my wife and I work to ensure we have enough money to send our kids to a Christian education at a private school. We have a mortgage we're paying … but the biggest debt I owe is to the United States."

Walker, like Rubio, also dinged family dynasties, comments that appeared directed at Bush: "My brother and I did not inherit fame or fortune from our family. What we got was more important. And that was the belief that if you work hard and play by the rules, you can be anything you want to be in America."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Everyone received standing ovations and had some applause lines — and as usual, Fiorina's Clinton zingers were well-received —but no one's performance brought down the house. The real action took place on the sidelines, where each of the candidates had a tent set up. There, volunteers took down attendees' information, and some — like Walker's tent — served up swag like beer coozies and candy. The candidates made appearances at their booths, where some Iowans demanded photos while others probed policy positions. Walker, Rubio and Perry were particularly mobbed as they worked the crowds, though everyone drew interested bystanders.

"I doubt the candidates will win any converts during their eight allotted minutes onstage — all of the activity is going to take place off stage, off the bikes, actually interacting with and talking to Iowans," said Matt Strawn, a former Iowa GOP chairman who worked closely with Ernst during her 2014 Senate campaign. "What I'm watching for are, which candidates understand this is meant to be a fun, relaxing event designed for them to interact with Iowans? Most of the large events in the state have been forums in ballroom theater settings, not an opportunity to spend a lot of time personally interacting."

To that end, Rubio indulged a woman who ribbed him about a recent story highlighting his rocky driving record — she referenced someone who had made it well into life without a ticket, to which Rubio replied that that person "doesn't live in Florida!" He could be found later carving up meat, while Walker was seen flipping pork chops on the grill. Perry was constantly surrounded by bikers and veterans, following a charity motorcycle ride he did to benefit an organization that provides service dogs to wounded veterans. And Fiorina lingered for pictures after the speeches were done.

The "Roast and Ride" shone the national spotlight on Ernst, who has been showered with attention from presidential contenders since her Senate contest — a race in which the bulk of the current presidential field showed up to curry favor as Ernst surrogates. Rubio, in particular, was an early endorser, and there is considerable overlap between Ernst's Senate campaign team and both the Rubio and Walker 2016 shops.

Ernst has no plans to endorse, but instead is aiming to serve as a facilitator between Iowa voters and the candidates who want to cozy up to them.
With the inaugural hog roast, Ernst is following in the footsteps of longtime Democratic Sen. Tom Harkin, whose seat she now holds. Harkin feted his party with an annual steak fry that became a must-attend event for Democratic presidential candidates and aspiring national Democratic figures over its 37-year run. The freshman senator aims to build a similar tradition.

"Sen. Harkin had the wonderful tradition of the Steak Fry, and this is actually an event we've wanted to do during the campaign cycle but didn't have the opportunity," Ernst said Saturday morning in Des Moines, where she kicked off a motorcycle ride to the event. "So we thought, why not start with an inaugural 'Roast and Ride,' a little twist … this is something uniquely Joni Ernst and I love it, so I'm glad to have so many people participating."

So far, there appears to be important party buy-in. Top Iowa officials attended, including Gov. Terry Branstad and Lt. Gov. Kim Reynolds —a personal friend of Ernst's —and both of them sent out solicitations for the event to build attendance.

"We've got a great group [of candidates], they're spending a lot of time in Iowa and I love that," Reynolds said. "My role is to encourage them to come here, come here often, go to all 99 counties … and really give Iowans the opportunity to ask questions."

In Iowa, pork, patriotism and presidential politics // WaPo // Jenna Johnson & Dan Balz – June 6, 2015

The day started with the sputtering roar of motorcycles and ended with pork sandwiches, and Republican presidential hopefuls taking shots at Hillary Rodham Clinton and President Obama.

Throughout the first "Roast and Ride" here on Saturday, Iowa Republicans made this case to anyone who would listen: This state still deeply matters in the nominating process -- plus, look how much fun it is to campaign here.

Presiding over the day was Sen. Joni Ernst, a Republican from Iowa, who has only been in Washington for five months but has quickly emerged as a powerful and popular conservative in her party. She hopes that the event -- which started with a 39-mile motorcycle ride from the edge of Des Moines to a rural event center -- will replace the famed Steak Fry that her predecessor, Democrat Tom Harkin, once held. Especially ahead of presidential elections.

"Iowa is always very important," Ernst told reporters after downing an oversized can of a zero-calorie energy drink, but before hopping on her bike. "Iowa is a great cross-section of America."

For a brand-new event, it sure felt like a time-tested tradition: Roughly 300 bikers showed up, plus hundreds more spectators carrying their own lawn chairs, dozens of national reporters and seven announced or likely presidential contenders. The candidates differentiated themselves by talking about their biographies, rather than attacking one another. But there was no clear winner from the afternoon's speeches -- one more sign of just how fluid the GOP race is here and nationally.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Iowans often roll their eyes at how easily they become stereotyped during the caucuses, but this event played up so many things that East Coasters think of when they think of the Midwest -- and that political strategists look for when planning campaign stops. A large red tractor sat near the stage, behind a wall of hay bales and in front of the local fire department's massive ladder truck that displayed an oversized American flag. Nearly every candidate who took the stage declared "God Bless America" and focused heavily on talking about how the working class has fallen behind under Democratic control -- along with criticizing Clinton, the Democratic front-runner.

The day started with breakfast at the Harley-Davidson Big Barn in Des Moines. The ride honored military veterans and many of the bikers wore leather vests, T-shirts or tattoos featuring patriotic phrases like: "Freedom isn't free."

Ernst has been riding bikes for most of her life -- starting with a dirt bike when she was a farm kid, riding messages from her mom out to her dad in the fields. She now rides a 2009 Harley-Davidson Softail Deluxe, which she wheeled to the front of the pack on Saturday morning. Right behind her was Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker on a rented 2015 Harley-Davidson Road King that he said rode just like the 2003 model he has at home. Alongside them was a black pickup truck with seven photographers and videographers in the bed. Former Texas governor Rick Perry also rode to the event, although on his own route accompanied by his own posse of military. Ernst had offered to let her Senate colleague, Marco Rubio of Florida, ride on the back of her hog, but he passed.

Ernst said there are parallels between riding a Harley and governing: "You have to be a leader, and you have to make decisive determinations of what path you want to take. So whatever that road is, you have to follow it." But when asked if riding a motorcycle should be a prerequisite for running for president, Ernst laughed and said: "Not a qualifier but definitely an interesting factoid."

Upon arriving at the event site, Ernst quipped, “No bugs in my teeth but plenty on the windshield.”

The venue, the Central Iowa Expo, provided a state-fair-like feel to the event -- much like the Iowa Republican Party's straw poll, which is expected to happen in August in the same location, although no top-tier candidates have committed to attending. Attendees ate roasted pork sandwiches, potato salad, baked beans and chips, while the Iowa band The Nadas played country music over blaring speakers. Some people played picnic games. Perry and Walker wore black shirts, jeans and caps. Former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee was the only one to wear a sport coat.

The main attraction was speeches from seven declared or likely presidential candidates. Among those missing was former Florida governor Jeb Bush, who was with his family celebrating the 90th birthday of his mother, Barbara. They all painted a bleak picture of America under Obama's leadership and, of course, lavished praise on Ernst. "I love a senator who knows how to castrate a pig, ride a hog and cut the pork in Washington, D.C.," Walker said.

Walker talked up his Midwestern values and the importance of freedom, while pointing out that Harley-Davidson is based in Wisconsin. Perry -- who took the stage with a "Howdy, Iowa!" -- focused heavily on patriotism and the need for national leadership. Former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina and retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson both blasted big government. Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina -- who dropped joke after joke -- called for a better defense of the country. Rubio talked about the American Dream, the new century and defended himself against criticism that he is too young and inexperienced to run. Huckabee talked about an economic vision that is at odds with many in his party.

Collectively, the candidates impressed the activists who sat through the seven speeches, but individually there was no clear favorite.

“I think we have a fantastic field,” said David Freligh of Pella. “I am not yet in favor of anyone in particular but I am reassured that there’s a good strong field of very qualified people. I feel good about it.

“I’ve always liked Ben Carson because he can unite the nation. I thought Carly was very articulate, and Scott Walker was very articulate. I have not made up my mind.

“They’re all so impressive,” said Bonnie Cornick, of Creston. “I’ve been sitting here talking to the people next to us saying how am I ever going to caucus because I like them all?"

She cited Walker, Rubio and Perry as three who impressed her, but added, “There isn’t a one of them I don’t [like].”

Sonya Crosby of Ottumwa listed Graham, Rubio and Huckabee among her favorites. “They’re all good, though,” she said. Asked how she would make up her mind, she said, “I don’t know at this point. Keep listening. It’s tough.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Can conservatives find their footing in Hollywood in 2016? // CNN // Maeve Reston – June 5, 2015

The West Coast has long been a fundraising bastion for Democrats -- famously fueling the long struggle between Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton in the 2008 presidential race when Hollywood's loyalties were divided. And George Clooney grabbed headlines in 2012 by raising a $15 million haul for Obama in one night.

But Republicans have raised plenty of money on the West Coast -- albeit more quietly than their Democratic rivals. Now the Republican Jewish Coalition, with its roster of influential donors and board members, is looking to raise the profile of Hollywood conservatives at their annual gala Sunday night in Beverly Hills.

Arizona Sen. John McCain, New Hampshire Sen. Kelly Ayotte and Wisconsin Sen. Ron Johnson will be the featured guests at the gathering, but the Republican Jewish Coalition is also hosting its own red carpet to draw attention to more conservative actors and studio executives including Raquel Welch, Angie Harmon, Jeremy Boreing and Nick Searcy.

On Sunday night, the group plans to honor actor Jon Voight, who has often drawn headlines with his vociferous critiques of President Barack Obama's approach to foreign policy.

The group plans to praise Voight for his outspoken support of Israel, and specifically for responding publicly to an open letter signed by Penelope Cruz and Javier Bardem, as well as other Spanish actors, directors and writers that condemned the incursion into Gaza by the Israeli military last year. European press outlets reported that the letter signed by Cruz, Bardem and Pedro Almodovar urged a cease-fire and was critical of Israel's actions in Gaza.

In his opinion column in The Hollywood Reporter, Voight wrote that he was "heartsick that people like Penelope Cruz and Javier Bardem could incite anti-Semitism all over the world and are oblivious to the damage they have caused."

Both Bardem and Cruz, who are married, issued statements after the event clarifying that they were expressing their wish for peace in the region.

"I am now being labeled by some as anti-Semitic, as is my wife -- which is the antithesis of who we are as human beings," Bardem said in a statement last year. "We detest anti-Semitism as much as we detest the horrible and painful consequences of war."

Nick Searcy of the FX series "Justified" said he and others would be attending the gala Sunday in part to honor Voight's advocacy for conservative causes as an example to others with similar political views.

"There are really are some (conservatives)" in Hollywood," Searcy told CNN in a telephone interview. "I've met them -- some of them will tell you who they are and some of them won't."

Searcy called political recognition of Voight by the Republican Jewish Coalition "a big step."

"Jon obviously has been very outspoken in his disagreements with the Obama-Democrat foreign policy, and at the same time, he doesn't seem to be hurting for work," Searcy said. "In a town like Hollywood -- where we're supposed to be about freedom of thought and freedom of expression -- it's good to see Jon practicing that."

GOP hopefuls blame Obama's China policy for data breach // The Hill // Cory Bennett – June 6, 2015

OP presidential hopefuls are bashing President Obama over his handling of China in the wake of a massive digital theft of federal workers' data that officials have tied to Beijing.

The Office of Personnel Management (OPM) on Thursday revealed that hackers had snapped up roughly 4 million employees' records.

Several Republican candidates argued on Friday that Obama's failure to employ a strong hand with the Asian power empowered the country to launch digital assaults at will against the U.S. government and private sector.

"The lack of common sense in this White House is beyond breathtaking," said former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee.
"We need a different strategy to confront Chinese behavior — whether in the South China Sea or in cyberspace," said Carly Fiorina, the former Hewlett-Packard executive, on Facebook.

"Yet another example of America being walked over by rivals and adversaries," said Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), who declared his candidacy Monday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In recent years, security experts say China has built up its cyber capabilities, ranking as a leading world power.

In addition to using its considerable prowess to monitor its own citizens, China has also launched a pervasive cyber espionage campaign against the U.S.

“China is rapidly evolving from a sometime partner, sometime competitor, into an adversary,” Fiorina said.

The recent OPM breach is thought to be part of a broader scheme to create a database on high-ranking U.S. officials and defense contractors.

Researchers have linked the suspected OPM hackers to the digital intruders behind the gargantuan breaches at health insurers Anthem and Premera, which exposed over 90 million people’s data, possibly including that of White House cybersecurity coordinator Michael Daniel.

Experts worry the stockpile of data could be used to imitate or even blackmail senior U.S. officials.

“They have a tremendous amount of stepping stones they can use for further activity,” said John Hultquist, senior manager of online espionage threat intelligence at iSight, a security firm.

The problem, say Republican candidates, is that China has no fear of repercussions.

“We need a leader who will challenge the status quo in Washington and confront our adversaries abroad,” said Fiorina.

The U.S. has struggled to maintain diplomatic cyber relations with China, while simultaneously trying to step up pressure on Beijing to end its hacking and digital theft of commercial secrets.

The Justice Department last year indicted five members of the Chinese military for hacking.

Recently updated White House and Pentagon national security and cybersecurity documents also directly call out China on cyber espionage.

But the administration continues to promote a diplomatic path in the hopes of establishing international norms in cyberspace. The Department of Homeland Security has taken steps to reestablish an official cyber dialogue, which was cut off following the DOJ indictments last year.

The tactic doesn’t sit well with the GOP field.

“The Obama administration's failures in foreign policy and national security continue to pile up yet they do nothing to change course,” Graham said.

Huckabee has criticized the president for even engaging China in trade deals.

“China cheats, rips-off American products, abuses its people, taunts our allies, and now they're crawling through our federal government stealing sensitive personal information from millions of people,” he said.

“As president, I will stop Chinese cheating, hold China accountable, and never, ever apologize for protecting Americans.”

TOP NEWS

DOMESTIC

Marriage today: rich-poor gap, later vows, gays gain access // AP // David Crary – June 6, 2015

Through two decades of debate on whether America's gays and lesbians should have the right to marry, opponents of such unions depicted their resistance as "defense of marriage." Now, on the cusp of a Supreme Court ruling that could legalize same-sex marriage nationwide, the underlying institution is under scrutiny anew.

Does marriage in America indeed need help? What kind of shape is it in? In simplest terms, the diagnosis is mixed.

Among college-educated, relatively affluent couples, marriage is doing pretty well. Where education and income levels are lower, it's often a different story — higher divorce rates, and far more children being born out of wedlock, including many to single mothers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There's broad sentiment that this "marriage gap" is unfortunate, but no consensus on what to do about it. Some believe government-funded marriage-promotion programs can make a difference, although their effectiveness has been questioned. Others depict marriage-focused solutions as misguided and say the problems can be eased only by broader economic and social initiatives benefiting all types of households.

"There is no one silver bullet," said David Blankenhorn, head of a centrist think-tank, the Institute for American Values, that focuses much of its work on marriage and families.

Yet despite uncertainty about solutions, he and others believe there is now an opportunity to bridge the left-right split over marriage, particularly in light of the sweeping gains for gay and lesbian couples, which have changed the tenor of the discussion.

For many years, the gay-marriage debate was intertwined with assertions about "traditional marriage" between a man and a woman. A federal act passed in 1996 and a subsequent wave of amendments adopted in many states used the term "defense of marriage" to deny recognition to same-sex unions. Many opponents of same-sex marriage argued that allowing gays to wed would somehow undermine heterosexual marriage.

Such arguments have fared poorly in recent federal court cases. And there's a strong likelihood that the Supreme Court will order the legalization of same-sex marriage in all 50 states in a ruling expected soon. Opinion polls show a solid majority of Americans support it.

"Marriage as culture war in America can now be replaced by marriage as common cause," said a coalition of scholars and civic leaders in their manifesto for a new initiative called Marriage Opportunity.

The group, with Blankenhorn as an organizer, envisions liberals fighting for economic opportunity, conservatives fighting for stronger families and gays who have now won marriage rights for themselves all uniting to confront the marriage gap and to promote "a new embrace of marriage's promise."

Among the scholars chronicling the marriage gap is Andrew Cherlin, a sociologist at Johns Hopkins University and author of "Labor's Love Lost: The Rise and Fall of the Working-Class Family in America."

Cherlin says the gap stems in large measure from the loss of stable, well-paid industrial jobs — consigning legions of young adults to precarious, low-paid jobs, and prompting many to put off marriage even while having children out of wedlock.

In contrast, college-educated young adults are more likely to wait until marriage to have children and then have the prospect of raising them in a household supported by two good incomes. For such couples, Cherlin writes, marriage is a status symbol, and their divorce rates are now much lower than for couples with only a high school education.

According to the Pew Research Center, the share of American adults who have never been married is at an historic high. In 2012, roughly 20 percent of adults 25 and older had never been married, compared to only 9 percent of adults in that age range in 1960. Back then, according to Pew, the likelihood of being married didn't vary according to level of education; now men with advanced degrees are far more likely to have married than those who didn't go beyond high school.

There's a wealth of other data illustrating challenges confronting the institution of marriage:

—Americans are waiting longer to get married. According to the Census Bureau, the current median age for a first marriage — 29 for men and 27 for women — is the highest in more than a century. In 1960, the median age at first marriage was 23 for men and 20 for women.

—Unmarried mothers account for 40.6 percent of children born in the U.S., according to the latest Census data. The rate is particularly high in the African-American community — 71.5 percent.

—Even for couples raising children, marriage is increasingly optional. According to the research group Child Trends, there were 3.1 million cohabiting but unmarried couples in the U.S. raising children in 2014, up from 1.2 million in 1996.

Tera Jordan, a professor of human development at Iowa State University, has studied various aspects of marriage and relationships among black Americans.

To the extent that marriage is under siege in their communities, she sees a need for multiple changes — more access to good-paying jobs, better educational opportunities, a lowering of the incarceration rate for young black men. Her advice to young adults wondering about marriage: "Be clear about your goals, be patient. Finish your education."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Long-term, she is optimistic.

"Americans still hold marriage in very high regard," she said.

Before moving to Iowa, Jordan worked with a federally funded marriage-strengthening program in Georgia. In all, according to experts who study the field, more than $1 billion in public funding has been spent since 2005 on an array of marriage and relationship programs.

Yet the effectiveness of these programs remains subject to debate.

For example, there were negative findings in a rigorous study of a federally funded program called Building Strong Families, which taught relationship skills to more than 5,100 low-income, unwed couples who were expecting a child or just had a baby.

The study by Mathematica Policy Research found that after three years, the program had no effect on the quality of couples' relationships and co-parenting skills, and did not make them more likely to stay together or get married.

The largest and most durable state-level program is the Oklahoma Marriage Initiative, recently renamed Project Relate. Since its launch in 1999, it has served more than 400,000 Oklahomans — about 10 percent of the population.

Alan Hawkins, professor of Family Life at Brigham Young University, describes it as "the most comprehensive and effective public policy effort to help couples achieve healthy relationships and enduring marriages." It provides relationship education for teens, young adults, unmarried cohabiting parents, engaged couples and married couples.

One of its primary programs, Family Expectations, entails 30 hours of classes for low-income expectant parents, whether married or not, who want to strengthen their relationships. Independent assessments found that couples taking the program are more likely to stay together than other couples. Other research has credited Oklahoma's initiative with a slight increase in the percentage of children living with two parents and a slight decrease in the percentage living in poverty.

Kendy Cox, a senior director of Project Relate, said its annual funding is between $6.5 million and $7 million, mostly from federal welfare appropriations.

Many low-income couples believe in the concept of marriage, Cox said, yet are unsure if it's the right step for them.

"It's become seen as sort of pie in the sky for some couples," she said. "Even if they've already had a baby, they have this sense of, 'I have so much work to do before we can even consider marriage.'"

Among the graduates of Family Expectations is Rachel Chudoba, 27, who now has a job with Public Strategies, the private firm which handles daily management of the marriage initiative.

Chudoba and her then-fiance, Chad — now her husband — were only 19 when they signed up for Family Expectations in 2007.

"We both wanted to do it," Chudoba said. "We were pretty much in agreement that we didn't know what we were doing."

They put in a full day of coursework each Saturday for six weeks, then received periodic coaching over the next two years. They're now parents of a son and daughter.

Chudoba said the communications skills they learned came in handy when Chad, a member of the Army National Guard, was deployed to Afghanistan in 2013.

"Our communication was so sporadic — mostly by email," she said. "All the things I was taught were really important in those moments."

Among the lessons she applied, Chudoba said, was learning to take a timeout when an argument flared.

"It's hard to acknowledge that you need a timeout in a conversation when you don't get to talk very often," Chudoba said. "But being separated for a year, you are going to have disagreements, and solving them is difficult."

Chudoba said both she and her husband came from challenging backgrounds — both of Rachel's parents had multiple divorces, while Chad spent time in foster care.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We didn't have a lot of positive examples of how to have a relationship and how to raise children," she said. "That was a huge thing for me and my husband — not repeating the mistakes of the older generation."

Several members of her extended family are in their early 20s, and wondering where marriage fits in their future. "I see people who are apprehensive," Chudoba said. "I see a lot of looking for answers."

Oklahoma, along with Utah, also has initiated a program seeking to save some marriages by curtailing divorce. Hawkins, the BYU professor, says they are the only states with mandatory education programs for divorcing parents that include specific advice on how to reconcile.

According to Hawkins, about 10 percent of divorcing couples — both husband and wife — still want to save the marriage even near the end of the divorce process.

"Divorce may be easy legally, but it's not easy psychologically — very few people are casual about it," he said. "Even many people experiencing some of the hardest problems — adultery, substance abuse — don't want a divorce and are willing to work hard to solve those problems."

Looking nationally, Hawkins says he understands the widespread skepticism about state-backed marriage programs.

"Success has been modest in relation to the size of the problem," he said. "We don't know what levers we could pull to make a difference."

In Raleigh, North Carolina, Brad Hambrick says he's seen positive results from a mentoring program for young couples at the Summit Church, a Southern Baptist congregation that he serves as pastor of counseling.

Raleigh, he says, has a large population of transients — a status that can be challenging for newly married couples.

"If you don't have that network of parents, aunts, uncles, high school friends, marriage bears much more of the total social weight," he said. "What is expected of marriage becomes much greater — it either winds up being really good or really bad."

He recalls one younger couple in the church's program telling their mentors, "You're the first people who've talked positively to us about marriage."

Among the veteran mentors is Tom Droege, 57, a software developer who has teamed up with his wife, Paula, for more than a decade of counseling younger couples. Part of what they teach is how to handle conflict — including "how to fight fairly," he says.

"What they get from our program is a better understanding of expectations, so that when they run into the typical kinds of challenges that marriage presents, they don't feel that it only happens to them — it's normal."

GOP-led states trying bolster budgets by limiting government assistance programs // Fox News – June 6, 2015

Lawmakers in the Sunflower State have been scrambling for years to make up a $400 million revenue gap following a 2012 income tax cut that left deep holes in the state budget.

Republican Gov. Sam Brownback wants recover some of the money by placing limits on government assistance.

Starting in July, people in Kansas who collect government assistance will be limited to a single ATM withdrawal not exceeding $25 per day. The Kansas law also prohibits public-assistance spending at swimming pools, tattoo parlors and video arcades.

Though it might sound extreme to some, Kansas is just the latest GOP-led state to launch campaigns to cut or limit public assistance.

A 2014 Pew Research Center survey found that 73 percent of Republicans and 32 percent of Democrats believe the government can't afford to spend much more on assistance programs. The number of families receiving cash through the Temporary Assistance for Needy Families program stood at 1.5 million at the end of 2014.

When Brownback signed the bill in April he defended it by saying the primary focus isn't a handout but instead to "get people back to work, because that's where the real benefit is – getting people off public assistance and back into the marketplace with the dignity and far more income there than the pittance that government gives them."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Shannon Cotsoradis, president of the advocacy group Kansas Action for Children, told Bloomberg News that state lawmakers “acted on anecdotes” about TANF cards being used on cruise ships and casinos and that the information used to sway lawmakers isn’t “data-driven.”

But lawmakers in a growing number of states believe chipping away at a budget shortfall can be done by limiting the amount of government assistance being doled out.

In Michigan, the state Senate recently passed a bill that would put families on the welfare chopping block if their children are regularly absent from school. The “Parental Responsibility Act” would give the state the ability to cut off assistance if a child whose parents are receiving assistance is chronically truant.

If the child is younger than 16, the whole family could lose its cash benefits.

“During the recession there were lots of blue states, for fiscally driven reasons, that were cutting welfare,” Liz Schott, a senior fellow at the liberal Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, a Washington think tank, told Bloomberg News. “This year’s cuts feel more ideologically driven.”

In May, Missouri’s Republican legislature overrode a veto by Gov. Jay Nixon, a Democrat, to enact a bill that would take away assistance from more than 6,400 children -- 2,600 of them below the age of 5, his office said in published reports.

Nixon described the bill “a misguided measure that punishes poor children” in a “zeal to reduce reliance on government assistance.”

And in Arizona, lawmakers slashed the amount of time residents could stay on assistance to 1 year – the shortest window in the nation.

The Associated Press described the cuts as a reflection of the “prevailing mood” among lawmakers who believe that public assistance programs are what keeps the poor from getting back on their feet permanently.

But not everyone subscribes to the sentiment.

Jessica Lopez, 23, said cutting off benefits isn’t fair.

Lopez, who gets $133 per month, gave birth to her son while living in a domestic violence shelter and has struggled to hold onto jobs because she has dyslexia and didn’t finish high school.

“We’re all human,” she told the AP. “Everybody has problems. Everybody is different. When people ask for help, we should be able to get it without having to be looked at wrong.”

INTERNATIONAL

Behind Tough Talk on Russia, G-7 Leaders Face Tough Reality // AP // Julie Pace – June 6, 2015

Behind the tough talk on Russia expected from President Barack Obama and other leaders gathering in Germany this weekend is a stark reality.

None of the world powers believes the economic and diplomatic punishments levied on Russia for its alleged aggression in Ukraine are changing President Vladimir Putin's calculus, yet there are no plans to shift strategies.

At most, leaders hope to emerge from two days of talks in the Bavarian Alps with an agreement to keep U.S. and European Union sanctions against Russia in place, and perhaps a pledge to enact deeper economic penalties if the crisis escalates. While there is little expectation that a show of unity will lead to a quick resolution in Ukraine, officials hope it will at least give Putin pause if he is considering ratcheting up Russia's moves.

A fresh outbreak of violence between government troops and pro-Russian separatists in eastern Ukraine is threatening to derail an already tenuous cease-fire.

The fact that sanctions have not altered Putin's military posture is "a sign of how heedless the Russian government seems to be about the long-term welfare of its own people that it has not yet resulted in a change, in a reversal at least, of course, which is what we want out of Russia," Defense Secretary Ash Carter told reporters after a Friday meeting in Germany with American military and diplomatic leaders.

The Group of Seven summit marks the second year in a row that leaders from the United States, Canada, Britain, France, Germany, Italy and Japan will assemble without Putin. After Russia annexed territory from Ukraine last year, the world powers kicked Russia out of what had been called the Group of Eight, a move aimed at isolating Putin and signaling the West's united opposition to his provocative actions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Yet Putin remains a major player on pressing issues.

Russia is a partner of the U.S. and other nations in the nuclear talks with Iran, an Obama priority. Putin is a linchpin in any discussions on resolving the civil war in Syria, given Russia's status as President Bashar Assad's biggest benefactor.

Republicans have accused Obama of putting his interest in the Iran nuclear talks above supporting Ukraine. GOP White House hopeful Jeb Bush is set to arrive in Europe just as Obama departs, with stops in Germany, Poland and Estonia. Bush is expected to pledge broader U.S. backing for the region if elected president.

White House officials defend the engagement with Russia on Iran and other matters, and say the U.S. can work with Moscow on issues of mutual interest while also confronting Putin over Ukraine.

But experts say Secretary of State John Kerry's meetings with Putin in Russia last month raised questions in Europe about whether Washington might be pursuing a new policy toward the Kremlin. Kerry's trip was the first time a senior U.S. official has traveled to Russia since Moscow annexed the Crimean Peninsula from Ukraine.

"It created this cloud of controversy around what is the U.S. strategy: Why did he go?" said Julianne Smith, a former Obama White House official who is now a senior fellow at the Center for New American Security. "So I think there'll be a little bit of mopping up from that trip."

European nations are watching whether the U.S. commitment to isolating and penalizing Russia is weakening. Europe has far stronger ties to Russia than the U.S. and some leaders face pressure from the business community to ease off penalties that have affected their finances.
Still, the European Union is expected to renew expiring sanctions later this summer.

Thousands of people gathered Saturday in a town a few miles from the summit venue to protest a range of causes, including a proposed trans-Atlantic trade deal, before the leaders' arrival.

Obama departed Washington Saturday evening after delivering an emotional eulogy at the funeral service for Vice President Joe Biden's son, Beau. Joining Obama on Air Force One for the trip to Germany were four House Democrats who support his efforts to win special authority to negotiate a Pacific Rim trade deal.

The trade debate on Capitol Hill is being closely watched by G-7 leaders. While Obama has Senate backing to seek fast-track authority of the Trans Pacific Partnership pact, he faces a steep challenge in getting his own party's support in the House. Japan a*nd Canada are both part of TPP.*

European nations are not part of the pact, but the congressional debate could affect whether Obama has the political capital left to pursue a trans-Atlantic trade deal with the EU before leaving office.

After his overnight flight to Munich, Obama was to meet with German Chancellor Angela Merkel, then join other leaders for talks at Schloss Elmau, a one-time Bavarian ar*tist retreat turned luxury spa.*

Also on Obama's schedule was a meeting with British Prime Minister David Cameron, whose party is coming off an unexpectedly strong election victory. The president also planned to see Iraqi Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi, who was invited to the G-7 meeting to discuss the U.S.-led campaign against the Islamic State in his country, as well as in Syria.

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS

Running Against Hillary // NYT // Ross Douthat – June 6, 2015

BEFORE anything else is said, they deserve the thanks of a grateful nation. Bernie Sanders, Martin O'Malley, even Lincoln Chafee: They are stepping up where others quailed, laying their bodies on democracy's altar, saving their party's nominating contest from resembling a presidential re-election in Kazakhstan.

But if they aspire to more than just holding Hillary Clinton below the 97.7 percent of the vote that Nursultan Nazarbayev claimed in his last trip to the hustings, her primary rivals will need more than courage. They'll need a plan.

A little while ago, the plan for a not-Hillary candidate looked obvious: While Clinton played it safe and hugged the political center, her challenger would run hard to her left, channel the energy of the party's grass-roots activists, campaign against the front-runner's establishment instincts and her husband's triangulating past.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This road map did not promise victory. (Only Hillary herself can stop Hillary from winning — and even then not without a lot of work.) But it promised, at least, a meaningful battle of ideas, and maybe even a chance to make things close in Iowa.

Since her official entrance into the race, however, Hillary has moved aggressively to shrink the space for that kind of battle. Her big policy statements – on criminal justice reform, immigration, and now universal voter registration – have all aligned her explicitly with the party's activists, and to an extent many them did not expect.

Her theory seems to be that the political center has moved leftward, and that mobilizing Democratic constituencies will matter as much in the general election as reaching out to swing voters; she may also be haunted, understandably, by memories of 2008. (There's no reason to think she isn't sincere in her new stances, but with the Clintons it's always fair to analyze strategy before belief.)

Whatever the motivation, this new positioning has made it even harder for the not-Hillarys to run against her. They can move further to her left (Sanders, in particular, won't have trouble doing so), but then their campaigns will seem even more quixotic. And if Hillary stays committed to their major goals, the party's activists will have clear incentives to just take her "yes" for an answer.

So what remains for our brave few, our band of brothers? Well, they can attack her as a latecomer, a flip-flopper, a fair-weather progressive. But such charges are rarely politically effective; if they were, Mitt Romney would never have been the 2012 G.O.P. nominee. At some level, voters know that they're voting for the platform more than for the candidate. And the left, in particular, has philosophical reasons to be comfortable with flip-flops: If you think the Arc of History is bending toward your ideas, then it's actually a kind of vindication when a politician bends your way.

Alternatively, our anti-Hillarys can focus on foreign policy, where her Iraq War vote helped doom her seven years ago. Here they'll have a stronger case, since she probably remains more hawkish (see her role in our Libyan war for evidence) than her party's dovish base.

But Clinton can find shelter by associating herself with the current president: She'll just say (as she's already saying) that she's exactly as hawkish as Obama, no less and no more. If he escalates against ISIS, she'll support it; if not, she won't. Ditto Putin, Assad, you name it. This won't protect her left flank fully, but so long as she's hugging the president she'll lose more left-wing intellectuals than actual progressive voters.

So all that really remains for her would-be challengers is to attack her ethics. There, at last, the anti-Hillary argument becomes an easy one: From the Nixonian style of her State Department operation to the way her family fattened itself on global tribute during her recent public service, her rivals can point to sins and misdemeanors that would have already disqualified a lesser candidate.

But will many Democrats really want to hear that argument? The advantage of making an ideological case against Hillary is that progressives can accept it – yes, she's not as liberal as we would like, we're glad somebody's pressing her, and maybe we'll cast a protest vote for them – and still feel O.K. about her inevitability and about voting for her in the general election.

The ethical case, on the other hand, is more personal, discomfiting, and easily repurposed by Republicans. So any time Hillary's rivals offer those kinds of critiques, their audience will hear intimations of G.O.P. attacks to come. And since she's almost certainly going to be the nominee, Democratic voters may not be particularly grateful for the foretaste; they may, instead, dismiss the men offering it for giving aid and comfort to the enemy.

In which case those men will still deserve our gratitude. Because then, at least, whatever happens in a Clinton presidency, her supporters won't be able to say that they weren't warned.

Hillary the Tormentor // NYT // Frank Bruni – June 6, 2015

LATELY I've been running into people even more put off by the Clintons than the nefarious operatives in the "vast right wing conspiracy" ever were.

They're called Democrats.

I had breakfast with one last week. I'd quote him directly, but The Times doesn't permit profanity.

He's furious at Hillary and Bill, because they've once again created all these ugly, obvious messes that they could and should have avoided. He's disgusted, because he has come to believe that they're tainted.

He's also resolute: He's voting — even rooting — for Hillary.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Party loyalty motivates him. On top of which, he's worried about the Supreme Court and how a Republican president might pack it.

And he keeps hearing the voices of little girls in his life who have asked him whether a woman can be president of the United States in reality, not just on some TV show.

He wants them to see: Yes, she can.

So here he stands, or rather squirms, exhilarated by what Hillary embodies and repelled by what she represents, wanting to see her take the oath and wanting never to lay eyes on her and Bill again, determined that they reclaim the White House and despairing of the muddy road there and the certain muck beyond. He's a riot of warring emotions, a paradox with a pulse.

The Clintons will do that to a person.

Or to a country.

There was a suggestion last week that Clinton weariness and wariness had again overtaken Americans: Two new national polls showed that regard for Hillary had declined, at least for the moment, to levels not seen in many years.

In both surveys, more respondents saw her unfavorably than favorably. In the one by ABC News and The Washington Post, only 41 percent said that she was honest and trustworthy, while 52 percent said that she wasn't.

Such findings will fluctuate, as Jack Shafer noted aptly and archly in Politico: "While glory awaits the journalist who buries Hillary Clinton, carves her tombstone and tidies her grave, the makings of her demise cannot be read in these poll results. Clinton rides a favorability roller coaster, and has been riding it hard for the past 23 years."

I bring no coffin, carry no shovel and am less interested in her roller coaster than in the hard ride that she and Bill have taken us on. It never ends.

And it's different from politics as usual. It's politics as a peculiar form of psychological torture, because the Clintons have a way — it's their trademark — of being the best, most exciting vessel for people's hopes even as they make those people feel icky about their investment in the couple.

Just ask Democrats who were in Congress during Bill's impeachment. Many fought to save his presidency, and thus gave the requisite interviews and said the right words, all the while roiling with outrage over the selfish, reckless manner in which he'd put his and the party's agenda at risk.

Just look at all the liberal women who rallied then to his defense, studiously turning a blind eye to his personal behavior because his policy priorities were preferable to those of his attackers. It was an understandable bargain, but it wasn't a pretty one.

It's never as simple and humdrum as being for or against the Clintons. And while countless other politicians force supporters to make special allowances, stomach imperfections and come to terms with a tangle of good and bad, few do so on the Clintons' operatic scale.

A prediction: With the publication on June 16 of two new books that assess Richard Nixon — "One Man Against the World: The Tragedy of Richard Nixon," by Tim Weiner, and "Being Nixon: A Man Divided," by Evan Thomas — you're going to see and hear some comparisons of Nixon and Hillary.

These will touch on paranoia and on relationships (or, rather, the lack of them) with reporters.

"It's definitely true that Hillary is like Nixon in her sense of aggrievement and her deep suspicion of the press," Thomas told me, though he hastened to add, "Nixon ultimately was a darker figure."

It's also true that voting for her may require of many Democrats what voting for him did of many Republicans, which is the suppression of profound misgivings. Thomas said that in 1968, people backing Nixon often felt that "there really wasn't any other choice." At least for the nomination, he was inevitable.

As is she, and this time around, in contrast to 2008, there's no Barack Obama in the wings, at least none that Democratic operatives can detect. Bernie Sanders, Martin O'Malley and Lincoln Chafee don't qualify.

At some point over the last year Democrats placed just about all of their chips on Hillary, reassured by the depth of her experience, aware of how much money she could raise, and inspired by what a perfect sequel to Barack Obama she'd be. He broke the color barrier. Now she'd shatter the glass ceiling that she put all those cracks in.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the Clintons facilitate a thrilling scenario only to pollute it. They come wrapped in shiny folds of promise and good intentions, then the packaging comes off, and what lies beneath are emails from Sidney Blumenthal, shakedowns of Petra Nemcova.

Recently Bill wrote a letter to supporters of his, Hillary's and Chelsea's sprawling charitable foundation, outlining its global reach. He described the breadth of services it provides, including H.I.V./AIDS medicines for nearly 10 million people in 70 countries, and the diversity of people it supports, from farmers in Africa to female entrepreneurs in Latin America.

His words were a reminder that perhaps no other former president has lavished so much travel and star power on such an ambitious engine of good deeds. The foundation is an exemplar.

Until you peek inside and behold a convoluted braid of public service and personal aggrandizement, a queasy-making brew of altruism and vanity, a mechanism for employing loyalists and rewarding friends, a bazaar for favor trading. Straightforward admiration is no longer possible.

Frustration supplants it. Worry, too. A few days ago I spoke with one Democratic elder who ranted, like my breakfast companion, about all the ammunition that the Clintons had needlessly created for a Republican nominee.

He envisioned a flood of negative ads in Florida and Ohio about State Department emails, speaking fees and foreign donations. He said that this deluge could very well make a difference.

He was livid.

Would that keep him from campaigning for Hillary?

No, he said. Even if he couldn't count on her, she could count on him.

It didn't seem fair.

It did seem familiar.

Why Join the Military With a Reckless (Meaning Republican) Commander-In-Chief? // HuffPo //
Doug Bandow – June 6, 2015

Former governor and presidential candidate Michael Huckabee issued a clarion call for young Americans not to join the military if he or virtually any Republican wins the presidency in 2016. Well, that's not exactly what he said. But it was the obvious implication of his remarks.

Huckabee declared: "I'd wait a couple of years, until we got a new commander-in-chief, that will once again believe one nation under God and believes that people of faith should be a vital part of the process of not only governing, but defending this country." It was an oblique, even confusing attack on President Barack Obama. Apparently the former Baptist pastor was upset about Pentagon restrictions on proselytizing within the armed services.

It's a fair area for debate since the Obama administration sometimes has taken a careless, if not hostile, stance toward religious liberty. But there's no evidence that the president doesn't want people of faith joining the military (or being involved in "governing," whatever that means).

However, Huckabee inadvertently raised a far more important issue. Should Americans join the military if the next commander-in-chief of the armed services is an arrogant, ignorant, irresponsible, war-happy hawk? Patriotic young men and women want to serve their country, challenge themselves and more. Many of America's best and brightest join the armed services. But with the U.S. constantly at war, joining is a life or death decision, dependent on the judgment of whoever sits in the Oval Office.

There is much to criticize in President Obama's foreign policy. He is too aggressive -- twice increasing troop levels in Afghanistan, and recently prolonging the U.S. presence, going to war in Libya, making the Islamic State's sectarian conflict America's own, putting combat and training personnel in a number of smaller conflicts, including Uganda and Ukraine. The administration's execution also often suffers. Sadly, the word incompetent comes to mind.

Nevertheless, the president apparently is thoughtful and thus reluctant to loose the dogs of war. In contrast, ever-angry 2008 presidential candidate John McCain urges war in virtually every circumstance. He never seems to think about the consequences of bombing or invading other nations. One would be a real risk-taker to join the military under such a commander-in-chief.

President George W. Bush demonstrated a different set of faults. By all accounts he knew little about the countries he was invading and peoples he was fighting. He believed the fairy tale promises of more "optimistic" advisers. He wasn't willing to finish what he started, essentially abandoning the Afghan war, which was tied to 9/11, to initiate the far most disastrous Iraq war, which was unrelated to the attack on America. Bush then refused to accept responsibility while carrying on with a failed policy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As a consequence, more than 4,500 American service members, plus other U.S. employees and contractors, died needlessly. New enemies and enemy organizations were created, such as the Islamic State, which are active today. Iran was greatly empowered, the same Iran that most of the current GOP presidential candidates believe should be bombed. It is a miracle -- or a testament to so many Americans' deep patriotism -- that anyone enlisted while Bush was president (and Richard Cheney was vice president, a scary heartbeat away from the Oval Office).

The 2016 contenders are almost all worse than President Obama. There are some outliers, like Sen. Rand Paul and former Senators Jim Webb and Lincoln Chaffee. A few others are unclear players such as Ohio Gov. John Kasich and former governors Jeb Bush and Martin O'Malley. The first group take a more nuanced and restrained approach to foreign policy, though not all their positions are consistent. The others so far have not committed themselves or have given conflicting signals.

The other contenders appear more interested in promoting ideology than addressing reality in foreign policy. For instance, Hillary Clinton has spent most of her political life as a hawk. She reportedly was a leading advocate of military action in the Balkans in the 1990s -- a complicated, murderous conflict of primary interest to Europe in which the U.S. ignored massive ethnic cleansing by its allies, Croatia and the ethnic Albanian Kosovars. Bosnia and Kosovo remain problems because the U.S. attempted to impose a "solution" from outside through force.

As senator, Clinton voted to authorize the Iraq war, the most foolish, counterproductive foreign policy decision by the U.S. government in decades. Iran was empowered, sectarianism exploded in Iraq, and radical forces including the Islamic State were born. She obviously learned no lessons, however.

As secretary of state, Clinton was a constant advocate of more war. She appeared to enthusiastically back the force build-up in Afghanistan and insisted that war was an option against Iran. Observed neocon intellectual Robert Kagan: "I feel comfortable with her on foreign policy." He told the New York Times that her policy is "something that might have been called neocon, but clearly her supporters are not going to call it that."

Libya was Clinton's war. That conflict was supposed to be another cakewalk. Alas, it resulted in thousands of deaths, multiple war atrocities, an incipient civil war, another home for Islamic State killers, and the regional spread of arms, including anti-aircraft missiles. The good news is that no Americans died fighting. But Americans stationed in Libya died afterwards, on her watch, and now are at risk battling the Islamic State. Out of office, she supported the president's initial plan for bombing Syria over its apparent use of chemical weapons as well as re-involvement in Iraq to fight the Islamic State.

When has she ever supported peace? Anyone serving under her should recognize the risks of being sent into another foolish, counterproductive war.

However, most of the Republicans are no better -- indeed, some are a good deal worse. Lindsey Graham is running in order to promote a policy of constant conflict. In recent years he joined with John McCain to advocate on behalf of every war fought and many not started. If Graham was president, members of the armed services could expect to spend years overseas occupying and remaking foreign societies. Kind of a permanent Afghan-Iraqi policy, only everywhere.

The media has anointed Sen. Marco Rubio as having "expertise" in foreign policy, despite his endorsement every war since his election in 2010. He backed bombing Libya, bombing Syria, bombing the Islamic State, and possibly attacking Iran. Apparently unaware that Iran was, if anything, even more hostile than Washington to the Islamic State, Rubio recently combined bellicosity with ignorance. Alas, George W. Bush demonstrated that that is a really bad combination for a president. (Rubio also has taken on the contradictory task of promoting new thinking while backing the half century old economic embargo on Cuba.)

A couple of former governors, Huckabee and Rick Perry, previously ran as "bomb-first" neocons, believing that most every foreign policy problem would be solved by another war. A gaggle of governors -- Scott Walker, Chris Christie, and Bobby Jindal -- avoided much of the foreign policy debate while serving but generally have been attempting to outflank each other with hawkish pronouncements. None has demonstrated knowing very much about the subject and, in general, they have backed the Iraq war, inveighed against the nuclear agreement with Iran (the alternative to which likely is a nuclear Iran or war with Iran), insisted in increased military outlays, spouted the usual pabulum about the importance of "leadership" and "toughness," and denounced President Obama as weak. It is hard to know what they would do in any particular instance, but taken at their word they likely would send military personnel into combat for reasons minor or even frivolous.

One suspects that when the issue of foreign policy comes up at the Republican presidential debates, most of these candidates will break into the Maori Haka in an attempt to demonstrate that they are tougher and meaner and readier for war than their competitors. That is, unless someone reminds them that New Zealand is a peaceful nation which does not constantly start stupid wars.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Other Republicans who today are back benchers might come to the fore with an uber-hawkish president. Sen. Tom Cotton, for instance, recently made a thinly veiled appeal for military action against Iran despite the prospect of a negotiated settlement. But he argued it wasn't anything to worry about, that a few days of bombing would suffice. Even more bizarrely, he contended that "You have to be focused everywhere." The failure to set priorities really works well in wars.

All of the Republicans, including Rand Paul, also advocate essentially a blank check for the Pentagon, adopting the traditional Democratic position that spending more money on something is the same as achieving something. Paul, at least, wants to cut other outlays as an offset. Most of the candidates simply favor more money for more wars, wherever they might be fought.

What's a patriotic potential service member to do? Pine for Ronald Reagan.

It's not just the grand rhetoric of freedom and genuine appreciation for military service. It's also his very restrained, responsible use of the armed services. Caricatured as a wild cowboy, he only used the military three times. Once to oust a bloody communist regime in nearby Grenada which, he contended, threatened American students in medical school there. Another instance was to retaliate against Libya for a terrorist attack. The last was to support Lebanon's government in the middle of that nation's tragic civil war.

The first two were finished quickly. The third proved to be a horrible mistake, from which Reagan learned. He didn't send in another 100,000 troops, impose a multi-year occupation, and engage in nation-building. Instead, he pulled the troops out. And he never repeated that mistake.

Michael Huckabee is right. Americans should consider the commander-in-chief before joining the military. Unfortunately for Huckabee, if they did so they would disqualify him and most of the other presidential contenders. Voters should insist on good military as well as moral character.

Alexandria Phillips
Press Assistant | Communications
Hillary for America | www.hillaryclinton.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Mandy Grunwald" <gruncom@aol.com>
To: jake.sullivan@gmail.com
kschake@hillaryclinton.com
Date: 5/3/2015 12:09:05 PM
Subject: Re: 8 am Agenda & Standing Meetings / Calls

If you won't be on the call, Jake, can I ask one immigration question. Does it make any sense to whack Steve King for trying to change the Constitution to deny babies born here the right to American citizenship if their parents aren't citizens? (basically get rid of the 14th amendment). It seems like a great contrast to what HRC is proposing.

Mandy Grunwald
Grunwald Communications
202 973-9400

-----Original Message-----
From: Jake Sullivan <jake.sullivan@gmail.com>
To: Kristina Schake <kschake@hillaryclinton.com>
Cc: Robby Mook <re47@hillaryclinton.com>; Huma Abedin <ha16@hillaryclinton.com>; Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>; John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com>; Brian Fallon <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com>; Margolis, Jim <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>; Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com>; Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com>; John Anzalone <john@algpolling.com>; David Binder <David@db-research.com>; Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com>; Marissa Astor <mastor@hillaryclinton.com>; Teddy Goff <tgoff@hillaryclinton.com>; Oren Shur <oshur@hillaryclinton.com>; Tony Carrk <tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com>
Sent: Sun, May 3, 2015 7:03 pm
Subject: Re: 8 am Agenda & Standing Meetings / Calls

Marlon and I will be on a plane to Atlanta. Dan can walk through our immigration gameplan.

On Sun, May 3, 2015 at 6:48 PM, Kristina Schake <kschake@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

> Our agenda for tomorrow's 8 am is:
>
> - Immigration plan
> - Clinton Cash update
>
> Just to remind everyone that these are our standing meetings/calls going forward:
>
> Monday, Wednesday, Friday 8 am Call
>
> Week & Month Look Ahead - Thursdays
> Normally this call will be every Thursday, but due to scheduling conflicts this week it will be Friday at 1 pm. It will be a one hour call and then every other week it will be a 2 hour in-person meeting. The first in-person meeting will be on May 14. Marissa is scheduling it with your offices.
>
> --
> Kristina Schake
> Hillary for America

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Gregory Rosalsky" <grosalsky@progressivemediausa.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 5/14/2008 5:00:57 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 05/14/08

Main Topics: McCain Interview on ABC, Bush Interview, West Virginia Primary

Summary of Shift: The main focus of pundits this morning was the outcome of yesterday's West Virginia Primary. President Bush is in Israel, the first part of a Mideast tour. Former Justice Sandra Day O'Connor will be on the Hill later today to talk about Alzheimer's disease. Economic reports show inflation is not as bad as expected, despite escalating food and fuel costs.

Islamic militants are the alleged perpetrators of a series of bomb blasts that killed 80 people in India. The military leadership of Myanmar continues to block cyclone relief from reaching those in need and it's estimated that nearly 15,000 people have died due to the earthquake in China.

Highlights:

1) McCain Interview on "Regis and Kelly"
a. McSame as Bush?
b. Questioned about "100 years" in Iraq, McCain says words "distorted" but still indicates he wants long-term presence like Korea
c. Double talks on Social Security privatization
d. Discusses health care
2) McCain vs. Obama general election map explored on "Today Show"
3) On Fox News, Robert Novak describes what McCain needs in a VP
4) President Bush Politico interview on Yahoo!, includes "no golf for troops" comment

Clips:

Highlight #1
McSame as Bush? (ABC 05/14/08 9:32am)
REGIS PHILBIN: I've heard Senator Obama say that if you were to get in your administration would be the same as President Bush's. Is there any truth to that?

JOHN MCCAIN: Well, I think I will be as I have been, my own person. I have taken positions on issues that I have sometimes not agreed with President Bush, climate change, spending, the handling of the war early on. I think that the American people know me well enough that I'll run on my own record. And more importantly who can best portray and give a plan of action to help Americans right now. They're hurting, we know that. They're sitting around the kitchen table tonight having maybe lost their job. How are they going to make their home loan mortgage payments? These are tough times in America and Americans want to know what you're gonna do. I think that's, it's not so much about the past, but it's about the future.

Regis asks about "100 years" in Iraq, McCain Says Words "Distorted" But Still Argues for Long-Term Presence (ABC 05/14/08 9:32am)
REGIS PHILBIN: Now what about your plans for Iraq, which has suddenly been bumped off the front pages with all that's going on with the race and so on. But did you say that we might be there 50 or 100 years? And don't you think that remark is gonna come back to haunt you when the campaign really ignites?

JOHN MCCAIN: I think, I think that all is fair in politics. But the fact is that what I said was after we win we may have a security relationship with Iraq. After the Korean war was over we kept troops in South Korea. They're still there.

PHILBIN: They're still there.

MCCAIN: They're still there. And they're there for security arrangements , an arrangement between our governments. Kuwait, after the first Gulf War, we have troops in Kuwait, a big base there. We have them in Japan, we have them in Germany. America is the world's superpower and our security arrangements and presence sometimes is a very important stabilizing force. But also, it's not American presence in Iraq that grieves Americans, what grieves Americans is the tragic loss of brave young Americans and their sacrifice. So if we can stop the casualties, which I think I am convinced we can do by giving the responsibilities to the Iraqi military and government and bringing them home, but bringing them home with honor and victory. Then a security arrangement after that would be fine. So obviously those words of mine have been distorted but it's not the first time and it's not the last time. And so it's my job to get my message out and my position to the American people.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

McCain Double Talks on Social Security Privatization (ABC 05/14/08 9:32am)
JOHN MCCAIN: [...]I have a record in the Senate of working together with the Democrats and I think that's what we have to do. What should be partisan about the fact that social security is gonna go broke? I mean, should we be divided up between Republican and Democrat.

REGIS PHILBIN: So do you have a plan for that?

MCCAIN: Yes sir and it's gonna require though, cooperation and participation from the other side. And I will reach my hand out...

PHILBIN: Is it privatization of the social security program?

MCCAIN: No, No, No it isn't. But I would say that I support, I would put everything on the table to start with. But second of all, that we ought, young workers ought to be able to put part of their salary, part of their taxes that they pay into social security, into an account with their name on it. But that would not in anyway affect older workers. But you've got to have a negotiation. Back in 1983 Ronald Reagan and Tip O'Neil, who you don't remember Kelly, they sat down together, they sat down together and they fixed social security for a short period of time.

Kelly asks McCain to Explain his Health Care Plan (FNC 05/14/08 09:32am)
JOHN MCCAIN: First of all, for our veterans, we have to give them the ability when they have a routine health care need to just go to a doctor and get the treatment they need rather then have to stand in line.

MCCAIN: PTSD is a big problem, the kind of wounds we are getting out of this long tragic conflict need a lot of treatment

MCCAIN: I just want for people and families to make the choices for their health care not the government. That is one of the big differences. In other words I want to give every American family a five thousand dollar refundable tax credit that they can go any place in America and say this is the insurance policy that best meets my needs and that of my family.

MCCAIN: Basically it is put the choices and the ability to make those choices in the hands of the American family, I think, obviously the economy is the biggest issue, i think that health care obviously, is the underlying great concern that people have in America today.

Highlight #2
McCain vs. Obama General Election Map Explored on "Today Show" (NBC 05/14/08 7:15am)
MATT LAUER: [...]The formula for winning the general election this fall may be different than it has been in the past. NBC's David Gregory is here now with a look ahead to the battleground states shaping up for the general election.

DAVID GREGORY: Well this political map is like a game of roulette. Both McCain and Obama are now deciding where to place their bets.
[...]
CHRIS COOK: So you've got a lot of states that are just kind of moving around, not big movement, but small movements that could be pivotal in terms of turning this thing one way or the other, 270 for one party of the other.

GREGORY: Obama's strategists think they can be competitive in states that were red or Republican in 2004, like New Mexico, Colorado, Nevada, where growing Hispanic populations are helping Democrats. Virginia, where heavy turnout in the Northern part of the state has recently helped Democrats win statewide races. Missouri which neighbors Obama's home state Illinois and Iowa where Obama's success began with a resounding Caucus victory. McCain has his eyes on 2004 blue states like New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, Michigan, and Oregon. In New Hampshire McCain is a well known figure and across the rust belt he hopes to appeal to Reagan Democrats. This week he broke from President Bush on global warming, a speech he gave in Democratic leaning Oregon.

VIN WEBER: He'll try to emphasize his appeal to independent voters, he'll try his maximize his appeal in certain states to Hispanic voters, and then of course you have a number of conservative Democrats that are going to be uncomfortable with a candidate as far to the left as Barack Obama.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Highlight #3
Novak Describes What McCain Needs in a Vice Presidential Nominee (FNC 05/14/08 08:30am)
ROBERT NOVAK: He has to name somebody who is younger then he is, which isn't hard at all and hes got to name somebody who is more conservative then he is, which isn't hard either. That doesn't narrow the field.

Highlight #4
President Bush Politico Interview on Yahoo!, Includes "No Golf for Troops" Comment (Politico 05/13/08 04:00pm)
Q Good morning, Mr. President.

THE PRESIDENT: Michael, welcome.

Q Thank you for having us into this amazing place.

THE PRESIDENT: Glad you're here.

Q Congratulations, father of the bride.

THE PRESIDENT: I am the father of the bride, and was real pleased with the way the wedding went. It was an amazing experience, Mike, to see a little girl I dearly love be so happy. It was — I think the wedding went exactly the way she hoped it would go.

Q When you took her arm, Mr. President, what were you thinking?

THE PRESIDENT: I was thinking this is one beautiful bride, and Henry is a lucky man. It was — you know, you can imagine, the setting was beautiful by our lake.

Q A sunset.

THE PRESIDENT: The sun set, came down around about the time of the vows.

Q Ninety-two degrees?

THE PRESIDENT: It cooled off a little bit. But it didn't matter how hot it was.

Q Mr. President, what was your toast?

THE PRESIDENT: The toast was to the families and friends that were there; the toast was to the Hagers in raising a good man in Henry; the toast was to my beautiful girl.

Q Mr. President, we understand you had a little homework assignment, you watched Steve Martin's "Father of the Bride."

THE PRESIDENT: I did. (Laughter.)

Q Did you pick up any tips there?

THE PRESIDENT: Yes, which is to write the check and be happy.

Q Mr. President, the one thing we don't see in here is a computer, and we know that you went cold turkey off email for security reasons. What are you looking forward to when you finally get your computer back?

THE PRESIDENT: Emailing to my buddies. I can remember as governor I stayed in touch with all kinds of people around the country, firing off emails at all times of the day to stay in touch with my pals. One of the things that I will have ended my public service time with is a group of friends, a lot of friends. And I want to stay in touch with them and there's no better way to communicate with them than through email.

Q Mr. President, we know you're a man of intense faith. And I wonder, what was a moment in this room over the past eight years when you needed that most?

THE PRESIDENT: Michael, I'd say daily. I mean, part of the faith walk is to understand your weaknesses and is to constantly try to embetter yourself and get closer to the Lord. And that's a daily occurrence. Obviously there's been some tough moments in here. When you know that somebody lost their loved one as a result of a decision that I made, that's a tough moment. If you're a faithful person you try to empathize with the suffering that that person is going through. On the other hand, there is a knowledge that the good Lord can comfort during these moments of grief. And that's what I ask for in my prayer.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Oval Office is a place where there's been, obviously, a lot of amazing experiences over a seven-and-a-half year period. My presidency is one where I've had to make some very tough decisions. I guess some presidencies are kind of — were real smooth, there were no real big issues. Well, that's not the way mine is.

Q Consequential. That's what you want —

THE PRESIDENT: Consequential — if that's how it turns out to be, that's a good word, because I didn't want to come to Washington, D.C. and just hold the office for the sake of holding it. I wanted to come to Washington, D.C. and help be a transformative President. And I think history, when they look back, will say this is a fellow who knew how to make decisions, and made some tough ones, stood by them, wasn't driven by the latest opinion poll, but was driven by some core principles from which he would not deviate.

Q This is the last question, Mr. President. You talked about some tough decisions -- what was the happiest moment you've had in this amazing room?

THE PRESIDENT: You know, Michael, that's a good question. One of the most interesting moments, of course, was right after the inauguration. And my dad was upstairs at the White House preparing for the inaugural balls. And I said to him, let's go on over to the Oval Office -- I hadn't been in the Oval Office as President yet. And so I came over here before he got here, and he walked through that door right there and it was a happy moment to see my dad come in the Oval Office. I love him dearly.

Here I put -- this is where I put the President, the most influential President. And I tell people that a natural choice for the most influential President would be my dad, because I wouldn't be standing here without his unconditional love, so I say it -- his portrait hangs in my heart, and Abraham Lincoln hangs on the wall as the most influential, substantial, transformative President. He was a great President.

Q Do you think the first President Bush is proud of you?

THE PRESIDENT: Oh, yes, no question he is. And I'm proud of him. Look, I tell people -- and this is an interesting thing -- it's harder to be the son of a President than to be the President. In other words, when people get after Dad it would cause all kinds of emotions, none of them very good, in my being. I didn't like the unfair criticism. I thought at times he wasn't treated well. And when that happened, I didn't react positively because I loved him a lot. And now the roles are reversed.

Q You know the feeling.

THE PRESIDENT: Yes, he's sitting there complaining about this editorial or that -- I said, man, I don't even pay attention to it, because I don't. But, yes, he's very proud of me, you can imagine -- and proud of Jeb and he's proud of all his children for different reasons.

Q Mr. President, thank you for sharing the people's house with us.

(Interview moves to Roosevelt Room)

THE PRESIDENT: Mike, glad you're here.

Q Mr. President, thank you very much for having us into the Roosevelt Room for the first online interview. In the spirit of the Internet, I wonder if we could ask a question from one of our users, Steve Bailey, of New York, who says: With oil at $126 a barrel, pushing up the price of everything -- even food -- what can your administration do to help people right now?

THE PRESIDENT: I appreciate Steven's concerns. With the price of gasoline going up, it's like a tax. I wish I could give Steven a quick answer. In other words, it took us a while to get to where we are -- very dependent on oil, and in a world in which demand is greater than oil. So my answer to Steven is that the best thing we can do is to increase supply, and to drill for oil and gas in environmentally friendly ways at home, and build more refineries. Steven probably doesn't know this, but we haven't built a new refinery since 1976, and if we're truly interested in relieving the pressure on our consumers, then we ought to have a very active domestic policy now.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q Mr. President, as you know, as a possible solution, Senator McCain, Senator Clinton have talked about suspending the federal gasoline tax this summer. You never said an absolute "no" to that. Is it something you would consider or do you think it's a bad idea to consider?

THE PRESIDENT: I'll consider it. And there's all kinds of ideas -- they're trying to pass a deal to stop filling the Strategic Petroleum Reserve; we'll look at that.

The truth of the matter is that in order for there to be a substantial change either consumers have to change their habits -- which we're encouraging through alternative tax of automobiles -- or there has to be an increase of supply. And both of them have to go hand in hand in order to achieve less dependence on this very unsettled oil market.

Q Mr. President, I wonder if in your eight years in office what the changes have been, in your view, of climate change?

THE PRESIDENT: I think it's been more clearly defined as a problem. But what hasn't changed is the realistic notion that new technologies are going to be the solution, and the fundamental question is how do you grow the economy at the same time, and at the same time encourage new technologies. And my administration has done more for the new technologies necessary to change our lifestyles without sacrificing wealth than any other administration.

Q Mr. President, for the record, is global warming real?

THE PRESIDENT: Yes, it is real, sure is. But the solutions -- having said that, the solutions have got to be measured and realistic -- you can't have a solution to global warming unless China and India are part of any international pact. It's one of the reasons I didn't accept what's called the Kyoto Protocol, and therefore was labeled as anti-environment. I'm a realistic guy. If the major emitters of greenhouse gases are not a part of a solution, then those who are part of a solution are acting in a way that's simply not going to -- it will affect their own economies, but it won't affect the overall global warming issue.

So, yes, I put forth a very realistic, straightforward program that makes sense.

Q Mr. President, acknowledging those constraints, you're an oil man -- some people say that climate change, global warming could have been your Nixon-to-China. Do you wish you'd done more?

THE PRESIDENT: I did what I think is necessary to actually work, Michael. I mean, I could have signed a -- I could have supported a lousy treaty and everybody would have went, "Oh, man, what a wonderful sounding fellow he is." But it just wouldn't have worked. I don't think you want your President trying to be the cool guy and not end up with policies that actually make a difference.

So the policies I've outlined are policies that will actually make a difference: nuclear power for generating electricity; battery driven cars; ethanol. There's a variety of initiatives -- clean coal technology -- all of which will help us sustain our economic vitality and at the same time be better stewards of the environment.

Q Mr. President, turning to the biggest issue of all, Iraq. I wonder if you -- various people and various candidates talk about pulling out next year. If we were to pull out of Iraq next year, what's the worst that could happen, what's the doomsday scenario?

THE PRESIDENT: Doomsday scenario of course is that extremists throughout the Middle East would be emboldened, which would eventually lead to another attack on the United States.

The biggest issue we face is -- it's bigger than Iraq -- it's this ideological struggle against cold-blooded killers who will kill people to achieve their political objectives. Iraq just happens to be a part of this global war. Iraq is the place where al Qaeda and other extremists have made their stand -- and they will be defeated. They'll be defeated through military action, but they'll also be defeated as this young democracy takes hold. They can't stand to live in a free society, that's why they try to fight free societies.

The United States pulling out of Iraq or pulling out of the Middle East or not maintaining a forward presence would send all kinds of signals throughout the Middle East. And it would shake everybody's nerves, and it would embolden the very same people that we're trying to defeat.

Q Mr. President, I'm going to surprise you -- there's a question from a user, Bruce Becker, and he asks: Do you feel that you were misled on Iraq?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

THE PRESIDENT: I feel like -- I felt like there were weapons of mass destruction. You know, "mislead" is a strong word, it almost connotes some kind of intentional -- I don't think so, I think there was a -- not only our intelligence community, but intelligence communities all across the world shared the same assessment. And so I was disappointed to see how flawed our intelligence was.

Q And so you feel that you didn't have all the information you should have or the right spin on that information?

THE PRESIDENT: No, no, I was told by people that they had weapons of mass destruction -- as were members of Congress, who voted for the resolution to get rid of Saddam Hussein. And of course, the political heat gets on and they start to run and try to hide from their votes. But intelligence communities all across the world felt the same thing. This was kind of a common assessment.

So "mislead" means, do I think somebody lied to me? No, I don't. I think it was just, you know, they analyzed the situation and came up with the wrong conclusion.

Q Mr. President, you haven't been golfing in recent years. Is that related to Iraq?

THE PRESIDENT: Yes, it really is. I don't want some mom whose son may have recently died to see the Commander-in-Chief playing golf. I feel I owe it to the families to be as -- to be in solidarity as best as I can with them. And I think playing golf during a war just sends the wrong signal.

Q Mr. President, was there a particular moment or incident that brought you to that decision, or how did you come to that?

THE PRESIDENT: No, I remember when de Mello, who was at the U.N., got killed in Baghdad as a result of these murderers taking this good man's life. And I was playing golf -- I think I was in central Texas -- and they pulled me off the golf course and I said, it's just not worth it anymore to do.

Q Mr. President, you're headed later today to the Middle East. The prospects for brokering peace between Israelis and Palestinians look bleak. I wonder what the best is you can hope for, and why should Americans back home care about your efforts over there?

THE PRESIDENT: It's a great question. Americans at home ought to care for the advance of free societies throughout the Middle East, after all, this is the center of anti-Americanism and hatred. In other words, the people that attacked us on 9/11 came from this part of the world. By far the vast majority of people aren't haters, and by far the vast majority of people don't hate America. But there are enough to be able to recruit if forms of government repress people. In other words, if there's hopelessness -- there's nothing more hopeless, by the way, than becoming a suicide bomber. And yet, these ideologues require hopeless situations.

So it's the advance of freedom throughout the Middle East which ought to be interesting -- which ought to say to the American people it's the best way to keep us secure.

No, we have seen -- we've witnessed this type of history before, Michael. In Europe it was the advance of freedom that now makes Europe whole, free and at peace. But that wasn't the case throughout the 1900s. In Japan, democracy came along and that enemy of ours is now an ally. In other words, freedom is transformative. And the big challenge in the 21st century is to advance freedom in the Middle East, for our security.

And you said about the Israeli-Palestinian issue? It's been tough for a long time. But I do believe we've got -- we're on the right track to defining a Palestinian state, what it looks like, so that the moderate people, the reasonable people in the region have something to be for.

Q Mr. President, I know you're going to hate this, but I'm hoping that we may twist your arm and talk about baseball for just a moment. (Laughter.) Mr. President, you're a Major League Baseball team owner again. Everyone is a free agent. You have a Yankees-like wallet. Who is your first position player? Who's your pitcher?

THE PRESIDENT: That's a great question. I like Ottley from the Philadelphia Phillies. He's a middle infielder, which is always -- you know, they say you have strength up the middle -- there's nothing better than having a good person up the middle that can hit. And Roy Halladay from the Toronto Blue Jays is a great pitcher. He's a steady guy, he burns up innings. And I'm sure I'm leaving some other good ones out, but those --

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q We thought you were going to go A-Rod, Josh Beckett.

THE PRESIDENT: Josh Beckett is good, yes, he's real good, too. I mean, look, that's a tough question to answer on the fly like this, Michael.

Q Now, Mr. President, I wonder if you think that Major League Baseball is doing enough to combat steroids use, and specifically, would you favor a blood test to check for human growth hormone. As you know the players union says it's an unwarranted --

THE PRESIDENT: Yes, look, I think what they need to do is to come to an agreement and to assure fans like me that the sport is clean. I mean, I --

Q But what would that take?

THE PRESIDENT: Well, I haven't studied all the particulars and all the testing. But I do know they need to get this era behind them quickly. Baseball is a fabulous sport. I used to say it's a sport played by normal-sized people. It turns out some of these normal-sized people are obviously very strong and very quick, but nevertheless, normal-size -- you don't have to be a huge guy to play baseball. And it's a great family sport, and it needs to be cleaned up.

Q And there haven't been enough normal-sized people.

THE PRESIDENT: Well, there's -- yes, there are a lot of normal-sized people. I mean, there's a lot of little dudes who can play the game and play it well.

Q Now, Mr. President, you and the First Lady appeared on American Idol's charity show, "Idol Gives Back." And I wonder who do you think is going to win? Syesha, David Cook, or David Archuleta?

THE PRESIDENT: Michael, I can't tell you. I'll be frank with you, I'm usually asleep by that time of night. We did appear on it because we wanted to thank the "Idol" show for supporting causes such as Malaria No More, which is a real passion of mine and Laura's, which is to help eradicate malaria, or at least reduce the infection rate in half in 15 major countries -- or affected countries in Africa. And we're making some good progress….

…Q All right. Mr. President, who does the better impression, Will Ferrell of you, or Dana Carvey of your father?

THE PRESIDENT: Dana Carvey.

Q And speaking of impressions, our friend, Robert Draper, author of "Dead Certain," said you do a great impression of Dr. Evil from "Austin Powers". (Laughter.)

THE PRESIDENT: That's awfully -- you mean this -- yes. That was a really good movie, too, the first one.

Q Mr. President, I know you're not going to believe this transition, but the Congress and Democrats now have been in charge for the Capitol for 18 months. I wonder if you care to give them a grade.

THE PRESIDENT: Well, one thing is for certain, Michael, that I've laid out a very aggressive agenda: a trade agreement with Colombia to help our economy continue to grow; making sure we got the tools necessary to protect our country from attack; supporting our troops in harm's way. And there hasn't been much action. And we got a housing crisis, and I proposed a reasonable set of reforms. And so I would call them stalled. I would call them, so far, good at verbiage and not so good at results.

Q Now, Mr. President, President Carter recently told Charlie Rose the next President could change America's image in 10 minutes. Here's what he said: "I think the next President could change the image of this country around the world in 10 minutes by making an inaugural speech that would start off and say, 'As long as I'm President we will never torture another prisoner, as long as I'm President we will never attack or invade another country unless our own security is directly threatened.'"

THE PRESIDENT: Yes, well, what he ought to be saying is, is that America doesn't torture. If the implication there is that we do now, then he's wrong. And you bet we're going to protect ourselves by the use of military force. What he really is implying is -- or some imply -- you can be popular; if you want to be popular in the Middle East just go blame Israel for every problem. That will make you popular. Or if you want to be popular in Europe, say you're going to join the International Criminal Court.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Popularity is fleeting, Michael. Principles are forever.

Q Mr. President, I'm getting the hook here. If I can ask you one quick political question. You have a clear eye. I wonder if at this point you feel sorry for Senator Clinton.

THE PRESIDENT: I feel like this primary has been a long, hard campaign. I remember what it was like in 2000, and I was exhausted. And my primary ended pretty quickly, compared to this one. And so I -- both those candidates have got to be just worn out. They haven't had time to get their feet on the ground or rest. So I know how they feel -- kind of.

Q Mr. President, looking ahead, are you worried that through no fault of the candidates, that America may be in for a kind of ugly conversation about race this fall?

THE PRESIDENT: No, I'm not. I think most Americans are open-minded people, and they're going to pick the President who can keep America safe and keep taxes low. And so I think -- my own judgment is, is that race will only enter in if it's provoked by the press.

Q Mr. President, as a final question -- and thank you so much for taking this time with us -- the scale of the disasters in China and Burma is amazing. I wonder how the United States can go about getting aid into those closed regimes.

THE PRESIDENT: I talked to Hu Jintao and if he -- I told him if he needs aid he's got it. Thus -- we'd get him some money, but thus far, he feels like he's in pretty good shape. And the relief -- and they've got a pretty good infrastructure in dealing with problems.

The place that really needs help is Burma. And Admiral Keating is there now. I told President Hu Jintao today, of China, if you get -- if you're in touch with the Burmese, tell them that we're genuine in our efforts to want to help. We've got some ships off the coast of Burma now, and so we'll see if Keating and Henrietta Fore, who runs AID, will get a better response from the government than we have gotten so far. We just want to make sure that the aid we give is given to the people -- that it's not squandered, not hoarded, but it actually gets to the suffering people.

We've been disappointed by the response. It's taken these people too long to move. It's almost as if they're in a state of denial. But we'll see. We're beginning to make some progress there in terms of getting our aid in.

Q Mr. President, thank you very much for your time. Good luck on your trip.

THE PRESIDENT: Thank you, sir. Thank you.

Q Thank you, sir.

THE PRESIDENT: It's been a pleasure.
To View: http://cosmos.bcst.yahoo.com/up/player/popup/?rn=3906861&ch=7684298&src=news

--
Gregory E. Rosalsky
Progressive Media USA
202-609-7691 (office)
707-484-3796 (cell)
GRosalsky@progressivemediausa.org
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Suzy George" <sgeorge@albrightstonebridge.com>
To: "Ben Chang" <bchang@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Fariba Yassaee" <fyassaee@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Anne Hall" <Anne.Hall@APORTER.COM>
"Bill?? Antholis" <wantholis@brookings.edu>
"Bill Woodward?? \(blackwoodward@gmail.com\)" <blackwoodward@gmail.com> bill.danvers@gmail.com
"Brian Katulis" <bkatulis@americanprogress.org>
"Bruce Riedel" <briedel@brookings.edu>
"Caitlin McDonnell" <cmcdonnell@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Carol Browner" <cmbrowner@me.com>
"Carole Hall" <chall@brookings.edu>
"Catherine Whitney" <Catherine.Whitney@skadden.com>
"Chris Roberts" <croberts@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Dan Benjamin" <dbenjam61@hotmail.com>
"Daniel Silverberg" <danielsilverberg@yahoo.com>
"Denis McDonough" <denis.mcdonough@gmail.com>
"Derek Chollet" <dhchollet@gmail.com>
"Don Gips?? \(don.gips@gmail.com\)" <don.gips@gmail.com>
donkerrick <donkerrick@comcast.net>
"Eryn M. Sepp \(eryn.sepp@gmail.com\)" <eryn.sepp@gmail.com>
"Frank Lowenstein" <frankl03@yahoo.com>
"Greg Craig" <gcraig@skadden.com>
"Jake Sullivan" <jake.sullivan@gmail.com>
"Jamie Rubin" <JamesPRubin1960@gmail.com>
"Jan Stewart" <jstewart@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Jeff Smith" <jeffrey_smith@aporter.com>
"Jeremy Bash" <jeremybash@gmail.com>
"Jessica Lewis" <lewisje03@yahoo.com>
"Jim Miller - Department of Defense?? \(james.n.miller.jr@gmail.com \)" <james.n.miller.jr@gmail.com>
"Jim O'Brien" <jobrien@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Joanna Nicoletti?? \(info@forwardengagement.org\)" <info@forwardengagement.org>
"Joe Cirincione" <jcirincione@ploughshares.org>
"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
"Julianne Smith" <julsmi@gmail.com>
"Ken Lieberthal" <klieberthal@brookings.edu>
"Kurt Campbell" <kurtmcampbell@yahoo.com>
"Laura?? Huber" <lhuber@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Leon Fuerth" <hdpf@msn.com>
"Maida?? Stadtler" <mstadtler@apcoworldwide.com>
"Marcel Lettre" <mlettre@verizon.net>
"Mariah Sixkiller \(mariah6@gmail.com\)" <mariah6@gmail.com>
"Marisa DeAngelis" <MDeAngelis@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Martin Indyk" <mindyk@brookings.edu>
"Michele Flournoy" <micheleflournoy3@gmail.com>
"Pat Griffin" <pgriffin@pmj-dc.com>
"Rich Verma" <rverma@steptoe.com>
"Rob Malley" <rmalley555@gmail.com>
"Samuel Berger" <sberger@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Steve Ricchetti" <sricchetti@cox.net>
"Strobe Talbott" <stalbott@brookings.edu>
"Susan Rice" <ricesusane@aol.com>
"Tara Sonenshine" <tsonenshine@earthlink.net>
"Theodore Waddelow" <twaddelow@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Tim Roemer" <tjroemer@gmail.com>
"Tom?? Daschle" <tom.daschle@dlapiper.com>
"Tom Donilon" <tdonilon@gmail.com>
"Tom?? Downey" <tdowney@dmggroup.com>
"Tommy Ross" <tommy_ross@reid.senate.gov>
"Toni Verstandig" <tonigverstandig@gmail.com>
"Tony Blinken" <ablinken@aol.com>
"Veronica Pollack" <Veronica.Pollock@dlapiper.com>
"Vikram Singh" <vsingh@americanprogress.org>
"Wendy Sherman" <wendyrsherman@gmail.com>
Date: 6/16/2014 7:29:02 PM
Subject: Brian Katulis Mideast report

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

New report by Brian Katulis

A new era of extremism, sectarianism, and competition between regional powers requires the United States to update its regional strategy.

http://americanprogress.org/issues/security/report/2014/06/16/91809/u-s-middle-east-policy-at-a-time-of-regional-fragmentation-and-competition

The ongoing fragmentation in Iraq and Syria is the latest episode in a series of events that is shaking the foundations of today's Middle East. The region has entered a fluid period of transition involving the growing power of non-state actors, including new Islamist extremist groups, at a time of increased competition for influence among the key countries in the region.

For decades, the United States has grappled with formulating a Middle East strategy that advances both its interests and its values. Under President Barack Obama, the top U.S. priorities in the Middle East have included preventing a terrorist attack on the homeland; stopping Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon; ending the Iraq War; maintaining a secure flow of energy from the region; and trying to broker Arab-Israeli peace.

The United States has struggled to define its position since the Arab uprisings in 2011, which sparked a new era of competition among the leading powers in the region. The role and status of Islamists such as the Muslim Brotherhood, which rose to power after the uprisings in some Arab countries, have been central in this intraregional struggle. Also, violent Salafi jihadists such as the Islamic State of Iraq and al-Sham, or ISIS, seek to break down national borders and establish an Islamic state by force. This report, based on field research conducted by the Center for American Progress in multiple countries during the past year, analyzes the current strategic environment and outlines lessons learned that should inform U.S. policy. Those lessons include:

- The 2011 Arab uprisings sparked a regional competition in a new "Middle East cold war." The leading countries of the Middle East and North Africa are engaged in an intense, multipolar, and multidimensional struggle for influence and power. This competition goes beyond Shia-Sunni sectarian divisions and involves traditional tools of power projection—such as military aid and economic assistance—as well as new forms of power projection, including direct investments in media outlets, non-state actors, and political movements. The region's wealthier, more politically stable states compete with each other by proxy—and in some cases, directly—on the ground in poorer and politically polarized states. This competition has taken on many features of a cold war: different sides engaged in proxy battles across the region using multiple means of influence.

- The status of Islamist movements is central to this regional competition. The Muslim Brotherhood's empowerment and subsequent removal from power in Egypt has been a main event and central to this regional struggle. Some states such as Qatar and Turkey back the Muslim Brotherhood, while others such as Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, or UAE, oppose it. Another new dynamic is the rise of extremist Islamist groups that have challenged the Al Qaeda movement. New political openings, as well as ongoing conflicts such as the civil war in Syria, have enabled a range of political Islamist groups, including the ultraorthodox Salafists, to affect politics in countries such as Egypt and Tunisia and fostered a strand of Islamist extremist groups that has emerged in Syria and Iraq. The regional contest over the status of political Islamists has broad reach; it has contributed to disarray within the Syrian opposition, influenced relations among different Palestinian factions, and affected competition among the various armed groups in Libya.

- The United States remains the dominant military power in the region but lacks sufficient diplomatic, political, and economic tools to influence regional political trends. The new and still unfolding regional dynamics limit the effectiveness of a U.S. policy that maintains a heavy reliance on traditional tools of power, such as the military and intelligence. The current U.S. policy approach lacks a nimble and effective ability to engage multiple centers of power in the region politically and economically in strategies that emphasize political pluralism and prosperity. The Obama administration's engagement with political Islamist organizations such as the Muslim Brotherhood created confusion in the region about U.S. policy priorities and values. The U.S. response to the Arab uprisings and the new Middle East cold war has been uneven and the United States has often appeared as little more than a bystander.

The major changes underway in regional power dynamics point to a need to make U.S. foreign policy in the Middle East and North Africa more adept at understanding and responding to political currents in a way that reflects both U.S. core security interests and values. Simply focusing on questions of how many troops are stationed in a particular country for what period of time or how much bilateral security assistance the United States gives to a particular country is too narrow and inadequate to deal with the historical changes sweeping the region and upending its political balance.

A wider range of state actors are seeking to advance their interests and values across the region, and the regional landscape now includes a number of non-state actors that have broader reach and impact than they did in previous eras. The United States will not be able to dictate or control events, but many in the region still examine what the United States says and does very closely. Most of its key governments take active steps to shape the trajectory of U.S. policy. The United States should make the most of these diplomatic engagements to craft a wiser engagement policy that seeks to isolate and defeat extremist ideologies in the ongoing battle of ideas.

Brian Katulis is a Senior Fellow at the Center for American Progress. Peter Juul is a Policy Analyst at the Center.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
To: catherinehand5@aol.com
Date: 8/16/2015 8:38:25 AM
Subject: Re: Today's Post story on HRC

Thanks Catherine. Easy to fall into old habits. We'll reflect on this.

On Sunday, August 16, 2015, <catherinehand5@aol.com > wrote:

Dear Jake and John:

I'm sending this to you at the suggestion of my friend Lorraine Hariton. By way of introduction, back in 1980 I helped Norman Lear create People For the American Way -- even before Tony Podesta came into the picture. I spent months traveling across the country with Norman meeting with so many people to talk about the rise of something Norman was seeing -- the rise of the Religious Right and its impact on our politics. You know the rest.

Currently, I am one of the producers of a film adaptation of the award wining children's classic, A Wrinkle in Time, that Jennifer Lee (FROZEN) is scripting for Disney. I mention this, because this book has meant a great deal to millions of young people over the past 50 years. Even Sheryl Sandberg was quoted in the New York Times during an interview for her book, Lean In, that A Wrinkle in Time was her favorite childhood book.

Wrinkle was written in 1962 and received the Newberry Award for children's literature in 1963, the year I first read it. As you will read in this note, 1963 was quite a tumultuous year. The year before, in 1962, the Cuban missile crisis threatened the world with the possibility of nuclear war. Against a backdrop of uncertainty, death, and fear, A Wrinkle in Time, came along at a time when young people needed a way to understand the changing world around them. It wasn't necessarily a conscious need, more a longing or yearning for a way to comprehend the evil that existed, and to feel comforted by a story that helped us see that it could be overcome. I think the need for a vision of a loving and empathetic universe is as needed today as it was 50 years ago.

I'm writing a book about my 50 year journey to make Wrinkle into a movie and have been doing research on the past 5 decades which moved me to write this note to Lorraine this morning.

Lorraine-

Just wanted to send along a few thoughts re today's Post story on HRC. First, hope you are enjoying your time in NY. The emails and phone calls about the campaign are very helpful.

Something struck me in reading the Post piece that you may want to consider. When Hillary speaks of the email issue or other issues, her counter is "politics as usual." Those very words are what contribute to the general feeling of her tone deafness. I have no idea what is said in your discussions, but I assume lots of very smart, savvy people are thinking about this problem everyday. Most people do not know what she really means when she says "politics as usual' and it might help her if she were more precise in her reply. What I mean by that is not to use words that mean something to people who follow politics, but use words that mean something to people who don't. And, "politics as usual' is immediately heard as "politics as usual in Clinton-world."

Take every single opportunity she has to explain in the simplest way over and over again that she represents change to a more conservative way of thinking and rather than talk about the need for inclusivity in all things for all Americans, her opponents only want to instill fear about her as a person and the change she represents.

I've been doing a little research on the big historical events over the past 50 years and it is a real awakening to take in how much change this country has been dealing with ever since 1963.

Hillary's candidacy is an accumulation of a 50-year shift in attitudes and ever since the early 1970s a backlash to this change has taken shape and strengthened. It's not a vast right wing conspiracy - it is real fear of change. When she uses the words 'politics as usual' it only helps to strengthen that backlash.

She needs to be seen and heard as someone who can lead us to a more empathetic world where we can learn to actually get along with those who are different than us.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Take a look at what happened in 1963:

George Wallace became Governor of Alabama and proclaimed “segregation now, segregation tomorrow, and segregation forever. “

Betty Friedan’s The Feminine Mystique launched the reawakening of the women’s movement in the United States as women’s organizations and consciousness raising groups spread.

70,000 marchers arrived in London to demonstrate against nuclear weapons.

Martin Luther King, Jr. issued his Letter from Birmingham Jail.

The US Supreme Court ruled that state-mandated Bible reading in public schools was unconstitutional.

Pope Paul VI succeeded Pope John XXIII and continued the Vatican Council II. Priests were now asked to celebrate Mass in the language of the countries in which they lived, face the congregation, and not only to be heard and seen but also to signal to worshippers that they were being included because they were a vital component of the service. No longer was prayer to be seen as a performance, but active participation.

The United States, United Kingdom, and Soviet Union signed a nuclear test ban treaty.

Martin Luther King, Jr delivered his I Have A Dream speech on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial to an audience of 250,000 people participating in the March on Washington for Jobs and Freedoms.

South Vietnamese President Diem was assassinated following a military coup.

“ I Want to Hold Your Hand” and “ I Saw Her Standing There” were released in the U.S., marking the beginning of Beatlemania on an international level.

President John F. Kennedy was assassinated.

And the 1970s became fertile ground for even more divisiveness:

As the protests against the Viet Nam war intensified, the backlash began to take shape. When Richard Nixon won the presidency in 1968 he dismantled programs put in place by President Johnson’s War on Poverty. The anti-war protests increased in frequency and no longer only w ere students protesting, but professors, scientists, and stay at home mothers.

In response to protesters, hippies and the new drug culture, President Nixon’s ‘silent majority,’ -- mostly white working and middle class voters, were angry at what they saw as the destruction of a country they had known and loved.

The nation seemed to tear apart at the seams as America watched the live coverage of the Watergate hearings. When President Nixon finally resigned from office in 1974 the seeds of government mistrust were firmly rooted.

The women’s rights movement took hold when Congress approved the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) to the Constitution in 1972. Twenty-two of the necessary 38 states ratified with no difficulty, but the conservative faction in the country saw it as a threat to the traditional role of wife and mother and successfully fought back and defeated it.

The 1980s were a difficult period for Democrats. I remember helping to mount the Democratic convention in 1984 and standing on the podium that last night looking at a sea of waving American flags, excited that the first woman had been nominated for Vice President, inspired by Mario Cuomo's speech about the "two cities on a hill" and all I could think about was my dog. I didn't believe in any of it anymore. Reagan had done a great job of making the word liberal sound like a dirty word. Few Democrats had passion back then- we were so splintered and couldn't get along which lead to the creation of Democratic Leadership Forum and the eventual rise of Bill Clinton in 1992.

Hillary is the embodiment of the changes that have been bubbling up since 1963. She is a woman embracing the need to include everyone at the table. But, she is falling into a trap that started in the 80s -- demonizing her opponent. That happened back in the 80s to raise funds. Direct mail campaigns for Dems, Republicans, and special interests groups had to demonize their opponents to fan the flames of fear to survive.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What Bernie Sanders represents is someone who doesn't seem to be caught in that demonizing cycle. There has to be a way for Hillary to rise above it, too, with humor, compassion and empathy. She needs new tactics, a new strategy and to breakaway fro m how she handled her adversaries in the past. She most likely first developed her deep distrust of conservative operatives in her formative years working as a lawyer during the Watergate hearings. That mistrust of Nixon and his associates left a lasting scar on so many of us. But, we need to move passed it.

Stephen Hawking said something recently that might help ground a new strategy:

“The human failing I would most like to correct is aggression. It may have had survival advantage in caveman days, to get more food, territory or a partner with whom to reproduce, but now it threatens to destroy us all. We need to replace aggression with empathy, which “brings us together in a peaceful loving state.”

Hillary needs to be President of the United States to act upon Hawking’s insight and her ability to lead must start with a new kind of campaign.

Catherine

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Lisa Reed" <lisa@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 10/29/2008 4:59:49 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Correction: Tracking Update: McCain Rally in Miami, FL 10/29/08

I originally stated Alexandria, VA. The event was in Miami, FL. My apologies for the confusion.

Hello All,
Unfortunately we weren't able to send a tracker to this event. But good news: we were able to capture the event via online-streaming video. Below are the notes from that effort.

Big Highlights

- Gives President credit for not being attacked since 9/11
- Says Hugo Chavez hurt his feelings. [sarcasm] Would like to sit down with him with release of political prisoners, free elections, and there are functioning human rights organizations
- Brings up drilling in Florida, says revenues should go to Tallahassee rather than Washington.
- Repeats Obama's television appearance as an "infomercial" interrupting the World Series

Miami, FL: McCain Rally 10/29/08

(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Speech Highlights

(Introduces Charlie Crist, Senator Mel Martinez, Joe Lieberman, Tom Ridge, Lindsey Graham)

It's great to be back in Florida. We need to win Florida on November 4th, and with your help -- we're going to win here, and bring real change to Washington. We need a new direction, and we have to fight for it.

My friends, you hear a lot of things, but you know, it's no accident that the United States of America has not been attacked since 9/11. I do believe that the President of the United States deserves some credit for that, don't you?

I've been fighting for this country since I was seventeen years old, and I have the scars to prove it. If I'm elected President, I will fight to shake up Washington and take America in a new direction from my first day in office until my last. I'm not afraid of the fight, I'm ready for it.

I have a plan to hold the line on taxes and cut them to make America more competitive and create jobs here at home. We're going to double the child deduction for working families. We will cut the capital gains tax. And we will cut business taxes to help create jobs, and keep American businesses in America. Raising taxes makes a bad economy much worse. Keeping taxes low creates jobs, keeps money in your hands and strengthens our economy.

If I'm elected President, I won't spend nearly a trillion dollars more of your money. Senator Obama will. And he can't do that without raising your taxes or digging us further into debt. I'm going to make government live on a budget just like you do.

I will freeze government spending on all but the most important programs like defense, veterans care, NASA, Social Security and health care until we scrub every single government program and get rid of the ones that aren't working for the American people. And I will veto every single pork barrel bill Congresses passes.

I'm not going to spend $750 billion dollars of your money just bailing out the Wall Street bankers and brokers who got us into this mess. Senator Obama will. I'm going to make sure we take care of the working people who were devastated by the excesses of Wall Street and Washington.

I have a plan to fix our housing market, so that your home value doesn't go down when your neighbor defaults, and so that people in danger of defaulting have a path to pay off their loan.

Including Hugo Chavez in Venezuela. By the way, I heard that Fidel Castro wrote some sentiments about me the other day. And let me just say, it hurt my feelings. And I want to tell you, I'll sit down with one of the Castro brothers right after the empty the political prisons, right after they have free elections, right after the human rights organizations are functioning. You saw the other day about what the Castro Brothers are about. When Cuba was hit with a natural disaster and they refused American humanitarian aid. That's what they're all about, my friends. And have no illusions.

If I'm elected President, we're going to stop spending $700 billion to buy oil from countries that don't like us very much.

My friends, with more money and more revenues to the state of Florida, we will drill offshore and drill now. With the agreement of the state of Florida. And my friends, I've already talked to your state's great Governor, we're going to drill off the shores of Florid a, then we need to give Florida more of those revenues. They shouldn't be sent to Washington, they should be sent to Tallahasee.

Senator Obama will argue to delay drilling for more oil and gas and against building new nuclear power plants in America. If I am president, we will start new drilling now.

We will invest in all energy alternatives -- nuclear, wind, solar, and tide. We will encourage the manufacture of hybrid, flex fuel and electric automobiles. We will invest in clean coal technology. We will lower the cost of energy within months, and we will create millions of new jobs.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We've learned more about Senator Obama's real goals for our country over the last two weeks than we learned over the past two years, and that only because Joe the plumber asked him a question in Ohio. That's when Senator Obama revealed he wants to quote "spread the wealth around."

Now, Joe didn't ask for Senator Obama to come to his house, and he didn't ask to be famous. He certainly didn't ask for the political attacks on him from the Obama campaign. Joe's dream is to own a small business that will create jobs, and the attacks on him are an attack on small businesses all over the country. These are people like Gus the homebuilder and Peter the exterminator right here in Miami. Small businesses employ 84 percent of Americans, and we need to support these small businesses, not tax them.

After months of campaign trail eloquence, we've finally learned what Senator Obama's economic goal is: to spread the wealth. In a radio interview revealed this week, he said the same thing -- that one of the quote, "tragedies" of the civil rights movement is that it didn't bring about "redistributive change."

You see, Senator Obama believes in redistributing wealth, not in policies that grow our economy and create jobs. He said that even though lower taxes on investment help our economy, he favors higher taxes on investment for quote "fairness." There's nothing "fair" about driving our economy into the ground. We all suffer when that happens, and that is the problem with Senator Obama's approach to our economy. He is more interested in controlling wealth than in creating it, in redistributing money instead of spreading opportunity. I am going to create wealth for all Americans, by creating opportunity for all Americans.

Senator Obama is running to be Redistributionist in Chief. I'm running to be Commander in Chief. Senator Obama is running to spread the wealth. I'm running to create more wealth. Senator Obama is running to punish the successful. I'm running to make everyone successful.

Senator Obama has made a lot of promises. First he said people making less than 250,000 dollars would benefit from his plan, then this weekend he announced in an ad that if you're a family making less than 200,000 dollars you'll benefit -- but this week, Senator Biden said tax relief should only go to "middle class people -- people making under 150,000 dollars a year." It's interesting how their definition of rich has a way of creeping down. At this rate, it won't be long before Senator Obama is right back to his vote that Americans making just 42,000 dollars a year should get a tax increase. We can't let that happen.

This Democratic Congress is planning all sorts of new taxes. This week, we are hearing they want to tax your 401k contributions. This is a time when we need to be encouraging more investing, not taxing it. We can't let them get away with making a bad economy even worse. Now is the time to grow our economy, and that's what I'm going to do.

My opponent's massive new tax increase is exactly the wrong approach in an economic slowdown. The answer to a slowing economy is not higher taxes, but that is exactly what is going to happen when the Democrats have total control of Washington. We can't let that happen. We need pro-growth and pro-jobs economic policies, not pro-government spending programs paid for with higher taxes.

This is the fundamental difference between Senator Obama and me. He thinks taxes are too low, and I think that spending is too high.

If we are going to change Washington, we need a President who has actually fought for change and made it happen. The next President won't have time to get used to the office. We face many challenges here at home, and many enemies abroad in this dangerous world.

Senator Biden warned that Senator Obama would be tested with an international crisis. I have been tested. Senator Obama hasn't. Senator Biden referred to how Jack Kennedy was tested in the Cuban Missile Crisis and I have a little personal experience in that. I was on board the U.S.S. Enterprise, and I sat in a jet cockpit on the flight deck waiting to take off. We had a target. I know how close we came to a nuclear war and I will not be a president that needs to be tested.

We know Senator Obama won't have the right response to that test, because we've seen the wrong response from him over and over during this campaign. He opposed the surge strategy that is bringing us victory in Iraq and will bring us victory in Afghanistan. He said he would sit down unconditionally with the world's worst dictators. When Russia invaded Georgia, Sen. Obama said the invaded country should show restraint. He's been wrong on all of these. When I am president, we are going to win in Iraq and win in Afghanistan, and our troops will come home in victory and honor.

Let me give you the state of the race today. There's less than a week to go. We're a few points down. The pundits have written us off, just like they've done before. My opponent is working out the details with Speaker Pelosi and Senator Reid of their plans to raise your taxes, increase spending, and concede defeat in Iraq. He's measuring the drapes, and he's planned his first address to the nation for before the election. I guess I'm old fashioned about these things -- I prefer to let the voters weigh in before presuming the outcome.

What America needs now is someone who will finish the race before the starting the victory lap, someone who will fight to the end, and not for himself but for his country.

I have fought for you most of my life, and in places where defeat meant more than returning to the Senate. There are other ways to love this country, but I've never been the kind to back down when the stakes are high.

I know you're worried. America is a great country, but we are at a moment of national crisis that will determine our future.

Will we continue to lead the world's economies or will we be overtaken? Will the world become safer or more dangerous? Will our military remain the strongest in the world? Will our children and grandchildren's future be brighter than ours?

My answer to you is yes. Yes, we will lead. Yes, we will prosper. Yes, we will be safer. Yes, we will pass on to our children a stronger, better country. But we must be prepared to act swiftly, boldly, with courage and wisdom.

I'm an American. And I choose to fight. Don't give up hope. Be strong. Have courage. And fight. Fight for a new direction for our country. Fight for what's right for America.

Fight to clean up the mess of corruption, infighting and selfishness in Washington.

Fight to get our economy out of the ditch and back in the lead.

Fight for the ideals and character of a free people.

Fight for our children's future.

Fight for justice and opportunity for all.

Stand up to defend our country from its enemies.

Stand up, stand up, stand up and fight. America is worth fighting for. Nothing is inevitable here. We never give up. We never quit. We never hide from history. We make history. Now, let's go win this election and get this country moving again.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

--
Lisa L. Reed
Progressive Accountability Office
601.434.2986

--
Lisa L. Reed
Progressive Accountability Office
601.434.2986

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail lori@progressiveaccountability.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "The Washington Post" <email@e.washingtonpost.com>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 7/29/2015 12:16:48 AM
Subject: The Daily 202: Could Obama win a third term?

View The Daily 202 on the Web

PowerPost

The Daily 202

Morning intelligence for leaders

Share on Twitter Share on Facebook

President Obama waves before boarding Air Force One to depart Ethiopia yesterday, the final leg of his African trip. (AP Photo/Evan Vucci)

BY JAMES HOHMANN

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

THE BIG IDEA:

— Encouraging African leaders not to cling to power for life, Barack Obama expressed confidence during a speech in Addis Ababa yesterday that he could win a third term if he ran. "I love my work, but under our Constitution, I cannot run again," he said. "I actually think I'm a pretty good president. I think if I ran, I could win. But I can't. So there's a lot that I'd like to do to keep America moving, but the law is the law."

It is a fun parlor game to speculate on Obama's reelection prospects if there was no 22nd Amendment. He's about as popular right now as he was at this stage in 2011; his approval rating is 45 percent in our latest poll. The economy is stronger in key ways. And the Democratic base is more passionate about him than Hillary Clinton.

But Obama—who won in 2008 as an outsider—is now seen as an insider, at a time when Americans want a change agent. See the summer success of Bernie Sanders and Donald Trump.

Becoming a lame duck has liberated the president to take action on issues like immigration, Iran and climate change. These positions could backfire with independents in a general election, but they could also galvanize record turnout among Hispanics, African-Americans and young people.

The debate over Obama's electability is moot, but it dovetails with a broader, ongoing conversation within the Clinton campaign about the extent to which she should tie her fortunes to the president's. She knows that she needs the so-called Obama coalition to turn out in force next November, which is one reason she's tacked to the left in recent months. Many of these voters, registered by the Obama campaign in 2008 or 2012, will only turn out for Hillary if they see a vote for her as a vote for a third Obama term.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama with Clinton in Dec. 2008 after announcing that she was his choice as Secretary of State. (AP Photo)

Hillary is not actively distancing herself from her ex-boss as much as many observers predicted throughout 2014. Almost exactly a year ago, during an interview with The Atlantic, Clinton criticized Obama for not taking more action in Syria and for an internal White House mantra buzzed about at the time ("Don't do stupid sh"). This prompted Obama allies like David Axelrod to point out that Clinton, not Obama, voted to authorize the Iraq war in the first place. Hillary phoned Obama to say she had not meant "to attack him," and her spokesman announced that she looked forward to "hugging it out" when they were both on Martha's Vineyard a few days later. We haven't seen a blow-up quite like that since then.

From the preternaturally cautious and calculating Clinton, watch for a continued balancing act. When she distances herself, it will be more implicit and subtle than during that Atlantic interview. Her campaign leadership team is also stocked with Obama alumni who were still at the White House during this time last year. "I'm not running for my husband's third term and I'm not running for Barack Obama's third term," she declared in New Hampshire this spring. In the very next breath, she added: "I'm running to continue the positive, results-oriented policies that both of them worked for."

Some additional distancing is probably inevitable. Vice President George H.W. Bush's talk during the 1988 campaign about "a kinder, gentler America" was a calculated effort to show he was different than Ronald Reagan. Few remember it now, but Reagan's approval rating in the summer of 1987 was in the 40s because of the Iran-Contra scandal. A July 1987 Gallup poll asked how Reagan would go down in history: only 9 percent said he would be remembered as “outstanding”; 28 percent said “above average”; 34 percent said “average”; and 26 percent said either “below average” or “poor.” It’s a good reminder Obama could be viewed very differently next November.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost ’s morning newsletter. Sign up to receive the newsletter.

With contributions by Elise Viebeck .

WHILE YOU WERE SLEEPING:

— Rep. Mark Meadows (R-N.C.) made the case for ousting John Boehner as Speaker. (Spoiler alert: it’s not going to happen.) Toward the end of the day, he filed a rare “motion to vacate the chair,” catching even anti-Boehner Republicans off guard. Others who had wind of it discouraged him from following through.

— Congressional Republicans are going all in on try defunding Planned Parenthood. Iowa freshman Sen. Joni Ernst (R-Iowa) filed a bill last night to completely block any federal money from going to the group. It came at the end of a day that saw the release of a third undercover video by a pro-life group. Rand Paul and Mitch McConnell are among the cosponsors. Democrats will never allow this to happen, but Republicans believe that they can play offense on the abortion issue in 2016 (unlike in 2012 when the issue cost them two Senate seats in red states). To improve the optics, GOP leaders are leaning on women to lead the fight. Besides Ernst in the Senate, Rep. Diane Black is expected to be front-and-center in the House. Hillary defended Planned Parenthood in New Hampshire yesterday and will continue to do so.

— “The Obama administration has decided to give states more time to comply with proposed regulations that will require dramatic cuts in greenhouse-gas pollution from power plants,” Joby Warrick scoops in a story that posted at 11:47 p.m. “The Environmental Protection Agency will give states an additional two years — until 2022 — to begin phasing in pollution cuts, even as the agency toughens the standards that many states will ultimately have to meet. At the same time, the EPA will offer credits and other inducements to encourage a rapid shift to renewable energy under the Clean Power Plan, the administration’s ambitious and controversial proposal to cut pollutants blamed for climate change.” The final version of the regulation is expected to land in the next week.

— Afghanistan officials said that the leader of the Afghan Taliban, Mullah Mohammed Omar, has died. The militant group has not confirmed the claim but plans to comment soon, the BBC reports.

GET SMART FAST:

1. Congress is poised to pass a stopgap, three-month highway bill, punting the issue into the fall, after House and Senate Republicans could not agree on a compromise.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2. The Los Angeles City Council voted unanimously to ban the possession of firearm magazines that hold more than 10 rounds, a measure the NRA has already promised to challenge in court.
3. "A Florida man has been charged with plotting to set off a backpack bomb at a beach after becoming inspired by the terrorist group ISIS," NBC reports. "Harlem Suarez, 23, of Key West was arrested Monday after he received what he thought was a working bomb but which was actually a phony device provided by the FBI."
4. An unclassified email network used by Army General Martin Dempsey and other members of the U.S. military's Joint Staff was taken offline yesterday because of suspicious activity, per Reuters .
5. Jonathan Pollard, the Israeli spy whose treachery may have put U.S. secrets in the hands of the Soviets during some of the darkest days of the Cold War, has officially been granted parole and will be released in November, his lawyers announced. Now his lawyers want Obama to waive a legal requirement that he stay in the United States for at least five years, so that he can resettle in the country he spied for.
6. Fox News removed a requirement that a candidate pull at least 1 percent in national polling in order to appear in the consolation debate of undercards next Thursday (which will air at 5 p.m. Eastern, before the top 10 candidates appear together at 9 p.m.). This means that all 16 declared GOP candidates will get TV time.
7. "Tom Brady and the players' union are headed to a legal clash with the NFL over DeflateGate after Commissioner Roger Goodell rejected Brady's appeal and upheld the four-game suspension of the New England Patriots quarterback and reigning Super Bowl MVP," Mark Maske reports. The NFL revealed yesterday that Brady directed his cell phone be destroyed shortly before meeting with its investigators in March.
8. Now that Boston is out of the running, Los Angeles leaders have reached out to their Bay Area counterparts about a potential joint bid for the 2024 Summer Olympics. (San Francisco Chronicle)

POWER PLAYERS IN THE NEWS:

1. Jake Tapper offered Ben Carson condolences on the death of his mother during an interview on CNN last night. It got awkward when Carson pointed out that his mom is still alive! "I've never been happier to be wrong," the anchor told Mediaite .
2. Jeb Bush has told folks that he's lost 45 pounds since going on the Paleo diet, according to the New York Post's Page Six .
3. Chris Christie promised to re-criminalize marijuana if he's elected. "If you're getting high in Colorado today, enjoy it," he said at a New Hampshire town hall. "As of January 2017, I will enforce the federal laws."
4. Donald Trump said Sarah Palin would have a role in his administration, perhaps in the cabinet. "Because she really is somebody who knows what's happening and she's a special person," he said on a show called "The Palin Update. "
5. Trump is actually worth about $2.9 billion, according to a Bloomberg calculation, far less than the $10 billion he claims.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

6. Trump's lawyer, Michael Cohen, apologized for insisting to the Daily Beast that, "by the very definition, you can't rape your spouse." Trump told CNN that he disagreed with his close confidant. "He's speaking for himself," The Donald said. "He's not speaking for me, obviously."
7. Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) put a hold on the intelligence spending bill that funds the FBI and NSA because of a provision requiring social networks to report terrorist activity to the government. The measure passed through the Senate Intelligence Committee 15-0 last month. (USA Today)
8. Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) has more than $5 million cash on hand for his gubernatorial campaign, more than the three other candidates combined. (Times-Picayune)
9. Oklahoma Gov. Mary Fallin's daughter, Christina, who has been living out of a trailer parked on the grounds of the governor's mansion (!), will move in the face of public outrage and the discovery that it violates a state code, The Oklahoman reports. Here is a picture of the trailer from KFOR-TV (via the AP):

WAPO HIGHLIGHTS:

— "Companies have found something to give their workers besides wages," by Ylan Q. Mui: "More businesses are upping their spending on benefits such as one-time bonuses, health care and paid time off…Many are rolling out perks such as free gym membership, commuting subsidies, even pet health insurance…Often, those benefits are being provided in lieu of higher salaries…Companies say they are catering to the growing workforce of millennials who seem to prize short-term flexibility over long-term financial security, and the change allows bosses to reward star employees without permanently increasing costs."

— Maryland Senate candidate Donna "Edwards won't buck outside cash in Senate race," by Rachel Weiner: "For Edwards, what might seem a tough decision ideologically is also a necessity for political survival. Vastly outraised by Democratic primary opponent Rep. Chris Van Hollen, the four-term member of Congress says she will need spending from outside groups to stay competitive in her bid to succeed retiring Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski (D). Van Hollen, a prolific fundraiser and former chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, has $3.75 million ready for the race, according to the most recent campaign filings. Edwards has $419,000."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

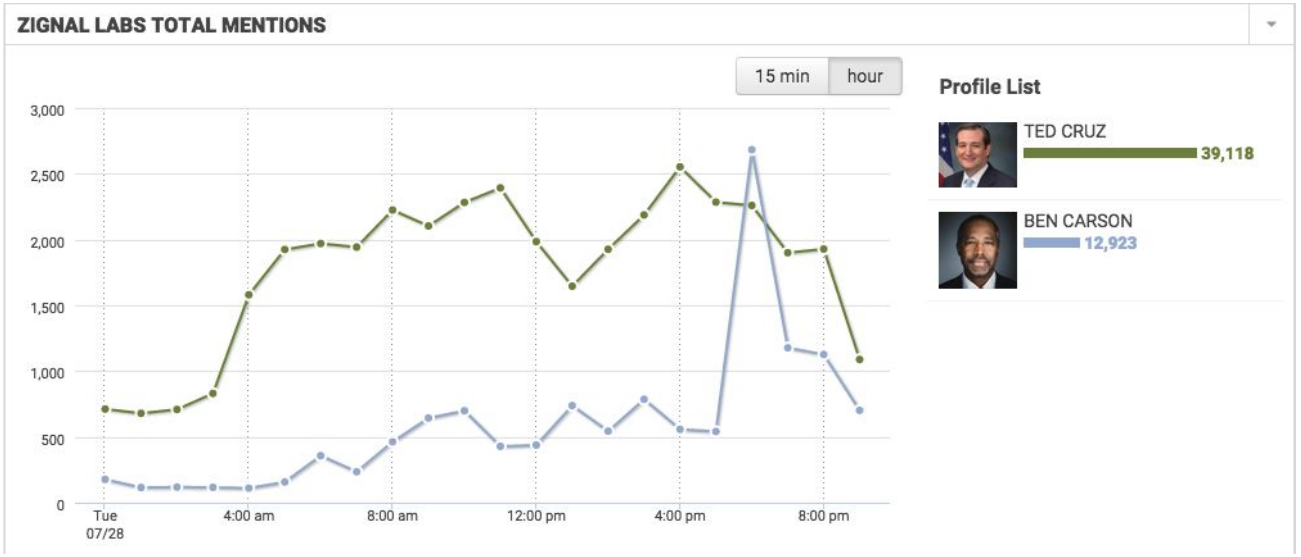
SOCIAL MEDIA SPEED READ:

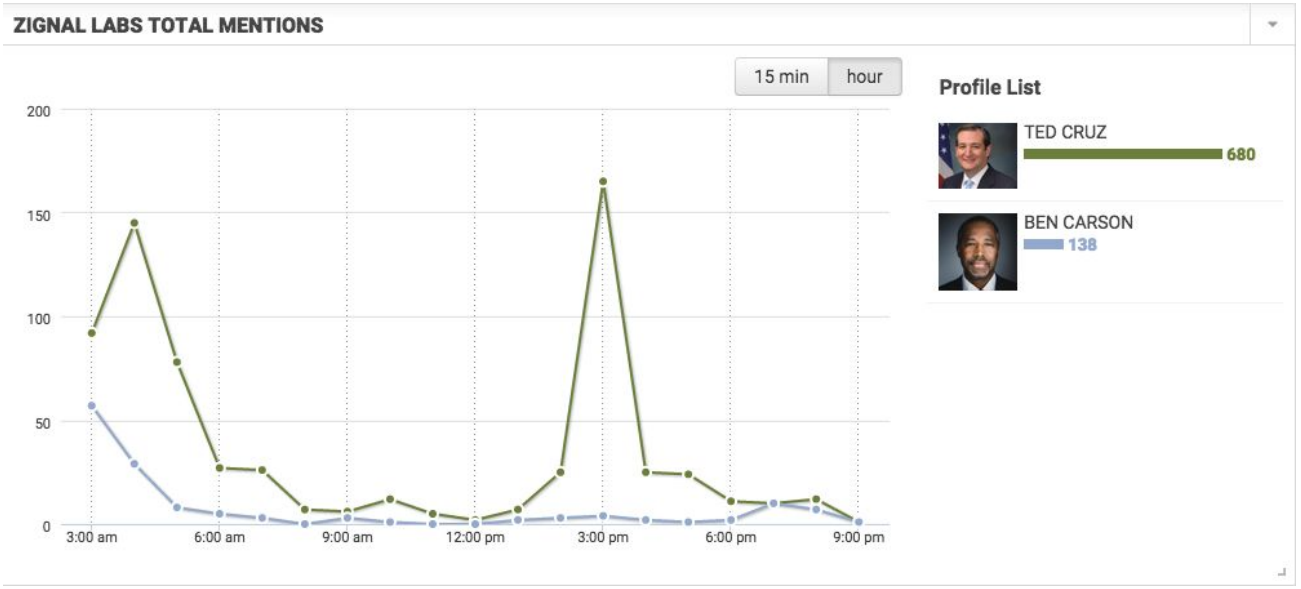
— ZIGNAL VISUAL: Ted Cruz's crusade against Planned Parenthood allowed him to win the day online. Tuesday belonged to Ted Cruz, who commanded more media attention than any GOP contender who has never had his own reality TV show. Cruz's call to defund Planned Parenthood stoked the conservative net roots. Cruz himself drove the social-media chatter with a series of widely-circulated tweets:

The gambit proved so successful at generating attention for the Texas Senator that one of his fellow GOP contenders decided to join the fray. Look at what happened to Ben Carson's mentions when he also pushed for the government to defund Planned Parenthood on Tuesday evening:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



But Cruz was the one who got the cameras. Carson received 40 percent of the Twitter mentions that Cruz did, but the Texas senator had five times as many television mentions, meaning his story reached millions more people than Carson's announcement. Look at that same total mentions graph when we only chart mentions of the two candidates on network and cable television:



–WHAT EVERYONE IS TALKING ABOUT:

Pictures of the day:

President Obama laughs at the hair nets that reporters had to wear to cover his tour of Faffa Food in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(time)

Here’s a shot of the press pool from the Post’s Juliet Eilperin:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@eilperin)

Scott Walker visited Philadelphia's iconic rival cheesesteak shops, Pat's and Geno's, where he ran into protesters:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@MattGelb)

Tweets of the day:

Maryland Gov. Larry Hogan (R) shared a photo of his bald head, the result of chemotherapy for non-Hodgkins lymphoma. “It looks like there is another white dome in Annapolis! I’m losing hair, but I’m winning the battle,” he tweeted.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@LarryHogan)

The Post has a front-page profile this morning of Hogan's little-known lieutenant governor, Boyd K. Rutherford, who has found himself thrust into a somewhat awkward role. "At a minimum, Rutherford is filling in more frequently for Hogan at meetings, ribbon-cuttings and other events," Paul Schwartzman writes. "But the gravity of Hogan's illness and treatment regimen also creates the possibility that Rutherford may have to step up in a more permanent way." Fun fact: "Rutherford, a District native whose grandmother was an ally of the city's political maestro, Marion Barry, joined the Republican Party in his 30s after deciding that policies championed by Barry and other Democrats had failed blacks."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Maryland Lt. Governor Boyd Rutherford in Annapolis last month. (Photo by Marvin Joseph/The Washington Post)

Sen. Mark Warner (D-Va.) thanked Sen. Jon Tester (D-Mont.) for pointing out a hole in his suit and “offering to take me shopping”:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@MarkWarner)

Instagrams of the day:

It was a day for fast food on the campaign trail, as Chris Christie lunched at McDonalds:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(chrischristie)

GOOD READS FROM ELSEWHERE:

— New York Times, "Under Oath, Donald Trump Shows his Raw Side ," by Michael Barbaro and Steve Eder: "Hundreds of pages of sworn testimony by Mr. Trump over the past decade show something less flattering. Some of his claims, made under oath, and under pressure, are shown to be hyperbolic overstatements, and others to be shadings of the truth or even outright misstatements. And in rare instances, he turns boorish and demeaning…It showcases Mr. Trump's fixation with his image as a financial success, and lays bare his hypersensitivity to any suggestion of failure." Also, the story sheds lights on some of Trump's habits: he doesn't drink alcohol, doesn't really watch TV, doesn't use text messages and "very rarely" used email as of 2013.

— Milwaukee Journal-Sentinel, "Assembly passes arena deal, sends it to Scott Walker," by Patrick Marley and Jason Stein: "Almost seven months after Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker proposed public money for the new Milwaukee Bucks arena, the Assembly

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Tuesday returned a $250 million bill to him…While campaigning at two South Philadelphia cheesesteak joints, the governor said he would sign the much-revised measure, calling it a good deal for Wisconsin…'the main reason I got into it was because it protected state revenues,' Walker said, citing the income taxes Wisconsin would lose if the team leaves the state. 'That just creates a big hole for everything else. … This was really about protecting the taxpayers of the state.'"

— Huffington Post, "Vermont media want a piece of the Bernie Sanders story ," by Michael Calderone: "VT Digger, a nonprofit Vermont news site with a full-time staff of 10, reported earlier this month that the mother of Sen. Bernie Sanders' 46-year-old son Levi was an old girlfriend — not the candidate's first wife… Sure enough, just 12 hours after its publication, Politico, which specializes in covering the fine details of lawmakers' biographies, blasted out a feature built largely on the very same nugget…The emergence of Sanders (I-Vt.) as a major presidential candidate has provided a second act on the national stage for a quirky press corps from one of the country's smallest states."

— Minneapolis Star Tribune, "Twin Cities dentist admits killing beloved lion, thought he was acting legally," by Paul Walsh and Brandon Stahl: "Walter J. Palmer of Eden Prairie, a practicing dentist in Bloomington and a prominent bow-and-arrow hunter, issued a statement addressing the killing on July 1 of Cecil, a lion that was a favorite among tourists and wildlife researchers. 'I hired several professional guides, and they secured all proper permits,' Palmer's statement read. 'To my knowledge, everything about this trip was legal and properly handled. I had no idea that the lion I took was a known, local favorite, was collared and part of a study until the end of the hunt. I relied on the expertise of my local professional guides to ensure a legal hunt.'"

Health care —

Good news: "Mortality rates among Medicare patients fell 16% from 1999 to 2013. That's equal to more than 300,000 fewer deaths a year in 2013 than in 1999," according to a Journal of American Medicine Study that USA Today reports on.

Bad news: "By 2019, midway through the next president's term, health care spending will be increasing at roughly 6 percent a year, compared to an average annual rise of 4 percent from 2008 through 2013," says the Health and Human Services Department's Office of the Actuary, per the AP .

BUZZING AT THE CAPITOL:

— Washington Post, "Former members of Congress not invited to pope's speech," by Colby Itkowitz: "If any former members of Congress planned a return trip to Capitol Hill for Pope Francis's anticipated visit, they might want to check the refund policy. The House on Tuesday passed a rule for who can attend the pontiff's planned Sept. 24 speech in the House chamber. Unlike other major addresses, like the State of the Union or Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's March visit, the hundreds former members didn't make the cut.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

'I think they literally have an unmanageable interest from everyone in the Pope's visit,' Catholic-convert former Speaker Newt Gingrich told us in an e-mail."

— National Journal, "Senate Democrats get a 2016 pitch from Bernie Sanders ," by Sarah Mimms and Rachel Roubein: "Senate Democrats got a side of Bernie Sanders with their lunch Tuesday, as their independent colleague pitched them on his presidential candidacy during the conference's weekly gathering. Sanders's presentation follows one earlier this month by his rival for the Democratic nomination, Hillary Clinton, whom a majority of his colleagues already support … Sanders's presentation was relatively brief and largely a laying out of his ideology and vision for the nation's future, members said. He also discussed the large crowds that have shown up for his speeches around the country."

— Politico, "Carson, Cruz and Paul rally against Planned Parenthood ," by Eliza Collins: "Sen. Ted Cruz called on the Department of Justice to open a criminal investigation into the people who appear in undercover videos of Planned Parenthood officials discussing fetal tissue donation. Cruz was speaking at an anti-abortion rally organized by Students for Life of America on Tuesday, just after activists released their third undercover video of Planned Parenthood officials discussing fetal body parts in graphic detail … Cruz was one of three presidential candidates, along with Sen. Rand Paul and Dr. Ben Carson, who spoke at the event."

HOT ON THE LEFT

America still wants to fund Planned Parenthood after sting videos. From The Huffington Post: "Nearly two-thirds of American voters said they oppose a Republican proposal to strip federal funds from Planned Parenthood after the release of two undercover "sting" videos of the family planning provider, according to a new poll released Tuesday by the liberal Hart Research Associates … Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) started the process last week of fast-tracking a bill that would zero out federal family planning funding for Planned Parenthood. But the new poll found that only 28 percent of voters favor that proposal, and just a

HOT ON THE RIGHT

University of California offers six choices for gender identity. From Fox News : "Admission applications used by the UC system are giving potential students a host of choices for gender-related questions – including six varieties to describe "gender identity." The questions, which will go into circulation this fall, are voluntarily answered and responses don't impact the admissions process … Applicants can choose male, female, trans male/trans man, trans female/ trans woman, gender queer/gender non-conforming and 'different identity' … The gender and sex questions are just one change slated for the UC system. Gender-neutral quarter of voters would prefer a congressional candidate who supports defunding the family planning provider over one who would continue funding it."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

restrooms and changing rooms are being installed and "the university is initiating a two-year project designed to coordinate and promote interdisciplinary study of genders and sexualities," according to a UC press release."

DAYBOOK:

–What's happening today on the campaign trail: The Bernie Sanders campaign will hold its first ever national organizing meeting. Rick Perry will campaign in New Hampshire, focusing on Carroll County. Chris Christie will attend a meet-and-greet in Hooksett, New Hampshire and participate in the Americans for Peace, Prosperity and Security Forum at the University of New Hampshire in Manchester. Scott Walker will attend a breakfast for the Greenwich Republican Town Committee in Connecticut. [On Saturday, trying to capitalize on the debt crisis, Martin O'Malley will travel to Puerto Rico.]

–On the Hill: The Senate kicks off the day with a round of votes at 10 a.m. The House will also convene at 10 a.m. on what could be its last day before summer break. Joint Chiefs of Staff Chair Martin Dempsey, Defense Secretary Ashton Carter, and Energy Secretary Ernest Moniz testify before the Senate Armed Services Committee on the Iran nuclear deal at 9:45 a.m.

–At the White House: President Obama will host House Democrats for a working reception to discuss his legislative priorities, including the Iran agreement.

QUOTE OF THE DAY:

"The response from Jewish people has been overwhelmingly positive." – Mike Huckabee defended his comment that Obama is marching Israel "to the door of the oven" with the Iran deal, as a procession of Jewish leaders criticized him

NEWS YOU CAN USE IF YOU LIVE IN D.C.:

— It'll be another sweaty day, but we should avoid rain until tomorrow. "Heat and high humidity combine with partly sunny skies (once we burn off patchy morning fog) for a classic late-July 'steamer,'" the Capital Weather Gang forecasts. "The heat part could be worse, with highs hitting the fairly typical low 90s. But with a muggy light breeze from the south keeping dew points up in the low 70s, the afternoon heat index peaks near or past 100."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

— Left fielder Jayson Werth and first baseman Ryan Zimmerman returned from the disabled list last night, but the Nationals still lost to the Miami Marlins, 4-1, their fourth loss in five games. The Nats also acquired Philadelphia Phillies veteran closer Jonathan Papelbon in a complicated trade deal that will displace Drew Storen from ninth-inning duties. Papelbon agreed to a pay cut in exchange for Washington picking up his option for 2016.

Dee Gordon of the Marlins turns a double play as Jayson Werth slides into second in Miami last night. (Photo by Mike Ehrmann/Getty Images)

VIDEO OF THE DAY:

Jack Black, Morgan Freeman, Natasha Lyonne and Valerie Plame Wilson endorsed the Iran deal in a video for Global Zero:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(globalzerochannel)

An excavation in Jamestown unearthed four bodies that were buried in 1609 inside a long-vanished church. Michael E. Ruane has a fascinating story in the paper this morning about the archaeologists involved and the questions raised by a mysterious box discovered with the bones.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This image from the Smithsonian shows the four sets of human remains excavated in Jamestown, Va.

You received this e-mail because you are registered on washingtonpost.com . We respect your privacy . If you believe that this e-mail has been sent to you in error, or you no longer wish to receive this newsletter, click here . Contact us for help.

©2015 The Washington Post | 1150 15th St NW, Washington, DC 20071

The Washington Post

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "German Marshall Fund" <press@gmfus.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 3/1/2016 6:30:00 PM
Subject: Transatlantic Take: Moscow, Washington, and Damascus: Is Cooperation Really Possible?

If you have problems viewing this email, you can view it as a web page. To view the mobile-friendly web page click here.

G | M | F The German Marshall Fund of the United States
STRENGTHENING TRANSATLANTIC COOPERATION

Transatlantic Take

Moscow, Washington, and Damascus: Is Cooperation Really Possible?

Angela Stent — March 2, 2016

WASHINGTON—Since launching a bombing campaign in Syria in late September, Russian President Vladimir Putin has ended the West's attempt to isolate Russia and has ensured that Moscow will have to be part of the solution to the Syrian crisis. As the international community awaits the fate of the latest cease-fire and Putin highlights Russia's constructive role in securing the agreement, Western and Arab skepticism about Russia's true intentions remains high. Indeed, U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry has promised that the United States has a "Plan B" if the ceasefire fails, while Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov insists that "there is no such thing [as a Plan B] and can never be"...

FULL ARTICLE

Angela Stent is a Senior Fellow at the Transatlantic Academy, an initiative of the German Marshall Fund of the United States in Washington, DC, and is the author of The Limits of Partnership: U.S.-Russian Relations in the 21st Century. Follow her on Twitter @AngelaStent .

The views expressed in GMF publications and commentary are the views of the author alone.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara Du Bois" <sdubois@progressivemediausa.org>
To: "Sara Du Bois" <SDuBois@progressivemediausa.org>
Date: 6/4/2008 7:42:33 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Town Hall in Baton Rouge, LA 06/04/08

Hello BigCampaign,

Just off the phone with our tracker Evan who was on the ground today in Baton Rouge, LA. Below are the notes from our call.

BIG HIGHLIGHTS

- Congratulates both Democratic candidates. Says that "as a father of 3 daughters," he knows that Hillary's campaign has been an inspiration to women
- Invites Obama to join him in series of town hall-style meetings, and even fly on the same plane. Spends most of the event criticizing Obama for empty rhetoric and naivete, and distancing himself from Bush wherever he can.
- Insists that "we are drawing down from pre-surge levels" and that Obama was "dead wrong" to think the surge wouldn't work. Says of Iraqi political situation, "Democracy is tough… Look at the gridlock we have" in Washington. It's better to have a 'flawed but functioning' democracy than Saddam.
- Had to be corrected for 2 small flubs:

  1. Saying there are now 27 instead of 37 charter schools in NOLA and
  2. Repeating a reporter's mistake of saying "investment" instead of "divestment" in Iran policy. As a result, McCain said, "I've never favored investment," and then waved off the misspeak.

Baton Rouge, LA: McCain Town Hall Meeting 06/04/08

Background details:

- Mayor Kip Holden gave introductory remarks, followed by former Gov. Buddy Roemer and finally Gov. Jindal.
- Also in the audience were former Gov. Dave Treen, State Sen. John Kennedy and Woody Jenkins
- 6-700 people. Staffers appeared to act as seat-fillers at the beginning of the event. It was unclear whether they moved as the event got under way. The event appeared at capacity, with audience members having to stand along the walls.
- Minorities poorly represented, but more than usual; Crowd younger than usual
- Security: McCain staffers gave our staffer some trouble, as they seem to be getting stricter about only letting credentialed press onto the risers. Our tracker was able to get into the Town Hall by leaving out his tripod, etc.. He was turned away from the press avail.
- A few Ron Paul buttons / supporters, and a Code Pink lady. McCain seems more careful about who he picks to answer questions, e.g. a lot of questions from the risers, which were packed with vets. Spent a longer time than usual talking with his back to the general seating.
- Backdrop is another giant green sign that says "Straight Talk Town Hall"

Speech Highlights:

- Roemer thanks McCain's volunteers who called you all and got you to come to this event. He remarked that there are some racists and a few journalists say the race is about black and white. It's not, it's about green and gray; commander-in-chief; leading the free world; health care. McCain's "modest about his economic background" (" He gets it right every time. … Let's lower taxes on business…"). McCain had the courage to stand alone in the Senate and not put a single earmark in a single bill. Earmarks are not the American way. "John McCain doesn't talk about it; he just does it." "He's not an economist" but he knows how to "protect our dollars." As President, "don't need a pretty speech; I need a Commander-in-Chief" (This is the general message of the event.)
- Jindal comments that McCain was a real reformer before it was cool, e.g. earmark reform. Courage-knows what it means to suffer and sacrifice. He is a son, grandson and father of dedicated patriots. Our next President will need to stand up and do what's right, not just sound bites. McCain "has an annoying habit": he's straightforward.

[McCain begins opening remarks]

- Thanks Jindal for his tax reform and ethic and lobbying reforms. Thanks the rest of the introducers. Talks about post-Katrina LSU-AZ State football game in AZ, a "moving experience"
- Town hall meeting is "essence" of American democracy. - Congratulates both Dem candidates, HRC for hard-fought campaign she waged and her hard work "and I know that as a father of 3 daughters" that Hillary has inspired women with her campaign." Congratulates Obama on his win. And so, this morning, I sent Obama invitation to join in town hall meetings around the country (vis-a-vis JFK-Goldwater—those contenders enjoyed a very good personal relationship. They had agreed on this, and it would have happened had not JFK been assassinated in Dallas). No spin rooms, just people. MCCAIN even suggested they travel together, even on same plane – probably save on energy; and given the expenses, I'm sure my campaign would agree to it. Wants 1st to be in NYC June 12th.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Americans are tired of all the gimmicks, phony sound bites and photo-ops that make campaigns seem more about the candidates than the public. No matter who wins this election, this country is going to change dramatically. The difference is between the right change and wrong change, forward vs. backwards. Obama has chance to embrace a higher level of political discourse, namely this town halls.
- America is a leader. "Leaders don't hide from history; they make history."
- ENERGY: Cost of oil continues to increase and you keep paying more for gas. It is a compelling national security issue and economic issue and environmental one that we eliminate our dependence on foreign oil. We're spending $500B - $600B to countries that don't like us very much. We must exploit existing reserves, obviously in U.S.—and this state is very important to that aspect of our economy—but also need to go to alternate fuel sources, incl. nuclear power. Americans need to be led. I'm not telling you that Americans have to shiver in the dark. i'll be telling you how we can achieve this in a few years. Uncertain about what Hugo Chavez is going to do, the Persian Gulf, the Iranians—but I can tell you they're up to no good.
- NATIONAL SECURITY / ROLE OF MILITARY / IRAQ: We need a much larger military to relieve the strain on them. We can recruit and retain the best of our military. All of us are saddened by the sacrifice—over 4,000 making the ultimate sacrifice in Iraq and Afghanistan. Straight-talk: the war was badly mismanaged, and I was against the way it was going. Under Petraeus, it's working and it's succeeding. It's been hard and tough but "recent events show we are winning in Iraq." Today in 3 Iraqi cities, the Iraqi military is running things with support of Americans – not the other way around. The Iraqi military is now functioning effectively. "Sadr City today is quiet."
- Repeats – "we are drawing down from pre-surge levels." I am hopeful that we will be able to withdraw more troops. But it has to be based on facts on the ground, not some politician's ideological schedule for withdrawal. Obama was "dead wrong" in Oct when he said the surge wouldn't work. "Democracy is tough. … Look at the gridlock we're in" in DC. Saddam Hussein who had had WMDs in the past and used them against his people and wanted to do it again today. Better to have a 'flawed but functioning' democracy.
- Iran is developing nuclear weapons. They've pledged elimination of Israel, they're exporting explosives that are killing Americans. Obama's willingness to sit down without preconditions is "not right… naïve… shows a lack of experience"
- I want to be President because these are dangerous times—we're in two wars—but also because I believe I can inspire Americans to serve a cause greater than themselves.
- In Louisiana, I sense a spirit of optimism – there are still challenges, but they are making improvements. I believe that that spirit can spread across the country.

QUESTION AND ANSWER

Q1) I'm a military mom. I have 2 sons enlisted right now. One is in Baghdad – told her to tell him that the Marines support him and he is our only hope for succeeding out here – we can't allow Obama or HRC in White House.

MCCAIN: All I can say is it's very hard to have family members in the military, but they are an inspiration to us all.

Q2) I appreciate your balanced approach on Iraq – I was uncomfortable with us going in, but we're there now and we have a responsibility. Similarly, on the energy issue. Any comments on the VP search?

MCCAIN: Jindal is the next generation of leadership, not just of GOP but of America. His accomplishments are remarkable, "a great American success story."

Q3) A lot of Gold Star families here.

MCCAIN: "I hate war. Ask the veterans here – no one hates war more than the vets." I will do everything I can to bring them home. If I didn't believe in my heart that staying the c—staying with this succeeding strategy was working, I would also want to bring them home immediately, but I want to bring them home with honor.

Q4) what's your opposition to Webb GI bill?

MCCAIN: We need to increase the educational benefits. Years ago, the GI bill was really important. I want 2 things: (1) at a point, GIs should be able to transfer their benefits to their spouse and family. (2) Non-commission officers are our great strength. I want to increase the educational benefits as those members of the military stay in the military- so they'll make a career out of a very honorable profession. Now the bill doesn't have any incentive to stay in longer. It's very expensive to train. Study says retention would drop 16%.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q4) Question about immigration and the problem of non-English speakers.
MCCAIN: "This meeting is adjourned." You articulate very eloquently the concerns and frustration that Americans have over our failure to carry out our federal responsibility to secure our borders. We have failed to do that. As you know, I've tried—reaching across the aisle. We failed because Americans didn't believe that we'd secure the borders. I got the message. A large number of illegals cross from Mexico to AZ. We can use technology, walls, UAVs, etc. it's going to be expensive but we can do it. Then we need to have a temporary worker programs with tamper-proof biometric document and electronic employer-verfication system. Then we can prosecute anyone who still employs people without these. The bad part is last: we should round up the 2 million people who've committed a crime and deport them or put them in jail. We don't have the capacity to deport all 10million. We should deport all the people who came here recently. For anyone to even get a green card, they have to learn English or at least English-capacity, and learn the Constitution and our laws. What's partisan about illegal immigration and securing our borders? Nothing. I'll reach across the aisle to fix this.

Q5) According to VFW mag, less than 1% (?) of Congressmen have children in service. I think that should be a national scandal.
MCCAIN: (1) I don't believe we need to go back to a draft. In Vietnam draft, the majority of the people drafted were the lowest-income Americans—the richer could find a way out of it. (2) as President, I will ask all young people to serve in some capacity. I'll tell them that the noblest of all is serving in the military and "I believe I can inspire them to serve."

Q6) If elected, what's your commitment to the limitation of federal powers and federal govt as it applies to national security and governance. To minimize intrusion.
MCCAIN: If I sign a bill into law, I will abide that law and will make sure the govt agencies abide by that law. (2) Very important – the appointment of judges to the federal bench. I will only appoint strict-constructionists. "Two of the finest appointments were both Senator Alito—excuse me, Justice Alito and Justice Roberts." I was proud to have supported them. There's a stark difference between myself and Obama, which is extremely important.

- MCCAIN jokes that "these work-release workers" aka his aides at the event "are not very good."

Q7) NCLB forgets about the responsibility of parents. How are you going to address this? We as teachers have no control over things like having kids with drug problems.
MCCAIN: straight-talk – I cannot legislate the responsibility of parents. I can encourage parents. I thought NCLB was a great beginning. It rewards good-performing schools in some ways. That's why we need to fix it. It was a landmark piece that got the fed govt involved in certain ways. If you want to scrap it like Obama wants to do, that means you're happy with the pre-NCLB status quo.
Good example in NOLA. There are 27 charter schools (interrupted and corrected--- "37, 37 charter schools"). McCain asks Gov. Jindal to talk about this system.
- Jindal says we can learn some lessons – when we rebuild Louisiana, let's not just rebuild what we had before; (2) lack of discipline in classroom environment makes teacher retention difficult; we need higher pay for teachers and a Teachers' Bill of Rights so they have support of school administration and the parents to restore classroom difficulty
- MCCAIN response to Jindal: "Well I've got to take him wherever I go"

Q8) (a PE teacher): Very concerned about childrens' obesity problem. Anything we can do to step up PE in schools.
MCCAIN: Every parent in USA should know what school lunch program is in their school, what their school's PE program is. I'm reluctant to have fed government impose things on local school boards and local authorities. But if you send LSU and NOLA Saints and other athletes to schools to say 'get in shape, watch your diet,' I think young people would respond to it. Wants a nationwide program where athletes go to schools and motivate kids to lose weight – without getting the federal govt involved, in which case there are always unintended consequences.

Q9) Wouldn't it be a good idea to concentrate more on preventative health care (e.g. BluePrint Louisiana)?
MCCAIN: I think insurance companies and employers should reward people for wellness and fitness; e.g. cash reward, employer paying for fitness club. Most expensive is ER care. We need more facilities that address emergency care outside E.R. health care costs are never going to come down if we have a rising rate of heart disease and diabetes. We're going to spend hours discussing / debating health care. I want to give every family $5k refundable tax credit so they can go across state lines and get health care.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

McCain concludes: I want to assure you as President, "I will never let you down."

Press Avail (Note: We were not able to get tracker footage of this, but it was broadcast by some of the cable networks.)

MCCAIN repeats invitation to Obama to engage in series of town hall meetings. Wants to do first one on June 12th and fly there with Sen Obama as part of the "symbology" and the agreement that was made between Goldwater and JFK. American people want a new kind of debate and they want to hear directly from the candidates. I hope Sen Obama will agree.

- Q1 (Kelly O'Donnell): Obama gets a lot of praise for drawing large crowds and deliver a speech and you get criticism for small crowds and worse at the podium. Is that a deficiency in your campaign.
  MCCAIN: (mocks getting angry and offended): We do fine. I just prefer a town hall meeting – it's a purer form of democracy, I never would've been able to win in NH without them. I will continue this throughout the election.

- Q2: At AIPAC speech, Obama said he proposed investment [means "divestment"] a year ago and wants to know why you didn't. he also said he wants to meet with Iranian leaders but with preconditions – using democracy as a leverage.
  MCCAIN: "I've never favored investment'" reporter corrects McCain and himself: "Divestment." It's very clear on my record on whether we should support terrorist organziations. Obama has repeatedly he would meet with Pres of Iran – it shows a naivete and a lack of experience.
  - Follow-up: Are you familiar with this divestment bill?
    MCCAIN: No, I don't even know if it passed the Senate. There are thousands of bills every year. Obama voted against declaring Iranian Revolutionary Guard a terrorist org – a fundamental misunderstanding of threat they pose to us.

- Q3 (Michael): Obama campaign said they're open to town hall meeting, but would prefer something less structured, more like Lincoln-Douglas debates. Are you flexible on format?
  MCCAIN: I want to hear directly from the American people asking the candidates what they think.

- Q4: Now that Obama has clinched nomination, what makes Louisiana important to you?
  MCCAIN: The leadership here, Gov. Jindal – has been able to reach across the aisle and help with recovery. It's a way I can show American people how I can reach across the aisle and get things done.

- Q5: It seems to me you didn't answer Michael's question.
  MCCAIN (interrupting): I was actually recognizing the person behind you, not you, to ask a question.
  - Follow-up Q: maybe I should start differently.
    MCCAIN: Maybe you should, but I'm recognizing the person behind you.

- Q6: In your speech last night, you criticized Obama for supporting GOP Pres's energy bill. It seemed extraordinary. Just how much of a liability do you see GWB to your campaign?
  MCCAIN: it was a bad bill. I'll leave others to figure out liability. I've agreed with Pres a lot of times and disagreed a lot, whether on Iraq, environment, spending, etc. we've had great differences. The energy bill was a failure. Obama has criticized the policy, but he supported the bill.

- Q7: When Michael asked if you were open to format changes in town hall proposal. Are you?
  MCCAIN: I want a town hall meeting and I want it to be in a way that American people can feel like they're involved. I know from many years of experience that this is the most effective way. If there are ways to modify the details, I would discuss that. I do want a town hall meeting.

- Q8 (JEFF MASON): you were complimentary of HRC last night and today. Are you actively courting her women voters?
  MCCAIN: I would welcome them, but we'll be seeking votes of people across the political spectrum. We're going to discard the old politics as usual. 81% of people think we're on the wrong track, and I think this town hall could go a long way in fixing that, rather than hearing long speeches.

- Q9: Maya Rodriguez (local CBS): Why have you voted twice against investigation of levee failures in NOLA?
  MCCAIN: I've supported every investigation into what caused the tragedy, I've been here. I've been as active as anybody in restoration efforts. I also voted against one bill that was loaded with pork-barrel projects that had nothing to do with NOLA recovery. I'm proud of my record of support, doing everything I can, incl. my commitment on climate change.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

--
Sara DuBois
Deputy Director, Tracking/Media Monitoring
Progressive Media USA
sdubois@progressivemediausa.org
202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"John M Deutch" <jmd@MIT.EDU>
To:	"John Podesta" <John_D_Podesta@who.eop.gov> "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date:	8/13/2014 4:16:18 PM
Subject:	Memorandum on Nuclear Power outlook
Attachments:	JMD-RKL Nuclear Memo (rev)[1].pdf

John,

I attach a four page memo that my colleague and friend Richard Lester have prepared about the outlook for nuclear power in the U.S.

I did this because of your telling me that you were concerned about this question and would welcome some outside view.

We shall be interested in your reaction. And if you request it, we will prepare a more complete paper.

Still at the cape. We expect 19 guests in the next 21 days. Mostly Phil and Marne collecting nice people. Nevertheless Pat and I may go to a motel.

I am set up to meet with Caroline Atkinson who, by all accounts, is quite excellent.

John

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jake Sullivan" <jake.sullivan@gmail.com>
To: "Eizenstat, Stuart" <seizenstat@cov.com>
Date: 6/25/2015 11:07:57 PM
Subject: Re: Letter

Stu - which line in the letter are you referring to? I don't have it in front of me but don't recall a specific section on fissile material.

> On Jun 26, 2015, at 12:39 AM, Eizenstat, Stuart <seizenstat@cov.com> wrote:
>
> Dear Jake,
>
> The Washington Institute letter complicates not only Kerry's efforts, but also Hillary's response, especially the insistence after the 10 year period that Iran have less nuclear fuel than needed for one bomb.
>
> I will be with Dennis Ross this weekend in Jerusalem, since we co-chair the Jewish People's Policy Institute, and we have our annual board meeting. I will get more texture on the letter.
>
> Best wishes,
>
> Stu

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara DuBois" <sara@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: "Sara Du Bois" <sara@progressiveaccountability.org>
Date: 9/2/2008 1:49:06 AM
Subject: [big campaign] '08 Daily News Clips - 9/2

08 Election Daily News Clips
September 2nd, 2008

Candidate Tracking:

All times in Eastern Standard Time

TBD

News Clips:

RNC NEWS

GOP Convention Going Forward Tuesday (The Page 9/2/08)
NBC reports the convention will attempt to get back on track Tuesday, and major evening speakers will include Fred Thompson, Lieberman and President Bush via satellite. The McCain camp has also organized several events focused on hurricane relief.
http://thepage.time.com/2008/09/02/tuesday-gop-convention-schedule-pending/

Networks Focus on Storm Continues (The Page 9/1/08)
All three network anchors host a primetime hour-long special on Hurricane Gustav from New Orleans.
http://feeds.feedburner.com/~r/time/thepage/ ~3/380819480/

Republicans Finish Short St. Paul Monday (The Page 9/1/08)
Day one of the Republican National Convention closes at 6:00 pm ET after Hurricane Gustav caused political restraint and a somber mood at the Xcel Center. Laura Bush addresses the convention about relief for the Gulf region: "Like all of you, George and I were planning on coming to enjoy this convention…. Our first priority now is to ensure the safety and well being of those living in the Gulf Coast region."
http://thepage.time.com/2008/09/01/in-session-3/

Paul Is Here, and the RNC Isn't Happy (WaPo 9/2/08)
By Matthew Mosk; A27
Former Republican presidential candidate Ron Paul has boasted that he wrote a book slamming the Iraq war and challenging the nation's economic system to continue a grass-roots movement that grew out of his quixotic campaign. The best-selling "The Revolution: A Manifesto" has become the centerpiece of a counterconvention by Paul that he has predicted will attract thousands of supporters to the Twin Cities.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/09/01/AR2008090102461_pf.html

Laura Bush, Cindy McCain take convention stage (CNN blog 9/1/08)
By Alexander Mooney
First Lady Laura Bush and Cindy McCain addressed the Republican National Convention Monday evening, delivering abbreviated remarks due to Hurricane Gustav.
http://politicalticker.blogs.cnn.com/2008/09/01/laura-bush-cindy-mccain-take-convention-stage/
Link to video of Laura Bush: http://www.cnn.com/video/#/ video/politics/2008/09/01/sot.laura.bush.gulf.coast.cnn
Link to video of Cindy: http://www.cnn.com/video/#/ video/politics/2008/09/01/sot.rnc.cindy.mccain.cnn

5 arrested in protests at GOP convention site (AP 9/1/08)
By AMY FORLITI
Thousands of protesters descended on the city hosting the Republican National Convention Monday, some smashing cars, puncturing tires and throwing bottles in a confrontations with pepper-spray wielding police who arrested at least five people.
http://ap.google.com/article/ALeqM5hksHDv1i55R2qYl6dkmMm10uxZ0AD92U58MO2

Roberta McCain Settles In at Xcel (The Page 9/1/08)
The candidate is absent from the GOP convention in St. Paul Monday– but his 96-year-old mother is attending the evening's session.
http://thepage.time.com/2008/09/01/roberta-mccain-settles-in-to-xcel/#

MCCAIN NEWS

McCain fought money on teen pregnancy programs (AP 9/2/08)
By Sharon Theimer
Republican John McCain, whose running mate disclosed that her unmarried 17-year-old daughter is pregnant, has opposed proposals to spend federal money on teen-pregnancy prevention programs and voted to require poor teen mothers to stay in school or lose their benefits.
http://www.boston.com/news/politics/2008/articles/2008/09/02/mccain_fought_money_on_teen_pregnancy_programs?mode=PF

McCain losing time to push security credentials (Boston Globe 9/2/08)
By Peter S. Canellos
As delegates to the Republican National Convention were riveted to TV shots of water lapping over levees yesterday, they expressed hope that a potential disaster had been averted on the Gulf Coast and that their own convention could proceed with only the loss of speeches by President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney. That may not be much of a loss at all, given the president's very low favorability ratings ... and the fact that

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hurricane Gustav gave John McCain a chance to show that he takes natural disasters very seriously. But the cancellation of Day One of the Republican convention may have a deeper political cost, one that pales in comparison with the potential loss of life on the Gulf Coast but one that could have an impact on the presidential race, nonetheless.
http://www.boston.com/news/politics/2008/articles/2008/09/02/mccain_losing_time_to_push_security_credentials?mode=PF

McCain in talks with Ron Paul for backing (Washington Times 9/2/08)
Ralph Z. Hallow
The McCain campaign, acting through the Republican National Committee, has been negotiating with Rep. Ron Paul to win his support and acquire the names of his sympathizers among the 4,607 delegates and alternates at the Republican National Convention, according to a senior aide to the Texas congressman.
http://washingtontimes.com/news/2008/sep/02/mccain-negotiating-with-paul-to-win-backing-suppor/

McCain Visits Disaster Relief Center in Toledo (ABC blog 9/1/08)
By Bret Hovell
Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., visited a disaster relief center in Toledo, Ohio, on Monday, continuing his effort to politically get out in front of Hurricane Gustav and avoid the overwhelming perception left after Hurricane Katrina that the Republican Party either didn't know about the magnitude of that storm, or didn't care.
http://blogs.abcnews.com/politicalradar/2008/09/mccain-visits-d.html

McCain posts biggest haul in August (AP 9/1/08)
Republican presidential candidate John McCain raised at least $47 million in August, his biggest haul so far and a sign that he is dispelling doubts about his campaign among conservative donors.
http://www.boston.com/news/politics/2008/articles/2008/09/02/mccain_posts_biggest_haul_in_august/?rss_id=Boston.com+--+Top+political+stories

Despite political respite, Biden hits McCain (FirstRead 9/1/08)
By Mike Memoli
This morning, Joe Biden said today was not a day for national politics. He said it again during a roundtable discussion outside his childhood home here this afternoon. But before long, he couldn't help himself, criticizing McCain for his views on offshore drilling and questioning his foreign policy judgment.
http://firstread.msnbc.msn.com/archive/2008/09/01/1322543.aspx

Response to Storm Shows Changes in McCain Campaign (NYT 9/1/08)
By ADAM NAGOURNEY
By every account, there was not much debate in John McCain's inner circle about what to do as Hurricane Gustav bore down on the Gulf Coast, just as delegates were coming into town for the convention. After the briefest of consultations, they decided to cancel major convention events Monday, realizing the political cost of proceeding with the pageantry of a convention as a potentially lethal storm landed on shore.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/09/01/us/politics/01web-nagourney.html?hp==print&adxnnl=1&pagewanted=print&adxnnlx=1220356858-ARUQVp6pnutnNPHuqrEelw

PAILIN NEWS

The Sarah Palin arrives at a GOP convention, eager to meet the new star (LA Times 9/2/08)
Ladies and gentlemen, the Governor is in the house. Sarah Palin, Alaska's governor but John McCain's new vice presidential partner, has arrived in St. Paul for the abbreviated Republican National Convention, where the selection of the relatively unknown 44-year-old mother of five has energized thousands of Republicans gathered for the GOP's first nomination of a female national candidaThe new Republican running mates Arizona senator John McCain and Alaska Governor Sarah Palinte since its founding in 1854.
http://latimesblogs.latimes.com/washington/2008/09/the-sarah-palin.html

Palin's Small Alaska Town Secured Big Federal Funds (WaPo 9/2/08)
By Paul Kane; A01
Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin employed a lobbying firm to secure almost $27 million in federal earmarks for a town of 6,700 residents while she was its mayor, according to an analysis by an independent government watchdog group.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/09/01/AR2008090103148.html

A New Twist in the Debate Over Mothers (NYT 9/2/08)
By JODI KANTOR and RACHEL L. SWARNS
When Gov. Sarah Palin of Alaska was introduced as a vice-presidential pick, she was presented as a magnet for female voters, the epitome of everymom appeal. But since then, as mothers across the country supervise the season's final water fights and pack book bags, some have voiced the kind of doubts that few male pundits have dared raise on television. With five children, including an infant with Down syndrome and, as the country learned Monday, a pregnant 17-year-old, Ms. Palin has set off a fierce argument among women about whether there are enough hours in the day for her to take on the vice presidency, and whether she is right to try.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/09/02/us/politics/02mother.html?ref=todayspaper&pagewanted=print

Gov. Mom (WaPo 9/2/08)
By Lois Romano; A21
It's quite a compelling image: An accomplished -- even glamorous -- working mother, projecting to the world that she can and does have it all: five children, a successful career and a husband who doesn't mind being Mr. Mom. Oh, and she's going to be a grandmother, and her infant has special needs, and she's running for vice president. The facts of life for Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin are fascinating and seem, frankly, exhausting.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/09/01/AR2008090102998_pf.html

In Political Realm, 'Family Problem' Emerges as Test (NYT 9/2/08)
By ADAM NAGOURNEY
For at least the time being, Gov. Sarah Palin appears to have survived the initial test after the disclosure that her unmarried teenage daughter was pregnant. Republican delegates rallied around her on Monday, saying the disclosure would not threaten her hopes of being Senator John McCain's running mate.

http://www.nytimes.com/2008/09/02/us/politics/02assess.html?hp

Labor Day Purge (The Page 9/2/08)
New Palin spinmeister tells the NY Times about McCain effort to put out potentially damaging information all at once during Gustav and the holiday.
http://thepage.time.com/2008/09/02/labor-day-purge/

New Palin details may help, not hurt (Politico 9/1/08)
By: Charles Mahtesian
Fishing permit violations. A blue-collar husband who racked up a DUI citation as a 22-year-old. An unmarried teenage daughter who is pregnant and a nasty child custody battle involving a family member. All of this, to one degree or another, has surfaced in recent days as a result of efforts to discredit or undermine Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin. But these revelations may have the opposite effect: In one sense, they could reinforce how remarkably unremarkable she is.
http://dyn.politico.com/printstory.cfm?uuid=202B4E02-18FE-70B2-A80A4298569F42B9

Evangelicals rally behind Palin after pregnancy news (CNN blog 9/1/08)
By Rebecca Sinderbrand
Key evangelical leaders rallied to Sarah Palin's support Monday amid news that her 17-year-old daughter, Bristol, was having a child.
http://politicalticker.blogs.cnn.com/2008/09/01/evangelicals-rally-behind-palin-after-pregnancy-news/

Calculated Risk With Female Voters Is Suddenly Even Harder to Calculate (WaPo 9/2/08)
By Anne E Kornblut and Juliet Eilperin; A19
In a presidential campaign that has challenged assumptions about female voters and candidates across the spectrum, the announcement yesterday that Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin's unmarried teenage daughter is five months pregnant added a variable to the multiple factors that will motivate the votes of more than half of the electorate in November.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/09/01/AR2008090102726_pf.html

Mayor Palin: A Rough Record (TIME 9/2/08)
By Nathan Thornburgh
John McCain was clear about why he picked half-term Alaska governor Sarah Palin to be his running mate. ...It is a powerful reinforcement of McCain's own political brand: tough, reform-minded, willing to break with his own party for the right cause. ...But in the first major race of her career — the 1996 campaign for mayor of her hometown of Wasilla — Palin was a far more conventional politician. In fact, according to some who were involved in that fight, Palin was a highly polarizing political figure who brought partisan politics and hot-button social issues like abortion and gun control into a mayoral race that had traditionally been contested like a friendly intramural contest among neighbors.
http://www.time.com/time/printout/0,8816,1837918,00.html

McCain vetter defends Palin review (AP 9/2/08)
By LIZ SIDOTI
Sarah Palin voluntarily told John McCain's campaign about her pregnant teenage daughter and her husband's 2-decade-old DUI arrest during questioning as part of the Republican's vice presidential search, the lawyer who conducted the background review said.
http://hosted.ap.org/dynamic/stories/C/CVN_PALIN?SITE=AP&SECTION=HOME&TEMPLATE=DEFAULT&CTIME=2008-09-02-03-36-15

McCain communications team sent to Alaska (CNN blog 9/1/08)
By Dana Bash
A senior adviser to John McCain's campaign confirms that they have dispatched a team of 12 people to presumptive VP nominee Sarah Palin's home state of Alaska.
http://politicalticker.blogs.cnn.com/2008/09/01/mccain-communications-team-sent-to-alaska/

Obama says Palin's family off limits (CNN 9/1/08)
* Barack Obama responds to Gov. Sarah Palin's daughter's pregnancy
* "People's families are off-limits ... children are especially off-limits," he says
* Obama says reporters should "back off these kinds of stories"
* Bristol Palin, a senior in high school, is about five months pregnant http://www.cnn.com/2008/POLITICS/09/01/obama.palin/index.html

GOP Deals With the Storm -- and the Stork (WaPo 9/2/08)
By Dana Milbank; A18
Hurricane Gustav made landfall on the Louisiana coast about 10:30 a.m. Monday. Hurricane Bristol made landfall in Minnesota at 11:43 a.m.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/09/01/AR2008090102553_pf.html

To rebut rumors, Palin says daughter, 17, pregnant (Reuters 9/1/08)
By Steve Holland
The 17-year-old daughter of Republican vice presidential candidate Sarah Palin is pregnant, Palin said on Monday in an announcement intended to knock down rumors by liberal bloggers that Palin faked her own pregnancy to cover up for her child.
http://www.reuters.com/article/newsOne/idUSN2944356420080901

The GOP platform plank on sexual abstinence (LA Times blog 9/1/08)
By Don Frederick
Palins In the wake of today's revelation that Sarah Palin's 17-year-old, unwed daughter is pregnant, the following plank in the Republican platform for the 2008 presidential campaign is sure to garner more attention than usual.
http://latimesblogs.latimes.com/washington/2008/09/the-gop-platfor.html

Palin On Abortion: I'd Oppose Even If My Own Daughter Was Raped (HuffPo 9/1/08)
By Sam Stein
In November 2006, then gubernatorial candidate Sarah Palin declared that she would not support an abortion for her own daughter even if she had been raped.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/09/01/palin-on-abortion-id-oppo_n_122924.html
See Ben Smith's "Palin opposed sex-ed": http://www.politico.com/blogs/bensmith/0908/Palin_opposed_sexed.html?showall

Palin Received Millions In Earmarks, Clouding Reformer Image (HuffPo 9/1/08)
By Sam Stein
News continues to break regarding vice presidential candidate Sarah Palin that could, in the long term, pose serious problems to one of the main thrusts of the McCain campaign: the message of conservative reform.
http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/09/01/palin-received-millions-i_n_123004.html

Palin Was a Director of Embattled Sen. Stevens's 527 Group (WaPo blog 9/1/08)
By Matthew Mosk
Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin began building clout in her state's political circles in part by serving as a director of an independent political group organized by the now embattled Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens. Palin's name is listed on 2003 incorporation papers of the "Ted Stevens Excellence in Public Service, Inc.," a 527 group that could raise unlimited funds from corporate donors.
http://voices.washingtonpost.com/the-trail/2008/09/01/palin_was_a_director_of_embatt.html#more

Exclusive: Todd Palin's 1986 DUI Arrest Called "Lesson Learned" (Brody File 9/1/08)
Sources close to Sarah Palin tell The Brody File that the husband of the GOP Vice-presidential choice, Todd Palin, was arrested and charged with Driving under the Influence of alcohol back in 1986. He was 22 years old at the time. He was driving in a truck with some friends in the small southwestern Alaska town of Dillingham when he was pulled over for the DUI. As is customary, he was taken to jail briefly. Sarah and Todd Palin were high school sweethearts so they were dating at the time. The Brody File can also report that there was no accident or injuries.
http://www.cbn.com/CBNnews/436411.aspx

Palin Hires Lawyer in Troopergate (AP 9/1/08)
By STEVE QUINN
Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin, the GOP vice presidential candidate, has hired a private practice attorney to defend her in the investigation into the firing of her public safety commissioner.
http://www.time.com/time/printout/0,8816,1837877,00.html

Palin and Her Pastors: "Those that die without Christ have a horrible, horrible surprise" (Harpers 9/1/08)
By Ken Silverstein and Sebastian Jones
During the 2008 campaign the beliefs of various candidates' spiritual mentors has attracted a great deal of attention, especially those of the Reverend Jeremiah Wright, and to a lesser extent those of John Hagee, who endorsed John McCain. So now seems an opportune time to examine the viewpoints of Sarah Palin's two most recent pastors, as expressed in their sermons.
http://www.harpers.org/archive/2008/08/hbc-90003486

Palin And The FBI Background Check -- Updated (Atlantic Online 9/1/08)
By Marc Ambinder
The Federal Bureau of Investigation did not participate in the vetting of Gov. Sarah Palin and did not conduct a background check as part of the process, an FBI spokesman said today.
http://marcambinder.theatlantic.com/archives/2008/09/palin_and_the_fbi_background_c.php

McCain Camp's Detailed Palin Review (AP 9/1/08)
By LIZ SIDOTI
Sarah Palin's path to the Republican ticket started with her name on a list — and a team of some 25 people poring through public records searching for trouble spots without her knowledge. Then came the 70-question survey and a nearly three-hour interview. ...In the days since, Republicans and Democrats have privately questioned whether the Arizona senator chose the first-term governor without fully looking into her background. McCain's campaign has vehemently defended the review.
http://www.time.com/time/politics/article/0,8599,1837949,00.html

Palin: "If Pledge Of Allegiance Was Good Enough For Founding Fathers, It's Good Enough For Me" (DailyKos 9/1/08)
...Sarah Palin, answering a 2006 policy questionnaire:
Q: "Are you offended by the phrase "Under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance? Why or why not?"
PALIN: "Not on your life. If it was good enough for the founding fathers, its good enough for me and I'll fight in defense of our Pledge of Allegiance"
...When John McCain was born, the words "Under God" were not in the Pledge. They would not appear there until 1954, during McCain's senior year of high school.
http://www.dailykos.com/storyonly/2008/9/1/13152/11620

Members of 'Fringe' Alaskan Independence Party Say Palin Was a Member in 90s (ABC blog 9/1/08)
By Jake Tapper
The campaign of Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., likes to herald the independence of its new running mate, Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin.
http://blogs.abcnews.com/politicalpunch/2008/09/members-of-frin.html

OPINIONS AND EDITORIALS

Longing for the McCain of old (Denver Post 9/2/08)
It would be refreshing if the old John McCain of political legend were to resurface this week at the Republican National Convention in St. Paul. We miss the old McCain, the one reputed for being a maverick, an occasional party rebel, a straight-talker, a coalition-builder. In short, a politician who is not annoyingly political, but who can work with both sides of the aisle.
http://www.denverpost.com/opinion/ci_10351957?source=rss

John McCain Has a Tax Plan To Create Jobs (WSJ 9/2/08)
By MARTIN FELDSTEIN and JOHN B. TAYLOR
John McCain's tax policies are designed to create jobs, increase wages and allow all Americans -- especially those in the hard-pressed middle class -- to keep more of what they earn. His plan achieves these goals in three important ways.
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB122031215585888783.html?mod=rss_opinion_main

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Why McCain Still Has a Chance To Win (WSJ 9/2/08)
By PETER ROBINSON
With Barack Obama already established as a skillful rhetorician, people keep asking me, a former White House speechwriter, about John McCain. Can he say anything -- anything at all -- that might place him in the company of Ronald Reagan, the president for whom I used to work? The answer, I believe, is yes.
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB122031196249888759.html?mod=rss_opinion_main

Ignore the Chauvinists. Palin Has Real Experience. (WSJ 9/2/08)
By NANCY PFOTENHAUER
In Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin, Sen. John McCain has found a fellow maverick to be his running mate -- one who can help bring the right kind of reform to Washington. Ms. Palin, like Mr. McCain, has a strong record of battling the status quo, restoring accountability and effectiveness to government, and working to secure energy independence, root out corruption and curb wasteful spending.
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB122031229774188795.html?mod=todays_us_opinion

What the Palin Pick Says (NYT 9/2/08)
By DAVID BROOKS
John McCain is not a normal conservative. He has instincts, but few abstract convictions about the proper size of government. He's a traditionalist, but is not energized by the social conservative agenda. As Rush Limbaugh understands, but the Democrats apparently do not, a McCain administration would not be like a Bush administration.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/09/02/opinion/02brooks.html?pagewanted=print

The Cynicism Express (WaPo 9/2/08)
By Eugene Robinson; A15
Has anyone noticed that Sarah Palin's central claim to political fame is a fraud? She represents herself as a fiscal conservative who abhors pork-barrel projects and said no thanks to the "Bridge to Nowhere" -- a $398 million span that would have linked Ketchikan, Alaska, to its airport across the Tongass Narrows. But as mayor of Wasilla (pop. 9,780), she hired a Washington lobbyist to bring home the bacon. And as a candidate for governor just two years ago, she supported both the Ketchikan bridge and the congressional earmark that would have paid most of its cost.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/09/01/AR2008090101716_pf.html

Sarah Palin: the new life of the Grand Old Party. (LA Times 9/2/08)
Jonah Goldberg
John McCain's running mate has been met with enthusiasm -- and donations -- from the conservative wing of the Republican Party.
http://www.latimes.com/news/opinion/la-oe-goldberg2-2008sep02,0,3190642.column?track=rss

Republicans Rush In (WaPo 9/2/08)
By Richard Cohen; A15
One of the great sights of American political life -- a YouTube moment if ever there was one -- was to see the doughboy face of Newt Gingrich as he extolled the virtues of Sarah Palin, a sitcom of a vice presidential choice and a disaster movie if she moves up to the presidency: "She's the first journalist ever to be nominated, I think, for the president or vice president, and she was a sportscaster on local television," Gingrich said on the "Today" show. "So she has a lot of interesting background. And she has a lot of experience. Remember that, when people worry about how inexperienced she is, for two years she's been in charge of the Alaska National Guard."
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/09/01/AR2008090101715_pf.html

The Lesson of Bristol Palin (WaPo 9/2/08)
By Ruth Marcus; A15
Bristol Palin's pregnancy may be the ultimate teachable moment. It just might not be the lesson that John McCain intended.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/09/01/AR2008090102305_pf.html

Bush's exit is McCain's redemption (Washington Times 9/2/08)
Hurricane Gustav has put on hold the party and splendor of the Republican National Convention, at least until today. As the Category 2 storm approached the Gulf states and even after the storm dissipated over land, there was talk that the party would have a chance to redeem itself during its convention, but there was nothing for the party to redeem, certainly not this Republican Party.
http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2008/sep/02/bushs-exit-is-mccains-redemption/

The dirty little secret about social security (Washington Times 9/2/08)
By Bob Barr
I am frustrated by the refusal of Sens. John McCain and Barack Obama to adequately confront Social Security's looming fiscal crunch. The United States faces a demography-driven crisis of entitlement spending.
http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2008/sep/02/the-dirty-little-secret-about-social-security/

Gustav's Landfall (WaPo 9/2/08)
The initial response suggests government has learned from Katrina.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/09/01/AR2008090102598_pf.html

McCain, a warrior, but ... (LA Times 9/1/08)
By Bob Kerrey
Fellow politician and Vietnam vet Bob Kerrey, who supports Barack Obama, says John McCain's military experience is not enough by itself to qualify him to be president.
http://www.latimes.com/news/opinion/la-oe-kerrey1-2008sep01,0,5019858.story?track=rss

BUSH NEWS

Cheney's Trip to Caucasus Could Presage a Tougher Russia Policy (WSJ 9/2/08)
By JOHN D. MCKINNON
Vice President Dick Cheney will travel to Georgia and Ukraine this week in a trip that could help lay the groundwork for stiffer Western responses to last month's Russian incursion of Georgia.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://online.wsj.com/public/article/SB122031972170389449.html?mod=special_page_campaign2008_leftbox
See Time's "EU Talks Tough on Russia": http://www.time.com/time/world/article/0,8599,1837863,00.html

Bush may address RNC via satellite Tuesday (CNN blog 9/1/08)
President Bush may still address the Republican National Convention via satellite from Washington Tuesday evening, White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said.
http://politicalticker.blogs.cnn.com/2008/09/01/bush-may-address-rnc-via-satellite-tuesday/

Bush: Gustav coordination better than Katrina (CNN 9/2/08)
* Bush credits governors of states affected by Gustav
* Federal government's response to 2005's Hurricane Katrina was widely criticized
* Bush says he feels good about recovery preparation for Gustav

http://www.cnn.com/2008/POLITICS/09/01/gustav.bush/index.html

BUSH, GOV. PERRY ADDRESS GUSTAV (The Page 9/1/08)
The President and the Texas governor participate in a briefing on the hurricane slamming the Gulf Coast in Texas.
...Bush: "The coordination on this storm is a lot better than during Katrina. A lot of it had to do with the governors…"
http://thepage.time.com/2008/09/01/bush-gov-perry-address-gustav/

OTHER TOP NEWS

Gustav knocks out Gulf oil production (CNNMoney.com 9/1/08)
By David Goldman
U.S. Department of Energy says hurricane halted oil and natural gas industry's activities in the Gulf of Mexico.
http://money.cnn.com/2008/09/01/news/economy/gustav_situation_report/index.htm?postversion=2008090115

Gustav hits U.S. economy (CNNMoney.com 9/1/08)
By Chris Isidore
Storm is weaker than Katrina three years ago. But it hits an economy that is at greater risk.
http://money.cnn.com/2008/09/01/news/economy/gustav_economy/index.htm?postversion=2008090115

Crisis a test for Louisiana's young governor (Financial Times 9/2/08)
By Andrew Ward
Bobby Jindal was supposed to be one of the stars of the Republican national convention in Minnesota this week. Instead, the 37-year-old governor of Louisiana was forced to stay home to prepare for hurricane Gustav and deal with its aftermath.
http://www.ft.com/cms/s/0/e538e25e-7853-11dd-acc3-0000779fd18c.html?nclick_check=1

Democrats, Eyeing Storm, Play Down Partisanship (NYT 9/2/08)
By JOHN M. BRODER and JEFF ZELENY
On this Labor Day, which has long been the traditional opening to the general election season, the Democratic presidential ticket struggled to draw attention. Mindful of Hurricane Gustav, Senators Barack Obama and Joseph R. Biden Jr. pressed ahead on Monday, traveling separately to three battleground states. But they altered their arguments against Senator John McCain, vowing that it was not a day for partisan politics.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/09/02/us/politics/02dems.html?ref=todayspaper&pagewanted=print

Obama Returning to Chicago to Handle Gustav (The Page 9/1/08)
The Democrat clears his Tuesday schedule to go back to campaign headquarters and deal with the aftermath of the storm.
http://thepage.time.com/2008/09/01/obama-today-is-not-a-day-for-political-speeches/

Obama Camp Texts Supporters For Gustav Help (The Page 9/1/08)
The Illinois Senator's campaign sends out a text message to supporters with instructions on how to donate to the Red Cross.
http://thepage.time.com/2008/09/01/obama-camp-texts-supporters-for-gustav-help/

Dutch intel: US to strike Iran in coming weeks (Jerusalem Post 9/1/08)
The Dutch intelligence service, the AIVD, has called off an operation aimed at infiltrating and sabotaging Iran's weapons industry due to an assessment that a US attack on the Islamic Republic's nuclear program is imminent, according to a report in the country's De Telegraaf newspaper on Friday.
http://www.jpost.com/servlet/Satellite?cid=1220186494776&pagename=JPost%2FJPArticle%2FShowFull

POLLS

Poll: Obama gets post-convention 'bounce' (USA Today 9/2/08)
By Susan Page
The Democratic National Convention significantly boosted Americans' views of Barack Obama as a strong leader who "shares your values" and can manage the economy and Iraq, a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Saturday and Sunday finds. ...In the head-to-head race, Obama leads 50%-43% among registered voters.
http://www.usatoday.com/news/politics/election2008/2008-09-01-poll-monday_N.htm?csp=34#

Obama's bounce smaller than others' (Politico 9/2/08)
By: David Paul Kuhn
Barack Obama's post-Democratic National Convention bounce in the polls appears to be slightly smaller than the norm of past conventions, and it's gradually depreciating. The Gallup daily tracking poll has found that since the conclusion of the convention, Obama has risen 4 percentage points in the polls, to lead McCain 49 percent to 43 percent today.
http://dyn.politico.com/printstory.cfm?uuid=20B38D47-18FE-70B2-A8250C9B2B12482A

CNN Poll of polls: Obama holds slim lead (CNN blog 9/1/08)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Alan Silverleib
Roughly nine weeks before Election Day, a new CNN poll of polls shows Barack Obama holding a five point lead over John McCain. Only four days after Obama's acceptance speech and three days after McCain's pick of Sarah Palin as his running mate, Obama is now ahead of McCain, 49 to 44 percent.
http://politicalticker.blogs.cnn.com/2008/09/01/cnn-poll-of-polls-obama-holds-slim-lead/

--
Sara DuBois
Tracking / Communications Manager
ProgressiveAccountability.org
sara@progressiveaccountability.org
202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: David.Willett@Sierraclub.org
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 6/17/2008 4:05:53 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Today's McCain Energy speech excerpts

Excerpts From Remarks As Prepared For Delivery
Houston, TX
June 17, 2008
?
Among its other distinctions, this great city is known as the oil capital of America. But people in Houston and all of Texas understand as well as anyone that the high price of oil and gas today is causing great harm all across our economy. People are hurting -- small farmers, truckers, and taxi drivers unable to cover their costs, small business owners struggling to meet payroll, the cost of living rising and the value of paychecks falling. All of this, in large part, because the price of oil is too high, and the supply of oil too uncertain. These citizens believe their government has a duty to finally assure the energy security of this country, and they are right.
I first addressed this issue at the outset of my primary campaign. And in just that time ? a little more than a year ? the price of a barrel of oil has more than doubled. And the price of a gallon of gas in America stands at more than four dollars. Yesterday, a barrel of oil cost about 134 dollars. And various oil ministers and investment firms have confidently informed us that soon we can expect to pay 200 dollars for every barrel, and as much as seven dollars for every gallon of gas.
?
Somehow the United States ? in so many ways the most self-reliant of nations ? has allowed and at times even encouraged this state of affairs. This was a troubling situation 35 years ago. It was an alarming situation twenty years ago. It is a dangerous situation today. And starting in the term of the next president, we must take control over our own energy future, and become once again the master of our fate.
The next president must be willing to break with the energy policies not just of the current Administration, but the administrations that preceded it, and lead a great national campaign to achieve energy security for America. So in the days ahead I plan to return to the subject in a series of discussions to explain my reform agenda. And I will set forth a strategy to free America once and for all from our strategic dependence on foreign oil.
?
Among these is a challenge we hardly even understood back when America first learned to associate the word ?energy? with ?crisis.? We now know that fossil fuel emissions, by retaining heat within the atmosphere, threaten disastrous changes in climate. No challenge of energy is to be taken lightly, and least of all the need to avoid the consequences of global warming.
In the face of climate change and other serious challenges, energy conservation is no longer just a moral luxury or a personal virtue. Conservation serves a critical national goal. Over time, we must shift our entire energy economy toward a sustainable mix of new and cleaner power sources. This will include some we use already, such as wind, solar, biofuels, and other sources yet to be invented. It will include a variety of new automotive and fuel technologies -- clean-burning coal and nuclear energy -- and a new system of incentives, under a cap-and-trade policy, to put the power of the market on the side of environmental protection.
But to make the great turn away from carbon-emitting fuels, we will need all the inventive genius of which America is capable. We will need as well an economy strong enough to support our nation?s great shift toward clean energy. And this gives us only further incentive to protect ourselves from the sudden shocks and ever-rising prices that come with our dependence on foreign oil.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Up to a point, these sudden rises in the price of oil are explainable in the terms of basic economics. When demand exceeds supply, prices always rise, and this has happened very dramatically in the demand for oil. Two powerful forces in the oil market today are China and India, nations in which a third of humanity is suddenly entering the industrial era ? with all the cars, construction, and consumption of oil that involves.

There is the further problem of speculation on the oil futures market, which in many cases has nothing to do with the actual sale, purchase, or delivery of oil. When crude oil became a futures-traded commodity in the 1980?s, the idea was to afford a measure of protection against the historic volatility of oil pricing. It takes several weeks to ship oil from the Arabian Peninsula to the offshore port of Louisiana. And for the buyers, it helps to know that the price will not suddenly fall while the oil is in transit. A futures contract assures importers that they can sell the oil at a profit.

That?s the theory, anyway. But we all know that some people on Wall Street are not above gaming the system. When you have enough speculators betting on the rising price of oil, that itself can cause oil prices to keep on rising. And while a few reckless speculators are counting their paper profits, most Americans are coming up on the short end ? using more and more of their hard-earned paychecks to buy gas for the truck, tractor, or family car.

Investigation is underway to root out this kind of reckless wagering, unrelated to any kind of productive commerce, because it can distort the market, drive prices beyond rational limits, and put the investments and pensions of millions of Americans at risk. Where we find such abuses, they need to be swiftly punished. And to make sure it never happens again, we must reform the laws and regulations governing the oil futures market, so that they are just as clear and effective as the rules applied to stocks, bonds, and other financial instruments. In all of these markets, reform must assure transparency, prevent abuse, and protect the public interest.

?

At the time of OPEC?s oil embargo, we imported roughly a third of our oil. Now we import two thirds. At that time, every day, we produced more than nine million barrels of oil domestically. Now America produces five million barrels a day. Five million barrels sounds like a lot until we compare the number with the oil we use, which comes to 20 million barrels, or a quarter of all the oil used every day across the earth.

?

It takes a very short leap in logic to wonder why we produce less and less crude oil, while we use more and more of it, or why politicians talk so much about promoting alternative energy sources, but often do so little to promote these alternatives. A reasonable observer, presented only with these numbers of consumption and production, might draw the conclusion that America has accepted this fate because we have no choice in the matter, or because we have no resources of our own. But just the opposite is true: We do have resources, and we do have a choice.

In oil, gas, and coal deposits, we have enormous energy reserves of our own. And we are gaining the means to use these resources in cleaner, more responsible ways. As for offshore drilling, it?s safe enough these days that not even Hurricanes Katrina and Rita could cause significant spillage from the battered rigs off the coasts of New Orleans and Houston. Yet for reasons that become less convincing with every rise in the price of foreign oil, the federal government discourages offshore production.

At the very least, one might assume, America had surely been building new refineries to achieve a more efficient delivery of gasoline to market, and thereby to lower the prices paid by the American people ? especially in the summer season. But the policymakers in Washington haven?t got around to that, either. There?s so much regulation of the industry that the last

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

American refinery was built when Jerry Ford was president.
As for nuclear energy ? a proven energy source that requires zero emissions ? we haven?t built a new reactor in 31 years. In Europe and elsewhere, they have been expanding their use of nuclear energy. But we?ve waited so long that we?ve lost our domestic capability to even build these power plants. Nuclear power is among the surest ways to gain a clean, abundant, and stable energy supply, as other nations understand. One nation today has plans to build almost 50 new reactors by 2020. Another country plans to build 26 major nuclear stations. A third nation plans to build enough nuclear plants to meet one quarter of all the electricity needs of its people ? a population of more than a billion people. Those three countries are China, Russia, and India. And if they have the vision to set and carry out great goals in energy policy, then why don?t we?
So, taking stock of our energy situation, it is time we draw a few sensible conclusions of our own. In their sum effect on the American economy, the policies of our government could hardly have left us more dependent had they been designed to do precisely that. This vulnerability is clear in many ways, and never more than when American leaders are reduced to supplicating for lower prices before the sheiks and princes of OPEC. Of course, they are unmoved by our troubles. They regard even the need to ask as a sign of weakness. And in the end, they take their cues not from our entreaties for relief, but from our failure to diversify and to produce.
Quite rightly, I believe, we confer a special status on some areas of our country that are best left undisturbed. When America set aside the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, we called it a ?refuge? for a reason.
But the stakes are high for our citizens and for our economy. And with gasoline running at more than four bucks a gallon, many do not have the luxury of waiting on the far-off plans of futurists and politicians. We have proven oil reserves of at least 21 billion barrels in the United States. But a broad federal moratorium stands in the way of energy exploration and production. And I believe it is time for the federal government to lift these restrictions and to put our own reserves to use. We can do this in ways that are consistent with sensible standards of environmental protection. And in states that choose to permit exploration, there must be an appropriate sharing of benefits between federal and state governments. But as a matter of fairness to the American people, and a matter of duty for our government, we must deal with the here and now, and assure affordable fuel for America by increasing domestic production.
We should set the highest goals for ourselves for the years and decades to come, and I am a believer in the technologies that one day will free us from oil entirely. But to get there at all, a more pragmatic approach will serve us better. In the short term, we must take the world as it is and our resources where they are ? even as we press on with new and cleaner sources of energy. We must be bold in our plans to break our strategic dependence on oil, and over the next two weeks, I?ll be offering a vision that will be bold. But we must also address the concerns of Americans, who are struggling right now to pay for gasoline, groceries, and other necessities of life.
What is certain in energy policy is that we have learned a few clear lessons along the way. Somehow all of them seem to have escaped my opponent. He says that high oil prices are not the problem, but only that they rose too quickly. He?s doesn?t support new domestic production. He doesn?t support new nuclear plants. He doesn?t support more traditional use of coal, either.
So what does Senator Obama support in energy policy? Well, for starters he supported the energy bill of 2005 ? a grab-bag of corporate favors that I opposed. And now he supports new taxes on energy producers. He wants a windfall profits tax on oil, to go along with the new taxes he also plans for coal and natural gas. If the plan sounds familiar, it?s because that was President Jimmy Carter?s big idea too ? and a lot of good it did us. Now as then, all a windfall profits tax will accomplish is to increase our dependence on foreign oil, and hinder exactly the kind of domestic exploration and production we need. I?m all for recycling ? but it?s better applied to paper and plastic than to the failed policies of the 1970?s.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Oddly enough, though, Senator Obama doesn?t want to lower the gas taxes paid by consumers, which would be the most direct and obvious way to give Americans a break at the gas station. Even in tough times for our economy, when folks are struggling to pay for gas and groceries, tax relief just isn?t change he can believe in. ?

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace" <info@centerpeace.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 7/22/2015 11:49:51 PM
Subject: News Update - July 23, 2015

S. DANIEL ABRAHAM
CENTER FOR MIDDLE EAST PEACE

Israel and the Middle East News Update

Thursday, July 23

Click here for a printer-friendly version.

Headlines:

- Italian PM: Israel is the Nation-State of the Jewish People
- US Congress to Begin Hearings on Iran Nuclear Agreement
- After Labeling, EU Think-Tank Proposes Banking Steps on Israel
- U.S.: Netanyahu Would Reject any Nuclear Deal with Iran
- AIPAC Girds for Rare High-Noon Showdown with White House
- Netanyahu: 'Better' Iran Deal can still Fix 'Historic Mistake'
- US Imposes Sanctions on Hezbollah Leaders
- Achievement to Opposition on Judges Selection Committee

Commentary:

- Washington Post: "The Case for the Nuclear Deal with Iran"
  - By John Kerry and Ernest Moniz
- New York Times: "Backing Up Our Wager with Iran"
  - By Thomas L. Friedman

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ha'arezt

Renzi: Israel is the Nation-State of the Jewish People

In a speech to the Knesset this afternoon, Italian Prime Minister Matteo Renzi called Israel the nation-state of the Jewish people. Renzi said that when he delivers a speech to the Palestinians in Bethlehem later in his visit, he plans to tell them that "to recognize Israel is to recognize reality." Renzi arrived on Tuesday for a visit of several days to Israel and the Palestinian Authority. In his speech, Renzi voiced enthusiastic support for Israel – for its security, economy and culture and referred to the calls for boycotts of Israel. "Whoever boycotts Israel doesn't understand that he is boycotting himself and doesn't understanding that he is betraying his own future," Renzi said.

Jerusalem Post

US Congress to Begin Hearings on Iran Deal

The US Congress begins its review of a nuclear agreement reached between world powers and Iran, the Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action, on Thursday. Hearings start in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, where three principals of the Obama administration tasked with crafting the deal – US Secretary of State John Kerry, Energy Secretary Ernest Moniz and Treasury Secretary Jack Lew – plan to testify. They will also appear before the House Foreign Affairs Committee next week. Their review begins amid a multi-million dollar effort, from both opponents and advocates of the agreement, to influence the outcome of the congressional vote. The lawmakers now have the opportunity to vote to approve or disapprove of the deal within 56 days.

Reuters

After Labeling, EU Think-Tank Proposes Bank Steps

The EU agreed this week to push ahead with introduction of labels that specifically identify Israeli goods made in settlements in the occupied West Bank, a policy that has angered Israel; but now an influential European Council on Foreign Relations think-tank is proposing going much further, including the targeting of Israeli banks. The new proposals would go much deeper and further, reaching into banking, loans and mortgages, qualifications earned in settlement institutions and the tax-exempt status of European charities that deal with Israeli settlements. European Union officials have talked in private about the steps that might follow labeling, but there are no formal EU proposals in the works at this stage.

See also, "EU Differentiation and Israeli settlements" (ECFR)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ha'aretz

U.S.: Netanyahu Would Reject any Nuclear Deal

Senior administration officials in Washington said on Wednesday they had reached the conclusion that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was not interested in any nuclear arrangement with Iran – except for one in which Tehran completely capitulates but is denied sanctions relief in return. "That is the logic of Israel's criticism," they said in a briefing with Haaretz. The officials also warned that the consequences of a decision by Congress to veto the Iran nuclear deal could be "potentially catastrophic," strengthening Iran, weakening the US and limiting its ability to defend Israel.

Times of Israel

AIPAC Girds for Rare High-Noon Showdown with WH

It will be the DC equivalent of the showdown at the OK Corral. Stepping into the summer haze on Capitol Hill, the American Israeli Public Affairs Committee and its allies are set to face off against the ultimate power broker – 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue – backed up by a cadre of its allied groups. The lobbying showdown, over a Congressional vote on the nuclear deal with Iran, represents a rare moment for AIPAC, with the avowedly bipartisan organization publicly splitting with the sitting administration over a major foreign policy initiative. Even at the peak of tensions between the Obama administration and the Israeli government, the pro-Israel organization worked hard to keep its head above an ugly fray. AIPAC's efforts at bipartisanship, and specifically at avoiding picking a fight with the president, extend back decades. For years, AIPAC has maintained a policy of remaining tight-lipped on budgetary face-offs, preferring to focus on completed deals and lobbying successes.

Times of Israel

PM: 'Better' Iran Deal can still Fix 'Historic Mistake'

Prime Minister Netanyahu on Wednesday said an alternative nuclear deal with Iran that would curb the Islamic State's aggression is still within reach, and railed against the agreement struck last week as a "historic mistake." "No agreement is better than this bad agreement," said Netanyahu, reiterating his denouncement of the accord struck July 14. "A better deal that would tie the lifting of restrictions on Iran's nuclear program and would roll back Iran's nuclear infrastructure — such a deal would be tied to ending Iran's aggression and terrorism. That's the real alternative," he said. Netanyahu addressed the issue during a press conference with visiting Croatian President Kolinda Grabar-Kitarović, who is on her first official visit to Israel since taking office in February.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ynet News

US Imposes Sanctions on Hezbollah Leaders

The US Treasury Department on Tuesday imposed sanctions on three leaders of the militant group Hezbollah and a businessman in Lebanon, saying they were key players in the group's military operations in Syria. "The United States will continue to aggressively target (Hezbollah) for its terrorist activities worldwide as well as its ongoing support to (Syrian President Bashar) Assad's ruthless military campaign in Syria," said Adam Szubin, the Treasury Department's acting under secretary for terrorism and financial intelligence. US President Barack Obama and Secretary of State John Kerry have said they are troubled by support from Iran for regional proxy groups such as Hezbollah. A businessman in Lebanon, Abd Al Nur Shalan, was also sanctioned for procuring weapons for Hezbollah and shipping them to Syria, the Treasury Department said.

Galey Tzahal

Achievement to Opposition on Judges Selection Com.

Judges Selection Committee: Last night the Knesset plenum elected MK Nurit Koren from the Likud and MK Robert Ilatov from Yisrael Beiteinu as in representatives in the Judges Selection Committee. MK Yisrael Eichler from the United Torah Judaism alliance and MK Revital Swid from the Zionist Union were chosen for the Rabbinical Judges Selection Committee. She surprisingly overtook the coalition's candidate MK Nava Boker from the Likud.

Washington Post - July 23, 2015

The Case for the Nuclear Deal with Iran

By John Kerry and Ernest Moniz

When President Obama took office, he faced an Iran that had mastered the nuclear fuel cycle, had constructed a covert uranium enrichment facility inside a mountain, was on its way to installing nearly 20,000 centrifuges for uranium enrichment, was developing advanced centrifuges and was building a heavy-water reactor that could produce weapons-grade plutonium. If Iran wanted to develop a nuclear weapon, it was already well down that road and the international community had little insight into its program. Against this backdrop the president vowed never to let Iran obtain a nuclear weapon.

The deal reached in Vienna this month is not only the best way to prevent Iran from having a nuclear weapon, it is the only durable and viable option for achieving this goal. This comprehensive diplomatic resolution has the unified support of the world's leading powers. It extends the time Iran would need to develop a nuclear weapon, provides strong verification measures that give us ample time to respond if Iran chooses that path, and takes none of our options off the table.

Specifically, the deal blocks each of Iran's possible pathways to producing fissile material for a nuclear weapon: the highly enriched uranium and the plutonium production pathways, as well as the covert pathway. This deal is based on verification, not trust. Before obtaining significant relief from economic sanctions, Iran must roll back its enrichment, its research-and-development and its stockpile of enriched uranium. To preclude cheating, international inspectors will have unprecedented access to Iran's declared nuclear facilities, any other sites of concern and its entire nuclear supply chain, from uranium production to centrifuge manufacturing and operation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If Iran fails to meet its responsibilities, sanctions will snap back into place, and no country can stop that from happening. If Iran tries to break out of the deal altogether, the world will have a longer time period — a year compared with two months — to respond before it could produce a bomb. We also will have the moral authority that comes from exhausting all diplomatic options.

Is this a good deal for the United States and for global security? Consider the facts.

Without this deal, Iran could double its capacity to enrich uranium in a short time. With it, it must reduce that capacity immediately and sharply.

Without this deal, Iran could continue to rapidly develop advanced centrifuges. With it, its program will be significantly constrained.

Without this deal, Iran could expand its existing stockpile of enriched uranium. With it, that stockpile will be reduced by 98 percent, and it will be capped at that level for 15 years. Iran will also be required to get rid of its 20 percent enriched uranium, which is most of the way to bomb material.

Without this deal, Iran could produce enough weapons-grade plutonium each year for one to two nuclear weapons. With it, Iran will not produce any weapons-grade plutonium.

Without this deal, Iran could take the steps necessary to produce a nuclear weapon. With it, Iran is prohibited from pursuing any of these steps.

If the international community suspects that Iran is cheating, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) can request access to any suspicious location. Much has been made about a possible 24-day delay before inspectors could gain access to suspected undeclared nuclear sites. To be clear, the IAEA can request access to any suspicious location with 24 hours' notice under the Additional Protocol of the Nonproliferation Treaty, which Iran will implement under this deal. This accord does not change that baseline. In fact, the deal enhances it by creating a new mechanism to ensure that the IAEA gets the required access and sets a firm time limit to resolve access issues within 24 days. This mechanism provides an important tool for ensuring that Iran could not delay indefinitely.

New York Times- July 23, 2015

Backing Up Our Wager with Iran

By Thomas L. Friedman

From the minute Iran detected that the U.S. was unwilling to use its overwhelming military force to curtail Tehran's nuclear program — and that dates back to the George W. Bush administration, which would neither accept Iran's right to a nuclear fuel cycle nor structure a military or diplomatic option to stop it — no perfect deal overwhelmingly favorable to America and its allies was ever going to emerge from negotiations with Iran. The balance of power became too equal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But there are degrees of imperfect, and the diplomatic option structured by the Obama team — if properly implemented and augmented by muscular diplomacy — serves core American interests better than any options I hear coming from the deal's critics: It prevents Iran from producing the fissile material to break out with a nuclear weapon for 15 years and creates a context that could empower the more pragmatic forces inside Iran over time — at the price of constraining, but not eliminating, Iran's nuclear infrastructure and sanctions relief that will strengthen Tehran as a regional power.

Supporting this deal doesn't make you Neville Chamberlain; opposing it doesn't make you Dr. Strangelove. Both sides have legitimate arguments. But having studied them, I believe America's interests are best served now by focusing on how to get the best out of this deal and cushion the worst, rather than scuttling it. That would be a mistake that would isolate us, not Iran, and limit our choices to going to war or tolerating an Iran much closer to nuclear breakout, without any observers or curbs on the ground, and with crumbling sanctions.

"The nuclear agreement is a deal, not a grand bargain," argued the Wilson Center's Robert Litwak, author of "Iran's Nuclear Chess." "Obama and Iran's supreme leader Khamenei are each making a tacit bet. Obama is defending the deal in transactional terms (that it addresses a discrete urgent challenge), but betting that it will empower Iran's moderate faction and put the country on a more favorable societal trajectory. Khamenei is making the opposite bet — that the regime can benefit from the transactional nature of the agreement (sanctions relief) and forestall the deal's potentially transformational implications to preserve Iran's revolutionary deep state."

We can, though, do things to increase the odds that the bet goes our way:

1. Don't let this deal become the Obamacare of arms control, where all the energy goes into the negotiation but then the implementing tools — in this case the verification technologies — don't work. President Obama should appoint a respected military figure to oversee every aspect of implementing this deal.

2. Congress should pass a resolution authorizing this and future presidents to use force to prevent Iran from ever becoming a nuclear weapons state. Iran must know now that the U.S. president is authorized to destroy — without warning or negotiation — any attempt by Tehran to build a bomb.

3. Focus on the Iranian people. The celebrations of this deal in Iran tell us that "the Iranian people want to be South Korea, not North Korea," notes Karim Sadjadpour, Iran expert at the Carnegie Endowment. We should reach out to them in every way — visas, exchanges and scholarships — to strengthen their voices. Visiting Iran taught me that Iranians have had enough Islamic fundamentalism to know they want less of it and they've had enough democracy to know they want more of it. (Iran's hard-line Revolutionary Guards know this well, which is why they are still trying to persuade Iran's supreme leader to reject this deal and its opening to the world.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

4. Avoid a black-and-white view of the Middle East. The idea that Iran is everywhere our enemy and the Sunni Arabs our allies is a mistake. Saudi Arabia's leadership has been a steadfast U.S. ally in the Cold War; many Saudis are pro-American. But the Saudi leadership's ruling bargain is toxic: It says to the Saudi people that the al-Saud tribe gets to rule and in return the Saudi Wahhabi religious establishment gets billions of dollars to transform the face of Sunni Islam from an open and modernizing faith to a puritanical, anti-women, anti-Shiite, anti-pluralistic one. The Saudis have lost control of this puritanical-Salafist transformation of Islam, and it has mutated into the ideology that inspired the 9/11 hijackers — 15 of 19 of whom were Saudis — and the Islamic State.

Iran aided the U.S. in toppling the Taliban regime in Afghanistan, and, at the same time, Tehran, and its cat's paw, Hezbollah, have propped up the Syrian regime while it has perpetrated a genocide against its own people, mostly Syrian Sunnis. We need to confront Iran's regional behavior when it contradicts our interests, but align with it when it comports with our interests. We want to balance the autocratic Sunnis and Shiites, not promote either. Neither share our values.

Finally, when it comes to the Middle East broadly, we need to contain, amplify and innovate: Contain the most aggressive forces there, amplify any leaders or people building decency there, and innovate on energy like crazy to keep prices low, reduce oil money to bad actors and reduce our exposure to a region that is going to be in turmoil for a long, long, long time.

S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace
633 Pennsylvania Ave. NW, 5th Floor, Washington, DC 20004
www.centerpeace.org

2015 S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace, All rights reserved.
YOU ARE RECEIVING THIS EMAIL BECAUSE YOU SIGNED UP FOR OUR NEWS UPDATES.

unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: VoteVets <info@votevets.org>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 1/11/2016 9:18:44 AM
Subject: [Last chance] VoteVets official 2016 Supporter Survey

John -

Today is the last chance to share your thoughts in VoteVets 2016 Supporter Survey. We've received a tremendous amount of feedback thus far, and that's important, because it helps guide our work for the year ahead.

So, Hillary, Bernie or another candidate? Is protecting VA health care the most important issue to you and your family, or is it something else. We want to hear from you, and you can sound off here:

http://action.votevets.org/2016-priorities

Thank you for making your voice heard before midnight tonight.

The team at VoteVets

VoteVets.org
Country. Service. Action.

John -

It's hard to overstate the importance of 2016 for veterans and military family members.

The Koch Brothers are financing a multi-million dollar campaign to privatize veterans health care.

Republicans running for Congress are eager escalate our endless war in the Middle East, threatening to re-commit more troops to the region and drop nuclear weapons on Iraq and Syria.

And, of course, control of the U.S. Senate is on the line and we're going to elect a new Commander in Chief before the year is done.

At VoteVets, we're set to take on these challenges and more, but we want to hear from you about your priorities for the year ahead.

Take a moment to complete our official VoteVets 2016 Supporter Survey, and let us know the issues you are passionate about in the year ahead.

With fewer members of Congress who have served in the military than at any point in decades, and none still in the race to become the next president, it is even more important that veterans and military family members make their voices heard on the issues of the day.

We're ready to lead with you, but first we want to get a sense of your thoughts for the year ahead.

Your priorities are our priorities -- let us know the issues you're most concerned about taking on in the year ahead.

http://action.votevets.org/2016-priorities

Thank you for making your voice heard. It's an important part of our decision making process as we consider our work in 2016.

Thank you for standing with us.

Jon Soltz
Iraq War Veteran and Chairman
VoteVets.org

Contribute

PAID FOR BY VOTEVETS ACTION FUND

This email was sent to john.podesta@gmail.com. If that is not your preferred email address, click here . Click here if you'd like to unsubscribe. We try to send only the most important information and opportunities to participate via email. To sustain VoteVets with a contribution click here .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Melissa Cantrell" <mcantrell@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	hrcrapid@googlegroups.com
Date:	5/5/2015 12:35:30 PM
Subject:	May 5 Evening News Roundup
Attachments:	5.5.15 Evening News Clips.docx

Document attached. 2016 highlights below.

ABC: Mike Huckabee announced his presidential run and pointed to his track record of taking on the Clinton's in Arkansas. HRC is in Nevada where she will call on a pathway to citizenship for undocumented immigrants in the US.

CBS: Huckabee has announced his campaign; is better known and better funded than the last time he ran for president but his rhetoric remains the same. Huckabee says he took on HRC in 2008 and can do it again. Segment on CBS/NYT poll. The poll shows that Americans are mostly split on if they find HRC trustworthy. Includes coverage of The Briefing and featured Brian Fallon's video, noting that the campaign timed the efforts with the release of Clinton Cash and questions regarding the Clinton Foundation.

NBC: Segment on HRC's Clinton Cash pushback and NBC poll. Andrea Mitchell included a part of Brian Fallon's video and coverage of The Briefing. Huckabee announced he is running for president and took a dig at HRC, stating that he does not have a global foundation to live off of. Short clip of Amanda Renteria's interview. Mentioned that HRC has agreed to six debates.

--

You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Charles Hicks" <chicks@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "HRC Rapid" <HRCRapid@hillaryclinton.com>
"Jennifer Palmieri" <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>
"Julie McClain" <jmcclain@hillaryclinton.com>
"Kristina Schake" <kschake@hillaryclinton.com>
"Meredith Thatcher" <mthatcher@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 6/25/2015 3:53:06 AM
Subject: June 24 Evening Cable News

National

-- Discussion with Glenn Beck; Beck talked about the importance of talking to people who make you feel uncomfortable; Beck brought up HRC's "all lives matter" comment, said he could not believe that HRC was "denigrated" for saying that all lives matter in a black church; Beck said that doesn't mean black lives don't matter, said it just means that all lives matter. CNN's CNN Tonight With Don Lemon , 2015 06 24 Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, Glenn Beck defends HRCs All Lives Matter comment.mp4

-- Report on HRC taking a private jet instead of the Scooby van; panel with Frank Luntz, Gretchen Carlson, and Dagen McDowell; Luntz said none of it mattered because HRC's language had gotten so much better in the last couple of weeks; Luntz said HRC was fighting for people, said HRC was doing personalized politics which she never did before; Luntz encouraged people to watch Bernie Sanders though; Carlson said optically HRC cannot start with the Scooby van and then go back to the private plane, said it makes HRC look inauthentic; Hannity said the poll he kept going back to was one that said 57 percent of Americans did not trust her; Luntz said god help this country if we vote for someone we don't trust; Carlson said HRC went to Ferguson on a private jet while BHO wouldn't go near AfAm communities in 2012 because AfAm unemployment was so high; McDowell noted HRC was going hard against Wall Street while her major contributors were Citigroup and Goldman Sachs; Hannity asked if HRC had a Confederate flag problem since WJC signed a law honoring the Confederate flag; conversation shifted into who was going to win the 2016 election; Carlson said politics was so fickle, said HRC was one email away from not being a candidate anymore; Hannity said he'd raise money to buy HRC's server contents from the Chinese. Fox News' Hannity , 2015 06 24 Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, Frank Luntz praised HRCs language.mp4

-- Report that the Senate gave POTUS "fast-track" authority on trade; mentioned that the next POTUS would potentially have fast-track authority; panel with Ron Kind and Debbie Dingell; asked Kind whether he wanted HRC to take a position on trade; Kind said he was sure there would be an opportunity for HRC to weigh in, said HRC was very clear about her position as Secretary of State. MSNBC's Hardball With Chris Matthews , 2015 06 24 Hillary Clinton Clips, National, Ron Kind on HRCs trade position.mp4

-- Report that HRC was taking a dip in the polls; Ed Henry reports; Henry said HRC's image continued to take a hit due to information slowly coming out about The Clinton Foundation; showed a Fox News poll that showed a majority of people did not find HRC trustworthy; mentioned the sale of uranium to the Russian government while she was Secretary of State; reported that HRC told WMUR that she was not personally involved in the uranium sale; showed a Fox News poll that showed HRC was ahead of Bernie Sanders for the Democratic nomination, showed Fox News poll that showed HRC in tight races with the top five GOP candidates; noted that Jim Webb took a more nuanced stance on the Confederate flag. Fox News' Special Report With Bret Baier , 2015 06 24 Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, Ed Henry on HRC favoribility Russian uranium sale.mp4

-- Discussion about BHO accomplishing much in spite of his lame-duck status; interviewed Ryan Grim; Al Sharpton asked Grim whether the trade deal complicated HRC's presidential bid; Grim said it was tough for HRC politically, noted HRC helped craft the TPP as Secretary of State; Grim said HRC didn't want to upset the Democratic base, noted that the timing would be complicated for HRC if TPP comes up in late fall or early winter when HRC was in Iowa and New Hampshire. MSNBC's PoliticsNation With Al Sharpton , 2015 06 24 Hillary

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton, Clips, National, Ryan Grim on HRCs trade position.mp4

--
Charles Hicks
(912) 429-8253

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Joe Cirincione" <jcirincione@ploughshares.org>
To: "Fariba Yassaee" <fyassaee@albrightstonebridge.com>
Date: 1/28/2015 9:09:24 AM
Subject: Boehner and Bibi

After last night's terrific discussion, I thought some of you might like the article I posted last Friday. If you are short on time, just skip to the end for a great quote I found from Bibi.

Joe

THE HUFFINGTON POST
THE INTERNET NEWSPAPER: NEWS BLOGS VIDEO COMMUNITY

Joe Cirincione Become a fan
President, Ploughshares Fund; Author, 'Nuclear Nightmares: Securing the World Before It Is Too Late'

How Boehner Bungled His Bibi Bid

Posted: 01/23/2015 3:03 pm EST Updated: 01/23/2015 5:59 pm EST

203 252 230

Speaker of the House John Boehner's invitation to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu hurts his own party, the policy process and Israel.

There are some in the Republican Party who truly care about preventing an Iranian nuclear bomb. There are some with helpful suggestions for how to improve our strategy. But Speaker Boehner is now using the policy debate on Iran as a crass political attack on the constitutional authority of the president of the United States. In the process, he does great damage to our national institutions, our efforts to stop Iran from getting a nuclear weapon, and the U.S.-Israeli alliance.

Who's Your President?

Without consulting with the president or the Democrats in Congress, Boehner invited the leader of a foreign power, Israeli Prime Minister Netanyahu, to address a joint session of Congress. There is no love lost between Netanyahu and President Obama. Netanyahu will no doubt rip into the president when he speaks on March 3.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That appears to be Boehner's purpose. "There is no other explanation for Boehner's impetuous, insulting and dangerous decision this week to break foreign policy protocol and invite Netanyahu," editorialized the Chicago Sun-Times.

Boehner's move could have been taken straight from the tea-party playbook, based on the view that Barack Obama is not legitimately the leader of the nation. Therefore, the powers given by the Constitution to the president to conduct the foreign policy of the United States can be ignored. The speaker can posture as the alternative commander-in-chief because the man who actually has that responsibility doesn't deserve the title.

As Max Fisher notes :

> This is not just a breach of protocol: it's a very real problem for American foreign policy. The Supreme Court has codified into law the idea that only the president is allowed to make foreign policy, and not Congress, because if there are two branches of government setting foreign policy then America effectively has two foreign policies.

Fisher warns that the fact that "a US political party is siding with a foreign country over their own president... is extremely unusual and a major break with the way that foreign relations usually work." This is dangerous business that could "lead to chaos" as other nations misread America's true intentions.

Iran Policy Boomerang

Boehner's overreach is likely to backfire politically. Some Republicans and neoconservatives have been using criticism of Iran policy as the tip of the spear in their continuous efforts to paint Obama as weak, dangerous and the worst appeaser since Neville Chamberlain. The Netanyahu invite is also a fairly transparent effort to use a Jewish leader to drive a wedge into the Democratic Party base. But this move is likely to rally Democrats -- some of whom have genuine disagreements on Iran policy -- around the president.

Already, the GOP-led effort to slap new sanctions on Iran is floundering. The bill championed by Sen. Mark Kirk (R-Illinois) has failed to get a single Democratic co-sponsor other than his co-author, Sen. Robert Menendez (D-New Jersey). And for good reason. There is broad consensus among global security leaders that new sanctions would kill the negotiations and could lead to a new war.

Former National Security Advisor Brent Scowcroft explained the problem in a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing this week:

> I think two things are likely to happen if we increase the sanctions. They will break the talks. And a lot of the people who have now joined us in the sanctions would be in danger of leaving because most of the people who joined us in sanctions on Iran didn't do it to destroy Iran. They did it to help get a nuclear solution.

Former National Security Advisor Zbigniew Brzezinski then spelled out the consequences:

> If the negotiations broke down, the whole process would collapse. And then what would be the alternative? Should we then attack and bomb them and > thereby make the war in the Middle East even more explosive? We have to ask ourselves, why should we do this? ... I don't see any benefit in the United States in that transpiring.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Neither does the conservative prime minister of Great Britain, David Cameron, who pleaded with the GOP last week not to kill the talks with new sanctions.

The foreign ministers of Britain, France, Germany and the European Union weighed in with their own plea in a joint op-ed in the Washington Post this week:

> New sanctions at this moment might also fracture the international coalition that has made sanctions so effective so far. Rather than strengthening our negotiating position, new sanctions legislation at this point would set us back.

Unfortunately, this global consensus breaks down under the dome of the U.S. Congress. Politics trumps policy, and our national security suffers for it. But it is not just U.S. policy that is jeopardized by Boehner's gambit.

Bad for Israel

Boehner has a willing accomplice in Bibi Netanyahu. Behind in the polls, he is hopingto use the U.S. Congress as a prop in his reelection bid just weeks before the vote in Israel.

The highly respected pro-Israel group J Street warns :

> It was a mistake for House Speaker John Boehner to invite Prime Minister Netanyahu now. Mr. Netanyahu is not only head of the Israeli government -- he is also a candidate in the midst of a highly-contested election campaign. His invitation, rightly or wrongly, will inevitably be interpreted in Israel and elsewhere as an attempt by an outside actor to interfere in the Israeli election. We would urge Mr. Boehner to postpone the invitation until after the election and then to invite whoever is elected Prime Minister, who will enjoy a fresh mandate from his or her people to address the Congress.

The Jewish Daily Forward reports that Anti-Defamation League National Director Abe Foxman is trying to get Boehner and Netanyahu "to come down from the high tree they had climbed." By joining a partisan attack of the American president, Netanyahu is jeopardizing Israel's relationship with its strongest supporter. By turning this into a partisan issue, "Netanyahu is shooting himself in the foot," one lawmaker told the Forward.

"I think mainstream Jewish organizations that place a high stock in maintaining their bipartisan identity -- including the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations, the Anti-Defamation League, and even AIPAC," warns journalist Jim Lobe, "are going to have a difficult time dealing with this situation due to the fact that Boehner has acted in such a transparently partisan manner."

Even Netanyahu himself once warned of the dangers of such actions. He harshly criticized then-Prime Minister Shimon Peres just for visiting the United States less than a month before the 1996 election. "I can't find an example of any previous Israeli government whose prime minister, on the eve of elections, made a cynical attempt to use relations between Israel and the United States as a party advertisement," Netanyahu said.

He could do worse than to listen to his own advice.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Ambassador Kounalakis" <kounalakiset@gmail.com>
To: "Abedin Huma" <huma@clintonemail.com>
"Huma Abedin" <huma@hrcoffice.com>
Date: 10/29/2015 2:15:41 AM
Subject: Ride with S on 11/4?

Dear Huma:

Our Sacramento event for HRC is doing very well. We have more than $300k in the door, and another $50k that will be collected by this weekend. My dad, Sofia and I have all sent in our $33k, so the total for the event will be far more than we thought Sacramento was capable of. I'm thrilled! (Especially because I live in SF full time...) But seriously, the response has been great, and I'm poised to reach the $270k goal for my raiser page by the time we're done.

I'm also honored to be part of S's working group on Europe and Russia, and that is why I'm writing you. I would very much like to speak with her about what is happening in Europe - particularly Hungary and Greece.

This is my 5th event for Hillary in Sacramento, and my 7th overall since 2015. I've never requested to ride with her in the motorcade before or after the event. But I would very much like to do so this time, in order to have a few minutes to discuss these things, and a few other thoughts I have about foreign policy.

I know you are the one to ask... and of course am very hopeful that I'll see YOU on this swing as well.

All best, and thank you for your consideration!

Eleni

Ambassador Eleni Kounalakis
2500 Steiner Street, Ninth Floor
San Francisco, CA 94115
KounalakisET@gmail.com

Sent from my iPad

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Team Kirkpatrick" <info@kirkpatrickforarizona.com>
To: "John Podesta" <podesta@law.georgetown.edu>
Date: 11/20/2014 1:33:51 PM
Subject: PETITION: [The Grand Canyon]

KIRKPATRICK FOR ★ ARIZONA

John --

What a response!

So far, over 40,000 of you have signed your name to stand with Ann to protect the Grand Canyon -- THAT'S INCREDIBLE!!!

We've got to keep our grassroots momentum going! Will you help us reach 50,000 supporters standing strong to protect the Grand Canyon?

Please click here to add your name to our list of supporters and demand Congress pass a permanent ban on new uranium mining at the Grand Canyon >>

---------- Original Message ----------

From: Ann Kirkpatrick
Subject: Protect the Grand Canyon: [PETITION]

John --

The Grand Canyon has always been close to my heart. It is one of our country's greatest wonders, and every time I visit the Canyon, I am stunned by its vast beauty and deep heritage.

Grand Canyon National Park is not only one of our state's greatest natural treasures, it is also a major economic driver. The Canyon delivers about 6,000 jobs and $475 million to our local economy each year.

But more uranium mining around the Canyon could pose a real threat to our wonder of the world. This practice could contaminate our water supply, pollute our communities and destroy our local economy.

Earlier this session, I voted against a bill that could have opened up the area around the Canyon for more uranium mining by undermining the administration's 20-year ban.

It is absolutely critical we seek a long-term, permanent solution to protect the Grand Canyon.

Will you join me in calling on Congress to permanently protect the Canyon?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Please click here to add your name to our list of supporters demanding Congress pass a permanent ban on new uranium mining at the Grand Canyon >>

As a native Arizonan, the Grand Canyon holds a special place in my heart. But if we're going to protect it, I need you to step up.

ADD YOUR NAME: http://action.kirkpatrickforarizona.com/Grand-Canyon

Thanks,

Ann

Paid for by Kirkpatrick for Arizona

This message was sent to: podesta@law.georgetown.edu | Change or update your email address by clicking here .

We believe that emails are a crucial way for our campaign to stay in touch with supporters like you. However, if you'd prefer to take a break from emails, click here . If you'd just like to receive fewer emails, you can click here .

Our campaign is powered by supporters like you. Your grassroots support is critical to helping Ann fight back against Republican lies. If you'd still like to unsubscribe from our emails, click here . If you'd like to donate to our campaign, please click here . Thanks for having Ann's back!

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "German Marshall Fund" <press@gmfus.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 5/20/2015 6:00:00 PM
Subject: Transatlantic Take: R ussia Strikes Back Against Europe's Energy Union

If you have problems viewing this email, you can view it as a web page. To view the mobile-friendly web page click here

Russia Strikes Back Against Europe's Energy Union

Kristine Berzina May 21, 2015

BRUSSELS—Europe is starting to play hardball with Russia on energy — and the Kremlin is fighting back. For years, the European Union was highly dependent on Russia's natural gas and was unable to exert any influence on its supplier since it is the world's largest energy importer. This spring, the European Commission launched an EU Energy Union to finally bind the 28 countries into a single energy market.

The three Baltic States — previously linked only to each other and to Russia — have been instrumental to this new era of EU energy policy. Last December, Lithuania leased a floating liquefied natural gas terminal, and now buys Norwegian natural gas from Statoil that it can share with Latvia and Estonia. Electricity is Lithuania's other major vulnerability, but with the EU's support, it will soon complete grid connections to Poland and Sweden. Lithuania also initiated a European Commission investigation of Russia's state-owned gas company Gazprom in 2011, arguing that it should not have to pay significantly more for natural gas than EU member states further away. Not only did the Commission agree, but last month, it charged Gazprom with hindering competition in eight Central and Eastern European member states. Gazprom could now face up to $10 billion in fines.

Russia may be losing its commercial levers over Lithuania's energy sector, but it is beginning to intervene militarily in the region's energy sector. In the past few weeks, Russian naval vessels in the Baltic Sea have chased and disrupted ships in Lithuania's exclusive economic zone that are laying the NordBalt electricity cable, intended to create an integrated Baltic electricity market. These Russian naval actions present a new military threat to energy in Europe. The EU needs to be aware that actions against Russia's commercial practices may risk escalating conflicts across Europe.

Other forms of Russian political interference could also increase. The prospect of greater political maneuvering against vulnerable EU member states — such as Greece — is especially worrisome. Russian President Vladimir Putin has proposed a new pipeline, Turkish Stream, which may deliver gas to Greece as well. The pipeline bypasses Ukraine and is a political tool for the Kremlin. Putin has directly courted Greek Prime Minister Alexis Tsipras, describing the economic benefits of the pipeline just as Greece struggles to repay its debts. Conveniently for Moscow, Turkish Stream could also interfere with the EU's long-supported Trans-Anatolian pipeline, which is slated to bring gas from Azerbaijan to European markets.

The EU and the United States can expect the continuation of such political, military, and economic maneuvering from Moscow on energy issues. In the past, the transatlantic partners have focused largely on gas pipelines rather than on other aspects of the energy sector as levers for Russia's political influence. But energy security risks are no longer confined to one single area of the energy industry. With a more aggressive European energy policy, threats to energy security may come in the form of military and cyber moves against electricity as well as oil and gas infrastructure.

Appropriately, the G7 expanded its understanding of energy security to include sustainability and cybersecurity concerns at an energy ministers' meeting in Hamburg last week. This updated concept of energy security acknowledges the increasing importance of renewable electricity sources and digital technologies in the energy sector. The G7 should match its new-found awareness of these energy vulnerabilities with adequate resources and coordination to protect both traditional oil and gas supplies along with electricity and digital infrastructure. If Russia views energy relations as a strategic priority, it would be prudent for NATO, the EU, and the G7 to do so as well.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

DISCUSS

Kristine Berzina is a Transatlantic Fellow for Energy & Society in the Brussels office of The German Marshall Fund of the United States. Follow her on Twitter @kristineberz .

The views expressed in GMF publications and commentary are the views of the author alone.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Ryan Duncan" <ryan@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: "Big Campaign" <bigcampaign@googlegroups.com>
Date: 7/11/2008 6:45:57 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 07/11/08

Main Topics: Phil Graham's Comments Dominate News, McCain vs. Viagra, Edwards Interview

Summary of Shift: Former Senator and current McCain chief economic advisor, Phil Graham's controversial comments on the economy, calling the American people a "nation of whiners" dominated all the major and cable news stations today. It was the lead story on every major morning show, and repeated continuously throughout the day. Analysts devoted coverage to the McCain surrogate problem, his campaign disarray, and analyzed whether there was any truth in what Graham meant. John Edwards also chimed in on the Graham controversy on Good Morning America, where he also used the opportunity to go after McCain on being wrong on Iraq. Overall, it was a rough week for McCain as several reports pointed out. McCain continued to get hit on the Viagra/Healthcare issue, and there was even discussion of whether he could even run for president since he was born in Panama. The only positive McCain story of the day was the release of his fundraising for last month. June proved to be McCain's best fundraising month to date.
Other non-McCain headlines included the possibility of mortgage lending giants, Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac possibly getting bailed out by the Federal government, potentially costing the American taxpayers $3 trillion dollars. The California wildfires continue to cause destruction and dominate coverage. And oil prices reach new record highs due to speculation and fear of war with Iran. The Senate confirmed General David Petraeus as top commander of the Middle East.

Highlights:
1. Phil Graham's controversial comments on economy dominate coverage
a. NBC: With Friends Like These; The Today Show Leads With Controversial Graham Comments
b. CBS: Controversial Graham Comments Lead Story on The Early Show
c. ABC: Good Morning America: Gramm's comments have caused a media "firestorm"
d. CNN: McCain's has too Much History with Gramm to Dismiss him so Easily
e. NBC: Is Phil Graham Crazy? Jim Cramer and the Today Show Investigate
f. NBC: Jay Leno Jokes About Phil Graham Controversy
2. ABC: John Edwards: McCain is Wrong in Iraq, McCain's Can't be Cast off his "Economic Guru" so Easily
3. Surrogate Controversy
a. MSNBC: Not Just Any Surrogate, Phil Graham Offers Insight Into McCain's Ideology and Thinking
b. CBS: McCain's Surrogate Problem
c. ABC: McCain's Advisors Leave Him In Awkward Situation
4. MSNBC: McCain's Rough Week
5. MSNBC: McCain Breaks Fundraising Record for Month of June
6. FNC: University of Arizona Professor Questions McCain's Natural Born Citizen Status and Right to be President
7. CNN: McCain Struggles to Respond to Birth Control Question, Carly to Blame
8. Comedy Central: Daily Show lampoons Charlie Black comments (No Clip, Repeat)
9. Comedy Central: Colbert Report devotes "The Word" to McCain as the same (No Clip, Repeat)

Local Highlights:
1. ABC-5-KSTP: Local Minnesota News Interviews McCain, Takes Questions From Viewers
2. McCain skirts answering questions in Michigan [No Clip]

Clips:

Highlight #1
With Friends Like These; The Today Show Leads With Controversial Graham Comments (NBC, 07/11/08, 7:02am)
MATT LAUER: […] and remarks that could spell problems for Senator John McCain's campaign. […]

ANDREA MITCHELL: [....] John McCain is now running as fast as he can to get away from one of his closest economic advisers who called Americans, "a nation of whiners," when it comes to the bad economy. In Michigan, a battle ground state where the economy is on everyone's mind, John McCain wasted no time throwing his economic advisor, Phil Graham, under the bus.

JOHN MCCAIN: Phil Graham does not speak for me. I speak for me. So, I strongly disagree.

MITCHELL: Graham, a former senator and PHD economist, told the Washington Times, that American are suffering from a mental recession, not a real one.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

PHIL GRAHAM: "[…] you've heard of a mental depression. This is a mental recession. We have never had more natural advantages than we have today. We've sort of become a nation of whiners."

MITCHELL: McCain's problem, he and Graham have been friends for decades. Ever since Graham co-sponsored landmark legislation to control federal spending. And this year Graham has been a top McCain economic advisor.

MCCAIN: There is no one in America that is more respected on the issue of economics than Senator Phil Graham. So I'm honored that you are here, Phil.

MITCHELL: Barack Obama saw the opening and pounced.

BARACK OBAMA: America already has one Dr. Phil. We don't need another one!

MITCHELL: And McCain was so eager to distance himself from Graham; he said his old friend would no longer be a candidate for treasury secretary in a McCain administration.

MCCAIN: I think Senator Graham would be in serious consideration for ambassador to Belarus. Although I'm not sure the citizens of Minsk would welcome that.

MITCHELL: Belarus, an outlaw state, is far worse than Siberia in the old days. But even Mink might not be far enough to control the political damage.

CHUCK TODD: McCain was already seen as somebody who was struggling to show that he was in touch on the issue of the economy. This just made his job that much harder.

MITCHELL: Today McCain will go to another battleground state, Wisconsin, and try again to get back on message about how much he cares about the economy.

Controversial Graham Comments Lead Story on The Early Show (CBS, 07/11/08, 7:04am)
HARRY SMITH: Senator John McCain has been backed into a corner by a key economic adviser, and forced to disavow some key controversial statements. […]

BILL PANTE: Senator Phil Graham, former senator, a key economist, a key advisor to John McCain, but when he seemed to be blowing off people who were worried about the economy as a bunch of whiners, that's something the McCain campaign didn't need. And the candidate was blunt in his response.

JOHN MCCAIN: Phil Graham does not speak for me. I speak for me.

PLANTE: After spending the past week trying to convince voters that he does feel their pain, McCain was forced into full damage control after his economic advisor appeared to muck the troubles faced by many Americans. In an interview with the Washington Times, Graham questioned the true extent of the country's economic downturn saying quote, "You've heard of mental depression; this is a mental recession. We have sort of become a nation of whiners. Complaining about a loss of competitiveness, America in decline." Barack Obama wasted no time in responding.

BARACK OBAMA: America already has one Dr. Phil. We don't need another one.

PLANTE: Graham said that he had only been talking about the nation's leaders, but the comment played right into the democrat's charge that republicans are a bunch of plutocrats that don't care about the average voter. And McCain, when he was asked about a position for Graham in his administration, Graham has often been mentioned as a treasury secretary, said, well maybe he's a candidate for ambassador to Belarus. Belarus is a former Soviet republic, which is still repressive.

HARRY SMITH: Yeah, and McCain went on to say that he wasn't sure the people of Minsk would be happy about that either.

Good Morning America: Gramm's comments have caused a media "firestorm" (ABC 07/11/08 7:15am)
DAVID WRIGHT: […] one of his top advisors who seemed to suggest that the mortgage mess, gas prices crisis all those problems are just in people's heads, political dynamite. It's not exactly what former Senator Gramm meant but his words have been damaging at a time when McCain is trying to convince voters that he feels their pain. McCain had hoped his headline today would have been his message to voters in the rust belt.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

JOHN MCCAIN: America is hurting today, Michigan is hurting today, the automotive industry is hurting.

WRIGHT: Instead he finds himself at odds with one of his top economic advisors.

GRAMM: This is a mental recession.

WRIGHT: Former Senator Phil Gramm, a conservative icon, told the Washington Times he has no sympathy for people complaining about the economy.

GRAMM: We've never been more dominant. We never had more natural advantages than we have today. We've sort of become a nation of whiners.

WRIGHT: on cable tv:

LOU DOBBS: Phil Gramm who is clearly out of touch with reality, speaking for John McCain.

WRIGHT: on late night:

JAY LENO: It's just a mental recession. $5 a gallon gas and the bank kicking you out of your house, that's all in your mind! You're just imagining that!

WRIGHT: Gramm's remarks set of a firestorm.

BRAD DELONG: Well I think it reminds people that economic policy is not McCain's strength. It's not the central thing that he is running on, it's not why he wants to be President.
[…]

OBAMA: When people are out there losing their homes and property values are declining that's not a figment of your imagination. And it's not whining to ask government to step in and give families some relief.

WRIGHT: And John McCain sensed a liability, immediately he cut Gramm loose.

MCCAIN: I think Senator Gramm would be in serious consideration for ambassador to Belarus, although I'm not sure the citizens of Minsk would welcome that.
[…]

McCain's has too Much History with Gramm to Dismiss him so Easily (CNN 07/11/08 07:01am)
DANA BASH: Phil Gramm is not only the chairman of John McCain's campaign and a long time friend, he's an economist who McCain has pointed to often as a guide for him on economic issues. […] In hard hit Michigan this is the McCain mantra on the economy:

MCCAIN: People are hurting. People are hurting very badly.

BASH: A carefully measured message that is part feel your pain, part realist, but all optimism.

MCCAIN: But they need to have trust and hope and confidence in the future.

BASH: Given that, quotes from Phil Gramm, […] were a big oops.

[Clip of Gramm's Comments]

BASH: McCain couldn't distance himself fast enough from his friend. […] He struggled to steer his economic mission back on course.

[Clip of McCain in Michigan]

OBAMA: It's not all in your head. America already has one Dr. Phil. We don't need another one.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[…]

BASH: The problem for McCain is that he relies on Gramm, a PhD in economics, for policy advice and as a character witness for voters worried that McCain doesn't get the economy.

MCCAIN: The reason why I have the support of people like Jack Kemp and Phil Gramm is because of their confidence in my proven record of handling the economy.

BASH: I spoke to Phil Gramm by phone yesterday; he said he wanted to clarify some of his comments. He insisted he didn't mean to say Americans were whining about the economy but rather many of the country's leaders are. Here's what he said: "The whiners are the leaders. Hell, the American people are victims, but it didn't quite come out that way in the story." But Gramm did say he stood by another controversial thing he said that we are in a "mental recession". He said he believes a steady drumbeat of bad news is simply making Americans feel worse about the economy than they should.

JOHN ROBERTS: At the same time when he stood by that comment, John McCain was running away from it as fast as he could.

BASH: Could not get away far enough fast enough. […]

Is Phil Graham Crazy? Jim Cramer and the Today Show Investigate (NBC, 07/11/08, 7:04am)
MEREDITH VIERA: So are we in a mental recession? […] Now Phil Graham, he's not a kook. He obviously has strong economic chops, so is there any, any truth to this notion that we have become a nation of whiners?

JIM CRAMER: Well, I think we're more a nation of winners, more than a nation of whiners. I think that the firm that he works at, his stock, down 60 percent. You've laid of many thousands of people. Maybe he's surrounded by gloom, the rest of the country isn't.

VIERA: Well, I watched last night on Hardball and you were animated to say the least. You were ranting actually. You said, the problem with this economy is that the banking industry is falling apart and neither candidate gets it. What don't they understand?

CRAMER: […] If you cut taxes that doesn't do any good. We may actually need a bailout of the largest two entities that help our housing market. Where are they?

VIERA: You're talking about Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac.

CRAMER: Maybe these guys think that Fannie Mae is a chocolate company, I mean they better get on the case.
[…]

Jay Leno Jokes About Phil Graham Controversy (NBC, 07/10/08, 11:35pm)
JAY LENO: I don't think Jessie [Jackson] learned his lesson. Today he was over saying that he wanted to cut of John McCain's Medicare.

Oh how about John McCain? Now McCain is coming under fire, for comments made by his top economic advisor, former Senator Phil Graham, who called America a nation of whiners and said the economy is only in a mental recession.

It's just a mental recession. Like the $5.00 per gallon gas, and the bank kicking you out of your house, that's all in your mind! You're just imagining that!

Highlight #2
John Edwards: McCain is Wrong in Iraq, McCain's Can't be Cast off his "Economic Guru" so Easily (ABC 07/11/08 07:17am)
EDWARDS: John McCain has said that we could be in Iraq for as long as 100 years. […]

CHRIS CUOMO: But you know that McCain was talking about equipment and bases and things that often stay behind in countries. Do you really believe there is that meaningful of a distinction in terms of when they'll get out? Both want to end the war, No?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

EDWARDS: I think there is a huge distinction between the two. Barack Obama opposed the war to begin with and has said consistently that he will bring the war to an end. John McCain has been a very strong supporter of the war at every stage. Strong supporter of the surge, and I think is personally committed to stay there as long as he feels is necessary. […]

CUOMO: Phil Gramm, he came out and said we need to stop being a nation of whiners. […]

EDWARDS: John McCain has been very forthright about the fact that the American economy is not his strength. And he has called Phil Gramm his economic guru. This is his guy. And this guy says it's not a real recession it's a mental recession. […] What it means is if John McCain were actually elected President, I don't believe he will be, but if he were elected President that is the attitude that he projects, and Americans are struggling everyday.

CUOMO: But John McCain stepped away from him, turned and said he shouldn't have said that, said it was tough times, should you hold him accountable for what his advisor said?

EDWARDS: […] John McCain, one of his weaknesses is the American economy and he admits that I think he's been very open about that, and Phil Gramm is his guy, his economic guru on the American economy. That's what I think changes this situation. […] I think what makes Phil Gramm's statements, which I think are incredibly dismissive of hardworking Americans and the struggle that middle class families are going through, what makes it so important is that he is John McCain's guy in an area where Senator McCain admits he isn't very strong.

[…]

Highlight #3
Not Just Any Surrogate, Phil Graham Offers Insight Into McCain's Ideology and Thinking (MSNBC , 07/11/08, 7:20am)
JOE SCARBOROUGH: Talk about, let's talk a little bit about Phil Graham's comments. It seems to me that if you're a republican, in any year, that's the first thing you have to do is prove that you can feel voters' pain. The fact that we are in economic strains, the likes of which we haven't seen since probably 1979, makes the situation even worse. How damaging is it for the McCain campaign that their top economic advisor is saying that we're a nation of whiners and that this is just a mental recession?

JONATHAN ALTER: You know, I don't think it's that damaging, Joe. Because there's a flap a day nowadays. You know, it used to be that one of these things would come a long every few weeks in a campaign and there'd be a feeding frenzy about it. But now you have a surrogate sticking its foot in their mouth and chewing practically every day on one side or the other. So I don't think any one of these is necessarily crippling politically. But what it does do is give you a little bit of a window into the ideology and the thinking on the McCain side. Phil Graham is not just any old surrogate. This is a guy who John McCain favored him for president in 1996. I remember, I was down in your state in Florida for a straw poll in 1996, republican straw poll, and McCain was there passing out literature for Phil Graham for president. I said, why do you want this guy as president? And he talked about what great insight Graham had into the economy and how he was the best steward for our economy and how he liked him personally and the rest of it. And all the years since then, John McCain who's not terribly interested in economic policy, has relied heavily on Phil Graham and on his wife Wendy, when it came to economic issues. So this is an important insight into McCain. I don't think it's a particularly damaging thing in terms of his campaign.

ANDREA MITCHELL: But are you at all surprised, Jonathan, at how quickly McCain just tossed him overboard? As you point out, this relationship goes all the way back to 1982, to the Graham/Rudman Act. Landmark legislation to restrain federal spending, which was the mantra for McCain.

ALTER: Yeah, the kind of cliché of the year is throw them under the bus. And we're now into an interesting competition in politics, the speed at which you can throw somebody under the bus. And I think McCain might have set a new indoor record on that score yesterday. It took him about 5 seconds. He had to do that. What Phil Graham said was kind of beyond the pale, in the current context, with a lot of people hurting. I think he made it worse by calling people a bunch of whiners. That never helps. So McCain had to act quickly. […Everyone talks over each other]

[…]

ALTER: But the thing to remember about this is, that whenever somebody does get thrown under the bus, it's really just being thrown under the bus for the cameras. You know, you don't really have a sense of whether the person is really disassociated themselves from this surrogate who's caused them problems. A lot of times these candidates continue to talk privately to the people who they just had executed.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MITCHELL: It's called the Mark Penn effect. They're on the telephone even if they've been fired publicly.

ALTER: Yeah, that's a great example. Great example.

MIKE BARNACLE: […] But right out there, in the middle of this country, most people aren't paying attention to Phil Graham, they don't know who Phil Graham is, they don't know really that he's speaking on behalf of John McCain, or thinking he is. But what they do know is, that they're very anxious about the economy around them. They're anxious about the value of their house. They're anxious about their children's economic futures. Do you get the sense that this, with Graham saying what he said, that the whole economic conundrum that we face today, the economic issues that confront the average American family today, it might be such a steep hill for John McCain to climb that issues like Iraq, and issues like Iran, might be so far off the table that the economy is enough to just spin the whole thing for Obama?

ALTER: It's very possible that it will play out that way. You know, that's what happened in 1980 when Jimmy Carter was president. Ronald Reagan was the challenger. It looked like it was a very close race, even after Labor Day. And yet, the economy was in such bad shape that Reagan just romped. And so, you could see that happen this time. But you do also have to understand that, you know, McCain is hanging in there. And even as these numbers for him, in terms of who's better to handle the economy go south and the democrats pick up strength, there's a new poll out this morning indicating that, despite that he's still in that 5 point range with Obama. So, I think we have to be careful with getting too far ahead of ourselves on how the economy could necessarily tilt the outcome.

McCain's Surrogate Problem (CBS, 07/11/08, 7:06am)
HARRY SMITH: If you're John McCain, and you bring somebody into your fold, like a Phil Graham, serious heavyweight, longtime service in the Senate, supposedly on the money in terms of the economy, he says stuff like this, how does that rub up against your campaign?

JEFF GREENFIELD: Well, ok, you're in the suburb of Detroit, an area with 10 percent unemployment. You're trying to show that even though you are a republican, but you're not a conventional stereotype republican, you feel the pain, to coin a phrase of the workers. And your top economic adviser is calling the country a nation of whiners, saying it's all in your head. Phil Graham is a longtime free market de-regulator guy. And that's not the message McCain is trying to communicate. It steps on a message on the very week when McCain is out there trying to say on the economy, I'm with the regular, ordinary hurting folk. Not helpful.

HARRY SMITH: It's interesting, cause we are in a summer of surrogates, and one of McCain's other surrogates, Carly Fiorina, who of course was the CEO of Hewlett Packard and is another one of his important economic advisors, has been shooting from the lip and you know, sort of running off the cuff. And there was this whole controversy about what she had to say about whether or not insurance companies would pay. Let's play a sound bite […]

[McCain Viagra clip shown]

GREENFIELD: See Harry, here's why I'm the Chief Political Analyst, or whatever you call me. If you're the oldest candidate ever to run for president, the late night comedians are hammering one thing about you. You're old, you're out of touch. That's not how you want to be seen on television. It may be unfair. The other thing about this is, he's trying to appeal to women. He's going out, talking to women today. The idea that women may want birth control paid for by health insurance, that's also something that some of the republican base, especially if it's unmarried women, are not at all happy about. It again, is not a message you want to communicate given the fact that you're being looked at through a, perhaps, unfair prism of the oldest candidate ever.

McCain's Advisors Leave Him In Awkward Situation (ABC, 7/11/08, 6:32am)
MATT BROCK: […] you could call it a gaffe, a candidate simply unprepared. John McCain now in the hot seat for something he said, or didn't say. The Senator just didn't seem ready for a question on healthcare.

[Clip of Awkward McCain]

BROCK: We now know that McCain has voted against forcing insurance companies to cover birth control. This dust up follows one yesterday when one of the Republican's chief economic advisors, former Senator Phil Gramm called America a nation of whiners. And suggested the nation faces a mental recession instead of a real one. You know who jumped on that:

[Clip of Obama]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MCCAIN: America is in great difficulty. We are experiencing enormous economic challenges, as well as others. Phil Gramm does not speak for me, I speak for me. So I strongly disagree.

BROCK: The problem for McCain here is that he's been trying to shore up his credentials on economic issues. He's admitted in the past it's not his strong suit.

Highlight #4
McCain's Rough Week (MSNBC, 07/11/08, 7:04am)
JOE SCARBOROUGH: John McCain's not really had a good week. He's kind of gotten knocked around, his campaign's sort of in disarray right now, as we were saying earlier the L.A. Times now has a story about his divorce and it's sort of an ugly divorce. Ronald Reagan didn't like you. And now we move on to Phil Graham, which is probably the biggest problem he's faced this week.

WILLY GEIST: He did not get any help from Phil Graham, the former republican senator from Texas. Ran for president himself in 1996, and an economic advisor to the McCain campaign. In an interview with the board for the Washington Times, he took some shots at the American people about this economic slowdown.

[Phil Graham Nation of Whiners Clip Shown]

GEIST: This didn't go over well with a lot of people. Namely, John McCain and Barack Obama.

Highlight #5
McCain Breaks Fundraising Record for Month of June (MSNBC, 07/11/08, 7:55am)
JOE SCARBOROUGH: But now it looks like McCain, as far as cash on hand is going has parody.

HAROLD FORD Jr.: He raised $22 million, with the help of the RNC. With the help of the RNC, he finds himself in a stronger position. But he raised 22 million in June. When Barack releases his numbers, I think we'll see a far bigger number than a 22 million.

SCARBOROUGH: Do you think he's have 94 million cash on hand?

FORD Jr: Well, the RNC has 67 of that.

[…]

Highlight #6
University of Arizona Professor Questions McCain's Natural Born Citizen Status and Right to be President (FNC 07/11/08 07:14am)
GRETCHEN CARLSON: A discrepancy that has come up before with regard to John McCain and where he was born and whether or not this should make him eligible or ineligible to be President of the United States. So we know he was born in 1936. We know that he was born in Panama. We know there is something called the 14th Amendment that says you have to be a natural born citizen to be President of the United States. And now a professor in McCain's own state, at the University of Arizona, says not so fast.

CLAYTON MORRIS: Yea because McCain was born in 1936, well not until 1937 did they pass a law to change that said people born in that zone can be natural born citizens. But it doesn't really matter, in April Senate approved a non-binding resolution that said John McCain is eligible to be President. This law was never intended to disallow people who are military children to not be able to be president. Technically this guy is right, but again Senate already approved that John McCain can be President of the United States.
SCOTT DOOCY: […] This professor out there at the University of Arizona, Gabriel Chen, said that because he was born in 36 and because the law passed in 37. […] One year of gray.
[…]

Highlight #7
McCain Struggles to Respond to Birth Control Question, Carly to Blame (CNN 07/11/08 09:31am)
TONY HARRIS: John McCain takes pause:

[Clip of McCain]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

JOHN MCCAIN: I don't know enough about it to give you an informed answer.

HARRIS: Wow, is that a moment or what? Lets see, maybe we should call this the latest awkward moment brought to you by, Viagra.
[Commercial break]

HARRIS: Comments by some of his advisors causing problems for John McCain. He faced an awkward moment when a reporter asked about insurance coverage for birth control pills and Viagra. It's an issue raised by McCain advisor and former Hewlett Packard CEO, Carly Fiorina.

[Clip of McCain]

REPORTER: Earlier this week Carly was meeting with a bunch of reporters and talked about it being unfair that insurance companies cover Viagra but not birth control.

MCCAIN: I certainly do not want to discuss that issue.

REPORTER: But I think you voted against-

MCCAIN: I don't know what I ah-

REPORTER: You voted against coverage of birth control, forcing health insurance companies to cover birth control in the past, is that still your position?

McCain: [pause] Look at my voting record on it, but I have – ah – I don't recall the vote right now but I'd be glad to look at it and get back to you as to why. I don't ah.

REPORTER: I guess her statement was that it was unfair that Health Insurance companies cover Viagra but not birth control. Do you have an opinion on that?

MCCAIN: [long Pause- folds arms] I don't know enough about it to give you an informed answer because I don't recall the vote. I cast thousands of votes in the senate, but I will respond to you, it's a –

REPORTER: Delicate issue.

MCCAIN: It's a something that I have not thought much about. And I did hear about her response but I hadn't thought much about it. I will get back to you today on it. I don't usually duck an issue but I will try to get back to you.

[End of Clip]

HARRIS: That's just rough. That's just a rough moment.

Local Highlight #1
Local Minnesota News Interviews McCain, Takes Questions From Viewers (ST. Paul, MN-ABC 5-KSTP, 07/10/08, 10:13pm)
[…]

CHRIS O'CONNELL: My questions are going to come from our viewers.

JOHN MCCAIN: Oh I gotchya.

QUESTIONER 1: Senator McCain, I want to ask you, what are you going to do about the high gas prices?

MCCAIN: In the long term, though, we got to have nuclear, wind, solar, tied with a car battery that will take you a hundred miles or more.

QUESTIONER 2: Senator McCain, what's your plan on getting us out of debt?

MCCAIN: It isn't that revenues have been the problem, it's spending that's gotten completely out of control. I'll veto every single pork barrel bill that comes across my desk. I'll make them famous and you'll know their names.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

QUESTIONER 3: Senator McCain, I'd like to know about health care reform, what your plans are for covering everyone?

MCCAIN: I want to give every family in America a $5,000 dollar refundable tax credit, so they can go across state lines and get the health insurance of their choice.

QUESTIONER 4: My question would be, what is his fix for immigration?

MCCAIN: We have to secure our borders, then we have to have tamper proof biometric documents for temporary workers who are truly temporary. Then we have to address the issue of the 12 million people who are here illegally.

QUESTIONER 5: I want to know who will be your vice president and when are you going to tell us?

MCCAIN: We haven't been naming names and we've been going through the process. If we name a name then I guarantee you that the party's would have to have their home number changed. But the fact is we're not naming anybody's name but we'll try to get it done as soon as possible before we come to the Twin Cities for our convention.

O'CONNELL: Now McCain also said he knows he's behind in the polls here in Minnesota and that's one of the reasons for his trip here. […]

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Karl Frisch, Media Matters" <kfrisch@mediamatters.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 8/5/2008 3:09:54 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Important Research on the new Anti-Obama Books...

With the authors of two new anti-Obama books hitting the airwaves to promote their latest works of fiction, I wanted to make sure people had access to the research we've published thus far on Jerome Corsi's The Obama Nation: Leftist Politics and the Cult of Personality and David Freddoso's The Case Against Barack Obama: The Unlikely Rise and Unexamined Agenda of the Media's Favorite Candidate. Thus far both authors have been on FOX News' Hannity & Colmes. They are also actively hitting the right-wing talk radio circuit. Corsi was on MSNBC this morning and Contessa Brewer used our research to push back against his claims and ask why he should be taken seriously when so many mistakes have been found in his book. We are still combing through both books which we obtained before publication. This is how the Swift Boat attacks began in 2004 (Corsi was co-author of Unfit for Command: Swift Boat Veterans Speak Out Against John Kerry), it is extremely important that they are pushed back forcefully with facts that discredit their claims.

Karl Frisch
Media Matters for America
202-772-8156

Unfit for Publication: Corsi's The Obama Nation filled with falsehoods

http://mediamatters.org/items/200808040005
Summary: In its preface, Jerome Corsi compares his new book, The Obama Nation, to his 2004 book Unfit for Command. The comparison seems apt: Just as Unfit for Command contains false attacks on Sen. John Kerry's military service, a Media Matters review finds that The Obama Nation similarly contains numerous falsehoods about Sen. Barack Obama.

On three Hannity programs, Corsi offered another falsehood: Obama supports abortion "[a]fter a child's born"

http://mediamatters.org/items/200808020004
Summary: Jerome Corsi, author of the book, The Obama Nation, falsely claimed on Hannity's America that Sen. Barack Obama said, "Even if a child was born ... the woman still had the right to kill the child in an abortion." Corsi similarly falsely asserted on Hannity & Colmes that "[a]fter a child's born, Obama ... in the [Illinois] state Senate, wanted the child killed if the mother desired an abortion," and on Sean Hannity's radio program, said that "Obama's on record as let's kill the baby if that's what the mother wants." In fact, Obama has never supported giving people the right to kill their children.

Publisher's promotional materials for Corsi's Obama Nation echo falsehood and baseless charge in book

http://mediamatters.org/items/200808020003
Summary: Simon & Schuster's promotional materials for Jerome Corsi's book, The Obama Nation, echo Corsi's false claims and baseless charges about Sen. Barack Obama's Global Poverty Act and his views on nuclear weapons.

Misinformation in Freddoso's anti-Obama book comes early

http://mediamatters.org/items/200808010005
Summary: The introduction and first few pages of David Freddoso's forthcoming book, The Case Against Barack Obama, are marked by false and misleading assertions about Obama, accompanied by dubious citations.

On Hannity & Colmes, another Corsi falsehood about Obama

http://mediamatters.org/items/200808010003
Summary: On Hannity & Colmes, author Jerome Corsi claimed that in his upcoming book, The Obama Nation, "I do a great deal of analysis of [Sen. Barack Obama's] autobiography." Corsi then asserted, "Obama first presents his father as a great hero, and the truth was, his father was a polygamist and a alcoholic." However, contrary to Corsi's suggestion that Obama did not address these issues in his memoir Dreams From My Father, he discusses his father's alcoholism and polygamy in multiple passages in the book.

First reported allegation in Corsi's Obama attack book is false

http://mediamatters.org/items/200807310003
Summary: A WorldNetDaily.com article about author Jerome Corsi's forthcoming book, The Obama Nation, asserts that the book "points out" that "Barack Obama admitted using drugs in his autobiography but never revealed if or when he stopped."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In fact, Obama wrote in his autobiography, Dreams from My Father, that he "stopped getting high" shortly after moving to New York City to attend Columbia University.

In covering forthcoming anti-Obama books, will media repeat Swift Boat coverage mistakes?

http://mediamatters.org/items/200807300005

Summary: Two books attacking Sen. Barack Obama are scheduled to be released in early August: T*he Obama Nation*, by Jerome Corsi -- co-author of Unfit for Command, which contains false and baseless attacks on Sen. John Kerry's military service -- and The Case Against Barack Obama, by David Freddoso. Regnery, publisher of The Case Against Barack Obama, touts the book as having the same "goal" as Unfit for Command, which Regnery also published. The overt connections between the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth's scurrilous campaign against Kerry and the two forthcoming books raise the question for the media: Will they have absorbed the lessons of their highly flawed Swift Boat coverage and give more immediate and more thorough scrutiny to these forthcoming books?

Politico: Anti-Obama book to be released by conservative press that published Swift Boat smear book

http://mediamatters.org/items/200806230005

Summary: David Freddoso's upcoming book, The Case Against Barack Obama, will be published by Regnery, which reportedly "likens the goal of [the Obama] book to that of 'Unfit for Command,' " a widely discredited book containing numerous false and baseless attacks on John Kerry's military service.

MMFA investigates: Who is Jerome Corsi, co-author of Swift Boat Vets attack book?

http://mediamatters.org/items/200408060010

While much has been written about the identity and history of John E. O'Neill -- one of the authors of the forthcoming Regnery book Unfit for Command : Swift Boat Veterans Speak Out Against John Kerry (whose links in the GOP go back to his days as "protégé of Nixon-era dirty trickster Charles Colson") -- little has been said about his co-author, Jerome R. Corsi, PhD.

- Corsi on Islam: "a worthless, dangerous Satanic religion"
- Corsi on Catholicism: "Boy buggering in both Islam and Catholicism is okay with the Pope as long as it isn't reported by the liberal press"
- Corsi on Muslims: "RAGHEADS are Boy-Bumpers as clearly as they are Women-Haters -- it all goes together"
- Corsi on "John F*ing Commie Kerry": "After he married TerRAHsa, didn't John Kerry begin practicing Judiasm? He also has paternal grandparents that were Jewish. What religion is John Kerry?"
- Corsi on Senator "FAT HOG" Clinton: "Anybody ask why HELLary couldn't keep BJ Bill satisfied? Not lesbo or anything, is she?"

Karl Frisch
Communications Director

Media Matters for America
202-772-8156 phone
202-756-4101 fax
202-580-5813 cell
kfrisch@mediamatters.org
http://www.mediamatters.org

Media Matters for America is a progressive research and information center dedicated to monitoring, analyzing, and correcting conservative misinformation in the media.

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.

-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>
To: "Cheryl Mills" <cheryl.mills@gmail.com>
"Jennifer Palmieri" <jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com>
Date: 2/19/2015 8:50:03 PM
Subject: Re: Foundation | Foreign Contributors Statement

I know it's hard to keep track at this point, but the WSJ's long-worked-on piece about corporate giving to State and the Foundation is up. Pasted below.

http://www.wsj.com/article_email/hillary-clintons-complex-corporate-ties-1424403002-lMyQjAxMTA1NzEzOTgxMjk3Wj

Hillary Clinton's Complex Corporate Ties

By James V. Grimaldi and Rebecca Ballhaus
Feb. 19, 2015

Among recent secretaries of state, Hillary Clinton was one of the most aggressive global cheerleaders for American companies, pushing governments to sign deals and change policies to the advantage of corporate giants such as General Electric Co. , Exxon Mobil Corp. , Microsoft Corp. and Boeing Co.

At the same time, those companies were among the many that gave to the Clinton family's global foundation set up by her husband, former President Bill Clinton. At least 60 companies that lobbied the State Department during her tenure donated a total of more than $26 million to the Clinton Foundation, according to a Wall Street Journal analysis of public and foundation disclosures.

As Mrs. Clinton prepares to embark on a race for the presidency, she has a web of connections to big corporations unique in American politics—ties forged both as secretary of state and by her family's charitable interests. Those relationships are emerging as an issue for Mrs. Clinton's expected presidential campaign as income disparity and other populist themes gain early attention.

Indeed, Clinton Foundation money-raising already is drawing attention. "To a lot of progressive Democrats, Clinton's ties to corporate America are disturbing," says Jack Pitney, a politics professor at Claremont McKenna College who once worked for congressional Republicans. Mrs. Clinton's connections to companies, he says, "are a bonanza for opposition researchers because they enable her critics to suggest the appearance of a conflict of interest."

The Wall Street Journal identified the companies involved with both Clinton-family charitable endeavors and with Mrs. Clinton's State Department by examining large corporate donations to the Clinton Foundation, then reviewing lobbying-disclosure reports filed by those companies. At least 44 of those 60 companies also participated in philanthropic projects valued at $3.2 billion that were set up though a wing of the foundation called the Clinton Global Initiative, which coordinates the projects but receives no cash for them.

Mrs. Clinton's connections to the companies don't end there. As secretary of state, she created 15 public-private partnerships coordinated by the State Department, and at least 25 companies contributed to those partnerships. She also sought corporate donations for another charity she co-founded, a nonprofit women's group called Vital Voices.

Mrs. Clinton's spokesman, Nick Merrill, says: "She did the job that every secretary of state is supposed to do and what the American people expect of them—especially during difficult economic times. She proudly and loudly advocated on behalf of American business and took every opportunity she could to promote U.S. commercial interests abroad."

Corporate donations to politically connected charities aren't illegal so long as they aren't in exchange for favors. There is no evidence of that with the Clinton Foundation.

In some cases, donations came after Mrs. Clinton took action that helped a company. In other cases, the donation came first. In some instances, donations came both before and after. All of the companies mentioned in this article said their charitable donations had nothing to do with their lobbying agendas with Mrs. Clinton's State Department.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ENLARGE

Hillary Clinton, as secretary of state, visited a Boeing design center in Moscow in 2009. Photo: Associated Press

President Barack Obama 's transition team worried enough about potential problems stemming from Clinton-organization fundraising while Mrs. Clinton was secretary of state that it asked Mr. Clinton to quit raising money from foreign governments for the Clinton Global Initiative and to seek approval for paid speaking engagements, which he did. The transition team didn't put limits on corporate fundraising.

The foundation resumed soliciting foreign governments after Mrs. Clinton left the State Department. The official name of the foundation was changed to the Bill, Hillary & Chelsea Clinton Foundation. Mrs. Clinton became a director. All told, the Clinton Foundation and its affiliates have collected donations and pledges from all sources of more than $1.6 billion, according to their tax returns. On Thursday, the foundation said that if Mrs. Clinton runs for president, it would consider whether to continue accepting foreign-government contributions as part of an internal policy review.

"The Clinton Foundation has raised hundreds of millions that it claims is for charitable causes, but clearly overlaps with Hillary Clinton's political ambitions," said Tim Miller, director of America Rising PAC, a conservative group that has targeted Mrs. Clinton.

Tapping Corporate Pockets

Corporations are an important source of donations to the Clinton Foundation. Many corporate donors also lobbied the State Department during Hillary Clinton's tenure as secretary of state.

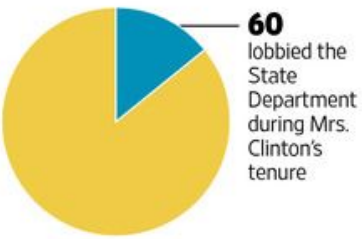
Sources of donations of at least $50,000 to the Clinton Foundation

Type of donor	Donors	Donations, in millions*
Individuals	490	$173.4
Corporations	425	114.4
Foundations	249	278.9
Corporate foundations	36	23.0
Governments	28	51.2
Unions	14	3.4

*Calculated based on the low end of the donation ranges disclosed by the Clinton Foundation

Source: WSJ analysis of disclosures from the Clinton Foundation

Of the 425 corporations that were large donors:



THE WALL STREET JOURNAL ENLARGE

Foundation spokesman Craig Minassian says the group's work helps millions around the world and its donors have a history of supporting such work. "So when companies get involved with the Clinton Foundation it's for only one reason, because they know our work matters," he says.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In her book, "Hard Choices," Mrs. Clinton said one of her goals at the State Department was "placing economics at the heart of our foreign policy." She wrote: "It was clearer than ever that America's economic strength and our global leadership were a package deal."

Matthew Goodman, a former Clinton State Department official who is now at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a Washington think tank, says Mrs. Clinton is the first secretary of state to make economics such a focus since George C. Marshall, who helped rebuild postwar Europe.

Economic Statecraft

That approach, which Mrs. Clinton called "economic statecraft," emerged in discussions with Robert Hormats, a former Goldman Sachs Group Inc. investment banker who has worked in Democratic and Republican administrations and became an undersecretary of state. "One of the very first items was, how do we strengthen the role of the State Department in economic policy?" he says.

The focus positioned Mrs. Clinton to pursue not just foreign-policy results, but domestic economic ones.

Early in Mrs. Clinton's tenure, according to Mr. Hormats, Microsoft's then Chief Research Officer Craig Mundie asked the State Department to send a ranking official to a fourth annual meeting of U.S. software executives and Chinese government officials about piracy and Internet freedom. Mr. Hormats joined the December 2009 meeting in Beijing.

Since 2005, Microsoft has given the Clinton Global Initiative $1.3 million, in addition to free software, according to the foundation.

In 2011, Microsoft launched a three-year initiative coordinated by the Clinton Global Initiative to provide free or discounted software and other resources to students and teachers—a commitment Microsoft estimated to be worth $130 million.

Mr. Hormats says there was no relation between Microsoft's donations and the State Department's participation in the China conference.

In 2012, the Clinton Foundation approached GE about working together to expand a health-access initiative the company had launched four years earlier, says a GE spokeswoman.

That same year, Mrs. Clinton lobbied for GE to be selected by the Algerian government to build power plants in that country. She went to Algiers that October and met with President Abdelaziz Bouteflika. "I saw an opportunity for advancing prosperity in Algeria and seizing an opportunity for American business," she explained in her book.

A month after Mrs. Clinton's trip, the Clinton Foundation announced the health-initiative partnership with GE, the company's first involvement with the foundation. GE eventually contributed between $500,000 and $1 million to the partnership.

The following September, GE won the contracts with the Algerian government , saying they marked "some of its largest power agreements in company history."

Mrs. Clinton championed U.S. energy companies and launched an office to promote overseas projects. Many of those efforts were focused in Eastern and Central Europe, where she saw energy development as a hedge against Russia's dominance in oil and gas. Companies that had interests in those areas included Exxon Mobil and Chevron Corp.

One effort, the Global Shale Gas Initiative, promoted hydraulic fracturing, or fracking, a technique perfected by U.S. companies. In 2010, Mrs. Clinton flew to Krakow to announce a Polish-American cooperation on a global shale-gas initiative, according to her book. At the time, the U.S. Energy Information Administration predicted abundant deposits of shale gas in Poland.

After pursuing shale-gas projects in Poland, Exxon Mobil gave up a few years later, and Chevron said late last month it would abandon its Poland project.

In 2012, Mrs. Clinton flew to Sofia, Bulgaria, and urged the Bulgarian Parliament to reconsider its moratorium on fracking and its withdrawal of Chevron's five-year exploration license. A few months later, the government allowed conventional gas exploration, but not fracking. Chevron left Bulgaria in 2012.

Ben Schreiber of the environmental group Friends of the Earth says: "We've long been concerned about the ties that Hillary Clinton has to the oil-and-gas industry."

Both Exxon and Chevron are supporters of the Clinton Foundation. Chevron donated $250,000 in 2013. A Chevron spokesman said the Clinton charity "is one of many programs and partnerships that the company has had or maintains across a number of issue areas and topics pertinent to our business."

Exxon Mobil has given about $2 million to the Clinton Global Initiative, starting in 2009. Since 2007, Exxon Mobil also has given $16.8 million to Vital Voices, the nonprofit women's group co-founded by Mrs. Clinton, according to the group's spokeswoman.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

An Exxon Mobil spokesman said the donations were made to support work on issues Exxon Mobil has long championed, such as programs to fight malaria and empower women. “That is the sole motivation for our support of charitable programs associated with the Clintons,” he said. “We did not seek or receive any special consideration on the Shale Gas Initiative.”

In October 2009, Mrs. Clinton went to bat for aerospace giant Boeing, which was seeking to sell jets to Russia, by flying to Moscow to visit the Boeing Design Center. “I made the case that Boeing’s jets set the global gold standard, and, after I left, our embassy kept at it,” she wrote in her book.

About seven months later, in June 2010, Russia agreed to purchase 50 Boeing 737s for $3.7 billion, choosing Boeing over Europe’s Airbus Group NV.

Two months later, Boeing made its first donation to the Clinton Foundation—$900,000 to help rebuild Haiti’s public-education system. Overall, Boeing has contributed around $1.1 million to the Clinton Foundation since 2010.

ENLARGE

As secretary of state, Hillary Clinton traveled to Algeria in 2012 and lobbied President Abdelaziz Bouteflika to select General Electric to build power plants. Photo: Agence France-Presse/Getty Images

A Boeing spokeswoman said it is routine for U.S. officials to advocate on behalf of businesses such as Boeing. “U.S. businesses face fierce global competition, and oftentimes an unlevel playing field in the global marketplace,” she said in a written statement. “Secretary Clinton did nothing for Boeing that former U.S. presidents and cabinet secretaries haven’t done for decades, or that their foreign counterparts haven’t done on behalf of companies like Airbus.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Before every overseas trip, says Mr. Hormats, the former undersecretary of state, he helped prepare a list of U.S. corporate interests for Mrs. Clinton to advocate while abroad.

During Mrs. Clinton's three trips to India, she urged the government to kill a ban on stores that sell multiple brands , a law aimed at department stores or big-box retailers such as Wal-Mart Stores Inc.

"It wasn't just Wal-Mart," Mr. Hormats says. "It was the whole point of multibrand retail. Wal-Mart was, of course, the biggest."

Mrs. Clinton served on the board of the Bentonville, Ark.-based retailer between 1986 and 1992, when her husband was governor of that state, and the law firm she worked for at the time represented the company. Wal-Mart has donated nearly $1.2 million to the Clinton Foundation for a program that issues grants to student-run charitable projects. The company also has paid more than $370,000 in membership fees to the foundation since 2008, according to a Wal-Mart spokesman.

Trip to India

Before Mrs. Clinton's official trip to India in 2012, Wal-Mart Chief Executive Mike Duke joined her at the Summit of the Americas in Cartagena, Colombia, to pledge $12 million to help women in Latin America. The donation included $1.5 million in grants to 55,000 women entrepreneurs through the International Fund for Women and Girls, one of the 15 public-private partnerships Mrs. Clinton created at the State Department, and $500,000 for Vital Voices, the charity she co-founded.

"We committed to helping women around the world live better," Mr. Duke said at the time. "By working with leaders like Secretary Clinton, we're bringing that mission to life."

One month later, Mrs. Clinton traveled to India to make the case against the ban on retail stores such as Wal-Mart. Then-Prime Minister Manmohan Singh had proposed allowing companies such as Wal-Mart to invest up to 51% directly in local multibrand retailers, but one of his allies, Mamata Banerjee, a regional governor, opposed the idea. Ms. Banerjee's support was key to Mr. Singh's majority in Parliament.

Mrs. Clinton met with Ms. Banerjee to press the matter. She also said in a speech in West Bengal that U.S. retailers could bring an "enormous amount of expertise" to India in areas ranging from supply-chain management to working with small producers and farmers. Her lobbying was unsuccessful.

A Wal-Mart spokesman said the retailer had lobbied the State Department on the issue, which he said was one of dozens of topics important to the business.

After Mrs. Clinton's India trip, her husband asked Mr. Duke, Walmart's CEO, to change his schedule to appear at the opening panel of the Clinton Global Initiative. Mr. Duke agreed.

Write to Rebecca Ballhaus at Rebecca.Ballhaus@wsj.com

On Feb 19, 2015, at 12:30 PM, Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com > wrote:

"Like other global charities, the Clinton Foundation receives support from individuals, organizations and governments from all over the world. Contributions are made because of a strong belief in the Foundation's programs improve the lives of millions of people around the globe. The Clinton Foundation has a record of transparency that goes above what is required of U.S. charities. This includes the voluntary disclosure of contributions on the Foundation's website. Should Secretary Clinton decide to run for office, we will continue to ensure the Foundation's policies and practices regarding support from international partners are appropriate, just as we did when she served as Secretary of State."

From: Cheryl Mills
Date: Thursday, February 19, 2015 at 12:29 PM
To: Jennifer Palmieri
Cc: NSM, John Podesta, Jacob Sullivan, Philippe Reines, Robby Mook, Huma Abedin, Dan Schwerin, Jim Margolis, John Anzalone, Mandy Grunwald, Teddy Goff, Kristina Schake, Ian Mandel, Cheryl Mills, Heather Samuelson
Subject: Re: Foundation | Foreign Contributors Statement

can you circulate that version?

On Thu, Feb 19, 2015 at 12:10 PM, Jennifer Palmieri <jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com > wrote:

> Disregard the version I just sent. Foundation wanted to go with the WJC version from last night.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Thu, Feb 19, 2015 at 12:06 PM, Jennifer Palmieri <jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com > wrote:

The Clinton Foundation is proud of the important work all over the world it does to combat disease, poverty and environmental degradation. This work has improved the lives of millions of people around the globe .Like other global charities, the Clinton Foundation is supported by individuals, organizations and governments from all over the world who value the Foundation's work. We are also proud of our record of transparency, which goes above what is required of U.S. charities and includes the voluntary disclosure of contributions on our website. Should Secretary Clinton decide to run for office, we will continue to ensure the Foundation's policies and practices regarding support from international partners are appropriate, just as we did when she served as Secretary of State."

On Thu, Feb 19, 2015 at 1:42 AM, Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com > wrote:

Based on our conversation earlier this evening, below is the statement with the Clintons' feedback that we can start to push out in the morning. Thanks again to everyone for talking this through today.

"Like other global charities, the Clinton Foundation receives support from individuals, organizations and governments from all over the world. Contributions are made because of a strong belief that the Foundation's programs improve the lives of millions of people around the globe. The Clinton Foundation has a record of transparency that goes above what is required of U.S. charities, including peer organizations. This includes the voluntary disclosure of contributions on the Foundation's website. Should Secretary Clinton decide to run for office, we will continue to ensure the Foundation's policies and practices regarding support from international partners are appropriate, just as we did when she served as Secretary of State."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Melissa Cantrell" <mcantrell@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	hrcrapid@googlegroups.com "Jennifer Palmieri" <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com> "Julie McClain" <jmcclain@hillaryclinton.com> "Meredith Thatcher" <mthatcher@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	5/20/2015 11:36:38 AM
Subject:	5.20.15 HRC TV Coverage
Attachments:	5.20.15 HRC TV Coverage.docx

Also attached as a Word doc.

National:

-- Report on HRC's stance on the TPP; used footage from HRC's Iowa roundtable on Tuesday; Jonathan Alter said HRC was just fine in saying she wanted to hold off taking a position on TPP until she read the deal. MSNBC's The Ed Show , 5.20.15

-- Interview with Marie Harf; Wolf asked Harf for a reaction to The Wall Street Journal report about HRC's political staff interfering with FOIA requests; Harf said she saw a lot of unnamed sources in that story; Harf said there were very specific rules on FOIA requests at the State Department; Harf said the rules govern the process, period; Harf said she had nothing to add to the anonymous sources from The Wall Street Journal article. CNN's Situation Room With Wolf Blitzer , 5.20.15

-- Led with The Wall Street Journal story about Cheryl Mills intervening in FOIA requests from the State Department; Heilemann said the information does not radically change the contours of the story, but this ties in a Clinton intimate into the story; gave profiles of Blumenthal and Mills; Halperin said he thought both Blumenthal and Mills would be called to testify; Halperin said if the stories from the New York Times and Wall Street Journal are true then Democrats would know this was not okay. Bloomberg's With All Due Respect , 5.20.15

-- Report on an Iowa focus group with Iowa Democrats on HRC; people said they liked HRC's experience; no one could say something specific that HRC accomplished as Secretary of State; Halperin focused in on whether WJC could hurt HRC in 2016; one person said nothing about WJC would hurt HRC in 2016; one person said he didn't see a WJC scandal until HRC's second term; people said HRC is running for President now, not for the nomination; people said HRC moved to the left which was a good thing; a millennial said HRC had a lot of young people excited; one person lauded HRC as a "bad mamajamma"; people said they were concerned about HRC's honesty; no one said they were concerned about HRC's ties to Wall Street; no one said they were concerned about HRC and WJC's speaking fees. Bloomberg's With All Due Respect , 5.20.15 [Part Two]

-- Report that the White House knew within a day of the Benghazi attack that it was a planned attack; said HRC and BHO told people the attack was based on a video anyways; led into a discussion about whether HRC could be trusted; Juan Williams said the video did have something to do with the attack; discussion about The Wall Street Journal's story about Cheryl Mills; showed Fournier on "Special Report" on Tuesday; discussed Bloomberg's Iowa focus group where people could not name an accomplishment of HRC as Secretary of State; Williams said no one could say a single accomplishment of any Secretary of State. Fox News' The Five , 5.20.15

-- Report on HRC's fundraisers in Chicago on Wednesday; used footage of HRC saying she wanted to reshuffle the deck for all Americans; juxtaposed with photos of JB Pritzker and Fred Eychaner, the men who are hosting her fundraisers; Ed Henry said HRC is also doing events on childcare and raising the minimum wage; Ed Henry mentioned Eychaner donated $25 million to The Clinton Foundation; mentioned The Clinton Foundation said Eychaner's foundation donated $10,000 to $25,000 when Eychaner's foundation donated more than $7 million to The Clinton Foundation. Fox News' Your World With Neil Cavuto , 5.20.15

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-- Report on The Wall Street Journal story about Cheryl Mills blocking the release of FOIAed documents; mentioned the Center for American Government study that showed the State Department was the least transparent among government agencies. CNN's The Lead With Jake Tapper , 5.20.15

-- Discussion about HRC hiring a DREAMer; Torre said this demonstrates that HRC is serious about immigration; interviewed Brian Beutler, who said HRC has shown incredible savvy in how she has dealt with immigration. MSNBC's The Cycle, 5.20.15

-- Report on the Benghazi Committee subpoenaing Blumenthal; panel with Chris Plante and Leslie Marshall; Plante said Blumenthal's subpoena could mean bad news for HRC; Marshall said HRC looked at the emails, but passed them off; Marshall said this was just a person sending emails to a friend, and it would not be a problem for HRC; used footage of Rand Paul from Meet The Press on Sunday when he said HRC should be asked about whether invading Libya was a good idea.Fox News' The Real Story With Gretchen Carlson , 5.20.15

-- Report that HRC's donations to The Clinton Foundation were in the millions, not matching up with tax returns; mentioned HRC's fundraisers in Chicago; said one of the fundraisers was with Fred Eychaner; said Eychaner also donated $25 million to The Clinton Foundation; said The Clinton Foundation said Eychaner's foundation donated $10,000 to $25,000 to the Foundation while Eychaner's foundation said it donated $7.5 million; showed footage of HRC talking about hedge fund managers in Iowa on Tuesday; mentioned HRC was courting those hedge fund managers in Iowa; said de Blasio and Warren did not endorse HRC; showed footage of de Blasio on CBS This Morning. Fox News' The Real Story With Gretchen Carlson , 5.20.15

-- Discussion about Blumenthal's emails with Gloria Borger; showed footage of HRC's Blumenthal answer in Iowa on Tuesday; reported that Gowdy wanted to subpoena Blumenthal; Borger said the Blumenthal emails were unsolicited and that people in power get a lot of unsolicited emails. CNN's Wolf , 5.20.15

-- Played segment of a Bloomberg Politics Iowa focus group in which recent scandals seem to not have affected HRC's popularity; Roberts asked Pataki how HRC was handling herself on the campaign trail; Pataki said HRC's strategy was an insult to the American people; Pataki said HRC's emails were a red herring because she did not release all of her emails. MSNBC's Live With Thomas Roberts , 5.20.15

-- Report on HRC's appearance in Chicago at two fundraisers and an event on childcare today; mentioned HRC spoke to reporters for the first time in 28 days yesterday; interviewed Pataki; Pataki said he would ask HRC if the US made the right decision in 2012 when the US pulled out of Iraq. MSNBC's Live With Thomas Roberts , 5.20.15

-- Report on HRC talking to reporters yesterday; reported on HRC saying she did not have control over her emails; quoted Ron Fournier from his column yesterday where he said he does not believe HRC; Tantaros mentioned HRC's credibility gap; Tantaros said HRC lied many times during her press conference yesterday; discussed Blumenthal's emails. Fox News' Outnumbered , 5.20.15

-- Report on HRC talking to reporters yesterday; interviewed Mark Murray; Murray said the biggest news HRC made at her press conference was that HRC said she wanted her emails turned over as soon as possible; Murray said we have a pretty good idea of what is in HRC's emails because HRC picked what would be turned over. MSNBC's News Nation with Tamron Hall , 5.20.15

-- Interview with Jerry Seib who said HRC will try to project a more aggressive posture abroad than Obama; Seib said HRC pushed for a more aggressive intervention in Syria. Fox News' Happening Now , 5.20.15

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-- Reported on Jack Shafer's op-ed in Politico about HRC acting like she's the President already, and the press is treating her like it; panel with Brad Blakeman and Doug Schoen; Blakeman said HRC's press strategy would not get her the Presidency; Schoen said the strategy is working fine for her already; showed Fox News poll that showed HRC's unfavorability rating going up; showed de Blasio's comment from CBS This Morning in which de Blasio says he wants to see a vision for change in 2016. Fox News' America's Newsroom with Bill Hemmer and Martha MacCallum, 5.20.15

-- Report on Bernie Sanders saying the Clinton's wealth is a problem on CNN's Wolf; interviewed Sara Murray; Murray said WJC's comment about needing to pay the bills did not help; showed HRC's comment about her wealth in Iowa yesterday; shifted into panel with SE Cupp and Jamal Simmons; Cupp said HRC's problem was not that she was wealthy – it's that she's trying to come across as a common person; Simmons said the Clintons worked hard to get their wealth whereas Mitt Romney was born into wealth; Simmons said the main issue for voters were what HRC's policies would be. CNN's CNN Newsroom With Carol Costello , 5.20.15

-- Report on the federal judge ordering a fast-track on the State Department's release of HRC's emails; reported that HRC gave a press conference yesterday; panel discussion with Anne Gearan and Marc Caputo; Gearan said the rolling release of emails was not great news for HRC because it will keep the story going; report on HRC's stops in Texas, Missouri, and Florida; Caputo said HRC was making stops in these states to prepare for the general election. MSNBC's The Rundown With Jose Diaz-Balart , 5.20.15

-- Report on a federal judge ordering the State Department to release HRC's emails on a rolling basis; report on HRC talking to the press yesterday, discussing her emails; used footage of HRC's email answer from the press conference on Tuesday; panel with Alex Seitz-Wald and Leigh Ann Caldwell; discussed The Wall Street Journal report about Cheryl Mills involvement in the FOIA process. MSNBC's The Rundown With Jose Diaz-Balart , 5.20.15

-- Interview with Charlie Rangel about HRC's opacity on the TPP; Rangel said HRC could not be for or against TPP without members of Congress knowing what was in the bill. CSPAN's Washington Journal , 5.20.15

-- Report on a federal court telling the State Department to speed up the release of HRC's emails; showed HRC's comments on her emails from her press conference in Iowa on Tuesday; Scarborough mocks HRC for saying that she's always wanted the State Department to show her emails; Halperin joins in the mocking; reported on The Wall Street Journal story about Cheryl Mills intervening in FOIA requests; read Nick Merrill's statement about the State Department's FOIA system; discussed HRC's press conference yesterday; showed Ed Henry's interruption of HRC yesterday; Scarborough said Henry got HRC to go over to talk to the press; report on Halperin's focus group with Iowans; showed footage from that focus group, where people had very positive comments to say about HRC but people couldn't think of anything specific HRC accomplished as Secretary of State. MSNBC's Morning Joe , 5.20.15 [Part Two]

-- Report on the Associated Press story about WJC and HRC supporting Martin O'Malley; interviewed Lisa Lerer who said O'Malley had a tough climb ahead of him. MSNBC's Morning Joe , 5.20.15

-- Discussion about Ron Fournier's piece in the National Journal yesterday; Scarborough, Brzezinski, Halperin, and Joe Conason get into a heated discussion about HRC's emails; Conason said Colin Powell was held to a different standard on his emails; there's a heated exchange between Scarborough and Conason when Scarborough thinks Conason compared him to a Nazi. MSNBC's Morning Joe , 5.20.15 [Part Two]

-- Report on HRC breaking her silence to the press on Tuesday; discussion with John Avlon and Margaret Hoover; Avlon said HRC was not speaking to the press out of strategy; Hoover said there was no competition on the Left; discussion about HRC's comments about her emails yesterday; Chris Cuomo asked why HRC turned over her emails on paper; discussion about Sidney Blumenthal's emails; discussion of The Wall Street Journal story about Cheryl Mills; quick discussion about HRC's Iraq answer. CNN's New Day , 5.20.15

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-- Report on the Benghazi Committee subpoenaing Blumenthal; discussed The New York Times story from yesterday; showed HRC's comment on Blumenthal from Iowa; interviewed Jonah Goldberg; Goldberg described Blumenthal for viewers; showed footage of HRC's testimony on Benghazi from January 2013; Goldberg said he was curious as to whether HRC included Blumenthal's emails in her cache of work emails that she handed over to the State Department. Fox News' America's Newsroom with Bill Hemmer and Martha MacCallum , 5.20.15

-- Report on HRC talking to the press yesterday; interviewed Jeff Zeleny; Zeleny described HRC's visit to Chicago today; recapped HRC's press conference yesterday and showed footage from that press conference; reported the State Department's plan to release HRC's work emails in January 2016; reported on the Wall Street Journal report about how political staff were personally involved in how State responded to FOIA requests during HRC's tenure at State; Zeleny said HFA had not responded to comment which showed transparency would still be a problem in HRC's 2016 campaign; shifted into a conversation about gender in the 2016 race; led with Snoop Dogg's endorsement of HRC for being a woman; showed Donald Trump's sexist deleted tweet about HRC; said Chris Christie touted his ability to win elections against women; panel with Sabrina Schaeffer and Anushay Hossain; Schaeffer said a lot of the gender-laden messaging was from HFA; Hossain said Fiorina played up the gender card to mitigate her lack of qualifications; teased a May 2014 (yes, 2014) poll that showed HRC would split the vote by gender like no other. CNN's CNN Newsroom With Carol Costello , 5.20.15

-- Report on HRC talking to the media on Tuesday; showed footage of HRC's answer about her email during her Iowa Q&A; mentioned The Wall Street Journal report about HRC's staff interfering with FOIA requests. CNN's New Day, 5.20.15

-- Federal court ruled that the State Department must move faster to release HRC's emails; said the State Department had a week to come up with a plan to release the emails; reported that HRC spoke about her emails in Iowa on Tuesday and showed the footage; led into The Wall Street Journal's report that Cheryl Mills interfered in FOIA requests; included Nick Merrill's quote from The Wall Street Journal; noted it had been 28 days since HRC had spoken to the press; reported about Ed Henry's interruption of HRC; showed HRC answering questions about Iraq; said Warren called on HRC to take a clearer stand on the trade deal. MSNBC's Way Too Early , 5.20.15

-- Interview with Jonathan Allen (Vox) about HRC's avoidance of the press; Allen said there was not much upside for HRC talking to the press; Allen said avoiding the press made sense for HRC politically; shifted to interview about the State Department's schedule for releasing HRC's emails; Allen said the real issue for HRC was the emails she deleted. MSNBC's First Look , 5.20.15

-- Led with the State Department releasing HRC's emails from the State Department; joked the 55,000 pages were one long email chain with the subject header "where is he?"; led into joke about HRC trying to win over millennials. TBS's Conan , 5.19.15

-- Report on George Stephanopoulos's $105 million contract from ABC News; interviewed Ann Coulter; Coulter talked about Stephanopoulos's line of questioning with Mitt Romney in the 2012 election; Coulter said, "Can we get Stephanopoulos on the record to tell us whether he knew Clinton had raped Juanita Broaddrick?"; Coulter suggested Republicans not have a moderator in their debates. Fox News' Hannity , 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC's use of two email addresses as Secretary of State; report on HRC's communication with Sidney Blumenthal; discussed Ed Henry's interruption of HRC in Iowa; showed HRC addressing Blumenthal in Iowa; interviewed Mark Steyn; Hannity said HRC's office and HRC's lawyer said she only used one email address;

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Steyn called the people at HRC's roundtables "carefully selected stooges"; Steyn said the press needs to treat HRC like any other candidate; Steyn said he'd love to see Elizabeth Warren run; Steyn said $60,000 of a $1 million donation to The Clinton Foundation goes to benefit Africa while $960,000 of it goes to keep the Clinton machine running; mentioned HRC's $30 million made from speeches; Steyn said people were trying to buy influence by paying HRC to speak; showed HRC's answer in Iowa about her emails; Hannity said they learned today from documents from the defense department and state department that HRC knew the day after the Benghazi attacks who was responsible for Benghazi; reported that Morell thought HRC's email server was hacked. Fox News' Hannity , 5.19.15

-- Led with HRC answering a question about Iraq; showed HRC's answer; compared HRC's answer in Iowa to what she said on Meet the Press in September 2011; showed footage from Scott Walker's Fox News interview with Bret Baier with him talking about HRC's Iraq vote; showed HRC's comment on Ramadi from Iowa; panel with David Axelrod, Joy Reid, and Phyllis Bennis; Axelrod said HRC gave a simple answer to the Iraq question, and the more important question was ~"what did you learn from Iraq?"; Reid said HRC being a woman running for President likely influenced her decision to vote for the Iraq War; shifts into a more general conversation about Iraq. MSNBC's The Last Word With Lawrence O'Donnell , 5.19.15

-- Interviewed John Kasich; Kasich said HRC can absolutely be beaten; Kasich said HRC could not be beaten unless somebody had a big message about how all Americans can rise together. Fox News' The Kelly File , 5.19.15

-- Interviewed Ed Henry; Henry talked about how he stayed in the hotel room across from HRC in Iowa; discussed the Iowa roundtable; discussed his interruption of HRC's roundtable; interviewed Bill Burton; Burton said the Obama administration understood that people outside the Obama White House would send emails to people in the administration; Burton said there was no proof of connection between advice Blumenthal gave and what actually happened at the State Department; Burton said HRC was talking about the American people, and the Republicans were talking about HRC; shifted into interview with Ron Fournier; Fournier said HRC had one, two, maybe more private email accounts; Fournier said HRC is the antonym of transparent, is a rule breaker, and unaccountable; Fournier called HRC's news conference "obnoxious." Fox News' The Kelly File , 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC's comments about Sidney Blumenthal in Iowa; interviewed Trace Gallagher; Gallagher gave an overview of Blumenthal; reported on The New York Times story about Blumenthal; showed HRC's comments about Blumenthal from Iowa; reported Gowdy subpoenaed Blumenthal; said Democrats accused Gowdy of selectively leaking emails; interviewed Howard Kurtz; Kurtz said the Blumenthal story demonstrated the confluence of public interest and The Clinton Foundation. Fox News' The Kelly File , 5.19.15

-- Follow-up story on George Stephanopoulos's failure to disclose he donated to The Clinton Foundation; discussed Stephanopoulos's $105 million contract with ABC; interviewed Bret Hume who said ABC couldn't afford to punish Stephanopoulos; Hume said the difference between Stephanopoulos and other journalists participating in Clinton Foundation events was his history with the Clintons; Hume said Stephanopoulos should go further to disassociate himself from the Clintons. Fox News' The Kelly File , 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC speaking to the press; discussed how HRC said at the beginning of the campaign she would focus on small groups of people; Maddow said this strategy worked because HRC decided to now talk about mental health based on talking to small groups; teased HRC's stops in Florida, Texas, and Missouri; Maddow explained HRC's trip to Texas was at the same time Rick Perry planned to announce his candidacy. MSNBC's The Rachel Maddow Show, 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC's comment that she wants her emails released quickly; used package from Jeff Zeleny; used footage of HRC answering questions about her emails as Secretary of State; mentioned the federal judge's order to the State Department to speed up the process of releasing HRC's emails; shifted into a report on Sidney Blumenthal, used footage of HRC's answer about Blumenthal today; said HRC answered questions today about The Clinton Foundation; used footage of HRC's answer about her Iraq War support; discussed how HRC answered questions about her wealth; shifted into panel with Gloria Borger and Nia-Malika Henderson; Borger said Blumenthal was embarrassing to HRC; Cooper said Blumenthal's emails were like a lobbyist; Henderson said information Blumenthal passed along was often wrong. CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 , 5.19.15

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-- O'Reilly reported HRC used two email addresses as Secretary of State; reported on Blumenthal's involvement with Libya and HRC; O'Reilly said the ongoing drama around HRC was tedious; panel with Richard Goodstein and James Grimaldi; Grimaldi said negative stories about HRC had affected HRC's poll results; Goodstein said there was no indication that negative stories were affecting HRC; Goodstein mentioned that HRC was Gallup's most admired woman in the world for 18 of the last 21 years. Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor , 5.19.15

-- Led with HRC breaking her press silence; reported about HRC's answer about the Iraq War in the context of 2016 candidates answering similar questions; discussed Bush and Rubio's answers; reported HRC was trying to keep her Iraq answer as simple as possible; interviewed Robert Costa and Jess McIntosh; Costa said voters want to hear about Iraq because of the state of the Middle East; most of the discussion is about general candidate answers on Iraq, not particularly about HRC; Chris Hayes said HRC's Libya intervention was not being litigated anywhere; Costa brought up Blumenthal, and Hayes dismissed the comment; Hayes said Democratic opponents could challenge HRC on her support of the Libya intervention. MSNBC's All In With Chris Hayes , 5.19.15

-- Interviewed Nick Confessore about politicians accepting speaking fees; angle is HRC's speaking fees; noted HRC responded to a question about her speaking fees in Iowa; Hayes said it was weirdly honest that HRC said the Clintons just admitted they just wanted to make money from speaking; reported on how the conservative media turned the Clinton Foundation into a super PAC to some people; Hayes notes the Clinton Foundation really does buy mosquito nets for people, said the Foundation is still a charity; Confessore said the Clinton Foundation was like a holding pen for Clinton campaigns. MSNBC's All In With Chris Hayes , 5.19.15

-- Report on Ed Henry's interruption of HRC in Iowa; noted HRC answered press questions; used footage of HRC talking about her email server; interviewed Ed Henry; reported HRC put the onus on the State Department to release her emails; Henry said if HRC wanted to be transparent that she could have released her emails a long time ago; reported HRC was not talking to local media; noted HRC talked to voters after the roundtable and went to small businesses; mentioned David Axelrod's comment from Meet The Press; shifted into panel with Jackie Kucinich and Susan Ferrechio; Kucinich said HRC didn't have any misstep during her press conference; Ferrechio said HRC was talking past the media and the message sounded good. Fox News' On The Record With Greta Van Susteren, 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC's Iraq answer; used footage of HRC's Iraq response from the roundtable; mentioned HRC's answer was similar to what she wrote in Hard Choices; panel with Mike Morell and Susan Page; discussion devolves into Matthews yelling at Morell about Iraq – no more mention of HRC. MSNBC's Hardball With Chris Matthews, 5.19.15 [Part Two]

-- Reported on a federal judge's decision that the State Department must release HRC's emails on a rolling basis; used footage of HRC's comments in Iowa about her emails; Matthews asked Mike Morell whether HRC did everything she could to save Chris Steven's life, Morell said, "I believe so"; Morell said everything that could have been done to save the people at Benghazi was done; Morell said the dustup around Benghazi was political. MSNBC's Hardball With Chris Matthews , 5.19.15

-- Reported on HRC talking to the press; used footage of HRC's comments on her emails from the press conference yesterday; reported about the State Department's announcement it would take until January 2016 to release HRC's emails; noted HRC deleted several emails; conversation with Jeff Zeleny about how HRC self-selected these emails; mentioned HRC printed out all of the emails for the State Department; Zeleny noted that even though HRC was not taking questions from reporters that she was taking them from people in roundtables that "are not unscripted questions and answers"; Zeleny said HRC put email issue to rest for the short term; Zeleny said HRC could not run for President without answering questions; shifted to panel with Brad Woodhouse and Sean Spicer; Woodhouse said only reporters were concerned about HRC not taking press questions, said he was impressed with HRC's campaign; Spicer said HRC is not talking to real voters; Burnett noted the questions were pre-screened; Woodhouse noted that Jeb Bush had a similar system as HRC in Florida, said HRC met her obligation under the law. CNN's Erin Burnett OutFront , 5.19.15

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-- Reported on Ed Henry interrupting HRC's roundtable; Sharpton said neither HRC nor roundtable attendees seemed to take the press interjection seriously; shifted into HRC's Iraq answer; used footage of HRC's Iraq answer yesterday; favorably compared HRC's Iraq answer with Jeb Bush's Iraq answer; shifted into footage of HRC's email answer from yesterday; Sharpton said HRC did not seem afraid to talk about various topics; panel with Shira Center and Angela Rye; Center said HRC answered the Iraq question better than her GOP opponents; Rye applauded HRC for making the media wait for her, said the press conference showed HRC was transparent; teased HRC's events in Texas, Missouri, and Florida; discussion about HRC's comments about restoring voting rights to felons; used footage of HRC's voting rights statements; Sharpton said HRC seemed at ease during the press conference. MSNBC's PoliticsNation With Al Sharpton , 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC speaking to the press; mentioned the Washington Post's counter about how long it had been since HRC spoke to the press; shifted to segment by Ed Henry; Henry said HRC answered questions after some urging from Fox; used footage of HRC responding to Henry; reported about the State Department's lag in producing emails; used footage of HRC discussing her emails in Iowa; said federal judge ordered there to be a timeline on rolling release of emails; said HRC said the emails would show she was a strong secretary; mentioned HRC deleted personal emails and did not release official emails on her own; said there were questions about HRC sharing sensitive information with Blumenthal; reported that Mike Morell said he believed at least one foreign government gained access to her server; used footage of HRC discussing Blumenthal; said Blumenthal was paid by Clinton Foundation; included footage of HRC's answers on the Foundation and her wealth; reported on HRC's answer about the TPP; shifted into segment by James Rosen about HRC's Iraq answer; used footage of HRC answering question about the Iraq War; reported that HRC had previously said she was duped into supporting the Iraq War; used floor footage of HRC in October 2002 discussing her Iraq War decision; reported about Robert Gates allegation in his memoir that HRC admitted to Obama that she supported the war for political reasons; included footage of Joe Trippi discussing HRC's Iraq position; footage of Kirsten Powers talking about HRC's Iraq position; footage of Darrell West saying that HRC has not addressed nuance of the Iraq War; noted that John Cassidy said he could not tell the difference between HRC and Jeb Bush's positions on Iraq. Fox News' Special Report With Bret Baier , 5.19.15

-- Interviewed Scott Walker who questioned what information went out from HRC's private server; questioned why the Clintons believed there was a different standard for them and for everyone else; brought up that WJC accepted money from foreign countries while HRC was Secretary of State. Fox News' Special Report With Bret Baier, 5.19.15

New Hampshire:

-- Report on HRC's private email use. Used footage of Jeff Rathke, State Dept. Press Office Director, who said they're working to release the Benghazi-related emails first. WVNY-BUR Local 22 News , Burlington (VT), 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC's private email use. Noted that Clinton wants the emails released as soon as possible. WFXT-BOS Fox 25 News at 6 , Boston (MA), 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC's private email use. Noted that Clinton wants the emails released as soon as possible. WPTZ-BUR 5:30 Now , Burlington (VT), 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC's private email use. Noted that Clinton wants the emails released as soon as possible. WBIN NH1 News at 5:30pm, Boston (MA), 5.19.15

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-- Report on HRC's private email use. Noted that the emails have been a focus on controversy for HRC. WHDH 7News at 5:30pm, Boston (MA), 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC's private email use. Noted that the January deadline could have serious impacts just ahead of the New Hampshire primary. WBIN NH1 News at 5p.m. , Boston (MA), 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC's private email use. Noted the Republican opponents accused her of using a second private email account while at the State Department. WCAX-BUR Channel 3 News at Five , Burlington (VT), 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC's private email use. Noted that the State Department plans to finish reviewing the emails just before the IA caucus/NH primary. Said in the coming days they plan to release 900 pages regarding Libya and attacks on Benghazi. WHDH-BOS 7News at Noon , Boston (MA), 5.19.15 & WHDH-BOS 7News Today in New England, Boston (MA), 5.19.15

-- Report on Bernie Sander's free public college and university tuition proposal. Reporter noted that the proposal could put added pressure on HRC, who has yet to release any plans for higher education. WPTZ-BUR Newschannel 5 Today @ 6AM

South Carolina:

-- Report on HRC's controversy over funding for CGI. Used footage from yesterday's event in Cedar Falls on CGI. Noted that WaPo said HRC made $11.7m delivering speeches, with over $3m coming from tech companies. Interview with Peter Schweizer, author of "Clinton Cash" who said sources of funding always deserve scrutiny. Report cited National Institute of Labor Relation Research (NILRR) data that CGI received $2m from labor union dues. Wrapped up saying HRC is still soaring in the polls. WCIV-CHS Good Morning Charleston, Charleston (SC), 5.20.15

-- Report on HRC's first South Carolina office opening on Wednesday. Noted that there would be a phone bank tonight and that the office is on Richland Street. Said HRC would be visiting the state next week. WIS News 10 Sunrise, Columbia (SC), 5.20.15

-- Report on HRC's release of emails. Used footage from yesterday's event's press Q&A of HRC answering question about email use. Noted she did not address the use of two private email accounts. WSPA 7 On Your Side at 11pm, Greenville (SC), 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC's release of emails. Used footage from HRC's March event about the emails.WSPA 7 On Your Side at 7pm, Greenville (SC), 5.19.15.

-- Report on HRC's private email use and yesterday's event on small business. Noted that "her team is denying the charges" of her using a second email account. Included interview with Gary Swenson, her Iowa host, who said she is really connecting with voters. Reporter said HRC's press events have been few and far between. Used footage of Lindsey Graham criticizing HRC of not answering questions from press. WSPA 7 On Your Side at 5pm

-- Report on HRC's private email use. Noted Republican opponents accusations of second private email account.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Used footage of HRC's two Iowa events but only discussed emails. WCSC Live 5 News at Noon, Charleston (SC), 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC's release of emails. Used footage from yesterday's event in Cedar Falls but did not mention the event details. WLTX News 19 @ Noon, Columbia (SC), 5.19.15

-- Report on Santorum explaining why he would be a stronger candidate than HRC. WACH Fox Good Day, Columbia (SC), 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC's release of emails. Used footage from HRC's March event about the emails.WHNS Morning News @ 8, Greenville (SC), 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC's first South Carolina office opening on Wednesday. Noted the Columbia office will open with a food bank and HRC will visit the state on May 27th but exact details have not yet been released. WLTX News 19 @ 6am, Columbia (SC), 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC's release of emails. Used footage from HRC's March event about the emails. WIS News 10 Sunrise, Columbia (SC), 5.19.15

-- Report of HRC's release of emails. Noted that "Vice News" requested copies of the emails. WCSC Live 5 News at 5am, Charleston (SC), 5.19.15

Nevada:

-- Review of Cedar Falls round table; reported HRC was "candid" with reporters about releasing emails while Secretary of State; quoted HRC as "wanting those emails out"; State Dept. says could take until January to release emails "just before the Iowa Caucus"; Judge announced those emails should come sooner and in smaller batches; mentioned HRC addressed her wealth, saying "she can still connect with everyday Americans"; reported she expressed regret over the Iraq war; also talked HRC's plans to revive small businesses; quoted HRC that she is proud of what the Clinton Foundation is doing. KVVU-LV FOX 5 News at 11 pm , Las Vegas, NV, 5.19.15

-- Review of Cedar Falls round table remarks; HRC "get's candid" with reporter after they claim she's "snubbing them. KVVU-LV FOX News at 10pm , Las Vegas, NV, 5.19.15

-- Review of Cedar Falls round table; HRC answered questions for "first time in nearly a month" about missing emails from personal account while Secretary of State; Federal judge ordered rolling release of emails; quoted HRC, "I want those emails out…nobody has a bigger interest than I do…"; State Dept. complying with order but may take until January to get them out. KTNV-LV ABC Action News at 6:30pm , Las Vegas, NV. 5.19.15

-- Reported HRC on campaign trail; many of the questions focused on her personal emails while Secretary of State; quoted HRC, "I respect the State Department, they have their process for me, just like anybody else…anything they can do to expedite the process I heartily support"; federal judge rejected State Departments to wait until next January to release 50,000+ emails, ordered the State department to have a plan to release them by May 26. KSNV NBC News at 3 Live at 6:30pm , Las Vegas, NV. 5.19.15

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-- Reported HRC wants State Dept. to speed up release of 55,000 pages of emails; HRC's second day campaigning in Iowa; Judge rejected State Dept. plan to release emails by next January, instead requiring a rolling release; quoted HRC, "They're not mine, they're the State Dept.'s…as much as they can expedite the process that's what I am asking them to do."; It's the first time HRC has taken questions from reporters in nearly a month. KVVU-LV FOX5 News at 5:00pm , Las Vegas, NV. 5.19.15

-- Quoted "I want those emails out…nobody has bigger interest…respect the state dept…"; HRC urging state dept. to release the emails now; HRC "under scrutiny" for using personal email rather than the official one while Secretary of State. KSNV NBC News at 3 Live at 5 pm. Las Vegas, NV. 5.19.15

-- Reported HRC's emails "in the news again" as new questions arise about using private email to handle government business; HRC had second private email account while at the state department; used a campaign stop in Iowa to urge State Dept. to hurry up to release emails; quoted "I want those emails out…nobody has bigger interest…"; but did not address Second private email account; aides say second account only created after she left state dept because email was reported; During business round table at bike shop she addressed reporters for first time in 3 weeks; Republicans noticing her silence; quoting Lindsay Graham, "how can you run for President and not answer a question…"; State Dept. wants to publish them in January but federal judge rejected, giving them a week instead; HRC has admitted to deleting thousands of personal emails but want the rest to be release ASAP. KLAS CBS 8 News Now at 4pm , Las Vegas, NV. 5.19.15

-- Reported State Dept. will make thousands of HRC emails public; center of fire storm after using private server for state department emails; deleted thousands of emails that didn't relate to state dept. business; several Freedom of Information Act lawsuits seeking all Clinton emails. KTNV-LV Action News at 3:30pm , Las Vegas, NV, 5.19.15

-- Reported HRC facing questions about funding she received in the last year and half from paid speeches; opposition asking what will the people who paid her one day ask in return; reported HRC on campaign trail "finally" taking questions from reporters; answered questions about funding received by Clinton Foundation, quoted HRC "proud of the work…"; questions on donations "raked in" over the years; questions about HRC's paid speeches, Washington Post report says she made "almost 12 million dollars for 51 speeches, 3 million from tech. industry,"; Peter Schweizer, author of "Clinton Cash" said donations can be "influence payments,"; over 2 million dollars in Union dues paid to Clinton Foundation; HRC still "plowing ahead" on campaign trail, according to NYT/CBS poll continues to soar in the polls; Lanny Davis, Clinton supporter said, "people care about the issues that affect their lives, families lives"; Reported that Democratic leaders are rallying to her support on emails, quoting Rep. Xavier Becerra, "hopefully the charade will stop,"; with little opposition from the left, scrutiny might be heating up. KSNV NBC News at 3 Live at 3:30pm , Las Vegas, NV, 5.19.15

-- Reported US Dist. Crt. Judge asked St. Dept. to create new schedule for release of emails on rolling basis; St. Dept. responding to Freedom of Information Act lawsuits; Emails have been source of controversy since revealed that HRC used private server to conduct state dept. business. KSNV NBC News at 3 Live at Noon , Las Vegas, NV. 5.19.15

-- Reported State Dept. will wait until January 15, 2016 to release thousands of private emails HRC exchanged while Secretary of State. KVVU-LV Fox 5 News This Morning , Las Vegas, NV, 5.19.15

-- Reported State Dept. will wait until January 15, 2016 to release thousands of emails that HRC exchanged while Secretary of State; quoted HRC that in March she had asked State Dept. to release emails to the public. KSNV NBC Wake Up With the Wagners, Las Vegas, NV, 5.19.15

-- Reported State Dept. will not release emails this year from HRC during her time as Secretary of State until January, in the middle of primary season; emails have been focus of controversy since revealed HRC used

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

private server to conduct official business. KTNV-LV Good Morning Las Vegas at 5am , Las Vegas, NV, 5.19.15

-- Reported HRC's emails will not be revealed until beginning of next year; HRC's emails have been focus of controversy since revealed she used private server to conduct state dept. business; State Dept. responding to Freedom of Information Act lawsuits to have all emails released; HRC said in March she wanted State Dept. to release emails. KLAS-LV 8 News Now at 4am , Las Vegas, NV, 5.19.15

-- Reported HRC said it's the political system that is dysfunctional and she's promising to fix it; started her 2 day tour of Iowa for a meet and greet in the home a gay couple; HRC also spoke about campaign finance and the gap between rich and poor; today will talk about helping small businesses. KTNV LV World News Now , Las Vegas, NV, 5.19.15

-- Reported HRC finally answered questions about private emails sent while Secretary of State; has come under fire for deleting emails she says were personal; State Dept. says 55,000 will all be released but not until January; quoted HRC, "those emails need to get out…"; Federal Judge ordered emails to be released sooner in batches; HRC said no conflict of interest from paid speeches; dismissed criticism that she is "out of touch" after earning over 30 million dollars over the last 16 months. KRNV NBC News 4 at Eleven , Reno, NV, 5.19.15

-- Reported judge ordered State Dept. to come up with schedule to order release of emails on rolling basis; HRC was campaigning in Iowa and said release couldn't come soon enough; Curiosity around HRC after she disclosed she had used private email server; State Dept. had targeted next January for release but judge says needs to be rolling basis every 2 months. KRXI Fox 10pm News , Reno, NV, 5.19.15

-- Reported spotlight on HRC and Foundation for donations raked in over the years; some controversy around paid speeches; new information concerning her compensation…IDENTICAL to KSNV NBC News at 3 Live at 3:30pm, Las Vegas, NV, 5.19.15. See above. This reported from KRNV NBC News 4 at Six , Reno, NV, 5.19.15.

-- Reported HRC urging State Dept. to release emails ASAP; quoted "I want those emails out, nobody has a bigger interest than I do…"; State Dept. schedule to release in January was rejected by a federal judge, given a week to come up with timetable; Reported HRC did not address allegations from the Republican National Committee that she used 2 not 1 private email account; aide said second account only created after her email account was published. KTVN CBS Channel 2 News 5pm , Reno, NV, 5.19.15

-- Reported HRC answered questions from reporters for the first time in "nearly a month"; HRC discussed missing State Dept. emails same day Federal Judge ordered sped up timeline; Jeff Rathke, State Dept. Spokesman, "we take our legal obligations very seriously…"; HRC wants State Dept. to act sooner, "anything they can do to expedite process…"; HRC addressed that she and her husband had made over 25 million dollars in the past year and a half delivering paid speeches, quoted HRC, "Bill and I have been blessed…"; HRC spoke after event that focused on small businesses where she asked questions but mostly listened; Quoted Rick Klein, ABC News Political Director, "Clinton is calculating more bad things will happen then good things when she talks to the press, she tries to avoid whenever possible"; Other candidates are noticing, and might push HRC to change strategy. KOLO ABC 8 News , Reno, NV, 5.19.15

-- Reported State Dept. will wait until January to release HRC's emails; State Dept. is responding to Freedom of Information Act lawsuits to have those emails released; in a bid to "defuse" the crisis ahead of the Presidential election HRC said in March that she wanted the emails released ASAP. KOLO ABC KOLO 8 Midday at 11am , Reno, NV, 5.19.15

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-- Reported HRC just wants emails made public; they are not her's, but instead are the State Dept.'s; HRC addressed the issue following an event in Iowa; Federal Judge rejected State Dept.'s plan to release portion of emails, instead must release faster and in smaller batches. KSL-SLC NBC 5 News at 5 , Salt Lake City, UT, 5.19.15

-- Reported HRC answers questions from the press on the same day that a Federal judge ordered a revised timetable for release of emails. KTVX-SLC ABC 4 Utah News at 4:00pm , Salt Lake City, Utah, 5.19.15

-- Reporters in back-in-forth with one another, said, "do you remember HRC's pant suits?" "Yes." "do you remember the email scandal?" replied "hard to forget!"; Reported state dept. will wait until next January to release emails, responding to Freedom of Information lawsuits; emails have been focus of controversy since revealed using private server to do state dept. business; in an effort to calm controversy in March, quoted HRC as asking state dept. to release those emails; won't happen until January of 2016; female reporter notes this might backfire on her because the emails would be forgotten by January, only to be revived as an issue when released. KUTV-SLC CBS News The Refresh , Salt Lake City, Utah, 5.19.15

-- Reported HRC wanted emails released ASAP but will have to wait until January; Vice News requested emails under the Freedom of Information Act; HRC was scheduled to testify for the House Select Committee on Benghazi today but Chair said they will not call HRC to testify until they have received all relevant documents including some of HRC's emails; State Dept. says sheer volume of emails and review time required is reason for delay and will take until January, "a year after they were supposed to be released." KSL-SLC KSL 5 News at Noon, Salt Lake City, Utah, 5.19.15

-- Reported State Dept. will wait until January to release thousands of HRC's emails to the public; Emails have been center of controversy since revealed she used private server to conduct state dept. business; in effort to defuse crisis ahead of 2016 campaign, HRC said she wants the emails to be release ASAP. KTVX-SLC ABC 4 Utah News Mid-day, Salt Lake City, Utah, 5.19.15

-- Reported that thousand of HRC's emails won't be released until January of next year; state dept. is responding to an umber of Freedom of Information Act lawsuits; emails became controversial after revelations that HRC used private server to conduct state dept. business. KSTU-SLC FOX 13 News Live at 11 , Salt Lake city, Utah, 5.19.15

-- Reported State Dept. will wait until next January to release HRC's emails; has been a source of controversy since revealed that HRC used private server to do state dept. business; HRC has asked state dept. to release emails ASAP; state dept. will release emails Jan. 15. KUTV-SLC CBS 2 News This Morning , Salt Lake City, Utah, 5.19.15

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sarah Stephens" <sarah@democracyinamericas.org>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 4/25/2014 10:53:03 AM
Subject: Wise Use of Executive Authority Could Navigate Obama off the 404 page

April 25, 2014

Dear Friends:

Thanks to ZunZuneo, President Obama has tweeted his Cuba policy into an Error 404 page.

Just this week, ZunZuneo rattled Roots of Hope, a non-profit that professed distance from government-funded "democracy promotion" programs, when the Associated Press exposed the role played by some of its leaders in the Cuban Twitter project.

It rankled Costa Rica after the AP reported that a USAID manager stationed in San Jose played a role in supervising the project, dragging a staunch U.S. ally which respects Cuba's sovereignty into the regime change row.

And it continued to roil press relations with the State Department, where Jen Psaki, the spokesperson, was still telling reporters that USAID had not yet finished reviewing the tweets ZunZuneo sent to Cubans to determine their political content three weeks after the scandal broke.

The 2012 election should have freed the president's hand. But, after the President vanquished former Gov. Romney - who famously said in Florida, "If I'm fortunate enough to become the next president, it is my expectation that Fidel Castro will finally be taken off this planet" - his Cuba policy is staggering under the weight of a really dumb program that he inherited from his predecessor.

How can the president navigate back? He should use his authority to revive his Cuba policy in ways that demonstrate his leadership and understanding of the post-Cold War world.

Take Cuba off the State Sponsors of Terror List. President Reagan listed Cuba for political reasons, and politics is the only justification for why it remains falsely accused and heavily penalized.

Even though the Department explains the list by saying, "the Secretary of State must determine that the government of such country has repeatedly provided support for acts of international terrorism," the report it issued last year read like a concise statement for Cuba's exoneration.

It said, Cuba distanced itself from Basque terrorists. It changed from offering safe haven to some members of the FARC to hosting peace talks between it and Colombia's government. The report even said, "There was no indication that the Cuban government provided weapons or paramilitary training to terrorist groups." The sole criticism it contained -- that Cuba harbors fugitives wanted in the United States -- is not a condition for including any country on the terror list.

Above politics, there are a number of compelling reasons - all in the U.S. national interest - for the President to remove Cuba from the terror list, and some urgency for him to take this step now.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Reconsider the sentences of the remaining members of the Cuban Five. This week, the New York Times endorsed a decision by the U.S. Department of Justice to reinvigorate the clemency power of the executive branch with this reminder.

Throughout American history, presidents from Abraham Lincoln to Harry Truman to Gerald Ford have used the power of executive clemency to help bring an end to war, or to promote national healing in its aftermath.

This brings us - and ought to bring the President - to the case of the Cuban Five, "now in their fifteenth year in prison for conducting espionage operations, mostly against exile groups with violent pasts," as Peter Kornbluh explained in the Nation last year.

Although its negotiating position has shifted over the years, it has long been clear that the Cuban government will negotiate for the release of imprisoned U.S. contractor Alan Gross so long as its "humanitarian concerns" for these prisoners are also met.

Since his arrest in 2009, the U.S. government has fecklessly called for Mr. Gross's unconditional release, despite his conviction in a Cuban court for activities our government knew were illegal before he was sent to Cuba under a USAID regime change program.

As recently as this month, Secretary of State John Kerry , in testimony before Congress, rejected a prisoner swap because it implies Cuba's spies and Mr. Gross were engaged in equivalent activities (a debatable notion in itself).

Worse, it is the position of hardline Members of Congress that the U.S. should not negotiate with Cuba to obtain his release because Cuba is listed as a state-sponsor of terror (see above).

While his government offers pat explanations for what it won't do to affect his release, Mr. Gross was plain-spoken in telling his attorney darkly, "His 65th birthday, which occurs on May 2, will be the last birthday that he celebrates in Havana."

Deputy Attorney General James Cole , explaining the administration's commutation policy, wrote, "It is important to remember that commutations are not pardons. They are not exonerations. They are not an expression of forgiveness." He could have been writing the script for a Presidential determination to free the Cuban spies in exchange for Alan Gross.

The President will be hard to move on this exercise of his executive authority. But, make no mistake; an action by the President to approve commutations for the remaining Cuban Five prisoners would not just enable Mr. Gross to celebrate his 66th birthday at home, but free his administration to pursue more effectively all of his Cuba policy goals.

The big enchilada is Helms-Burton. Our final point, though it might be hard to imagine, is that the President should be honing the argument for reclaiming the authority of his office to recognize Cuba, an authority that was seemingly taken away by passage of the Helms-Burton law.

On Monday, the U.S. Supreme Court announced it will consider a case that bears directly on this point. It concerns a law enacted by Congress that requires the State Department to treat Jerusalem as the capital of Israel for the purposes of issuing passports. At stake is the larger constitutional principle of whether the President has the exclusive right to recognize the sovereignty of another country.

The U.S. Court of Appeals sides with presidential power and against the Congress in a decision it issued last year. Its decision can be read in its entirety here . But, the conclusion by the Court is unmistakable:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Having reviewed the Constitution's text and structure, Supreme Court precedent and longstanding post-ratification history, we conclude that the President exclusively holds the power to determine whether to recognize a foreign sovereign."

Should the Supreme Court affirm the appellate court ruling, its decision will loosen the grip of Congress on the core issue of Cuba policy - whether the U.S. will shift its focus from overthrowing the Castro government to letting Cubans decide their own future by themselves.

Letting the Cubans lead, rather than forcing them to tweet, would be a proud moment for the President, unless he prefers hearing the tweet of the hummingbird that brought him to 404.

This week in Cuba news...

U.S.-CUBA RELATIONS

- Costa Rica demands answers from U.S. on ZunZuneo
- Alan Gross plans to return to U.S. 'one way or the other'; Cuba says relations will not improve until U.S. addresses Gross's intentions in Cuba
- USAID grant to Open Technology Institute for Cuba Wi-Fi project 'under review'; U.S. looks to train Cubans in entrepeneurship
- Cuban-American NGO played role in USAID's "Cuban Twitter"
- Dutch company to pay $5.9 million OFAC fine
- Cuba Travel Services to offer additional Cuba flights

CUBA'S FOREIGN RELATIONS

- Cuba to receive nearly $50 million from OPEC for water infrastructure
- Cuba considering debt deal with Paris Club
- President Castro meets with China's Foreign Minister; Russian senators to visit Cuba this week

IN CUBA

- Cuban Commission on Culture and Media presses government for speedier reforms
- Former MLB All-Star dies in Cuba

Recommended Reading

- From the Bay of Pigs to the 'Bay of Tweets' , Sarah Stephens, Huffington Post
- The United States and Cuba Should Play Ball , Reps. David Bonior and Tom Downey, Roll Call
- Coming soon, a spring thaw with Cuba? , Rafael Hernández, Los Angeles Times
- Cuba's Emerging Entrepeneurs: Update One Year On , Richard Feinberg, Brookings Institution
- Makers of political decisions can save people from amputation , Lisandra Díaz Padrón, Progreso Weekly

Recommended Viewing

- Cuban Artist Tomás Sánchez Shows Works in Cuba after 27 Years , Irina Icharry, The Havana Times

Interested in traveling to Cuba? Travel with CDA!

Since 2001, the Center for Democracy in the Americas (CDA) has been organizing delegations of travelers to visit Cuba to experience the island first-hand.

These trips, which we primarily offer to Members of Congress and various groups of policy experts, provide a truly unique experience, introducing travelers to our diverse range of contacts and friends, including artists, academics, entrepreneurs, musicians, journalists, and Cubans from all walks of life.

Right now, CDA is organizing a people-to-people delegation which will travel from June 1st to the 6th. There are just a few spaces left, and we are hoping that readers of our news blast would like to fill them! If you are interested in seeing Cuba first-hand, please email Vivian Ramos at vivian@democracyinamericas.org ASAP.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

U.S.-CUBA RELATIONS

Costa Rica demands answers from U.S. on ZunZuneo

Costa Rica's government has asked the Obama Administration to explain why the U.S. pursued work on the ZunZuneo program in that country despite warnings in 2009 that it would cause political problems, reports the AP .

In 2009, Costa Rica's Foreign Ministry told the U.S. embassy that the project could create "political difficulties" for Costa Rica. An internal Foreign Ministry memorandum written by Javier Sancho Bonilla, protocol and state ceremonial director, said that it "could create a situation politically inconvenient since it can be interpreted that it would violate the principle of non-intervention in the internal affairs of other countries."

On April 4th, the day after the Associated Press broke the ZunZuneo story, Costa Rica's Foreign Ministry requested an explanation, reports La Nación . Foreign Minister Enrique Castillo wrote: "It does not seem correct to the Ministry that Embassies should engage in actions from Costa Rica that affect another country. We cannot approve this, not in any case. This is unacceptable." Communications Minister Carlos Roverssi said that Costa Rica "officially asked the government of the United States to clarify the facts exactly as they have been denounced," adding that "The government of the Republic was not aware of this."

According to La Nación , the U.S. Embassy in Costa Rica requested permission from Costa Rica's government to operate a "Latin American Exchange Program" (PILA) in 2009, "to increase communication and exchanges in Cuba and throughout Latin America and the Caribbean, including Costa Rica." According to the report, the requests failed to mention the ZunZuneo project. Costa Rica denied permission to the U.S., rejecting accreditation for two Creative Associates contractors. Nonetheless, according to the report, the program operated in Costa Rica for over a year. The U.S. Embassy denies this claim, saying it does not have any record of a rejection from Costa Rica's government.

U.S. State Department Spokesperson Jen Psaki, acknowledged receipt of a diplomatic inquiry from Costa Rica after the AP broke the story, and said that "In the following days, embassy staffers have reached out to their Ministry of Foreign Affairs counterparts on multiple occasions about the issue and those conversations have been ongoing." An April 7 blog post from USAID spokesman Matt Herrick says that the AP investigation "suggests there was an inappropriate base of operations established in Costa Rica outside of normal U.S. government procedures," but said that the "government of Costa Rica was informed of the program on more than one occasion."

Alan Gross plans to return to U.S. 'one way or the other' ; Cuba says relations will not improve until U.S. addresses Gross's intentions in Cuba

Scott Gilbert, the lawyer for Alan Gross, a former USAID subcontractor who has been jailed in Cuba for over four years, said Gross plans to return to the U.S. before May 2015, reports Miami Herald .Gilbert told MSNBC:

> "[Gross] told me yesterday emphatically that May 2, which marks his 65th birthday, will be the last birthday that he marks in Cuba, one way or the other.... Alan means that he does not intend to endure another year of this solitary confinement and that he will return to the United States before his 66th birthday, dead or alive."

Jen Psaki, State Department spokeswoman, told reporters that U.S. officials discuss the Gross case indirectly with interlocutors who have ties to Cuba, neither confirming nor denying that direct talks with Cuba on Gross have continued. Gilbert met with Cuba's Foreign Minister Bruno Rodríguez Wednesday and confirmed that no ongoing discussions between the U.S. and Cuba on Gross are taking place.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rodríguez stated, Cuba "is interested in meeting with officials from the United States at the highest levels of both governments to discuss the release of Alan Gross with no preconditions." Gilbert told MSNBC:

> "Our message, really, is to ... President Obama. Please engage on this issue. ...Sit down with the Cuban government. Try to reach a resolution. Do what you can do to bring Alan Gross back to his country. Make serving your government in a foreign country mean something."

Capital News Service reports that representatives from the Cuban Interests Section said in remarks at American University that until the U.S. fully acknowledges and addresses Gross's intentions in Cuba, relations between the countries will not improve. First Secretary Warnel Lores Mora of the Cuban Interests Section said:

> "We want Internet. The United States denies us the possibility to connect from Florida, 90 miles away ... they prefer to waste the money for secret programs than provide us with the capability...There is a great hypocrisy in the policy."

USAID grant to Open Technology Institute for Cuba Wi-Fi project 'under review'; U.S. looks to train Cubans in entrepreneurship

A program approved and financed by the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID) to develop technology for a Wi-Fi network in Cuba is now under review, reports Miami Herald. The grant for this project was assigned in 2012 to the Open Technology Institute (OTI -- not to be confused USAID's Office of Transition Initiatives).

OTI, the grantee, is a part of the New America Foundation, which also includes the U.S.-Cuba Policy Initiative. The director of this New America Foundation project, Anya Landau-French, opposed OTI's decision to apply for the USAID grant.

This technology nicknamed "Commotion" was intended to advance USAID's "democracy promotion" efforts in Cuba by creating a mesh network, a local network made up of antennas and routers that communicate with each other. The project gained attention after it was mentioned in a New York Times feature about similar endeavors in Tunisia. The news follows recent revelations about other USAID projects on the island, namely the ZunZuneo "fake Twitter," an SMS service that obtained Cubans' phone numbers without their permission, and without informing them that the service was a project of the U.S. government. That program intended to reel in users with non-political content, and follow by sending political messages designed to stir unrest on the island.

USAID spokesperson Matt Herrick stated that USAID is "looking into [Commotion], to see if it's consistent with the [OTI] proposal and achieves expected outcomes." He also stated that Commotion "is not operational in Cuba" and that no one has traveled to Cuba for the project. The grant runs through September 30, 2015. According to the Times, USAID has pledged $4.3 million to create mesh networks in Cuba.

The article reports that USAID launched a similar network in Tunisia with the approval of municipal authorities. The network was started by some of the same individuals who helped overthrow Tunisian President Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali in 2011. According to the report, "It is clear that the United States sees Sayada [Tunisia town] as a test of the concept before it is deployed in more contested zones."

In related news, the independent journalist Tracey Eaton reports that the Broadcasting Board of Governors, which oversees Radio and TV Martí, is seeking firms capable of "developing and producing specialized Spanish language multimedia programming specifically designed for broadcast to Cuba." The BBG is most interested in firms that have previously produced programming in Cuba focused on entrepreneurship and profiles of artistic individuals or groups living in Cuba.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cuban-American NGO played role in USAID's "Cuban Twitter"

Leaders of the Cuban-American youth organization Roots of Hope provided support for the U.S. government's secret "Cuban Twitter" ZunZuneo program , serving as paid consultants and connecting contractors with potential investors in order to shift the program into private hands, the Associated Press reports. Roots of Hope itself was initially approached by federal contractors to invest, but the idea was dropped. Two members of its board of directors - Chris Gueits and Raul Moas - worked as consultants for the government program despite Roots of Hope's explicit refusal to accept U.S. government funding.

Past projects by Roots of Hope include work to give Cubans cell phones and USB flash drives, as well as collaborations with Cuban blogger Yoani Sánchez.

Dutch company to pay $5.9 million OFAC fine

CWT B.V., a prominent Dutch travel company, will pay a $5.9 million fine to the U.S. Treasury Department's Office of Foreign Assets Control (OFAC) for violations of the U.S. embargo against Cuba, reports The Wall Street Journal . According to the Miami Herald, the company violated sanctions by providing travel services to 44,430 people to and from Cuba between 2006 and 2012, after becoming majority-owned by U.S. entities.

The fine is one of the largest assigned to a travel company by the U.S. government for embargo violations and is part of a pattern of increasingly stringent enforcement. In a recent analysis of Cuba's new foreign investment law, David Jessop speculates about the U.S. government's motives:

> "Although many pressures still surround the process of US economic re-engagement it is clear that US business is acutely aware of the potential opportunity now opening up. This seems to have spawned an increasingly aggressive approach on the part of the US Treasury which by placing pressure on the international banking system and individuals in Europe and elsewhere to reserve the future Cuban market for US business alone."

Cuba Travel Services to offer additional Cuba flights

Cuba Travel Services has announced that it will offer direct flights from Miami to Holguín, Cuba beginning in June. Cuba Travel Services already provides direct flights from Miami to five Cuban cities - Havana, Cienfuegos, Camagüey, Santa Clara and Santiago de Cuba. The new route will launch on June 5th.

Carlos Alzugaray, former head of Cuba's mission to the European Union, says that ties between Cubans on the island and in the U.S. "have never been so diverse or so rich," reports AFP . As we reported last week , the U.S. granted 19,500 visas to Cubans for family, professional, and business visits during the first half of the current fiscal year. More than 90% of visas granted during this period were five-year, multiple-entry visas, which the U.S. began offering to Cubans in August 2013.

In the first trimester of 2014 , approximately 173,550 U.S. travelers visited Cuba, according to a report by the U.S.-based Havana Consulting Group. This figure includes Cuban Americans as well as other travelers taking part in legal categories of travel to the island, such as people-to-people trips.

CUBA'S FOREIGN RELATIONS

Cuba to receive nearly $50 million from OPEC for water infrastructure

The Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) Fund for International Development (OFID) will grant nearly $50 million in loans for water rehabilitation projects in Cuba over the next two years, reports Cuba Standard . The funding will support Cuba's ongoing water infrastructure rehabilitation program. OFID has provided Cuba with low-interest loans to support various sectors since 2002.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cuba considering debt deal with Paris Club

Western diplomats say Cuba may reach a debt agreement with the Paris Club, an informal grouping of nineteen creditor governments that includes Russia, Germany, the UK, Switzerland, Japan, and the U.S., reports Reuters . According to the diplomats, the Paris Club sent a delegation to Havana at the end of 2013 to present proposals to Cuban officials, who were receptive. The officials discussed a possible combination of debt forgiveness, a 10-year payment plan, and debt swaps.

According to the Paris Club, Cuba's debt in 2012 was $35.5 billion. Establishing the exact figure will be part of the negotiations, and will take into account Russia's deal with Cuba in 2013 which wrote off 90% of Cuba's $32 billion debt to the Soviet Union. The Club reportedly maintains a working group on Cuba that excludes the U.S. Reaching a deal would reduce Cuba's debt and facilitate the acquisition of new international loans, according to Reuters.

Cuba's national debt figures are not public. Moody's, the financial services company based in New York, dropped Cuba's credit rating on Wednesday from Caa1 to Caa2, citing risks associated with the instability in the island's oil supply from Venezuela and the potential for "an abrupt and disorderly political transition," reports AFP .

After the fall of the Soviet Union, Cuba defaulted on its debt while reeling from the economic effects of losing its biggest trading partner as it was still subject to the U.S. embargo. Talks with the Paris Club were opened in 1999 and were placed indefinitely on hold in 2001.

The Paris Club proposed the resumption of talks with Cuba in 2011 , following Cuba's stated intentions to address its international debt. The Guidelines passed at the 2011 Communist Party Conference include a push to "enhance Cuba's credibility in its international economic relations by strictly observing all the commitments that have been entered into," and to introduce "flexible restructuring strategies for debt payment."

President Castro meets with China's Foreign Minister; Russian senators to visit Cuba this week

On Sunday, President Raúl Castro met with China's Foreign Minister, Wang Yi, report Granma and Progreso Weekly . According to their statement, the officials "analyzed a broad bilateral agenda, the preparations for the official visit of President Xi Jinping, and aspects of the international situation that are of mutual interest." Wang is preparing for China's President Xi Jinping's Latin America tour that will begin in July. Wang also met with former President Fidel Castro and Cuba's Foreign Minister, Bruno Rodríguez.

Russian senators of the Federation Council of the Federal Assembly plan to meet with top Cuban officials this week, reports Progreso Weekly . The delegation will be led by the chairman of the Assembly's Committee on Rules and Organization, Vadim Albertovich Tulpanov. In addition to meeting with officials, they plan to tour joint Russian-Cuban engineering enterprises and discuss the development of tourism infrastructure and tourism exchange.

IN CUBA

Cuban Commission on Culture and Media presses government for speedier reforms

Cuba's Commission on Culture and Media published a report Friday pressing the government to push forward with reforms of its television and film industry, reports AFP . The report concludes that these industries suffer from:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

> "a shortage of funding, poor leadership, disorganization and a lack of discipline. ... Cuba's television system is urged to make structural and productive changes, in keeping with the current reality in the rest of the country."

The report proposes reforms that include the creation of outlets not under state control. It was released following a recent meeting of Cuba's Union of Writers and Artists, or UNEAC.

Former MLB All-Star dies in Cuba

Cuban baseball star Connie Marrero passed away in Havana on Wednesday at age 102, reports The New York Times . He was the oldest living former Major League Baseball player. Marrero first joined the U.S. Major Leagues in 1950 at age 38, and became a pitching sensation. He eventually returned to Cuba. He told NPR:

> "I'm Cuban, and I came back to my homeland, to the place I was born. I wish our countries could be united again, just like the way they used to be."

Dan Whittle, director of the Environmental Defense Fund's Cuba program, recounts the story of a recent interview with Marrero, reflecting that the former all-star's story serves as a reminder:

> "that U.S.--Cuba relations were once as close as the sliver of saltwater that separates the two nations, and should be so again. This is important for both countries, which, despite five decades of political stalemate, share much more than a love of baseball."

Recommended Reading

From the Bay of Pigs to the 'Bay of Tweets' , Sarah Stephens, Huffington Post

In a Huffington Post column, CDA's director, Sarah Stephens, links revelations of covert actions like the Bay of Pigs to USAID's Twitter-like program, ZunZuneo. She writes, "Fifty-three years later, the United States is still trying to overthrow Cuba's government, and still misusing the dark arts of secrecy and deniability to obscure the facts; with consequences so familiar, it is as if a new generation of public officials has risen to power ignorant of their country's history."

The United States and Cuba Should Play Ball , Reps. David Bonior and Tom Downey, Roll Call

Representatives David Bonior (MI-12) and Tom Downey (NY-2) reflect on their recent visit to Cuba, arguing that it is time for great engagement between the two nations. Bonior and Downey encourage president Obama to take steps to "ease travel and open opportunities for the private sector" because sanctions against Cuba have only "hamper[ed] the success of the very type of market reforms that the embargo was supposed to bring about."

Coming soon, a spring thaw with Cuba? , Rafael Hernández, Los Angeles Times

Rafael Hernández, editor of the Cuban periodical Temas, makes the case for greater engagement by the U.S. with Cuba, on issues ranging from the island's new role in the regional economy, to the historic concerns of the U.S. with human rights. He says, "Dialogue and discreet diplomacy - what the Canadians call 'constructive engagement' - have functioned better than external pressure toward Cuba. The Vatican and the European Union , which could hardly be suspected of sympathizing with the Cuban government, can bear witness to that approach."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cuba's Emerging Entrepreneurs: Update One Year On , Richard Feinberg, Brookings Institution

Richard Feinberg, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, returned to Cuba to check in with the entrepreneurs he interviewed for his 2013 work "Soft Landing in Cuba? Emerging Entrepreneurs and Middle Classes."

Makers of political decisions can save people from amputation , Lisandra Díaz Padrón, Progreso Weekly

Lisandra Díaz Padrón interviews Jorge Berlanga, "the father of Heberprot-P", the breakthrough treatment for foot ulcers associated with diabetes. U.S. sanctions against Cuba prevent the sale of Heberprot-P in the U.S.

Recommended Viewing

Cuban Artist Tomás Sánchez Shows Works in Cuba after 27 Years , Irina Icharry, The Havana Times

Irina Icharry profiles Tomás Sánchez, a Cuban artist who recently presented his first exposition on the island in 27 years.

Until next time,

The Cuba Central Team

DONATE NOW THROUGH Network for Good

Like our work? Consider a monthly donation!

The Cuba Central Newsblast is produced by the Center for Democracy in the Americas (CDA). CDA is devoted to changing U.S. policy toward Cuba and the other countries of the Americas by basing our relations on mutual respect, fostering dialogue with those governments and movements with which U.S. policy is at odds, and recognizing positive trends in democracy and governance. For more information, check out the CDA website . You can also like us on Facebook or follow us on Twitter .

© 2014 Center for Democracy in the Americas. All rights reserved.

Forward email

SafeUnsubscribe

Trusted Email from Constant Contact Try it FREE today.

This email was sent to john.podesta@gmail.com by sarah@democracyinamericas.org | Update Profile/Email Address | Instant removal with SafeUnsubscribe ™ | Privacy Policy .

Center for Democracy in the Americas | PO Box 53106 NW | Washington | DC | 20009

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jesse Ferguson" <jferguson@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Josh Schwerin" <joshschwerin@gmail.com>
HRCrapid@googlegroups.com
Date: 4/14/2015 11:39:47 AM
Subject: RE: POLITICO Breaking News

If anyone needs this….

[BACKGROUND/NO QUOTE]

Hillary Clinton has tapped three heavyweights to lead the policy team on her campaign in the roles of senior policy advisors – Maya Harris, Ann O'Leary, and Jake Sullivan

The three of them will handle Clinton's domestic and foreign policy portfolios, and each brings a well-respected and broad set of experiences to her campaign.

She started a policy process last fall to review solutions to the challenges she identified as she was considering whether to run for President or not.

Once her May "Ramp Up" period is concluded, she will begin unveiling some of her policy prescriptions.

Maya Harris, Senior Policy Advisor

Most recently was Senior Fellow at the Center for American Progress

Previously Vice President of Democracy, Rights and Justice at the Ford Foundation, where she led a global team in investing over $750 million to promote effective governance, increase democratic participation, and protect human rights.

Harris was also the Executive Director of the ACLU of Northern California, the nation's largest ACLU affiliate, where she led the organization in its litigation, public education, advocacy and grassroots organizing efforts.

After receiving her bachelor's degree from the University of California at Berkeley and law degree from Stanford Law School, Harris practiced law as a civil litigator.

While in private practice, she also taught law school as an adjunct professor at U.C. Hastings College of the Law and Lincoln Law School of San Jose. Lincoln's Board of Trustees subsequently recruited Harris to serve as Dean and Chief Executive Officer, making her one of the nation's youngest law school deans at age 29. Harris later joined PolicyLink, where she conducted research and policy advocacy on community policing issues.

Ann O'Leary, Senior Policy Advisor

Most recently was senior vice president and director of the children and families program at Next Generation;

Previously, O'Leary served as executive director of the Berkeley Center on Health, Economic & Family Security Program at the Chief Justice Earl Warren Institute on Law and Social Policy;

From 2001 to 2003 as legislative director for Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton. Prior to that, O'Leary served in a number of positions in the Clinton Administration, including as special assistant to the President in the Domestic Policy Council, policy advisor to the First Lady, and senior policy advisor to the Secretary of Education.

O'Leary serves on the boards of KQED and the East Bay Community Law Center; she previously served on the Obama-Biden Transition Team, where she advised the incoming Administration on early childhood education.

Jake Sullivan, Senior Policy Advisor

Jake Sullivan is a Visiting Lecturer in Law, the Oscar M. Ruebhausen Distinguished Visiting Lecturer in National Security at Yale Law School, and a Jackson Senior Fellow at Yale's Jackson Institute for Global Affairs.

Until 2014 he served as a national security adviser to Vice President Joe Biden.

He previously served as Director of Policy Planning at the U.S. Department of State and as deputy chief of staff to Secretary of State Hillary Clinton. He was deputy policy director on Hillary Clinton's 2008 presidential primary campaign, and a member of the debate preparation team for Barack Obama's general election campaign.

He clerked for Judge Stephen Breyer of the Supreme Court of the United States and Judge Guido Calabresi of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. Sullivan holds undergraduate and law degrees from Yale and a master's degree from Oxford.

From: hrcrapid@googlegroups.com [mailto:hrcrapid@googlegroups.com] On Behalf Of Josh Schwerin
Sent: Tuesday, April 14, 2015 6:33 PM
To: HRCrapid@googlegroups.com
Subject: Fwd: POLITICO Breaking News

---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: POLITICO Breaking News <breakingnews@politico.com >

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Date: Tue, Apr 14, 2015 at 6:31 PM
Subject: POLITICO Breaking News
To: Joshschwerin@gmail.com

Hillary Clinton has named three senior policy advisers to lead the development of an agenda for her presidential campaign. The team leaders are: Maya Harris, a former senior fellow at the Center for American Progress; Ann O'Leary, a former legislative director to Clinton when she was in the Senate; and Jake Sullivan, a top aide to Clinton while she was Secretary of State and a former national security adviser to Vice President Joe Biden.

The announcement is an early indication of the policy themes Clinton is likely to emphasize as she launches her campaign. Harris has a background in human rights, while O'Leary specializes in early childhood education and headed the children and families program at Next Generation, the Tom Steyer-funded advocacy group.

Sullivan, meanwhile, was a key player in laying the groundwork for the talks that led to the Obama administration's tentative agreement on Iran's nuclear program.

For more information... http://www.politico.com

==========
To unsubscribe, http://dyn.politico.com/unsubscribe.cfm?email=Joshschwerin@gmail.com&uuid=6FFBAF86-1C23-CEB9-142F6C4BD9157C74&alertID=1
==========

--
Josh Schwerin
Cell: 518-369-5469

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
To view this discussion on the web visit https://groups.google.com/d/msgid/hrcrapid/CAL3dchgcJ0Vbij6F%3D1j0diQ%3DwzNsAcJzYDW3U7KnhyAHg9muLg%40mail.gmail.com.
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
To view this discussion on the web visit https://groups.google.com/d/msgid/hrcrapid/9fa94ef420e24e913e367784bc2271d0%40mail.gmail.com.
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: David.Willett@Sierraclub.org
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 6/20/2008 1:59:57 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Sierra Club Endorses Obama for President

For Immediate Release
June 20, 2008

Contact:
David Willet, 202-675-6698
Josh Dorner, 202-679-7570 (m)

Sierra Club Endorses Obama for President
Joins United Steelworkers, Senator Brown in Call for Clean Energy Future

Cleveland, OH: With a giant wind turbine representing America's clean energy future as a backdrop, the Sierra Club and United Steelworkers today jointly endorsed Barack Obama as the change America needs.

Carl Pope, the Executive Director of the Sierra Club, America's largest grassroots environmental organization, Leo Gerard, the leader of America's largest industrial union, and,Ohio Senator Sherrod Brown highlighted the stakes in this year's election

"We believe Senator Obama is the change our nation needs - he is the change we need, the leader who will put America on the path to a clean energy economy that will create and keep millions of jobs, spur innovation and opportunity, make us a more secure nation, and help us solve global warming," said Pope.

"The Sierra Club and the United Steelworkers are standing together in support of Barack Obama because we all share the common goal of putting America back to work by building a clean energy economy," said Leo Gerard, International President of the United Steelworkers.

"Our endorsement today marks the beginning of a massive mobilization of thousands of members around the country for the campaign-on the phone, on the ground, on the airwaves and online, spreading the message that as President, Barack Obama will lead America into the clean energy future and that we support his plan to solve both our economic challenges and the challenge of global warming at the same time," said Allison Chin, President of the Sierra Club.

Senator Obama's plan will help heal America's economy and environment:

* Senator Obama has presented a bold and comprehensive plan for addressing climate change that relies on what the world's scientists have told us needs to be done. His plan includes a "cap and auction" system that would cut our carbon dioxide emissions 80 percent below 1990 levels by 2050.

* His plan requires the polluters pay for the global warming pollution they emit, invests the money generated from the credits polluters would have to buy into clean energy, green jobs and aid for the lowest-income Americans affected by higher energy costs.

* His calls for 25 percent of U.S. electricity to come from renewable sources by 2025, and for improving energy efficiency in the U.S. 50 percent by 2030 would create tens of thousands of jobs in growing industries while at the same time saving the amount Americans would have to spend on energy bills.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Barack Obama has said, 'Change is an energy policy that puts a price on pollution and makes the oil companies invest their record profits in clean, renewable sources of energy that will create millions of new jobs and leave our children a safer planet.' We really could not have said it better ourselves. And that is why he is our candidate and we will do everything in our power to help elect him the next president of the United States," said Pope.

A sample of other high points of Senator Obama's environmental platform.

*Opposes destructive oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge and on fragile coasts.
*Opposes the storage of nuclear waste at the Yucca Mountain repository being built in southern Nevada.
*Promises to restore environmental protections that the Bush administration rolled back by executive order.
*Calls for tougher pollution regulations on factory farms or concentrated animal-feeding operations (CAFOs).
*Primary cosponsor of the Lead Poisoning Reduction Act, which aims to protect children from toxic lead poisoning.
Sierra Club was also an early backer of State Senator Barack Obama in the Democratic Primary for his run to the U.S. Senate, basing our endorsement on "his strong record of support for clean air, wetlands protection, and clean energy."

###

David Willett
National Press Secretary
Sierra Club
(202) 675-6698 (w)
(202) 491-6919 (m)
david.willett@sierraclub.org www.sierraclub.org

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>
To:	"Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>
Date:	2/9/2015 7:07:01 AM
Subject:	HRC Clips | 2.9.15
Attachments:	20150209 HRC Clips.docx

HRC Clips
February 9, 2015

HRC

Brazile: 2016, bumpy roads ahead to the nominations (Herald News)
Is Hillary Clinton 'likable enough'? And does it even matter? (WAPO)
Hillary Clinton lapping 2016 Democratic field in New Hampshire (Washington Times)
In N.H. poll, Bush leads GOP hopefuls (Boston Globe)
Clinton's Greatest Political Strength May Be Hiding in Plain Sight (National Journal)
Pitting politics vs. public health (Chicago Tribune)
Boris to have talks with Clinton as Mayor's roadshow hits the US (Independent)
Obama's Soft Power Could Force Clinton to Take a Hard Line (National Journal)
Working Families Party Urges Warren to Run in '16 (NYT)
Hillary vs. Warren would split Hollywood (Hill)
Bernie Sanders steps up: I am not Hillary, 'trust me' (MSNBC)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Brazile: 2016, bumpy roads ahead to the nominations (Herald News)
By Donna Brazile
February 8, 2015
The Herald News

Less than a year from now, voters in Iowa, New Hampshire and elsewhere will gather in town centers, gymnasiums, local libraries and school cafeterias to kick off the 2016 presidential sweepstakes. Ever since the modern political process made running for president a four-year job, this is the time when potential candidates started making their public moves. So how are the two parties' races for the nomination shaping up?

Let's start with the Republican Party. With 2012 GOP nominee and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney's decision not to run in 2016, I wouldn't place too much stock in any polls that show former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush or Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker leading the Republican field. Their leads reflect knee-jerk name recognition, brand loyalty, or flavor-of-the-month enthusiasm – not the kind of support that is going to see them through the next year.

If you're a Republican of my generation, you have probably voted for six presidential tickets with a Bush on it. At this point, Republicans don't so much choose a Bush as they initially acquiesce in the choice of a Bush, so a lot of what appears to be support for Jeb Bush is simply resigned indifference. If you were an active Republican in 2012, whomever you preferred for the nomination, you probably eventually ended up working hard, supporting and arguing on behalf of eventual nominee Romney. So the question is, how will you respond when faced with new and different choices?

When it comes to polling, I would be much more interested in how Republicans respond when some of the candidates are described, rather than named. For instance, what if a survey described Ohio's Gov. John Kasich's credentials? Mail carrier's son, former chairman of the House Budget Committee, two-term governor of the pivotal state of Ohio, re-elected overwhelmingly with support from Democrats and independents. Republican primary voters need to start looking at the resumes of their candidates with the names removed.

Of the Republicans' two legacy candidates – Bush, and Rand Paul, whose fathers both ran for president – it's hard to predict who will have an upper hand with conservative voters. I predict that Bush's establishment support will melt away. His residual rank-and-file support will find its way to Paul and other candidates. But it's hard to write off Bush. People who have made careers writing off Bushes have generally had short careers.

Although he has a steep hill to climb, Bush is at ease with himself and with regular people. His rapport with Latino voters is just what the Republicans need. He's the former governor of the crucial swing state of Florida, and he has a conservative reformer's record that Republicans can take into a general election. His problem is whether, for voters in the general election, three Bushes are one too many, particularly since most voters remember the eight Clinton years more fondly than the 12 combined Bush years.

As has been the case in recent elections, the Republican field is crowded with minor candidates who generate a lot of smoke but never seem to catch fire for long. They tend to be rabble-rousers, holy rollers, regional candidates and Fox News favorites. Most of them stand an excellent chance of succeeding, but only in their real goal, which is either to push the party in the direction of their agenda or to use their candidacy to raise their own profile and potential in the world of conservative media.

On the Democratic side, it's likely we end up with former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, Vice President Joe Biden, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, former Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia and a few others. Clinton is the front-runner before anyone – including her – has even begun running. She's way ahead even while everyone is still at the starting line.

Clinton could have a Democratic challenger coming at her from the left or from the right, but whoever it is, they would have to come at her from way below her in the polls. The main questions for the Democrats are if Clinton will be challenged within the party and whether that would help or hurt her.

It's possible that a credible primary challenger could help Clinton sharpen her campaigning and debate skills before the general election contest begins. But she hardly lacks campaign experience, and primary contests can be costly. People say that what doesn't kill you makes you stronger, but in presidential primaries, if it doesn't kill you, it still drains your campaign war chest.

While the Republicans face a tough battle with each other, Clinton has what is the equivalent of a first-round bye in the playoffs. The fact that Democrats have a clear front-runner and the Republicans don't is a problem for Republicans, and a clear advantage to Clinton. Before the Republicans can beat her, they have to beat each other – and as we saw in the vicious GOP primary battles of 2012, they have a tendency to beat each other rather severely. The Republicans face a bruising primary season. The only things liable to get bruised on the Democratic side are egos.

The upshot is that at this point, neither party has much of a race. The Democrats have a lopsided contest (but not a foregone conclusion), and the Republicans have less of a race and more like something that resembles a rugby scrum. It remains to be seen if the eventual winner in 2016 is someone whose candidacy was seemingly ordained, or one who emerged from a chaotic clash.

Donna Brazile is a senior Democratic strategist, a political commentator and contributor to CNN and ABC News, and a contributing columnist to Ms. Magazine and O, the Oprah Magazine.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

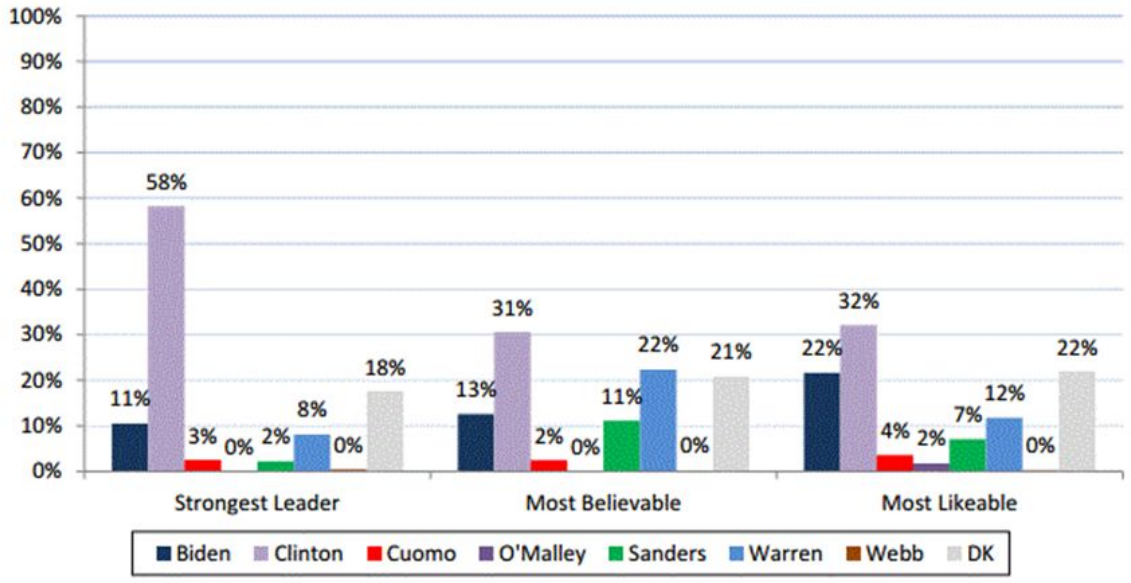
Is Hillary Clinton 'likable enough'? And does it even matter? (WAPO)
By Aaron Blake
February 9, 2015
The Washington Post

A new poll of the 2016 New Hampshire Democratic presidential primary shows pretty much what every other poll has shown: Hillary Rodham Clinton leads by a very wide margin.

The University of New Hampshire survey shows the former secretary of state taking 58 percent of the vote. It also shows about six in 10 likely Democratic primary voters consider her the strongest leader (58 percent) and about two-thirds say she would have the best odds of winning in the general election (66 percent) and has the most experience to be president (68 percent).

Candidate Qualities

A majority of likely primary voters (58%) view Hillary Clinton as the strongest leader in the field. Nearly a third (31%) of likely voters view Clinton as the most believable followed by Warren at 22% and Biden at 13%. Thirty-two percent (32%) say Clinton is the most likeable candidate followed by Joe Biden at 22%.



But then there are a couple of other ways in which the poll asked voters to compare Clinton to her fellow Democrats. In contrast to the numbers above, only about one-third viewed Clinton as the "most believable" (31 percent), and about the same proportion labeled her the "most likable" (32 percent).

If you just had a little twinge of deja vu, it's because this question has stalked Clinton before. Back in the 2008 Democratic primary, there was plenty of chatter about precisely how likable she was and whether it was holding her campaign back.

The culmination of this was Clinton being asked -- at a New Hampshire debate, no less -- about these criticisms. "Well that hurts my feelings," she deadpanned. Barack Obama then interjected, in a moment of unhelpful candor, that Clinton was "likable enough."

So, to recap, six in 10 New Hampshire Democratic primary voters think Clinton is their candidate, but just three in 10 say she's the most likable.

On some level, we'll concede, this is kind of dumb. Many think that the likability question is asked of Clinton only because she's a woman, and that men aren't held to the same standards. My colleague Nia-Malika Henderson noted this alleged dichotomy last month, with one noted expert saying voters do indeed judge female candidates on likability in a way that doesn't apply to men.

But regardless of whether it's fair, it's a question that has followed Clinton. And even if it's a double standard, it's still a potentially real factor for her when it comes to getting people to vote for her -- at least theoretically.

The good news for Clinton is that, at least at the outset of the 2016 campaign, it's less an issue than it was for her in 2008.

A poll conducted by the Pew Research Center last year showed that 36 percent of Americans said Clinton was "hard to like." That number was 51 percent in March 2008 and 53 percent in April 2008, at the height of her primary contest with Obama.

But it's not just Republicans who consider this a problem for her. Twenty percent of Democrats said she was "hard to like," along with 39 percent of independents. Those are real numbers.

The question from there, though, is does it even matter? Even if it is a hindrance for Clinton, it seems pretty unlikely that it would lose her a primary in which she is the overwhelming favorite. From there, in the general election, partisanship largely takes over, and there are very few voters who are actually up for grabs and could potentially be swayed by whatever likability issues Clinton has.

And even if a fair amount of swing voters think Clinton is "hard to like," that doesn't necessarily mean they wouldn't vote for her. Other considerations, after all, do come into play.

The likability thing might have hurt Clinton somewhat in a primary with the buzzy and very personally likable Obama. And it's possible that it could flare up again as the 2016 campaign gets off the ground.

But without that kind of Obama-esque contrast and with many potentially major issues on the table ahead of the general election, we have a hard time seeing lots of people voting against Clinton because they don't want to have a beer with her.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton lapping 2016 Democratic field in New Hampshire (Washington Times)
By David Sherfinski
February 9, 2015
Washington Times

Former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton has a sizable lead over possible Democratic rivals in the early primary state of New Hampshire in a new poll, as she takes steps toward a possible 2016 run for president.

Mrs. Clinton is the first choice of 56 percent of likely 2016 Democratic primary voters, followed by Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts at 15 percent and Vice President Joseph R. Biden Jr. and Sen. Bernie Sanders, Vermont Independent, at 8 percent apiece.

Some have been calling on Ms. Warren to enter the race as an alternative to Mrs. Clinton, and The New York Times reported that leaders of New York's Working Families Party on Sunday formally encouraged Mrs. Warren to enter the race.

But Ms. Warren has rejected the entreaties and has said she is not running.

Mrs. Clinton is actually viewed more favorably among Democratic primary voters than is Ms. Warren in the poll. Eighty-nine percent have a favorable view of Mrs. Clinton, compared to 9 percent who have an unfavorable one.

Sixty-four percent have a favorable view of Ms. Warren, compared to 14 percent who view her unfavorably.

The Bloomberg Politics/Saint Anselm College poll, conducted Jan. 31-Feb. 5 by Purple Strategies, includes a sample of 400 Democratic primary voters that carries a margin of error of plus or minus 4.9 percent points.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In N.H. poll, Bush leads GOP hopefuls (Boston Globe)
By James Pindell
February 9, 2015
The Boston Globe

The first poll of New Hampshire Republicans conducted entirely after former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney said he was not running for president in 2016 offers good news and bad news for Jeb Bush.

The good news: Bush, the former governor of Florida, tops the Republican field in the state that traditionally holds the nation's first-in-the-nation presidential primary.

The bad news: Bush is deeply unpopular among general election voters in New Hampshire, which is also a critical swing state.

A new Bloomberg Politics/Saint Anselm College poll showed that in the Republican primary, Bush has 16 percent support, Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky has 13 percent, and Governor Scott Walker of Wisconsin has 12 percent. Statistically, with the poll's margin of error of plus or minus 4.9 percent, all three are tied.

The poll of 400 Republican voters and 503 general election voters was conducted by Purple Insights from Jan. 31 through Feb. 5.

Governor Chris Christie of New Jersey, who experts say must win New Hampshire to have any shot at the Republican nomination, netted 10 percent support. All other prospective candidates were in single digits.

Potential Republican primary voters in New Hampshire said Bush's advocacy for comprehensive immigration reform and for the Common Core education standards were "deal killers" for at least one in five of them.

That said, roughly the same share of Republicans said Bush was the best opponent to face Democrat Hillary Clinton in the general election should she enter the race.

This does not mean that Bush would win the state's four electoral votes in the general election.

When comparing how Granite State voters view Bush and Clinton, Bush's unfavorable rating among general election voters is 50 percent, compared with 35 percent favorable.

Clinton, on the other hand, has a 54 percent favorable rating and a 42 percent unfavorable rating among those voters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's Greatest Political Strength May Be Hiding in Plain Sight (National Journal)

By Ronald Brownstein
February 9, 2015
National Journal

Much of the debate about Hillary Rodham Clinton's potential appeal to female voters may be focusing on the wrong group of women.

Probably the most frequently-asked question about Clinton's possible coalition as a Democratic nominee in 2016 is whether she can win back the working-class white women who have moved away from her party since 1996. On that issue, the evidence is ambivalent from months of early polling that pits Clinton against potential Republican nominees.

But polls over the past year almost invariably have found Clinton improving--often substantially--over President Obama's lackluster 2012 performance among white-collar white women.

Those college-educated white women have been the fastest-growing part of the white electorate in recent years. If Clinton as a nominee could cement the gains she's shown among those women in most national and state polls over the past year, she would present Republicans with a formidable demographic challenge, even without improving among any other white voters. Her greatest potential strength, in other words, may be hiding in plain sight: her potential connection to the white-collar white women who most resemble her.

All polls of the 2016 race at this point are recording only distant impressions long before most voters have seriously focused on their choices. The actual campaign, and events yet to occur, will inevitably scramble the equation.

Yet, especially with a candidate as familiar as Clinton, these early soundings can be viewed as a kind of rebuttable presumption: they sketch the coalition that may naturally gravitate to her unless opponents present them with a case not to.

The contours of a potential Clinton coalition were sketched in the three Quinnipiac University polls released last week in the key swing states of Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Florida. Obama won all of them in 2012, and any Democrat who wins at least two of the three would be in a commanding position to assemble an Electoral College majority in 2016.

The Quinnipiac results reinforced other early surveys in showing the potential for Clinton to improve on Obama's 2012 performance among white-collar white women--and perhaps also notch some gains with their blue-collar counterparts. Despite all the focus on the gender gap, Obama won in 2012 while capturing only 42 percent of all white women, according to exit polls. That was the weakest performance for any Democratic nominee since Walter Mondale in 1984, leaving plenty of room for Clinton to grow if she wins the Democratic nomination.

The most consistent note in the new Quinnipiac surveys was Clinton's strength among college-educated white women. Those women--most of them liberal on cultural issues and many more open than most other whites to an activist role for government--have provided Democratic presidential candidates the most reliable support in the white community since Bill Clinton's first election. The Democratic presidential nominee carried them in 1992, 1996, 2000, and 2008, and essentially split them in 2004. But in 2012, Obama lost ground with them, falling back to 46 percent nationally, the weakest performance among them for any Democratic nominee since Michael Dukakis in 1988.

According to detailed results provided by Quinnipiac to Next America, the new surveys show Clinton notably improving on Obama's performance among those well-educated white women in each of these three key states. The Quinnipiac Polls were conducted via landline and cell phone in each state from January 22 through February 1.

In Florida, Obama won 43 percent of college-educated white women in 2008 and 42 percent in 2012. The new surveys found Clinton drawing 50 percent of them against former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, 53 percent against New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, and 55 percent against Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul.

In Ohio, Obama carried a 52 percent majority of those women in 2008, but slipped back to 47 percent in 2012, while Mitt Romney won 51 percent. Compared to Obama's four-point Ohio deficit among the college white women, the Quinnipiac polls show them providing Clinton an edge of seven points over Bush, 17 over Christie, and 22 over Paul. (The Ohio poll produced a much larger undecided share among upscale women than the other two surveys.)

And in Pennsylvania, where Obama won 55 percent of those women in 2008 but tumbled to just 44 percent in 2012, Clinton displayed the most strength. The Quinnipiac Polls showed her at 56 percent among them against Christie, 58 percent against Bush, and 62 percent against Paul.

By contrast, the Quinnipiac Polls show considerably less strength for Clinton among non-college white women. Those so-called waitress moms have given most of their votes to Republicans in each election since Bill Clinton carried a plurality of them in 1996. Nationally, Obama carried just 39 percent of them in 2012.

In Florida, Obama won only 36 percent of the "waitress moms" in 2008 and 40 percent in 2012. The Quinnipiac polls place Clinton squarely in that range, at 36 percent among them against Bush, 41 percent against Paul, and 43 percent against Christie. But because large numbers of these women remain undecided in the survey, Clinton leads Christie with them, and only trails Paul narrowly while still facing a double-digit deficit against Bush.

In Ohio, Obama won 44 percent of these women in 2008 and 45 percent in 2012. That wasn't an overwhelming performance, but it was enough above his national showing to help him carry the state. The Quinnipiac surveys show Clinton settling exactly in that range, drawing 44 percent against Christie, and 45 percent against both Bush and Paul. Again, though, because of a large undecided contingent, Clinton leads against all three with those women.

The surveys showed Clinton making the clearest gains among blue-collar women in Pennsylvania. Obama posted nearly identical showings there with these women--47 percent in 2008 and 46 percent in 2012. Quinnipiac found Clinton attracting 49 percent of them against both Christie and Bush, and 53 percent against Paul. While Obama lost these women by seven points in 2012 and four in 2008, Clinton leads with them against all three Republicans.

The results were similar in polls from NBC News and Marist College last summer in Iowa and New Hampshire. Matched again against Christie, Paul and Bush, those surveys showed her attracting just under half of non-college white women in both states. But against all three men, she drew 52-54 percent of college white women in Iowa, and exactly 64 percent of them in New Hampshire. National Quinnipiac surveys last year testing Clinton against all three men also put her at 50 percent or more among college-plus white women, and generally at 40-45 percent among non-college white women.

Veteran Democratic pollster Geoff Garin, a senior strategist for Clinton during her 2008 primary campaign, notes that she ran very well among working-class white women during that contest against Obama. "The question is whether she can reconnect to non-college educated white women the same way she was doing at the end of her 2008 campaign," Garin says. "If she can, that has the potential to change the arithmetic. But I think that answer is yet to be determined." By contrast, he said, there's more evidence in early polling that college white-women "are with her. We see that very clearly."

With other groups of voters, the new Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania Quinnipiac polls show Clinton largely tracking Obama's 2012 performance. The polls give her cavernous leads among African-Americans--though with a large undecided bloc, her support doesn't yet quite match Obama's 2012 performances in Ohio and Florida. (It's already close in Pennsylvania.) Her showings in the three states among white men without a college education are consistently weak, but not noticeably worse than Obama's numbers with them when he won each of these three states twice. In Ohio, for instance, Obama won 44 percent of blue-collar white men in 2008 and 39 percent in 2012. The Quinnipiac polls put Clinton at 39 percent of them against Christie, 40 percent against Paul, and 42 percent against Bush. (Again, because a substantial portion remains undecided, Clinton's deficits in the polls among these men in all three states are much smaller than Obama's in 2012.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Her performance among college-educated white men in the surveys also generally follows close to Obama's share in 2012. In Ohio, for instance, Obama tumbled from 47 percent with those men in 2008 to 33 percent in 2012; Clinton draws 34 percent of them against Christie, 35 percent against Bush, and 37 percent against Paul. The same caveat applies to these results: because of large undecided populations, her deficits among these men are much smaller than Obama's in 2012.

Still, these polls present results that are largely consistent across the states--and also consonant with those other national and state polls measuring Clinton's early appeal. Almost everything could change once the campaign is actually joined. But for now, surveys like these Quinnipiac polls generally show some modest opportunities for Clinton to improve among working-class white women and little change relative to Obama's meager 2012 standing among both blue-collar and white-collar men. With minority voters, she remains in a very strong position, though Republicans argue it's unproven that African-Americans will turn out for her at the rates they did for Obama.

The big opening signaled by these polls is her opportunity to recover from Obama's 2012 trough among college-educated white women. That's an especially ominous prospect for Republicans because those upscale women have steadily increased their share of the electorate since the 1980s. If those trends continue, in 2016 they could cast more of the national vote than either college or non-college white men, or the waitress moms. Clinton's biggest boost over Obama might come from nothing more complex than consolidating her most natural supporters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Pitting politics vs. public health (Chicago Tribune)
By Clarence Page
February 8, 2015
Chicago Tribune

Is support for childhood vaccinations a partisan issue? Polls indicate that it isn't, yet Republicans appear to be getting stung by this needle more than Democrats are.

The question has come up after Republican presidential hopefuls Chris Christie and Rand Paul said that parents should have a choice and not be required by law to immunize their children.

Paul, a U.S. senator and licensed ophthalmologist from Kentucky, went further in a CNBC interview. He expressed belief in a link between vaccines and "profound mental disorders," even though the only study that claimed such a link was later debunked.

Christie, the New Jersey governor who famously and unnecessarily confined a nurse on the suspicion that she might have Ebola, clarified his immunization stance a bit after a backlash. Scientific support for vaccination was "pretty indisputable," he said.

President Barack Obama and other leading presidential hopefuls in both parties also urged parents to get their kids vaccinated, while mostly tiptoeing around the question of whether the vaccine should be required.

Among Democrats, Hillary Clinton, still holding the Democratic field pretty much to herself, tweeted confidence: "The science is clear: The earth is round, the sky is blue, and #vaccineswork." Obama on NBC's "Today" show similarly urged parents to get their kids vaccinated.

As parents who refuse to vaccinate their kids, often called "anti-vaxxers," receive widespread blame for a resurgence of measles in this country, a partisan dispute has arisen over which anti-vaxxers to blame: upper-income, organic-food-buying liberals or libertarian, anti-government, tea party conservatives?

After all, conservatives have been quick to point out, the new measles epidemic originated in politically blue California, one of the states that offers a variety of voluntary "personal belief" exemptions to parents who want to opt out of mandatory vaccine requirements.

Red-state Mississippi, by comparison, offers no religious exemption for vaccines, has the highest compliance rate in the country and hasn't had a reported measles case in two decades, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Liberals respond that, while anti-vaxxers certainly exist on the left -- and some even fit the stereotypes about yuppie organic-food shoppers -- they have essentially no political influence as a group. Since the Bill Clinton era, the Democratic Party has tried to corral its fringe elements, while Republicans have struggled between their right wing and their far-right wing.

Even so, on the "vaxx" issue, a new Pew Research Center poll finds the divide falls along lines of generations more than politics. While strong majorities across the board support vaccination, about one-third of Republicans and also of independents say parents should make the decision about immunizations, compared with 22 percent of Democrats.

Interestingly, Pew found no such divide between Democrats and Republicans in 2009, the pollsters said.

That's a disturbing development on several levels. If vaccine denialism becomes like climate change and Obama's birth certificate, issues to be divided by political leanings more than evidence, we are likely to see an increase in anti-vaxx refuseniks and a larger pool of vulnerable, unvaccinated children to spread more dangerous diseases.

Critics on the right point out that both Obama and Hillary Clinton raised questions in 2008 about a possible link between vaccines and autism. That's true. But two years later, the only study that claimed such a link was retracted by the medical journal that published it and its author lost his medical license.

Yet the lie persists, partly because of something called "confirmation bias," a fancy way of saying that we believe what we want to believe.

New evidence is offered by a major new study in the journal Pediatrics led by political scientist Brendan Nyhan of Dartmouth College.

In testing four separate pro-vaccine messages, including three that the CDC uses, the study found none of the messages increased the intent of parents to vaccinate their children -- and in several cases actually increased the unfounded belief that vaccines cause autism.

Such grim determination by many humans to believe the worst offers a tempting territory for politicians who are not above pandering to fears and suspicions. But when our elected leaders fear the criticism of anti-vaxx factions more than they fear for public health, it leaves all of us more exposed.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Boris to have talks with Clinton as Mayor's roadshow hits the US (Independent)
Pippa Crerar
February 9, 2015
The Independent

Boris Johnson will sit down for talks with Hillary Clinton this week during a six-day US tour seen by some as preparation for a future Conservative leadership bid.

The Mayor of London's meeting with the former US Secretary of State, the Democrat frontrunner to be the next President, is his highest profile yet in a busy few months of building relationships with international power brokers.

Last night Mr Johnson told The Independent he was "reconciled" to people reading whatever they wanted into his foreign visits but claimed his primary aim was to promote London rather than himself.

The Mayor, who has been eager to demonstrate a more statesmanlike image before the general election, also hopes to visit Japan, Israel and Turkey before the end of his mayoralty in 2016, although this could be difficult to combine with a cabinet post.

He has been selected as Tory candidate for Uxbridge and South Ruislip in the general election, and is expected to be fast-tracked to the front bench.

His aides denied the US trip was deliberately timed to generate maximum coverage just a few months before the general election, claiming it had been years in the planning.

The first part of the tour - which begins in Boston before heading to New York and Washington - could be hit by bad weather. The Boston authorities are advising people to stay at home because of the threat of a severe snow storm.

Last month Mr Johnson flew to meet the Kurdish Prime Minister. He was pictured taking aim with an AK47 alongside Peshmerga soldiers fighting against Isis. Critics in the London Assembly claim he has "mentally checked out" of his mayoral role.

At the end of last year Mr Johnson spent six days in the Far East, visiting Kuala Lumpur, Jakarta and Singapore to meet heads of state, in addition to drumming up business for London. He has already travelled to India, China and the Gulf on official business.

The talks in New York on Wednesday will be the first time Mr Johnson has met Senator Clinton, although he has previously been introduced to her husband, former US President Bill Clinton, as well as to President Obama.

City Hall sources said the pair would discuss the war in Syria and Iraq and the threat posed by Isis to both the region and Western cities. The conversation is almost certain to touch on the general election in May and the US presidential race next year.

Mr Johnson, who was born in New York and has dual citizenship, hopes he could meet Ms Clinton in future as PM. He also met Republican presidential hopefuls Jeb Bush and Chris Christie when they visited the UK recently.

The talks with Ms Clinton were confirmed as the Mayor flew into Boston - and a severe snowstorm - last night on the first day of his whistlestop tour.

Mr Johnson will visit MIT and Harvard in Boston, hold talks with Mayor Bill de Blasio of New York in Manhattan and then go on to attend a Congressional reception being held in Washington, DC.

There will be no shortage of picture opportunities as he meets business tycoons, top scientists, figures from the worlds of theatre and fashion and New York City's police chief "supercop" Bill Bratton.

Mr Johnson will also visit the Smithsonian museum in Washington, which is considering an outpost in London.

His face will crop up on a host of American television networks - including CNN and MSNBC - as well as in major newspapers and at a reception hosted by the British Ambassador in Washington.

CULTURE CLASH

THE NEW YORK COUNTERPART

Over his first five years as Mayor of London, Boris Johnson became firm friends with his New York counterpart Michael Bloomberg, staging joint events where they teased and praised one another in equal measure.

Johnson admired the New York Mayor's business clout and philanthropic instinct, envied his huge wealth and sophistication, and shared his competitive streak and love of publicity.

But when he meets Bloomberg's successor, Bill de Blasio (pictured), it will be a more cautious affair. From different ends of the social and political spectrum, they will harbour suspicions.

To de Blasio, Boris is the privileged champion of business who wants to cut taxes for the wealthy.

Boris sees the New York mayor as a bleeding-heart liberal who wants to tackle inequality by raising taxes on the super-rich and has overseen a schism between City Hall and the NYPD.

Our mayor is an outrageous self-publicist, theirs much more reserved.

But the two politicians also have much in common - both are laid back and personable, with mixed-race families and a socially liberal outlook on life.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And crucially, both men were born in Manhattan in the early 1960s. If the politics stalls, the New Yorker spirit could yet prevail.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama's Soft Power Could Force Clinton to Take a Hard Line (National Journal)

By James Oliphant
February 8, 2015
National Journal

President Obama's national security adviser, Susan Rice, outlined a foreign policy blueprint Friday for the president's remaining time in office. It's big on nuance, patience, and team-building, short on near-term solutions—and potentially a headache for the next Democratic presidential nominee.

Rice's remarks, which were part of the rollout of a new formal administration national security policy statement, came at the close of a week in which Obama's strategy for defeating the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria again fell under fierce criticism in the wake of the gruesome staged execution of a Jordanian Air Force pilot.

Beyond reaffirming its alliance with Jordan, the White House treated the incident with a business-as-usual air, insisting that its restrained approach against the Islamic State is paying off. While outrage erupted in Jordan and across the Arab world, Obama and his aides kept cool and stayed the course.

Rice's remarks Friday at the Brookings Institution were very much in keeping with that posture. She admonished the White House's critics at the outset, warning against what she called inside-the-Beltway "alarmism" about the threat posed by IS (as well as by Vladimir Putin's Russia). "What's missing here in D.C. is a sense of perspective," she said.

The Islamic State and other terrorist groups, Rice said, do not pose a threat "of an existential nature" to the United States. Obama had said something similar a week earlier in an interview. (And it seemed somewhat at odds with the picture Obama painted last summer when trying to drum up public support for U.S. intervention.) That dismissiveness is likely to further inflame those who say the administration isn't taking the jihadist threat seriously enough—and it may put Hillary Clinton, should she run for president, in an uncomfortable position.

Where she's been able to, Clinton has subtly—and not necessarily effectively—tried to keep some distance from Obama's foreign policy, an effort hamstrung by her own tenure as the president's secretary of State. The restatement of that policy, which clearly views the the Islamic State as a small part of a very large global picture, may force her to do more in that regard.

The administration may not be doing her any favors in embracing a national security approach, as described by Rice, that de-emphasizes America's military role, encourages the use of the tools of "soft power," such as diplomacy and social media, and plays up coalition-building over going it alone. While it may be a strategy that recognizes, as the White House says, the complexities of the 21st-century world and a war-weary populace, it may be tougher to defend against a GOP presidential nominee certain to take a harder line. Particularly if demonstrable progress against Islamic State hasn't been shown.

The hand-wringing over Obama's approach toward IS largely has been symbolizedby the escalating debate over the president's steadfast refusal to call the fight what critics say it is: a global struggle against radical Islam. Perhaps the most blistering recent critique came from the former head of the Defense Intelligence Agency, Lt. Gen. Michael Flynn, who at a conference in Washington last week blasted the administration's unwillingness to paint the fight in more epic terms.

"You cannot defeat an enemy you do not admit exists," Flynn said, in remarks first reported by The Daily Beast, adding that the Obama administration wants "us to think that our challenge is dealing with an undefined set of violent extremists or merely lone-wolf actors with no ideology or network. But that's just not the straight truth.... Our adversaries around the world are self-described Islamic militants—they say."

Characterizing the stakes in terms like those is exactly what the White House has been trying to avoid. As recently as last weekend, in an interview with CNN's Fareed Zakaria, Obama resisted any suggestion that the U.S. was enmeshed in an ideological conflict. "I think we do ourselves a disservice in this fight if we are not taking into account the fact that the overwhelming majority of Muslims reject this ideology," the president said.

That position, White House aides say, is rooted in a desire to not elevate or legitimize the fever-dream that animates the terrorist group and is central to its recruiting propaganda: that it is fighting in the name of a fundamentalist form of Islam. Another pressing concern has been to avoid antagonizing Muslim communities in the U.S and abroad, where trust and cooperation is necessary to identify potential radical elements, and where the administration can't risk sounding like it's demonizing the religion as a whole.

Even some progressive think tanks believe Obama is being a little too careful. "I understand why they do that, but I do think there is something particular about Islamic extremism that needs to be recognized," says Brian Katulis, a national security analyst at the Center for American Progress. But he adds, "I'm less concerned with how they talk about it, and more concerned about what they do about it."

After the attacks in Paris last month, the French government was not as hesitant. Prime Minister Manuel Valls said that his country "is at war with terrorism, jihadism, and radical Islamism."

Clinton's challenge is that she has, at times, sounded more like Flynn than like Obama. In a speech in Ottawa, Canada late last year, she warned that Islamic State forces were "jihadist" and "expansionary"—an ideological-based enemy determined to take territory. ("Jihadist " is another word Obama won't use.)

"They believe that it is part of their mission to launch attacks, to infiltrate through foreign fighters into Western societies," Clinton said then. "If that were not the case, then we could have a different debate. I think the evidence is convincing, at least to me, that this is a group that will try to pick up where al-Qaida in Afghanistan left off."

This is the same al-Qaida which, in Rice's words Friday, has been "decimated." But Rice also cautioned that "fighting terrorism is a long-term struggle. There will be setbacks. There will be no one-size-fits-all solutions."

In Washington-speak, that means this will all soon be a new president's problem, whether it's Clinton or someone else. But before that happens, Clinton will face new pressure to make clear how she will handle it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Working Families Party Urges Warren to Run in '16 (NYT)
By Alexander Burns
February 9, 2015
The New York Times

Leaders of New York's Working Families Party on Sunday urged Senator Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts to seek the Democratic nomination for president next year, formally calling on her to enter the 2016 race for the White House.

By voting to encourage a Warren candidacy, the Working Families Party became the latest liberal group to support her as a potential primary challenger to former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton, who has not formally announced that she will seek the Democratic nomination but is the presumed favorite.

Several organizations on the left, led by MoveOn.org and Democracy for America, have already organized a campaign designed to lure Ms. Warren, with her brand of economic populism, into making a bid for the presidency.

''We know a champion for working families when we see one,'' Bill Lipton, New York State director of the Working Families Party, said. ''The only thing better than watching Elizabeth Warren take Wall Street to task from the Senate would be helping her bring our issues to the center of the national debate.''

Ms. Warren, who is beloved among liberals as a fierce critic of what she sees as the abuses of the financial industry, has repeatedly ruled out running for president in 2016. Lacey Rose, a spokeswoman for the senator, reiterated that stance in an email on Sunday. ''As Senator Warren has said many times, she is not running for president and doesn't support these draft campaigns,'' Ms. Rose wrote.

The Working Families Party, led by a coalition of activists, liberal advocacy groups and labor unions, deliberated on an early-evening conference call before voting to encourage Ms. Warren to join the campaign. Party officials declined to share the tally of the vote.

The pro-Warren vote comes at a potentially awkward moment for New York Democrats, who have sought to draw their party's 2016 presidential nominating convention to New York City. Mayor Bill de Blasio has aggressively promoted the bid on the national stage, where Democrats aligned with Mrs. Clinton hold powerful sway.

Although Mr. de Blasio has a longstanding relationship with the Working Families Party, party officials said that neither the mayor nor his staff had played a role in the group's deliberations involving Ms. Warren.

Several Working Families leaders stressed that the vote was not meant as a rejection of Mrs. Clinton, who twice earned the party's endorsement as a candidate for the United States Senate.

''It's a vote in the context of two undeclared candidates for president,'' said Ed Ott, former head of the New York City Central Labor Council. ''What the Warren vote reflects is that people want a Democratic Party with a spine.''

Javier Valdes, executive director of Make the Road Action Fund, a Latino-oriented liberal group, characterized the vote as a statement of enthusiasm for a competitive primary. ''Secretary Clinton has had a strong track record with our community and what we really want here is a strong debate about Democratic values and working family values,'' Mr. Valdes, a Working Families Party leader, said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary vs. Warren would split Hollywood (Hill)
By Judy Kurtz
February 9, 2015
The Hill

A battle between Hillary Clinton and Sen. Elizabeth Warren could easily divide entertainers, creating a showdown that might split Hollywood and force A-list stars to choose sides.

The lines are already being drawn in the fight for La La Land's love, with the former secretary of State not yet officially in the 2016 Democratic presidential race and the Massachusetts Democrat professing a lack of interest.
"They draw on different parts of the artistic community," Darrell West, author of the book "Celebrity Politics," tells ITK. "Warren, being more liberal, does very well among progressive artists, various Hollywood stars who worry the Democratic Party has become too centrist."

Entertainers including Susan Sarandon, Olivia Wilde, Edward Norton and Mark Ruffalo have all signed on to support Warren. Celebs in the 65-year-old lawmaker's camp, West says, welcome her "populist rhetoric."

After banding together to form a group called "Artists for Warren," more than 90 performers penned an open letter last week urging the freshman senator to make a White House bid.

"Senator Warren, we're ready to show you that you have the support needed to enter this presidential race," the message stated, which was signed by celebrities including "Fahrenheit 9/11" director Michael Moore, "Big Love's" Chloe Sevigny, Julia Stiles and Natasha Lyonne, among others.

"There are a lot of people in grassroots organizations pushing for Senator Warren to run in 2016. This same sentiment exists in the Hollywood community," Kathryn Cramer Brownell, an assistant professor of history at Purdue University said.

In a video posted on Vanity Fair's website, "Firecatcher" and "The Avengers" star Ruffalo lauded Warren, saying, "She's someone that gets the progressive values that I believe we all share." He added, "We don't know that she's going to run, so we're sort of taking a leap of faith. But that's the only way to really implement the changes that need to be changed in the world today."

Clinton, however, generally appeals to a different type of Hollywood heavyweight, says West, the Brookings Institution's vice president and director of governance studies. "I think with Hillary Clinton, she attracts celebrities who are more pragmatic and are interested in winning, regardless of what the political message is," he added.

Some of Hollywood's biggest A-listers have said they'd buy a ticket to see Clinton storm the 2016 campaign box office. Music chart topper Katy Perry, George Clooney, big-time Democratic donor Barbra Streisand, "Happy" singer Pharrell Williams, Eva Longoria, Ashley Judd, and Elton John have all expressed support for the former first lady.

Longoria, a 2012 Obama campaign co-chairwoman, said as far back as 2013 that she would "absolutely" campaign for Clinton in the next race for the White House. "Lord of the Rings" actress Liv Tyler rooted Clinton on during a 2014 fashion shoot, donning a "Hillary for President" t-shirt in a series of glam images.

Brownell, the author of the recently released "Showbiz Politics: Hollywood in American Politics," says it'll be "fascinating" to see how Clinton uses her celeb cache. "I think Hillary Clinton is really a political celebrity herself," she said. "I think that Hollywood celebrities will be key in fundraising for her, using entertainment events to help raise a lot of money."

"The Clintons have been around for 20 years so they've had plenty of opportunities to cultivate artists and actors. So they're basically getting the pragmatic problem-solvers," West says.

Although Clinton, 67, is a veteran of the political arena, Brownell says Warren — who has repeatedly denied she'll be throwing her hat in the presidential ring in 2016 — may actually come out on top in terms of the number of Hollywood-types showing her the love. Having "prominent people to urge her to run created a groundswell of enthusiasm and support" for the former lawyer and professor, says Brownell. "I think celebrities would play a more prominent place in her campaign to generate excitement surrounding the potential of her candidacy."

And while there's a danger of appearing "too Hollywood," West says if Warren or Clinton were to run, they would likely embrace the entertainers who are publicly cheering them on.

"They provide credibility especially early in a campaign. It's a way to demonstrate that your campaign is able to attract famous people," says West. "It's the age of celebrity in which we live, so having star power is part of contemporary politics."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bernie Sanders steps up: I am not Hillary, 'trust me' (MSNBC)
By Alex Seitz-Wald
February 9, 2015
MSNBC

HARRISBURG, Penn. – Organizers with Keystone Progress invited Hillary Clinton, Martin O'Malley, Elizabeth Warren, and Bernie Sanders to speak at the annual conference here this weekend. Sanders showed up.

The Independent senator from Vermont is actively considering a presidential run in 2016, and hopes to tap into progressive grassroots networks like this one for a potential underdog challenge to all-but-declared Democratic frontrunner Clinton.

The desire for an alternative to Clinton was clear among the 800 rank-and-file activists, labor organizers, and local elected officials here. But he's stuck between Clinton on one hand and Warren on the other, who so far tops many progressives' fantasy draft presidential ticket.

"Hillary Clinton doesn't come up in our conversations as being a progressive," said Franklin Country Democratic Party Chair Sheri Morgan, who was manning the Progressive Democrats of America booth offering "Run, Bernie, Run" swag.

Sanders himself promised "real differences" with Clinton in an interview with msnbc's Steve Kornacki before his keynote speech Saturday. "Trust me, there will be a real clash of ideas," he said.

Maria Payan, who volunteered for both Obama presidential campaigns, ran up to Sanders as he left the interview and pressed a check into his hand. "I want to help with your campaign anyway I can," she said.

Payan said she likes Warren too, and the idea of woman president, but like others here, preferred Sanders at the top of a progressive dream ticket since she thought Sanders has more experience in government. "People are looking that alternative," she explained

Sanders will need a lot more checks if he hopes to imitate Obama – at least $50 million worth, according to his advisors – but he's been slow to build a fundraising or political operation. Two staffers accompanied Sanders to the event, his Senate communications director and the director of his PAC, and collected names and contact info from supporters.

In the absence of a formal campaign infrastructure, he's found allies in existing local groups, like the the Iowa Citizen Action Network in the key presidential state and Keystone Progress here. Sanders trails Clinton by well over 50 percentage points in early polls, garnering an average of just 3.4% in recent surveys. Warren, who has repeatedly said she is not running for president, has more support at 11%.

And it's still unclear whether Sanders has the stomach for a run. He despises what he calls the "game" aspects of politics, like fundraising and building a personality cult. "What is politics? What is serious politics?" he asked Saturday. "It's about having a serious debate about issues, not gossip, not personality."

Peter Deutsch, a retired Penn State physics professor, also liked the idea of a Sanders-Warren ticket. "To put it bluntly, no one is challenging the establishment, specifically Hillary Clinton," he said.

Inside the ballroom at the Hilton, where Sanders would receive four standing ovations during his speech, Keystone Progress chairman Ritchie Tabachnick called Sanders "the voice of the American conscious."

In his Brooklyn brogue, the senator gave a version of the stump speech he's been testing out on recent visits to Iowa and New Hampshire. It gets gloomy at times. "Now, I know that you think the situation is bad. In fact it's worse than you think," he said.

Nonetheless, the crowd encouraged him to press on when his time is up, whooping at every rhetorical barb against the Koch Brothers, and gasping at statistics about the accumulation of wealth in the top 1%.

Billionaires and "counterrevolutionaries," he explained, have "psychiatric issues" – they're "addicted to money." "We all know people who are addicted to alcohol or drugs; these people are addicted to money," Sanders said.

The result is a "philosophical war being waged against the middle-class and working families."

The solution is a "political revolution," but one that looks backwards, not forward, to a time when "one person could work 40 hours a week and make enough to take care for the entire family."

Sanders' agenda, which he'll lay out in more detail Monday at the Brookings Institution in Washington, may not be particularly radical, but his rhetoric is, and it's a message these activists seemed eager to hear.

"I like Bernie Sanders, I think he's sexy," said Maggie Henry, an organic farmer who says her Western Pennsylvania business was destroyed by nearby fracking.

Bob Pyle, a pastor in the Brethren Chuck in Snyder, voted for Ron Paul in the Republican primary in both 2008 and 2012, before voting for Obama and in general, said he likes Sanders because he's anti-establishment and anti-war.

Sanders' most immediate challenge in presidential politics, however, is not the Koch Brothers, but Warren, who has so far sucked up much of the organizational energy on the left despite giving zero indication that she's running for president.

Advisors to Sanders think progressives will ultimately come around to Sanders if and when Warren doesn't run. Michael Morrill, the executive director of Keystone Progress, agreed, "People will coalesce around a progressive candidate, whoever that is."

But activists hoping to draft Warren don't have any immediate plans to cease their efforts and throw their support behind Sanders in the event that Warren doesn't get in. Jim Dean, a fellow Vermonter, warmly introduced Sanders before the keynote address, but he runs a group, Democracy for America, that's trying to draft Warren. His brother, former Gov. Howard Dean, supports Clinton and hosted a fundraiser for the pro-Clinton super PAC Ready for Hillary last week.

"I'd love for Sanders to run," Dean said in an interview. But members of his group, which has long branded itself as representing the "Warren-wing of the Democratic party," voted overwhelming to support Warren in 2016.

Would DFA support Sanders if it becomes clear Warren isn't running? "We're not spending a lot of time gaming out what we're going to do 8 months or whatever from now," he replied, noting that about as many DFA members voted for Clinton as voted for Sanders.

When Rick Smith started his progressive talk radio show ten years ago, his very first guest was then-Rep. Bernie Sanders. Now, Smith's show is aired on affiliates on across Pennsylvania, and he says Sanders "has been right about everything" since they first talked.

"Warren says that she's going to stay out and that's the right choice," Smith said. "Bernie is the right guy at the right time."

But without prompting, Smith continued, "Can he win. Eh."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Furman, Jason L." <Jason_L_Furman@cea.eop.gov>
To:	"Furman, Jason L." <Jason_L_Furman@cea.eop.gov>
Date:	5/29/2014 9:03:24 AM
Subject:	CEA's report on energy
Attachments:	cea_2014_all-of-the-above energy strategy.pdf

Today, CEA released a report, "An All-of-the-Above Energy Strategy as a Path to Sustainable Economic Growth ," along with an associated op-ed by Jim Stock and me in Politico and a White House blog post . The report documents the profound transformation in the U.S. energy sector and its implications for the economic recovery, showing that it's having a larger impact on growth than it had in the past, describing new analysis of its impact on increasing our energy security, and documenting the ways in which it's contributing to a low-carbon future. The blog post summarizing the report is pasted below.

New Report: The All-of-the-Above Energy Strategy as a Path to Sustainable Economic Growth

Posted by Jason Furman and Jim Stock on May 29, 2014 at 11:30 AM

We can't have an energy strategy for the last century that traps us in the past. We need an energy strategy for the future – an all-of-the-above strategy for the 21st century that develops every source of American-made energy." – President Barack Obama, March 15, 2012

The U.S. energy sector is undergoing a profound transformation. The United States is producing more oil and natural gas, is generating more electricity from renewables such as wind and solar, and is consuming less petroleum while holding electricity consumption constant. As detailed in today's report from the Council of Economic Advisers, these developments have had substantial economic and energy security benefits, and they are helping to reduce carbon emissions in the energy sector and thereby tackle the challenge posed by climate change. These trends have been supported and advanced by President Obama's All-of-the-Above energy strategy.
The President's All-of-the-Above energy strategy has three key goals:

- To support economic growth and job creation
- To enhance energy security
- To deploy low-carbon energy technologies and lay the foundation for a clean energy future

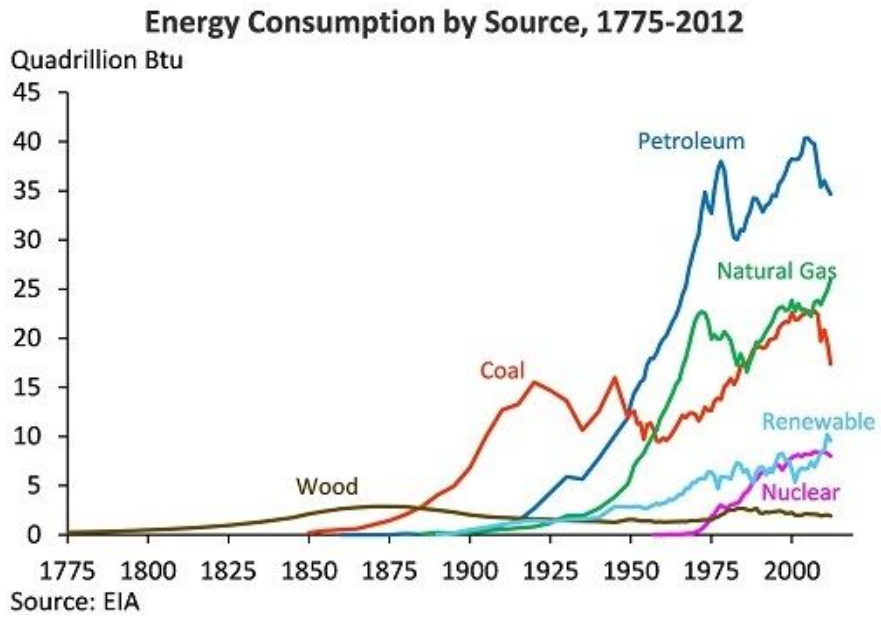
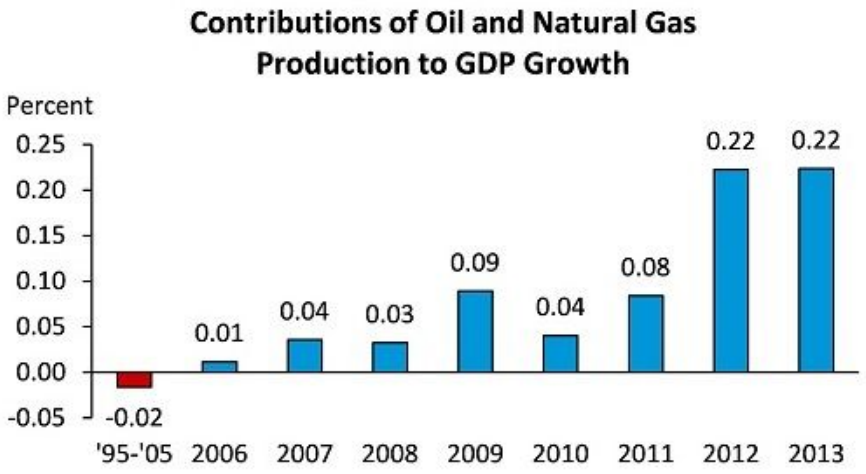
KEY POINTS IN TODAY'S REPORT FROM THE COUNCIL OF ECONOMIC ADVISERS

1. Decades-long trends in energy use are being reversed. The U.S. is the world's leading producer of petroleum and natural gas, surpassing long-standing petro-states Saudi Arabia and Russia. Accompanying these increases has been an unexpected turnaround in petroleum and gasoline demand; while industry-standard projections by the Energy Information Administration from as late as 2006 suggested ever-increasing consumption of oil and gasoline, U.S. gasoline consumption has fallen by 5.5 percent since 2007, or nearly half a million barrels per day. At the same time, production of renewable energy has increased rapidly. Since 2008, electricity production generation from wind has tripled while solar generation is up more than ten-fold.



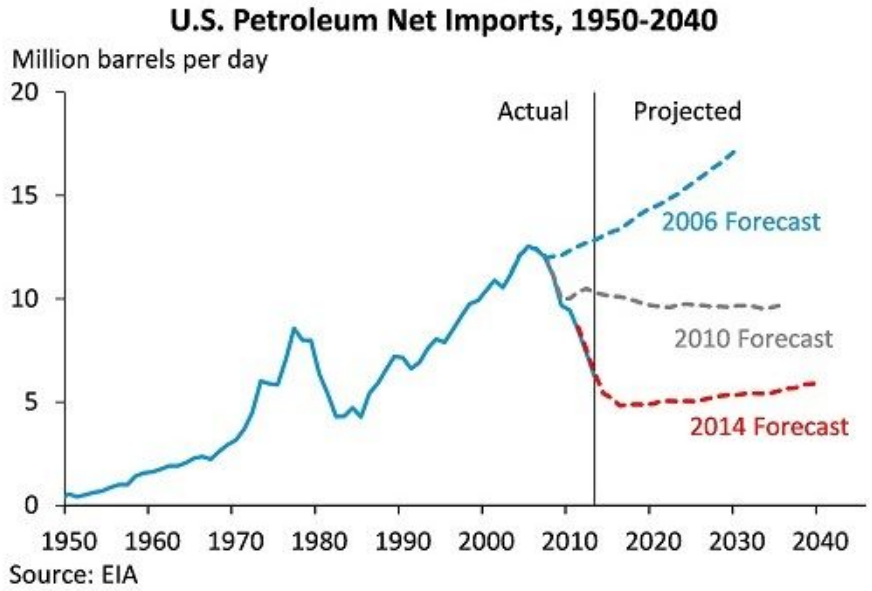
2. The energy sector has provided key support to the recovery from the Great Recession. Rising domestic energy production has made a significant contribution to GDP growth and job creation. The increases in oil and natural gas production alone contributed more than 0.2 percentage point to real GDP growth in both 2012 and 2013, and employment in these sectors increased by 133,000 between 2010 and 2013. Tens of thousands more jobs have been created in the solar and wind industries. These figures do not account for all the economic spillovers, so the overall impact on the economy of this growth in oil and gas production is even greater.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



Note: CEA calculations use physical quantity data for oil and natural gas production.
Source: EIA; CEA calculations.

3. New CEA analysis finds that the resilience of the economy to international supply shocks—macroeconomic energy security—is enhanced by reducing spending on net petroleum imports and by reducing oil dependence. The factors that have reduced net oil imports—decreased domestic petroleum demand, increased domestic oil production, more efficient vehicles, and increased use of biofuels—reduce the vulnerability of the U.S. economy to oil price shocks stemming from international supply disruptions. Although international oil supply shocks and oil price volatility will always present risks, empirical evidence presented in this report suggests that further reductions in net petroleum imports will reduce those risks.

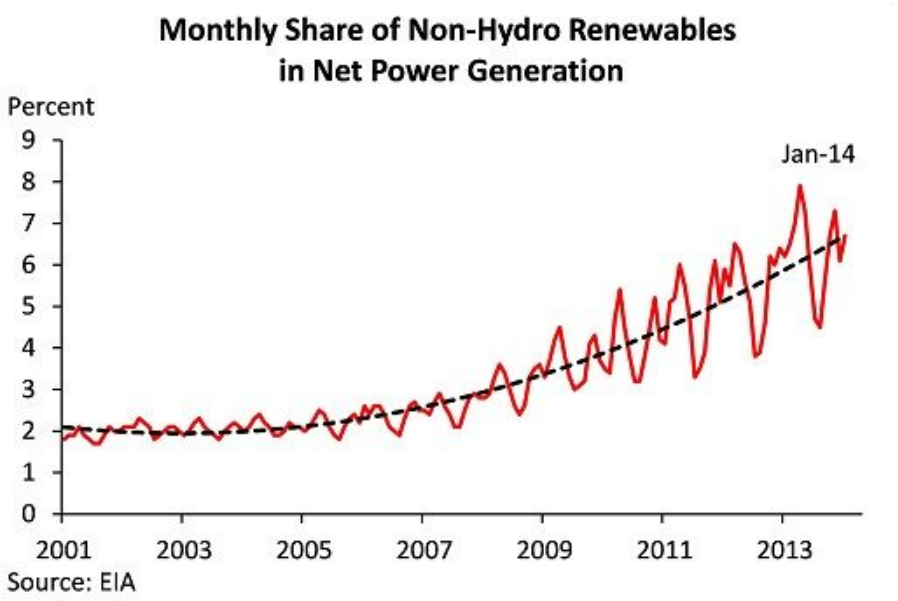


Source: EIA

4. Natural gas is already playing a central role in the transition to a clean energy future. Natural gas is comparatively cleaner than many other sources of energy, and the Administration is supporting its safe and responsible development. Looking further ahead, developing natural gas generation infrastructure now prepares for future widespread deployment of renewable electricity generation. Developing base load natural gas infrastructure today facilitates its use tomorrow for peak demand and renewable backup generation.

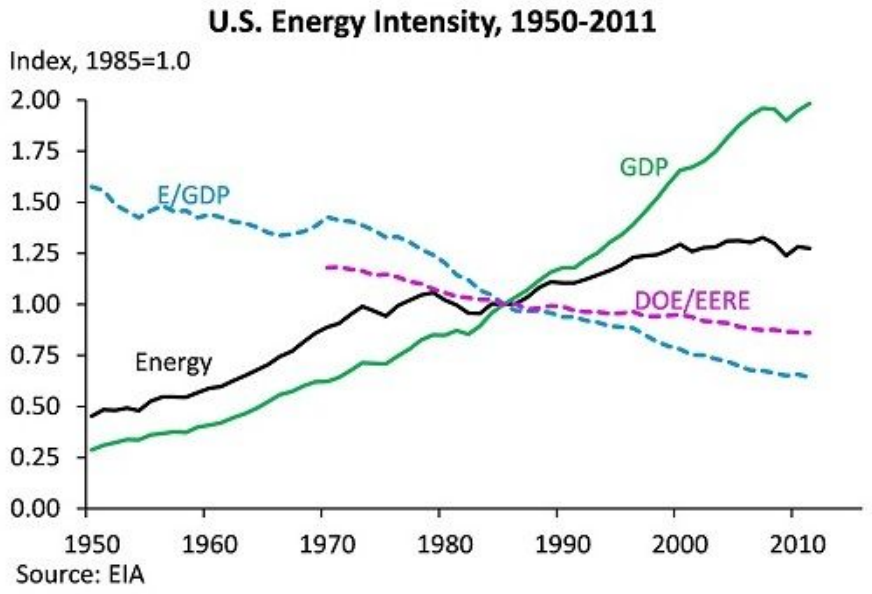
This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

5. The energy revolution also includes a dramatic increase in the use of renewables but more needs to be done to support low- and zero-carbon emissions sources of energy. Government support, increasing competitiveness of wind and photovoltaic electricity production, and renewable portfolio standards that many states have adopted have together increased the share of electricity generated by non-hydro renewables from roughly 2 percent in 2007 to 6 percent in 2013. The Administration backs support for renewables, including the renewable energy production tax credit, and supports early deployment projects aimed at bringing down the ultimate market price of renewables.

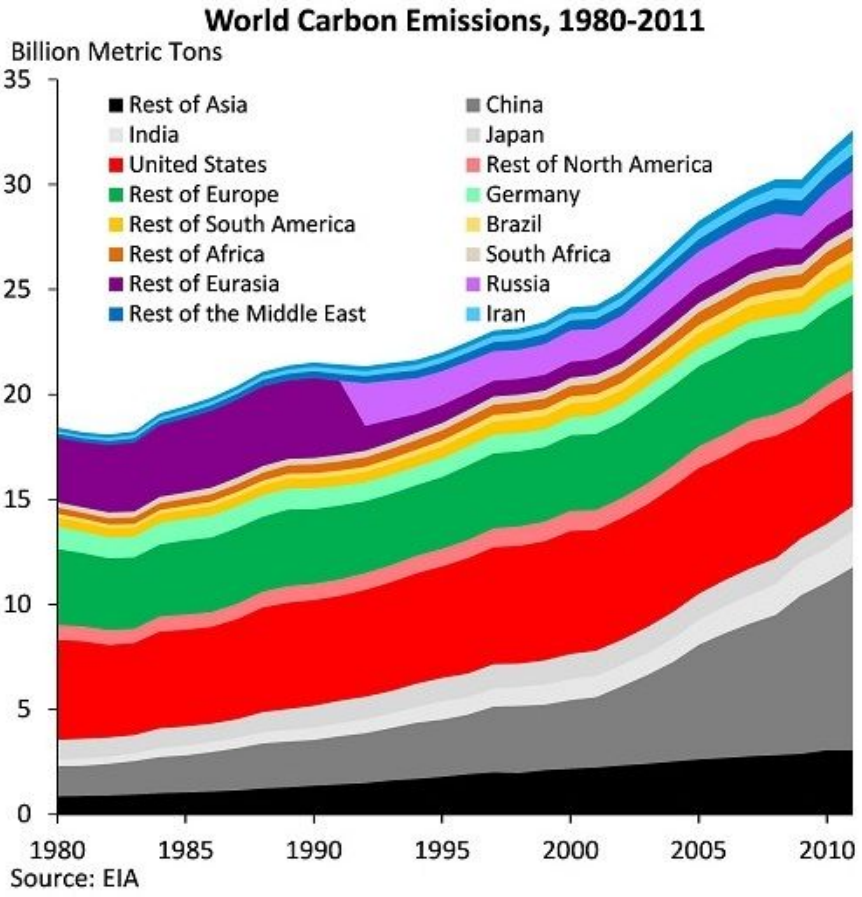


6. The United States is becoming more energy-efficient. The amount of energy used to produce a dollar of real GDP has declined steadily over the past four decades, and today stands at less than half of what it was in 1970. Moreover, consumption of petroleum including motor gasoline has declined significantly as fuel efficiency standards continue to rise.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



7. The United States has reduced its total carbon pollution since 2005 more than any other nation on Earth, though much more work remains to address this critical imperative. While energy-related CO_2 emissions have fallen 10 percent from their peak in 2007, recent projections suggest that emissions could begin to increase again. In his 2013 State of the Union address, the President again called on Congress to pass legislation that would provide a market-based mechanism for reducing emissions. Absent a market-based solution, a central goal of national energy policy is to develop and to deploy low-carbon technologies that the market would not otherwise undertake because of the externality of greenhouse gas emissions.



This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Lee Fang" <lee@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: "Lee Fang" <lee@progressiveaccountability.org>
Date: 8/26/2008 5:42:30 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 08/26/08

Main Topics: POW, Houses, Convention Speeches

Summary of Shift: The convention speeches by Michelle Obama and Ted Kennedy led the news cycle. The arrest of men accused of conspiring to assassinate Barack Obama was also a prominent story this morning. An intro video for a Madonna concert juxtaposing McCain with Adolph Hitler and Robert Mugabe gained significant controversy and coverage. The understanding that McCain might be overusing his POW experience as a rhetorical tool for deflecting any criticism is continuing to creep into the mainstream media. Cautiously citing the Maureen Dowd column as their reasoning, pundits on MSNBC and CNN noted McCain's bizarre invocation of being a POW when asked by late night comedian Jay Leno about the houses gaffe.

Other news surrounded flooding caused by Tropical Storm Fay, a new hurricane forming in the Caribbean, and the housing market slump.

Highlights:

1. NBC: McCain on Jay Leno; invokes POW for houses gaffe
2. Nicholle Wallace interviews
   a. MSNBC: Wallace defends McCain's constant use of POW experience
   b. NBC: Wallace praises Michelle Obama, highlights campaign themes
3. CNN: Velshi summarizes McCain tax plan
4. Overuse of POW
   a. CNN: Ed Rollins defends McCain using the POW card
   b. MSNBC: Mike Murphy also defends McCain invoking POW experience

Highlights, No Clips:

1. COMEDY: Daily Show mocks McCain sending Graham and Lieberman to Georgia as envoys; move smacks of arrogance

Local Coverage:

1. KPHO-CBS-AZ: REPORTER: Yes that is Puero Rican Musician Daddy Yankee who had a hit four years ago with the song Gasolina. He says he backs McCain because of his support of immigration efforts. Students were supposed to ask the Presidential hopeful some questions but apparently that never happened.

Clips:

Highlight #1

JAY LENO: Welcome back, Sen. McCain, for one million dollars, how many houses do you have?

JOHN MCCAIN: You know, could I just mention to you, Jay, and a moment of seriousness. I spent five and a half years in a prison cell, without—I didn't have a house, I didn't have a kitchen table, I didn't have a table, I didn't have a chair. And I spent those five and a half years, because—not because I wanted to get a house when I got out. And you know, I'm very proud of Cindy's father, he was a guy that barely got out of high school, fought in World War II in the Army Air Corps, came home and made a business and made the American dream and so somehow. You've had Cindy on this show.

LENO: Right right.

MCCAIN: The fact is she's extremely generous. She goes around the world doing humanitarian stuff. She's now in Georgia, as we speak, looking at the humanitarian aspects as a result of this Russian invasion. So look I'm proud of my life and my record, and we spend our time in a condominium in Washington, a condominium in Phoenix, some time over here in the state of California, and then we have a place up in northern Arizona," he said. And my friends, I'm proud of my record of service to this country, and it has nothing to do with houses. What it has to do with putting Americans in houses and keeping them in their homes.' And that's what I know how to do.

LENO: That sounded like five houses, okay. I had five in the pool. Let me ask you about these negative ads, because I have to admit I've been a little- everything seemed kind of okay until about a month ago. And with, whether its Paris Hilton, you know the other thing with the houses, everyone makes one little slip and it comes. The American people- with the dollar where it is, the fuel prices- it just seems so ridiculous.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MCCAIN: Well we all don't like negative ads and I thought the ads we put up were an attempt to be humorous but also- and I thought they were very funny and put up-and also differentiate between my positions and that of Senator Obama. But I think that the tone of this campaign is very rough. I think we all agree. What would have helped if Senator Obama agreed with what I wanted to do, come to town hall meetings together so that we can face the American people. What I learned is from the town hall meetings, that's where you learn hopes and dreams and aspirations and concerns of Americans that are hurting right now. So if we just stood on the stage together, it changes the atmosphere. Many years ago Barry Goldwater and Jack Kennedy had agreed to fly around the country and go from one place to another and stand before the American people. I still wish that Senator Obama would do that. I think that would change the American-

LENO: But look at Barry Goldwater [laughs] He got screwed.

MCCAIN: As you know the tragedy of Dallas intervened but I think it would have been great for the American people to see us stand together. […]

Highlight #2
Wallace Defends McCain's Constant Use Of POW Experience (MSNBC 08/26/08 8:12am)
NICHOLLE WALLACE: You I think starting with all these tender moments was very smart. You know Republicans have hearts too, you couldn't not be moved by Ted Kennedy's sheer force of will standing there. It was a moving moment. I think Michelle Obama moved people in her discussion of her father when he was sick. But I think it will drop off pretty quickly and pretty dramatically. And I think they've turned to a bottom drawer strategy, they're throwing everything but the kitchen sink at John McCain, and you know we'll see. There's a lot of pressure to do more than they did four years ago.

MIKA BRZEZINKSI: I'm just curious about the awkward moment on Leno.

WALLACE: About what?

BRZEZINSKI: Leno. McCain on Jay Leno last night.

WALLACE: Are you anti-Leno?

BRZEZINSKI: No I'm not.

JOE SCARBOROUGH: Do we have that clip? We're scrambling to get it.

BRZEZINSKI: I thought it was kind of awkward, I'm not sure about that and there has been some criticism about how his history about POW has been used on the advice of the campaign. I would say there have been times that John McCain has not even liked to go there because he doesn't want to flout it and he doesn't want to connect with people who have those very stories in a private way.

SCARBOROUGH: Let's take a listen and tell us what you think.
[plays clip of McCain on Leno talking about POW experience]

SCARBOROUGH: And of course some people are saying its sort of a nonsequitar to the question, Maureen Dowd Sunday saying that he's going a lil bit too often on it.

WALLACE: I think I got a shout out in there. Yeah, I've given up the New York Times for my own mental health.

BRZEZINSKI: Given up on Maureen.

WALLACE: Yeah. It's not a talking point, it's a fact. John McCain was a prisoner of war, and it's not thrown out there in anything other than an explanation. His ability to understand the true blessing of having a home is-comes from his life experience, he says that he knows what it was like and I think the other capacity in which we were criticized for mentioning it was when he was accused of cheating and I think it's very relevant then that a man who spends five and half years as a prisoner of war could never be compelled to cheat in a talk-a-thon with Barack Obama. It's just not on the same level.

BRZEZINSKI: Well Nicholle I get what your saying, but you're really good at this. Probably a standout in the campaign for sure, or in many campaigns, and what I don't get that that experience is so uniquely personal and carries so much weight compared to Barack Obama's life story. Wouldn't you be afriad, would'nt your advice be don't overuse it, don't throw it out. Find the moment and bring it home? And isn't this just tossing it on Leno in response to a joke?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

WALLACE: I hear you, I hear you. And I think it was- it is a precious part of the John McCain story. And it's a lot of people do already know about him. And there are a few people who don't know his extraordinary history, that he grew up in a military family, and you kno when we get a chance to remind people of his life, as we did ironically this attack over the houses has given John and Cindy McCain to tell the story about Cindy McCain's father who came back from world war two, shot down three times, came back, put together $10,000 dollars, and built the most successful beer distributorship in America. I don't know what part of the American dream offends Barack Obama, but telling these parts of the story that might be- there's always balance, every campaign [crosstalk]

BRZEZINKSI: ... remember how many houses he had, Nicholle Wallace would be on that one, all over it, and I mean c'mon.

SCARBOROUGH: Perhaps.

WALLACE: Not that he couldn't remember. I think we can all acknowledge. I mean he has four homes, he released financial disclosures in the Senate, I mean I think you all familiar with that. And there are investment properties, I think he's made clear there are other properties. He's not apologizing for the great blessings that he has in Cindy's success, in his father-in-law's success, realizing the American dream.

SCARBOROUGH: Does a chance this housing crisis, John McCain's, he doesn't know how many houses he has. Does that make Mitt Romney less likely as VP?

Wallace Praises Michelle Obama, Highlights Themes of Campaign (NBC 08/26/08 7:47am)
MATT LAUER: So let me ask you on the record how she did and does the McCain campaign doubt her [Michelle Obama's] love of country?

NICHOLLE WALLACE: Of course not. Look I thought she had an incredible night last night. She looked beautiful. I've never heard anyone speak in such a large forum with such high stakes about their father in such a tender way so I thought that Michelle Obama's talk about her father grew sick and woke up earlier. It was really a tender moment. The question, Matt, that we all have to ask is will these tender moments start to bridge the gap and solve his political problems? I'm not smart enough to know that they will.

LAUER: His political problems such as what?

WALLACE:Well his number one deficiency in the views of the voters that haven't made up their mind yet is that he lacks the experience and the judgment to step into the role of commander and chief. So I didn't see anything last night that leads me to believe that he's begun to bridge that gap. You know we're really proud, we've fought hard and we'll continue to fight hard every day of this election to win over some of the people who thought Hillary Clinton would make the best President. At least some of them- I'd say a lot of them, thought she was the best candidate because she had the experience to step into that commander in chief role [...]

LAUER: Yeah but Nicholle, there's a big hurdle there if you've got some staunch Hillary Clinton supporters are they going to switch over and over for John McCain when there is a major issue like abortion rights. Are a lot of people who are in favor of a woman's right to choose are going to cross over and vote for a pro-life candidate?

WALLACE: We'll have to wait and see. I think rebuilding this economy, breaking this dependence on foreign sources of energy, you know moms, theres a lot of households of people who drive, carpools who run errands who are in their cars all day and there is nothing that animates them more than the town hall meetings that we go to then when we talk about John McCain's very specific strategy for breaking our dependence on foreign oil, making our nation energy independent. They care abot jobs and they care about keeping this country safe. [...]

Highlight #3
Velshi Touches On Candidate Tax Plans (CNN 08/26/08
ALI VELSHI: So his argument is that you're not going to pay any more income tax under John McCain at all. He's also going to phase out the Alternative Minimum Tax, which some of you fall into, as you know. That's been creeping up and getting more and more Americans. It was designed for a tax on the filthy rich. And that's turned out not to be the case.

He's also planning on cutting the corporate tax rate from 35 percent to 20 percent, and doing other things to give businesses an incentive to invest more in research and development and to hire more people. So his emphasis is on business in terms of creating jobs.

I'm going to be back in the next hour to talk about their stance on the mortgage crisis and, in fact, on jobs. What they're going to do for working Americans.

Highlight#4
Rollins Defends McCain Using POW Experience To Deflect Criticism (CNN 08/26/08 6:58am)
CHETRY: Not to take anything away from his time as a P.O.W. But Maureen Dowd in "The New York Times" on Sunday said his campaign is cheapening his greatest strength in making a mockery of his already dubious claim that he's reticent to talk about his P.O.W. experience by flashing the P.O.W. card to rebut any criticism, no matter how unrelated."

Is there a danger in bringing up his times of P.O.W. too much.

ROLLINS: I don't think being a hero is ever an endangerment. And I think that made him who he is today. Now, obviously, as it reflects on the houses and all the rest of it -- the houses aren't his, they're his wife. John McCain has never been anybody who left the Senate, who not made money, never took his hero coat, who not made money.

He married someone who had a lot of money, inherited a lot of money. Does he live in her houses, yes. It's her lifestyle. His lifestyle is working very hard as a United States senator as he has for many, many years.

CHETRY: Is that the answer you would give. Is that what you would tell him to respond to when he was asked about the house?

ROLLINS: That's certainly the answer I would give.

CHETRY: Ed Rollins, we'll see you a little bit later on the hour. Thanks for being with us.

Murphy Defends McCain Using POW; Says McCain Is Typically Hesitant (MSNBC 08/26/08 9:40am)
MIKA BRZEZINSKI: Senator McCain in a serious moment on the Today Show-er Tonight Show with Jay Leno. I thought it was a little awkward.

JOE SCARBOROUGH: Mike Murphy, Maureen Dowd a couple days ago was criticizing John McCain for going to the well one time too often, and on the POW story. Last night he was asked about his houses, he went back to the POW story. Is there a possibility he could use that too much?

MIKE MURPHY: Well there's a possibility but he's generally pretty hesitant about using it. I didn't see the Leno clip and I didn't have sound on that so I haven't really seen it yet. I think McCain has a lot of license to talk about what he's done.

BRZEZINKSI: But Mike come on. I'll tell you about it. Jay Leno asked him in a joking form about how many houses he has, because that issue has come up because what he said to Politico and he just launched into his one house that he lived in for five years. To my, my gosh, never- I would never- I can only have respect for his experience. But it seems like the campaign might be doing him a disservice to having him, bringing it up in inopportune moments.

MURPHY: Well our policy in the 2000 campaign, which McCain drove, was less is more.

BRZEZINSKI: Yeah.

MURPHY: You know, about that sort of stuff. I didn't see this clip so I'm uncomfortable really talking about it. I will say the house thing though is a little over done. I think, I understand it was classic campaign gaffe, it had its week but it's not going to be the center of a presidential race.

BRZEZINSKI: Wouldn't you advise him to have an answer that is a joke in response to Jay Leno on the issue?

MURPHY: Yeah, I'm always for good answers . . . the Democrats think they're going to beat John McCain, large family, a couple of vacation properties, I think it's pretty ridiculous.
[. . .]
MURPHY: Barack Obama, let's talk to his mortgage broker.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BRZEZINSKI: Oh, here we go . . .
[. . .]
SCARBOROUGH: Well people are saying the Tony Rezko issue is not a fair issue, that he didn't help him get a house.

MURPHY: My view is they're both sideshow issues. They're both good guys. Neither of them are corrupt at all . . .

SCARBOROUGH: Yeah, and I don't think in the end people can go around yelling Rezko, Rezko all they want, I think people believe that Barack Obama's a good guy. I don't think that that's going to draw blood with the swing voters . . . there is not a pattern of corruption on either side.

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Adrienne Elrod" <aelrod@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 4/12/2015 2:37:42 PM
Subject: Re: draft surrogate talkers -- responding to day 1 attacks

FYI - our talkers tomorrow already have our positive "the reviews are in" doc. This is just an addendum that is only going to a handful of folks who are going on tv tomorrow

On Sun, Apr 12, 2015 at 9:35 PM, Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

> Agree on need for positive stuff. If we're not already let's add the topper but send them all the great stuff we've put together today so that people aren't seeing this in a vacuum.
>
> On Sun, Apr 12, 2015 at 9:31 PM, Karen Finney <kfinney@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:
>
> > Can we start with a positive line like - despite the overwhelmingly positive response to Hillary's message, the GOP went into attack mode.
> >
> > On Sun, Apr 12, 2015 at 9:15 PM, Ian Sams <isams@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:
> >
> > > Hey folks. Here are some points we pulled together for surrogates going on TV -- not a wide blast -- on how to respond to day one attacks on HRC. Thoughts? Adrienne/Karen/etc. can get to surrogates once we're all good.
> > >
> > > Thanks.
> > > Ian
> > >
> > > OPENING DAY -- SURROGATE TALKING POINTS ON GOP ATTACKS
> > >
> > > Today we've seen a wide range of attacks from the entire GOP field and their allies. Below are some points to respond -- keeping the focus on Hillary's desire to focus on voters while the Republicans are trotting out tired attacks on her.
> > >
> > > - Republicans can focus on attacking her, but Hillary is focused on meeting voters and having real conversations about issues facing everyday Americans. This is the start of the different kind of campaign that Hillary wants to run -- one that is squarely focused on having a conversation with voters -- answering their questions, asking them questions and sharing ideas.
> >
> > - Meanwhile, Republicans want to be the champions for those at the top. While Hillary is talking to voters and focused on everyday Americans, every single Republican candidate has offered the same tired attacks and the same economic agenda that Americans know rob them of the stability they've worked so hard for -- with a top-down agenda that would stack the deck even more in favor of those at the top.
>
> - Americans have responded clearly that they appreciate Hillary's focus on their issues and their lives, so if Republicans want to keep their focus on tired political attacks, that's their choice.
>
> If pressed on specific GOP attacks on foreign policy/HRC's record at the State Department, stemming from Jeb Bush's video or other attacks:
>
> Job number one for Hillary as Secretary of State was to restore America's leadership after it was badly eroded by eight years of the Bush administration's foreign policy -- two wars, damaged alliances, diminished moral standing, no stopping Iran's nuclear program, and no action on climate. She's proud of her accomplishments.
>
> - Hillary led the effort to build a worldwide coalition to impose the toughest sanctions in history against the Iranians, which forced them to the negotiating table and gave us our best shot at preventing them from acquiring a nuclear weapon.
> - Hillary brokered a ceasefire between Israel and Hamas in Gaza, which prevented a wider war and protected Israel's security.
> - Hillary stood up to Putin by strengthening NATO, encouraging Europe to find alternative sources of energy, and called him out for trying to rebuild the Soviet Empire.
> - Hillary worked with President Obama to get every major developing country, including China and India, to agree for the first time to reduce their carbon emissions and be held accountable for it.

- Hillary put internet freedom, LGBT rights, and women's rights on the global agenda, and defending human rights advocates on the frontlines around the world.
- And, of course, she was part of the President's team making the decision to launch the raid against bin Laden.

Jeb Bush may attack Hillary's time as Secretary of State now, but it's just negative politics meant to gin up his Republican base.

- Jeb Bush in 2013: "Former Secretary Clinton has dedicated her life to serving and engaging people across the world in democracy. These efforts as a citizen, an activist, and a leader have earned Secretary Clinton this year's Liberty Medal." [National Constitution Center, 6/27/2013]

Jeb Bush is advocating for the same failed foreign policy that led us to misguided wars and degraded our nation's standing in the world.

- Jeb Bush on George W. Bush: "I will tell you that I'm the only Republican that was in office when he was office as President that never disagreed with him. And I'm not going to start now. Why would I do that now after two years? …I'm not going to start now. It's just – 'til death do us part." [CNN interview]

--
Ian Sams | Rapid Response Associate
Hillary for America
(423) 915-6592 | @IanSams
Gchat: icsams

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
To view this discussion on the web visit https://groups.google.com/d/msgid/hrcrapid/CABd81JJxcSiv95x3%3Duc5H1fSQ5M9CZZ0deNmoNAwM%2BHKiO-p3Q%40mail.gmail.com.
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com.
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .

To view this discussion on the web visit https://groups.google.com/d/msgid/hrcrapid/CANOiRV9voo87eQ%2B49MXGxRrOM5gUxNkP0nCAL5ybLthiBFQVhA%40mail.gmail.com.

For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
To view this discussion on the web visit https://groups.google.com/d/msgid/hrcrapid/CAE_%3DYH9A96%3DBbB_V%2Bc2TuOy_zj4wT64H-ge3x9KHPB77Ob4ZEA%40mail.gmail.com.

For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
To view this discussion on the web visit https://groups.google.com/d/msgid/hrcrapid/CANu9wN4y7mDSVE1v%3DFO2ch96ceJU0a3jBz4EP8EVGbX7PsJiSg%40mail.gmail.com.
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <ctrfriendsfamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 8/19/2014 11:34:32 PM
Subject: CTR Tuesday August 20, 2014 Morning Roundup

Correct The Record Tuesday August 20, 2014 Morning Roundup:

Headlines:

MSNBC: "Hillary Clinton allies tout her record on 'smart power'"

"Correct the Record, the research and rapid response arm of a pro-Clinton super PAC, is equipping its surrogates and supporters Tuesday with a report and talking points memo, shared with msnbc, that promote Clinton's use of 'smart power.'"

Washington Post blog: National Security: "Cherry-picking Clinton's words"

"In total, it was Clinton's description of the world as she sees it and hardly an attempt to highlight her differences with President Obama, as Goldberg and others have written by cherry-picking her answers to some leading questions."

Huffington Post: "We Almost Can't Handle Andrea Mitchell's Ice Bucket Challenge Video"

"The setting, the Greenspan, the selection of Hillary Clinton, Chuck Todd and John Kerry as the people Mitchell challenged — we almost shouted 'THIS TOWN THIS TOWN THIS TOWN' over and over again."

Politico: "Pols on Ferguson: Sound of silence"

"The eventual Democratic nominee — Clinton or anyone else — will face a burden, as Sharpton suggested, to discuss it thoughtfully in a campaign, several operatives said. But few strategists see that moment as imminent, arguing that Clinton would risk fomenting an already heated situation."

Vox: "Why Hillary Clinton can get away with not talking about Ferguson"

"It's clear that Barack Obama, for a variety of fairly sound reasons, is not going to take this opportunity to address the question of systematic racial injustice in the American criminal justice system. But somebody ought to. And the next Democratic Party presidential nominee would be a fairly logical choice."

Washington Post blog: The Fix: "Why all of Hillary Clinton's top challengers are unlikely to run"

"Their motivations for not running appear, in many cases, to be much more convincing than their arguments for running."

Wall Street Journal column: WSJ editorial board member Jason L. Riley: "Princess Hillary"

"Out of touch, or out of practice?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Hillary Clinton's Speaking Gigs Could Become a Big Problem"

"Talk about controlling."

Fox 25 (Boston): "Warren dodges questions if Hillary is best choice for Democrats in 2016"

"When asked if she thinks Hillary Clinton is the best choice for the Democratic party in 2016, Warren said Clinton is 'terrific.'"

Articles:

MSNBC: "Hillary Clinton allies tout her record on 'smart power'"

By Alex Seitz-Wald

August 19, 2014, 2:00 p.m. EDT

Allies of Hillary Clinton are working to bolster the former secretary of state's foreign policy accomplishments after a recent interview erupted into controversy over her worldview.

Correct the Record, the research and rapid response arm of a pro-Clinton super PAC, is equipping its surrogates and supporters Tuesday with a report and talking points memo, shared with msnbc, that promote Clinton's use of "smart power."

It's the latest in a series of reports the group regularly distributes, all of which tout a different piece of Clinton's record, from LGBT rights to income inequality to the environment.

"Smart power" was central to Clinton's time at State, Correct the Record notes. An alternative to military action, Clinton viewed the approach as the strategic deployment of a mix of economic, diplomatic, political, legal, and cultural power, tailored to specific situations.

"As secretary of state, Hillary Clinton utilized a combination of creative tools to achieve foreign policy goals as an alternative to unilateral military action in many circumstances. This combination of diplomatic and economic tactics known as 'smart power' produced a number of results, ranging from strengthening our position with China to combating terrorism," Adrienne Elrod, Correct the Record's communications director, told msnbc.

Last week, The Atlantic magazine published an interview in which Clinton criticized President Obama on foreign policy, producing some tension with Obama loyalists and from some on the progressive left.

The Correct the Record report and talking points tout Clinton's commitment to "smart power," and give specific examples where the approach "produced results" by "rebuilding America's standing in the world."

In Asia, for instance, the group says that Clinton's approach helped counterbalance China by strengthening alliances with smaller nations while also broadening relations with Beijing. In her new memoir, "Hard Choices," Clinton writes that she had multiple options on how to deal with China's rise, but "decided that the 'smart power' choice was to meld all three approaches."

To combat terrorism, her allies say Clinton used "smart power" to better engage technology, to establish a global counterterrorism forum, and to handle delicate relations with Pakistan and Afghanistan. The forum brought together nations that did not have much in common, and may not have wanted to work together on other issues, but were willing to cooperate on the narrow issue of counterterrorism.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To implement her vision, Correct the Record notes that Clinton took a page from the Defense Department by starting a Quadrennial Diplomacy and Development Review – a major State Department self-examination process that "aimed to map out exactly how we would put smart power into practice."

If Clinton runs for president in 2016, she is expected to put her foreign policy record and tenure as secretary of state front and center. Republicans have already tied to claim that Clinton did not accomplish much at Foggy Bottom, a notion Clinton allies like Correct the Record are hoping to nip in the bud. Clinton has said she will decide on a run by the end of the year.

Washington Post blog: National Security: "Cherry-picking Clinton's words"

By Walter Pincus

August 18, 2014

Hillary Clinton says the country should "learn lessons" from today's problem areas and "figure out how we're going to have different and better responses going forward."

That's my take-away from reading the transcript of her long interview with the Atlantic's Jeffrey Goldberg, published Aug. 10. In total, it was Clinton's description of the world as she sees it and hardly an attempt to highlight her differences with President Obama, as Goldberg and others have written by cherry-picking her answers to some leading questions.

For example, Clinton does not say it was the U.S. "failure" to aid Syrian rebels that created the vacuum that led to the rise of Islamic State militants.

Clinton said she had proposed that "if we were to carefully vet, train, and equip early on a core group of the developing Free Syrian Army, we would, number one, have some better insight into what was going on on the ground."

She also pointed out that establishing that unified opposition "would prove to be very difficult, because there was this constant struggle between what was largely an exile group outside of Syria trying to claim to be the political opposition, and the people on the ground, primarily those doing the fighting and dying, who rejected that."

Clinton then added this important factor: "We were never able to bridge that [gap among the various groups opposing President Bashar al-Assad inside and outside Syria], despite a lot of efforts that [former U.S. ambassador to Syria] Robert [Ford] and others made."

Her conclusion: "I can't sit here today and say that if we had done what I recommended, and what Robert Ford recommended, that we'd be in a demonstrably different place."

That is exactly the argument Obama has been making in justifying his limited support given through the CIA to selected, vetted Syrian opposition fighters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Take the other picked-up phrase, Obama's statement, "Don't do stupid stuff."

It came up after Clinton spoke of "what we've learned about the limits of our power to spread freedom and democracy." She described that as "one of the big lessons out of Iraq."

Another lesson from Egypt should be, she said, "if you have no political — small p — experience, it is really hard to go from dictatorship to anything resembling what you and I would call democracy."

When Goldberg first raised "don't do stupid stuff," Clinton described Obama's phrase as a lesson for "what we did in Iraq . . . to have no plan about what to do after we did it [invaded the country]." She went on to describe the phrase as "not an organizing principle" that great nations need but "a necessary brake on the actions you might take in order to promote a vision."

It was Goldberg who then suggested that "don't do stupid stuff" was Obama's "foreign policy in a nutshell."

Clinton responded, "I think he was trying to communicate to the American people that he's not going to do something crazy."

She talked about Obama having expended "a lot of capital and energy trying to pull us out of the hole we're in. So I think that that's a political message, it's not his worldview."

Goldberg asked whether she was "taking a harder line than your former colleagues in the Obama administration" when it came to Iran having little or no right to enrich uranium.

Clinton replied, "I've always been in the camp that held that they [the Iranians] did not have a right to enrichment. Contrary to their claim, there is no such thing as a right to enrich. This is absolutely unfounded."

That has been the position of the Obama administration. In a 2013 backgrounder for reporters, a senior administration official said Article IV of the NonproliferationTreaty "is silent on the issue [of enrichment]. It neither confers a right nor denies a right. So we don't believe it is inherently there."

Clinton then explained her view of the negotiations.

"I think it's important to send a signal to everybody who is there that there cannot be a deal unless there is a clear set of restrictions on Iran. The preference would be no enrichment. The potential fallback position would be such little enrichment that they could not break out. So, little or no enrichment has always been my position."

Pushed by Goldberg, Clinton said, "No enrichment at all would make everyone breathe easier. If, however, they want a little bit for the Tehran research reactor, or a little bit for this scientific researcher, but they'll never go above 5 percent enrichment."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On the controversial question of permissible centrifuges for Iran, Clinton laughed at the Iranian leadership saying Iran has no intention of developing a bomb but wants 190,000 centrifuges. She called it a maximum position but pointed out that there are talks going on inside Iran about what a final position should be.

She was asked if she would she accept “a few thousand centrifuges.”

“If we’re talking a little, we’re talking about a discrete, constantly inspected number of centrifuges,” she said, but she refused to define what “a little” is.

That also appears to be the Obama administration’s current negotiating position.

Read the transcript and make up your own mind about Clinton’s views.

I fear the interview’s treatment so far illustrates a concern about journalism that former Washington Post editorial page editor Meg Greenfield noted more than a dozen years ago.

In her book “Washington,” she wrote that journalists “in so many cases [have] ceased thinking of the people they write about as people at all, thinking of them instead as opportune props and raw material for use in their stories and in opinion pieces.”

Huffington Post: “We Almost Can't Handle Andrea Mitchell's Ice Bucket Challenge Video”

By Catherine Taibi

August 19, 2014, 1:14 p.m. EDT

This has to be one of the most insane Ice Bucket Challenges we've seen yet.

MSNBC's Andrea Mitchell hopped on board the viral trend to raise money for ALS Monday night. Mitchell showed her video on air Tuesday, in which her husband, the former Federal Reserve czar Alan Greenspan dumps a bucket of ice water on her head.

The setting, the Greenspan, the selection of Hillary Clinton, Chuck Todd and John Kerry as the people Mitchell challenged — we almost shouted "THIS TOWN THIS TOWN THIS TOWN" over and over again. But then we didn't.

Her reaction makes us LOL every time. Watch the video for the full clip on MSNBC.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Politico: “Pols on Ferguson: Sound of silence”

By Maggie Haberman

August 20, 2014, 5:05 a.m. EDT

When the Rev. Al Sharpton visited Ferguson, Missouri, on Sunday, he told people at a rally that it was time for people like Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush to make their views heard.

“Jeb Bush, Hillary Clinton, don’t get laryngitis on this issue,” Sharpton, a New York-based preacher and MSNBC host, said, calling it a defining moment. “Nobody can go to the White House unless they stop by our house and talk about policing.”

So far, though, few Democrats have joined Sharpton’s call. And few potential 2016 candidates are rushing into the Ferguson fray — for good reason, strategists say.

After her summer book tour, which included a string of major media interviews, expectations have gelled that Clinton will give her opinion on a range of topics. No Democrat considering running in 2016 gets a fraction of the media attention she does, and it is one of the reasons some of President Barack Obama’s advisers have publicly questioned her decision to be so visible ahead of another likely campaign.

“That is [the] peril of being out front,” said Bruce Haynes, a Republican operative with Purple Strategies. “Everyone wants to know what you think about everything, whether you want to talk or not.”

But Democratic strategists say there’s little to be gained for Clinton — or for that matter, other likely White House contenders — by weighing in beyond brief statements on the still-roiling situation in Ferguson. And the risk of escalating matters is real. So is the risk of getting ahead of the White House, where President Barack Obama on Monday was noticeably restrained as he described the dangers in predetermining the outcome of an episode so far marked more by a lack of information than clarity.

By Monday, Sharpton was back at 30 Rockefeller Center, where he resumed his call to action to Clinton and others. But few Democrats are echoing him. More politicians opining on cable news, they say, won’t do much good.

“There’s two tragedies unfolding in American politics,” Donna Brazile, Al Gore’s 2000 campaign manager, said in an email. “The murder of a young unarmed man by a policeman and the mishandling of the case by local officials. And the second is the rush to politicize the tragic death of Mike Brown.

“I would caution all politicians outside Missouri to withhold making statements until the investigation is completed,” Brazile added, saying Clinton should not say anything until either Attorney General Eric Holder completes his visit on Wednesday or until the investigation is completed.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Neither Clinton (who has been vacationing in the Hamptons) nor Bush (who has kept a much lower profile of late and is not the field-clearing presence in his own party that Clinton is in hers) has said anything publicly about the police shooting of 18-year-old Michael Brown or the days of unrest that have followed his death. Neither has Vice President Joe Biden. (All three lived through the racial strife of the 1960s, unlike younger 2016 hopefuls.)

Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, a former Baltimore mayor, talked about the need for healing and alluded to racial divides that exist, but did not discuss the specifics of the case.

Rep. Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) implored people to take a "deep breath" and let the investigation unfold. New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, another Sharpton target, said the scene in the St. Louis suburb has become "a spectacle" and said people should not prejudge what happened without the facts.

Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.), who is doing the most in the Republican field to reach out to African-Americans but who also is looking to course-correct after raising questions about the Civil Rights Act in the past, drew praise when he wrote an op-ed in Time urging a discussion about race and policing. Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) questioned the arrests of two national reporters. And the shooting has prompted other politicians to call for demilitarizing local police departments and enhancing training.

The caveats for not-yet-candidates are well-known: They are not officially running campaigns and therefore shouldn't be viewed that way; they are private citizens entitled to keep private counsel until they're officially in the race.

Clinton, however, is the ever-present Democratic front-runner who has spoken out on a number of issues, including the border crisis, Obamacare and the budget standoff in Congress last fall. The expectation that she will discuss a range of major topics in the news has started to bake in with the media.

But weighing in on Ferguson would mean getting ahead of the White House.

Though she recently criticized parts of Obama's foreign policy, on national topics Clinton has been basically in lockstep with the president.

Paul was seen as challenging his own party with a call that moved toward the left. In the case of Clinton, or any of the Democrats who might try to challenge her, black voters are overwhelmingly part of the party's base.

Republicans have looked for fissures within the Democratic base on race where Clinton is concerned since the fractious 2008 primary between her and Obama, although polling showed that rift healed soon after she became secretary of state.

The shooting and its aftermath will likely resonate with African-American voters for a long time, coming amid a string of confrontations between black men and the police in recent months. The eventual Democratic nominee — Clinton or anyone else — will face a burden, as Sharpton suggested, to discuss it thoughtfully in a campaign, several operatives said.

But few strategists see that moment as imminent, arguing that Clinton would risk fomenting an already heated situation. Even those potential candidates who have commented are generally warning about not getting ahead of the facts.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“For now, Secretary Clinton, if she’s around, should express her remorse for the killing of an unarmed man,” Brazile said. “She’s a mom. For now, a community is hurting. And a country needs healing. Her voice, while prominent, might distract from the important work that needs to be done.”

Asked whether it made any sense for 2016 candidates to take a position on the Ferguson situation, Obama pollster Joel Benenson replied by email: “This is tragic and terrible situation resulting from the police shooting of an unarmed teenager and this is time for only those who can play a very constructive role in bringing peace to a divided town to be speaking out.”

He added, “I don’t see how asking potential candidates to comment makes any sense, nor do I see how it makes sense for a potential candidate to weigh in unless they have a legitimate role to play in this situation.”

Haynes argued that what candidates choose to talk about is “useful to the voter” because it “informs us of their priorities. Ferguson is a high priority for many African-Americans. They are a critical Democratic primary” voting bloc. “If Hillary is talking about Ferguson what she is really saying is, ‘I understand you and your priorities are my priorities.’”

However, with foreign policy crises flaring up in the Middle East and elsewhere, “Others will observe her speaking about a local dispute as political and pandering,” Haynes said.

Bill Clinton’s election in 1992 played out in the aftermath of the riots surrounding the verdict in the Rodney King police beating in California. The conflict in Ferguson has been less widespread and less violent by comparison.

And the display by officers in riot gear and tanks in the St. Louis suburb was in contrast to how New York City handled the recent chokehold death of an unarmed black man on Staten Island, who police were trying to arrest for selling loose cigarettes. New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio has worked to maintain peace (though Sharpton has criticized police tactics in that case, too).

That Clinton will ultimately have to discuss race and law enforcement seems assured. But few Democrats said the time is now.

Pundits calling for her to comment want her to do so so that “they can continue to feel relevant,” said one Democratic operative not aligned with Clinton. “By ginning up that she hasn’t weighed in, then parsing any word or action she does [take], they can fill valuable hours of cable airtime and Twitter feeds.”

Vox: “Why Hillary Clinton can get away with not talking about Ferguson”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Matthew Yglesias

August 20, 2014, 6:30 a.m. EDT

On Monday, Alex Seitz-Wald wrote an article for MSNBC with the thesis that pressure is building on Hillary Clinton to address the situation in Ferguson. The truth, however, is that while Clinton is certainly taking some criticism for ducking the issue she's not, objectively speaking, under any real pressure. Her position as the presumptive 2016 Democratic Party nominee is simply so strong that there is no incentive for her to wade into politically treacherous waters and every reason for her to try instead to lay low.

And that's the problem.

It's clear that Barack Obama, for a variety of fairly sound reasons, is not going to take this opportunity to address the question of systematic racial injustice in the American criminal justice system. But somebody ought to. And the next Democratic Party presidential nominee would be a fairly logical choice.

It's no secret that the demographics of the country are changing. The youngest cohort of voters is much less white than the national average — and even its white members are more liberal on economic issues. The normal course of things would be for those demographic trends to push the party to tackle new issues that were too hot for Bill Clinton or Barack Obama to touch. That's especially true because the demographics of the Democratic Party are changing along with the rest of the country. In 2012, almost 90 percent of Mitt Romney's votes came from non-Hispanic whites while racial and ethnic minorities provided about 45 percent of Obama's. And a primary campaign, the moment when activists and other policy-demanders have the most leverage over politicians, would be the ideal time for it to happen.

But Democrats aren't likely to get much of a primary campaign this cycle. And that's a shame. Not because there's anything wrong with Hillary, but because it's a lost opportunity to put new issues on the table. So far it's been left to idiosyncratic Republican Rand Paul to make the boldest statement of any prominent national politician. And good for him. But the Democratic Party, with its more multiracial coalition, is going to continue to be the political vehicle for the interests of people of color for years to come. The problem is the lack of a contested primary is denying the country the circumstances in which high-profile Democrats are forced to address the issues that Ferguson has placed squarely on the national agenda.

Huffington Post: “Hillary Clinton Is Everywhere, But Still Nowhere To Be Found On Ferguson”

By Samantha Lachman

August 19, 2014, 1:22 p.m. EDT

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton isn't exactly hiding from the public eye as she plans a trip to Iowa, furthering speculation about whether and when she'll announce plans to seek the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination. Yet, Clinton hasn't said a word about protests in Ferguson, Missouri, following the Aug. 9 shooting of Michael Brown, an unarmed black teenager, by a police officer.

Clinton's silence has provoked questions about why she's mum on an issue that other possible 2016 presidential candidates have felt compelled to weigh in on. Those who have spoken on the topic include Sens. Ted Cruz (R-Texas), Rand Paul (R-Ky.) and Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) as well as former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee (R), Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R) and Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley (D).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It isn't as if Clinton has shied from delving into the politics of the midterm elections as she plans fundraisers for the major Democratic committees. She has critiqued President Barack Obama's foreign policy approach and spoken out about Israel's offensive in Gaza, the downing of a Malaysia Airlines plane in Ukraine, the rise of the Islamic State in Iraq and whether Obama should have armed rebels earlier. And she's appeared across a broad array of cable shows to promote her book, Hard Choices.

But Clinton's calculation appears to be that the Ferguson conflict is one too complex, or dangerous, to address. A Clinton spokesperson did not respond to a HuffPost request for comment Tuesday. (Her camp also declined to comment to MSNBC on Monday.)

Of course Clinton, as a private citizen who holds no public office or elected position, is not obligated to remark on the racial politics surrounding Brown's death, or whether the militarization of America's police forces is a concerning trend. Yet, since Clinton has been willing to comment on an array of other issues, her reticence is noticeable.

Then again, when political figures have waded into the conversation about Ferguson, their comments aren't exactly enthralling. Obama's statement Monday made news for his announcement that Attorney General Eric Holder would travel to Missouri, but otherwise remained dispassionate.

“The [Department of Justice] works for me and when they're conducting an investigation, I've got to make sure that I don't look like I'm putting my thumb on the scale one way or the other,” Obama explained.

The Rev. Al Sharpton called out Clinton, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie (R) and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) on Monday, arguing that they lose credibility by refusing to weigh in on the situation in Ferguson.

“I’m amazed that we’re not hearing from leading [presidential] candidates -- Chris Christie or [former Florida Gov.] Jeb Bush, or Hillary Clinton,” Sharpton said. “This is now a national, central issue, and anyone running for president needs to come up with a formula or -- in my opinion -- they forfeit their right to be taken seriously.”

Washington Post blog: The Fix: “Why all of Hillary Clinton’s top challengers are unlikely to run”

By Aaron Blake

August 19, 2014, 1:51 p.m. EDT

The Hill is out with a list of the top five Democrats who could challenge Hillary Clinton from the left in the 2016 presidential race.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This isn't breaking any new ground, and it's largely the usual suspects. But as the debate over potential challengers to her in 2016 heats up in the months ahead (we're just two and a half months from the start of the 2016 primary campaign) we thought it would be worth looking at why any and all of these folks would not run.

And indeed, their motivations for not running appear, in many cases, to be much more convincing than their arguments for running.

Here are the five:

1. Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) -- praise for Clinton

Warren has said ad nauseam that she is "not running" for president in 2016, a statement that is notably in the present tense. But when it comes to challenging Clinton -- something the New Republic gave some big treatment last year -- we think the present tense applies to the future.

Warren has said repeatedly that Clinton is "terrific" and even praised Clinton in her book for pushing her husband, who was then president, to veto a 1998 bankruptcy reform bill that was supported by the financial industry.

The crux of the Warren-vs.-Clinton argument is that Clinton is too closely aligned with big finance and moneyed interests and not liberal enough. Given Warren's repeated praise for Clinton -- including on finance issues -- that could be a hard case for her to prosecute.

2. Vice President Biden -- presidentiality (if that's actually a word)

Biden has been angling toward a 2016 campaign harder than basically any other Demcorat, up to and including Clinton. And the idea that he will simply stand down for her seems far-fetched -- especially who you consider the 71-year-old two-time presidential hopeful faces perhaps his last chance to run.

But there is plenty of reason for him not to do just that, and the biggest reason is viability.

While others on this list are largely unknown, Biden doesn't have that problem. His problem is that people don't see him as being particularly presidential. A Quinnipiac poll in November showed 51 percent of Democrats and 73 percent of independents say they don't think Biden would make a good president.

When a majority of your own party says that, you've probably got a pretty low ceiling.

3. Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley (D) -- money

The former mayor of Baltimore seems like one of the more likely big-name Clinton challengers, but even for him, it's a tough choice. Back in May, Politico reported that O'Malley had reached out to Clinton to talk

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2016. It also reported that some think O'Malley will run regardless of what Clinton does. That was met with a pretty vigorous denial.

“Anyone who left the meeting with that impression is mistaken,” O'Malley spokeswoman Elisabeth Smith said in a statement. “The governor hasn’t made any decisions about his next steps and certainly did not voice any that day.”

This, of course, is not the same as O'Malley's team ruling out a run against Clinton. But it does suggest that they are being deferential for now. O'Malley himself said recently that "[I] certainly cherish my relationship and working relationship not only with Secretary Clinton and former President Bill Clinton, but also with President Obama."

The big challenges for O'Malley would be fundraising -- given that he's another establishment Democratic politician who would be aiming for the same donors as Clinton -- and viability, with polls showing he's basically a complete unknown on the national stage. (Like, only 16 percent of people know about him, unknown.) But the two work hand-in-hand. You need money to get name ID and viability, and that first step could prove very tough for O'Malley with Clinton in the race.

O'Malley is also only 51 years old. That's a baby by political standards. In other words: He's got lots of time to build a career without making enemies of the first family of Democratic politics.

4. Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) -- the s-word

Again, viability is the biggest barrier -- but for different reasons. Sanders, an independent who caucuses with Democrats but has also identified as a "socialist," would quite simply have basically no chance at the Democratic presidential nomination.

It's also pretty clear that a Sanders candidacy would be intended not to win but rather to guide the debate in a more populist (socialist?) direction. So the same calculus doesn't necessarily apply here.

A Sanders run would be predicated on him being able to get enough support to actually be a factor. And the first step in that process is getting liberal groups interested -- something that, as Real Clear Politics writes, isn't happening on the same scale as it is with someone like Warren. Put plainly, we're not quite sure these groups would like to support the socialist in the 2016 race.

Sanders is a well-regarded, longtime officeholder in Vermont. Does he want to run for president if it had a strong likelihood of turning into an embarrassing venture?

5. Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) -- preparation

This is certainly the most obscure potential candidate mentioned by The Hill. While some are talking about a potential repeat Senate bid for Feingold in 2016, few are talking about him in terms of a presidential campaign.

But Feingold also makes a lot of sense. After all, he has been fighting against government surveillance for years (including the Patriot Act and the NSA), he was an early supporter of same-sex marriage and a strong opponent of the Iraq war, and he has the kind of maverick streak that a Clinton challenger would need.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Feingold's biggest obstacle is preparation. He has been almost completely absent from politics and the national dialogue since his 2010 loss. Part of this is because he has spent the last year as a special envoy to Africa for the State Department. But even before that, he didn't make much noise.

If Feingold were interested in running for president, it might be time to dip his toe in the water.

Wall Street Journal column: WSJ editorial board member Jason L. Riley: "Princess Hillary"

By Jason L. Riley

August 19, 2014, 5:36 p.m. EDT

Summer continues, and so do Hillary Clinton's blunders. This week brings news that the former first lady lives a lot larger than those blue collar Democrats who supported her for president in 2008 might realize.

We already knew about the quarter-million dollar speaking fees, but that's just for the speech. In addition, Mrs. Clinton "insists on staying in the 'presidential suite' of luxury hotels that she chooses anywhere in the world, including Las Vegas," reports the Las Vegas Review-Journal. "She usually requires those who pay her six-figure fees for speeches to also provide a private jet for transportation—only a $39 million, 16-passenger Gulfstream G450 or larger will do."

Through a state public records law, the paper obtained documents related to Mrs. Clinton speech at a University of Nevada, Las Vegas fundraiser last fall. Her speaking contract includes a stipend for her staff and details such as how long she will remain at an event (90 minutes), how many photos she will pose for (50) and how many people she will pose with (100).

"Her lifestyles of the rich and famous ways and comments that she made about her wealth during a recent book tour have fueled criticism that she's out of touch with average Americans," reports the Review Journal.

Out of touch, or out of practice? Let's remember that Mrs. Clinton hasn't run for anything in six years. Whether it's her clumsy attempts to explain her wealth or her clumsy attempts to distance herself from President Obama's foreign policy, Mrs. Clinton is making a lot of unforced errors.

"The idea of Clinton as a candidate has always been better than the reality of a Clinton candidacy," Jennifer Rubin of the Washington Post wrote recently. "She lacks her husband's charm. She is forever claiming that her experience entitles her to the next rung on the ladder. And she doesn't have original ideas or political creativity."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She also doesn't have a Democratic challenger, since her refusal to rule out a 2016 run has cleared the field. That reality has allowed her to get away with these mistakes. But if she keeps this up, she won't not have a challenger for long.

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Hillary Clinton's Speaking Gigs Could Become a Big Problem"

By Linda Killian, journalist and a senior scholar at the Woodrow Wilson Center. Her most recent book is "The Swing Vote: The Untapped Power of Independents."

August 19, 2014, 2:47 p.m. EDT

The demands and requirements specified by Hillary Clinton when she is booked for a six-figure-speech — including flying on private jets and staying in presidential suites — do not portray the former secretary of state in a particularly flattering light and could even threaten her political future.

Recently the Las Vegas Review-Journal obtained a copy of Mrs. Clinton's contract for a speech at the University of Nevada, Las Vegas to be given in October for which she will be paid $225,000, a reduction of her normal $300,000 speaking fee.

Among the requirements spelled out for a Clinton appearance: a draft program for the event must be submitted one month in advance; she has approval over who will introduce her as well as the moderator for an audience Q&A; she will determine the topic, format and length of the speech as well as the backdrop, banners and scenery.

"The only approved speech title will be 'Remarks by former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton.'"

No photos or video of the event can be distributed and no broadcast or webcast of the event is allowed. The media will not be allowed to attend even as guests unless approved in advance, and any mailings and advance publicity must be approved. Radio or television advertising of the event is not permitted.

Talk about controlling.

Mrs. Clinton agrees to do a photo line for a maximum of 100 people prior to the speech but will not do any additional receptions or dinners. For 90 minutes she will be paid $225,000 — more than four times the average annual income in the U.S.

And therein lies the problem for the woman who, at this moment, is perceived as the frontrunner in the 2016 presidential race.

Since leaving the State Department, Mrs. Clinton has given paid speeches at a number of universities including UCLA and the University of Connecticut and to many trade conventions, Wall Street banks and business groups. From 2001-2012 Mrs. Clinton and former President Bill Clinton earned more than $160 million, according to financial disclosure forms, mostly from speaking fees, making them wealthier than any living former First Family.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Such wealth, especially for someone who might be seeking the Democratic presidential nomination at a time when income inequality and economic frustration is on the minds of most Americans, requires a certain humility and deft touch that President Clinton may have but so far Mrs. Clinton seems to lack.

When asked about their wealth, Mrs. Clinton said she and her husband left the White House “dead broke.” Perhaps – but obviously with tremendous earning potential.

Americans want to know that their elected officials are like them and understand their problems – especially now when many are questioning whether equal opportunities for advancement still exist in this nation.

This air of privilege and inability to connect was a significant problem for Mitt Romney’s presidential campaign and could be for Mrs. Clinton as well if she doesn’t find a way to break out of the insularity of a world of private jets and presidential suites.

Fox 25 (Boston): “Warren dodges questions if Hillary is best choice for Democrats in 2016”

[No Writer Mentioned]

August 19, 2014, 6:02 p.m. EDT

BOSTON (MyFoxBoston.com) -- Will Mass. Senator Elizabeth Warren run for president in 2016? Her upcoming trip to Israel has some thinking about her next career move.

FOX 25's Political Reporter Sharman Sacchetti asked Warren about her plans to visit Israel, her first overseas trip as a US Senator.

When asked if this trip was an attempt to build her foreign policy portfolio, Warren said, "No, this is an attempt to go to Israel."

When asked about her reasoning behind the trip, Warren said one reason is simply because she hasn't had a "chance to get there yet."

She went on to say, "And there's a very special relationship and there's a very special relationship between the United States and Israel and frankly a very special relationship between Massachusetts and Israel. We both have economies that are tech based, we have a lot of things, a lot of businesses."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When asked if she thinks Hillary Clinton is the best choice for the Democratic party in 2016, Warren said Clinton is "terrific."

One of her supporters asked her to go into an event and she did not comment further.

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· August 28 – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton keynotes Nexenta's OpenSDx Summit (BusinessWire)

· September 4 – Las Vegas, NV: Sec. Clinton speaks at the National Clean Energy Summit (Solar Novis Today)

· September 14 – Indianola, IA: Sec. Clinton headlines Sen. Harkin's Steak Fry (LA Times)

· October ? – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton fundraises for House Democratic women candidates with Nancy Pelosi (The Hill)

· October 2 – Miami Beach, FL: Sec. Clinton keynotes the CREW Network Convention & Marketplace (CREW Network)

· October 13 – Las Vegas, NV: Sec. Clinton keynotes the UNLV Foundation Annual Dinner (UNLV)

· October 14 – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton keynotes salesforce.com Dreamforce conference (salesforce.com)

· December 4 – Boston, MA: Sec. Clinton speaks at the Massachusetts Conference for Women (MCFW)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 1/26/2015 1:49:22 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Monday January 26, 2015 Morning Roundup

Correct The Record Monday January 26, 2015 Morning Roundup:

Articles:

Politico: "Behind Sen. Elizabeth Warren's Treasury takedown"

"The larger question is the extent to which Warren continues to use her platform to push Hillary Clinton to the left and away from her more centrist, Rubinite roots."

BuzzFeed: "DREAMers Are Back And They're Coming For The GOP And Clinton"

"National DREAMer activist Erika Andiola recently told BuzzFeed News that Clinton and Jeb Bush, two possible 2016 candidates with perhaps views on immigration policy more in line with the activists', will be forced to clarify their stances."

Time: "The Invisible Presidential Campaign Kicks Off in Earnest"

"Bush, Romney and Christie are especially squeezed by the fundraising pressures, as their candidacies are set to rely heavily on their predicted ability to match Hillary Clinton's formidable potential."

USA Today: "Cruz, Paul, Rubio spar on Cuba policy at desert forum"

"Asked by Karl whether Republicans should nominate a candidate with no foreign policy experience — which none of the three senators on stage in Rancho Mirage had — Rubio took a shot at Hillary Clinton, Democrats' likely 2016 presidential nominee. 'I think it would be a mistake to elect as president the architect of Obama's foreign policy,' he said. 'That would be a terrible mistake.'"

Forbes: "Hillary's Lead Over GOP Frontrunners Shrinks"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The January Zogby Analytics Poll shows former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton keeping her leads over possible GOP contenders in 2016 – but her leads narrowing significantly."

Articles:

Politico: "Behind Sen. Elizabeth Warren's Treasury takedown"

By Ben White

January 26, 2015, 5:37 a.m. EST

[Subtitle:] How the Massachusetts senator rallied the left and blindsided the White House.

NEW YORK — Supporters of Antonio Weiss knew the Wall Street banker's nomination for a top job at the Treasury Department was in deep trouble the morning of Dec. 5.

Kirsten Gillibrand, Democratic senator from New York, went on MSNBC's "Morning Joe" and refused to say if she would back the Lazard banker. And she made clear who was really calling the shots. "I think Senator Warren's very clear," Gillibrand said, sounding a bit like the Massachusetts senator's press secretary. "She believes that, as the person responsible for how consumers are affected, his background and his experience don't fit the requirements."

Weiss supporters in the White House and on Wall Street were stunned. They expected some opposition from the left but not the explosion that greeted the nomination. Never mind that, as undersecretary for domestic finance, Weiss would not be the person chiefly responsible for consumer financial protection — Warren created a whole separate agency for that — or that neither Gillibrand nor Warren had ever met or spoken to the man.

The verdict was in. And it was bad.

"That moment stunned me," said one close friend of Weiss. "For a senator from New York who is ostensibly part of the sensible center to say this, I was just flabbergasted."

Senior White House officials, led by chief of staff Denis McDonough and counselor to the president John Podesta, would continue to work the phones and argue in public and private for Weiss' nomination for the next several weeks.

But as Democrats kept coming out in opposition — while Republicans sat back and relished the show — it became clear that Weiss would have a very hard time getting confirmed.

The game in Washington had changed.

Elizabeth Warren, sometimes disregarded by the White House as a largely irrelevant nuisance, could no longer be ignored. Bolstered by grass roots groups eager for any anti-Wall Street crusade and a vibrant progressive media that hung on her every word, Warren succeeded in knocking out Weiss' nomination.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It was not a total victory. Weiss will still join Treasury as an unconfirmed counselor to Secretary Jack Lew. But in terms of symbolism, the Washington power game and the ideological direction of the Democratic Party, Warren won big. And the moderate, Wall Street- and business-friendly wing of the party — in past years happily occupied by Democratic presidential nominee-in-waiting Hillary Clinton — got punched in the mouth.

“They will have to be more careful now and you won’t see any bankers nominated for high-level positions,” said a person close to the campaign against Weiss, who said the episode could also influence the way Clinton staffs and runs her campaign.

On the other side, the despair among Wall Street’s Democratic elite is growing acute. As is the belief that Weiss himself never mattered in this fight.

“In this case, the thing Warren was against — adding another Wall Street anti-regulatory guy — wasn’t even remotely true,” said one senior Wall Street Democrat who has worked in government but, like many interviewed for this article, declined to be identified by name to avoid Warren’s wrath. “There is no one in government right now who has any market or finance experience. It’s not like there are ‘too many.’”

How it began

The White House nominated Weiss, a highly respected Wall Street banker at boutique firm Lazard, on Nov. 12. Treasury wanted him because no one in its top leadership tier — including Lew and deputy secretary Sarah Bloom Raskin — had any real financial markets experience.

Lew worked briefly at Citigroup, as did under secretary for international affairs Nathan Sheets. Raskin worked for a time at Promontory Financial Group. But none had the kind of deep relationships or international financial experience that Weiss did. And Weiss, in addition to his work on Wall Street, was a big financial supporter and bundler for President Barack Obama.

It did not take long for Warrren to declare war on the nomination.

On Nov. 14, POLITICO first reported, citing a Warren aide, that the senator would oppose Weiss for the job. “She is a no on Antonio Weiss. She was a Treasury official herself, she cares a lot about who is in the domestic finance role,” the aide said at the time. “It oversees Dodd-Frank implementation and other core economic policymaking.”

Shortly after the POLITICO story, Warren penned an op-ed for The Huffington Post laying out her case against Weiss, ripping his extensive career on Wall Street and his work on a controversial deal in which Burger King bought Canadian coffee and doughnut chain Tim Horton’s and moved its headquarters to Canada.

The morning the first POLITICO article about Warren’s opposition came out in the “Morning Money” tip sheet, a small group of progressives at CREDO Action in San Francisco gathered to plot strategy, poring over the Warren aides’ every word. This was the perfect fight, they decided.

After the midterm election drubbing, the battle was on for the soul of the Democratic Party. And another fight was already brewing over the inclusion of pro-Wall Street language in the year-end spending bill.

“It was the exact right campaign at the exact right time,” said Murshed Zaheed, deputy political director at CREDO and a former aid to Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid. “We felt this nomination presented the perfect battle that would drive the narrative of where the party needs to go and where the progressive movement is right now.”

Warren and other Democrats — along with Republican Chuck Grassley — slammed the Burger King deal as an un-American “inversion” transaction. The counterargument from Weiss supporters, that the Burger King deal was not an inversion because Tim Horton’s was the larger company and putting the headquarters in lower-tax Canada was the only reasonable thing to do, never got any traction. It did not help matters that Lew himself had recently launched an effort to crack down on inversion deals, though not the Burger King transaction.

For Warren, the Weiss nomination was a last-straw moment, people close to her say. She didn’t come out hard against Mary Jo White for Securities and Exchange Commission chair, despite White’s record of defending Wall Street clients as an attorney in the private sector. She didn’t try to block Stanley Fischer as Federal Reserve vice chair despite Fischer's work at Citigroup. And there were others.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It was time to fire up the troops against Weiss. And they came eagerly along.

By early December, with no coordination with Warren or anyone else on the Hill, CREDO said it had close to 200,000 signatures on a petition to oppose Weiss.

Progressive groups Democracy for America and Moveon.org also joined the fight. The AFL-CIO, the nation's largest labor group, raised questions about millions of dollars in accelerated compensation Weiss was to receive if he left Lazard for Treasury. The pressure came not just from the left. The Independent Community Bankers of America sent a letter to top senators questioning whether Weiss would do enough to champion the interests of smaller banks.

Through an aide, Dick Durbin, the No. 2 Democrat in the Senate, indicated he would oppose Weiss. Sen. Joe Manchin of West Virginia also came out in opposition, an early indication that a full-scale populist assault was underway. Then Jeanne Shaheen of New Hampshire, viewed as fairly moderate, said she could not back Weiss because of his work on tax deals.

Outgoing Senate Finance Committee Chairman Ron Wyden made it clear Weiss would not get a confirmation hearing in the lame-duck session of Congress in December. Weiss would have to wait until Republicans took over in 2015, allowing the opposition movement to gather strength.

"Warren successfully put together this incredible coalition of activist groups and liberal media organizations that sprang into action without her really having to do much of anything," said a Wall Street executive who tried to help steer Weiss through the process. "These people can now stop pretty much anyone they want and the White House can't do much about it."

Others view Warren's power as somewhat more limited. She succeeded in derailing Weiss in part because Obama could not count on Republicans — who typically like nominees with business experience — to put Weiss over the top.

"Unrecognizable"

As opposition began to grow, Weiss, who declined to comment for this story, hunkered down in New York. He could not speak out on his own behalf, hamstrung by the need to wait for confirmation hearings. He did not get to sit down in advance with Warren or other senators coming out against him.

People who spoke with Weiss during this time described him as bewildered by the characterizations of him as a super-wealthy tycoon who favored tax inversions and would come to Washington to do Wall Street's bidding at Treasury. "The picture they painted of him was totally unrecognizable to him," one friend said.

Instead, friends and colleagues described Weiss as a fairly progressive Democrat who liked poetry, bought the Paris Review to keep it afloat and fell in love with policy while working part time — at Podesta's invitation — on tax reform issues at the Center for American Progress, a Democratic think tank, where he co-authored a paper calling for curtailing tax loopholes for Wall Street executives, among other things.

These people say the 48-year-old Weiss had long been thinking of a career shift, especially in the years since his father passed away. He did some teaching but became most attracted to the idea of doing policy work in Washington. When Lew reached out to him for the undersecretary job, he jumped at the chance.

People who know Weiss say he expected to get some opposition. And they say he knew his high salary — he earned at least $15.4 million from Lazard over the past two years — would become public knowledge and the source of some embarrassment.

But friends say Weiss did not expect to be portrayed as a proponent of tax inversions, since his role at Lazard did not include working on the tax implications of merger deals. And they say he thought his broad international experience — he spent eight years in Paris — would be seen as a plus. Instead, Warren and others used it as a cudgel to argue that he lacked enough experience in issues of domestic finance. And they said that it would be better if Weiss had experience in Asia rather than Europe because of China's and Japan's large holdings of U.S. debt.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Meanwhile, White House officials including Podesta, Lew and National Economic Council Director Jeff Zients continued to speak out on Weiss' behalf and say they thought the GOP Senate would confirm him in 2015. By all accounts, the White House never gave up on Weiss. Lew told CNBC as recently as Friday that he thought Weiss could have been confirmed: "I still thought that there was a pathway for him to be confirmed. My concern when he said he didn't want to be renominated was that we'd get the benefit of his talent."

Some moderate voices — Andrew Ross Sorkin in The New York Times and the Bloomberg News editorial page — came out in favor of Weiss. But progressives just laughed off those endorsements as indications that the Lazard banker really should not be trusted.

Opposing Weiss become even more critical for progressives as the White House pushed hard for support of the year-end spending bill despite a provision rolling back a section of Dodd-Frank prohibiting banks from holding certain derivative securities inside their tax-payer backstopped subsidiaries.

Wall Street fought for the provision for years and Warren and many on the left railed against the White House for allowing Republicans to sneak it into the bill. Letting that happen and approving Weiss as well would be just too much.

As all this was going on, people close to Weiss say he took a long holiday break and decided it would not be worth it to keep up a confirmation fight that could take months and leave him little time to actually do the job. "Antonio learned a lot of lessons the hard way about how Washington really works now," one friend said.

And while the White House still hoped that Weiss would eventually receive a heavy dose of Republican support, there was no guarantee. Republicans could have simply delayed a hearing for Weiss and let Democrats continue to fight among themselves.

Friends say Weiss, after a lengthy series of conversations with friends and colleagues, decided leading up to the weekend of Jan. 10 that he would ask the White House not to resubmit his nomination in the new Congress. Officials at Treasury and in the West Wing pushed back at first on the decision but then relented and asked that he still join the administration as a counselor to Lew with a senior advisory role on a wide range of issues from fiscal policy to debt management and financial regulation.

He would not have the clout of a confirmed position or the ability to testify publicly on the administration's behalf. But he could still do most of the stuff he wanted to do. Some on the left squawked that he should not be allowed to go to Treasury at all. But Warren, herself a former unconfirmed Treasury official, mostly left the issue alone, content in scoring a major headline win and sending a message to the administration that they should not mess with her or the progressive movement on anything to do with Wall Street.

What it all means

Warren's message clearly resonated. Obama came out with strong populist themes in a State of the Union address that adopted much of the Massachusetts senator's rhetoric on standing up for the middle class against the wealthy and powerful. Obama called for a big bank tax, an increase in the capital gains rate and crackdowns on other loopholes enjoyed by the wealthy.

And Warren shot to her feet and applauded vigorously when Obama promised to veto any bill sent to him by the GOP Congress "unraveling the new rules on Wall Street."

This was the Obama the activist left loves, rather than the more cautious centrist with Wall Street sympathies who tried and failed to install former Clinton administration Treasury Secretary Larry Summers as Federal Reserve chair. Summers, a protégé of banker Robert Rubin — perhaps the most hated Democrat among the activist left — eventually had to step aside in favor of Janet Yellen, a beloved figure to progressives.

Warren clearly demonstrated her ascendance as a political force. The larger question is the extent to which Warren continues to use her platform to push Hillary Clinton to the left and away from her more centrist, Rubinite roots. So far, Clinton has proved less than adept at co-opting Warren's message. She's struggled mightily to talk about her own significant wealth, complaining about being "dead broke" when leaving the White House in 2000. And she stumbled on the stump in the midterms when she said that it's not corporations that create jobs.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Running on Warren's issues — reining in Wall Street, protecting consumers — is not a political liability. The public – and certainly the Democratic Party – is largely with Warren on all these issues, polling data show. But Democratic insiders and analysts all question whether Clinton would be successful at shifting left or come across as hypocritical and insincere.

There is also the question of financial support. Clinton has long enjoyed heavy backing from Wall Street. But that could dry up if she keeps criticizing the industry as she did in a tweet on Jan. 16: "Attacking financial reform is risky and wrong," she said. "Better for Congress to focus on jobs and wages for middle class families." Clinton, in the tweet, criticized Dodd-Frank changes strongly supported by Wall Street.

The former first lady and secretary of state will hardly be beholden to the financial-services industry for money, especially in the era of billionaire-funded "super PACs." But she would still face charges of changing her tune if she were to tack too hard toward the Antonio Weiss-bashing left.

"My guess is she will try to thread her way through this by saying that Warren has very legitimate concerns but that Wall Street is still an important part of the economy," said one of Clinton's biggest Wall Street supporters who also backed Weiss for Treasury. "But that's just a very tricky needle to thread."

BuzzFeed: "DREAMers Are Back And They're Coming For The GOP And Clinton"

By Adrian Carrasquillo

January 25, 2015, 8:16 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] After playing a key role in securing Obama's executive actions on immigration, DREAMer activists are back, confronting Republicans, with an eye towards Hillary Clinton too.

In 2014, DREAMer activists, undocumented youth brought to the country as children, established themselves as a pivotal force in the immigration fight. But if you thought the immigration protests that interrupted speeches from both Democrats and Republicans during 2014 would end with President Obama's executive actions, you thought wrong.

If anything, last year showed them that the strategy works, and so DREAMer activists are back. Their first volley of 2015 came at the Iowa Freedom Summit, a gathering of conservatives, many with presidential aspirations, where they had one question: Do you stand with us, or with immigration hardliner Steve King?

"2016 is around the corner, so we want to see where Republicans stand, would they overturn [Obama's actions]? Would they deport DREAMers?" said activist Cesar Vargas, one of the nearly 10 who crashed the GOP event, interrupting former Texas Gov. Rick Perry and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie. "For Hillary Clinton, yes, she tweeted that she supported the president on executive action, but for us it's not just about approval — what else will she do?"

The young activists gave Clinton headaches last year during her book promotional tour and later on the campaign trail, when they repeatedly confronted her. National DREAMer activist Erika Andiola recently told BuzzFeed News that Clinton and Jeb Bush, two possible 2016 candidates with perhaps views on immigration policy more in line with the activists', will be forced to clarify their stances.

If the strategy seems counterintuitive, Vargas says the activists' strategy is constantly misunderstood.

"This is not just about political tactics, it's just about real questions, there are real people affected by this, whether they're parents or workers," Vargas said. "All 2016 hopefuls say, 'We want to talk to the real Americans.' Well these are the real people affected by these policies."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Why protest Perry, for instance, someone who has faced criticism from the right on immigration (Perry famously said "you don't have a heart" if you oppose in-state tuition for undocumented immigrants), when Sen. Ted Cruz and others also there? Activists say they see it differently after Perry sent the National Guard to the border during the unaccompanied minors crisis, and Marco Malagon, who interrupted Perry at the event and was arrested, was there because of that in particular. But Cruz has advocated for stricter policy on undocumented immigrants and had strong words about immigrants at the event too.

"Ted Cruz is a lost cause," Vargas said. "He's a far right political figure for the Tea Party. Chris Christie, Scott Walker, on the other hand, they're trying to stay away from the issue, we want to know where they stand. Jeb Bush, he's seriously considering not only running, but also working with the Latino community."

One activist in Iowa for the confrontation, Giancarlo Tello, a New Jersey DREAMer, said that after the president's announcement, future immigration actions won't only feature young undocumented advocates.

"Its not just going to be DREAMers, but whole immigrant families. Not just those who qualify for [deferred action], but also for Obama's actions for families," Tello said. "It left 7 million behind. As long as the undocumented community is still being criminalized, we're going to go after them, whether they're Democrats or Republicans."

It's important to note that the activists are not all from one organization. There are local groups, leaders like Andiola and Vargas of the Arizona-based Dream Action Coalition, and also one major national organization: United We Dream (UWD).

For its part, UWD spent Friday to Sunday in Maryland holed up at their yearly retreat, mapping their strategy for the year. BuzzFeed News has learned that the group has so-called offensive and defensive priorities, as well as local and national plans for 2015.

Going on offense looks a lot like what went down in Iowa this weekend, but just as importantly, the organization wants to defend Obama's executive actions, which they feel are under attack by Congressional Republicans, as well as in the 25-state Texas lawsuit on the constitutionality of the executive actions. UWD also wants to work on educating the community on implementation of Obama's actions, getting all of those who are eligible to apply to be protected from deportation.

A new strategy for UWD this year centers on some local battles they want to aid affiliates in, like in Texas, where Lt. Gov. Dan Patrick campaigned on far stricter border enforcement and dismantling the in-state tuition program (the issue is contentious within the Republican Party there — Republican Gov. Greg Abbott largely distanced himself from Patrick during his campaign, but said if the legislature passed the in-state tuition bill, he would sign it). The organization also wants to help in states that may be looking to add in-state tuition like Massachusetts and Connecticut.

The activists in Iowa on Saturday held signs that said "Deportable?" on them, a reference to a much-maligned tweet by Steve King, who organized the Iowa Freedom Summit. King was referencing Michelle Obama's guest at the State of the Union, a young undocumented immigrant whom he called a "deportable."

DREAMers say that King like Cruz, is a lost cause, but the signs were meant as a question to prospective presidential candidates, as in, "Are we deportable?"

Vargas said Christie calling King a friend on Saturday told them a lot.

"In Spanish there is a saying, 'Dime con quién andas, y te diré quién eres,'" Vargas said.

"Tell me who you're with, and I'll tell you who you are."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Time: "The Invisible Presidential Campaign Kicks Off in Earnest"

By Michael Scherer, Alex Altman, and Zeke Miller

January 25, 2015

Presidential candidates-to-be, and a passel of well-known clingers on, converged in Iowa this weekend with all the flash and fun the nation has come to expect of the Grand Old Party.

Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker, New Jersey Governor Chris Christie, former Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee and former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina managed substantive introductions, alongside businessman Donald Trump, who declared there is "nobody like Trump," and Sarah Palin, who struggled with diction and metaphor, offering phrases like "We don't sit on our thumbs this next time when one of our own is being crucified."

The real action, however, lay elsewhere, off the stage and out of sight, in an invisible primary taking place behind closed doors in states not known for their place in the nominating calendar. Candidates have been crisscrossing the nation and working the phones, dialing for dollars and loyalty in a contest that may prove far more consequential than speech that can be given before any crowd at this point.

The goal is not to win votes, but to win the support of Republicans like Bobbie Kilberg, who hosted an off-the-record event in Virginia for Christie last week with 96 corporate technology leaders. In recent months, she has taken not one, but two calls from Mitt Romney informing her of her thinking, as he edges toward another campaign. And having worked for the administrations of both Presidents Bush, she feels a special affinity for former Florida Governor Jeb Bush, whose son, George P. Bush, she recently supported in his race for Texas land commissioner.

"I have three wonderful friends in this race," said Kilberg, who runs the Northern Virginia Technology Council, but supports candidates only in a personal capacity. "My expectation is that all three of them will run."

But the physics of political fundraising does not allow for her fealty to be equally divided for long. Connecters like Kilberg now face enormous pressure to decide on a single candidate to benefit from their vast Rolodexes. "I think there is enough donor bandwidth for all three of them in the center right lane," Kilberg explains of the three candidates. "The finite group are the bundlers."

Securing the 2012 nomination cost Romney $76.6 million, raised in increments up to the legal limit of $2,500. His super PAC, Restore Our Future, which could accept unlimited contributions, added nearly $50 million to the tally.

Operatives affiliated with multiple campaigns say candidates will need at least $50 million to win the nomination this time around, but predict more of the spending will tilt toward the outside groups.

Bush, Romney and Christie are especially squeezed by the fundraising pressures, as their candidacies are set to rely heavily on their predicted ability to match Hillary Clinton's formidable potential. The early start to the race — candidates are traveling the country earlier and more frequently than ever on the Republican side — adds strain across the board. Complicating matters further are changes to the nominating calendar with fewer debate opportunities and a compressed timeline that favor well-funded candidates once voters get to the polls.

Kilberg and her husband Bill, a prominent Washington lawyer, helped bundle together more than $100,000 in checks of less than $2,000 in 2004 for George W. Bush. In 2012, she helped lead Mitt Romney's fundraising in Virginia, bringing in a reported $322,000 at just one event at her home. The Tuesday event Kilberg had with Christie and northern Virginia technology executives was not a fundraiser, she said, but a get-to-know-you session.

At almost the same time the event was happening, Bush was meeting in the offices of Dirk Van Dongen, a Republican fundraiser who runs the National Association of Wholesalers. Dongen, a Washington fundraiser for another White House aspirant, Marco Rubio, plans to support Jeb Bush this time, if he runs.

The Bush events were not fundraisers either, though forms were distributed inviting donors to begin bundling for Bush's new political action committee, Right to Rise. The main purpose, as with the Virginia events, was to win over the networkers who traditionally hold the purse strings of presidential politics. According to people who attended, Bush spoke broadly about his views of the country and the best way to approach the presidential race. He said a winning candidate would have to connect with middle-class anxiety by walking in the shoes of regular people, said one attendee.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The contrast was obvious," the attendee said, explaining how Bush appeared to be contrasting himself with Romney's 2012 campaign. "That's 100 degrees from the 47% comment."

Romney, meanwhile, has been reactivating his own donor base, having chosen a donor event in New York early in the month to formally announce his decision to begin pursuing a third presidential campaign. The former private-equity executive has been working the phones since then, telling donors he is serious about considering another bid.

Senator Marco Rubio, meanwhile, held his annual retreat for his top donors in Miami over the weekend, a move designed to keep his loyalists close while he considers his options. He later joined fellow Senators Ted Cruz and Rand Paul on stage in Palm Springs at the winter meeting of the Freedom Partners Chamber of Commerce, a spending vehicle for the billionaire GOP megadonor Koch brothers and their allies. Also in attendance, after a well-received appearance in Iowa, was Walker, who was making the first stop on a multi-day West Coast fundraising swing for his new fundraising committee, which will be announced as soon as Monday.

While Republican voters have more than a year to decide on the candidate they want to take on Democrats in 2016, the donors clock is ticking. Quarterly fundraising totals, which will come out early this summer and again in the fall, will help shape the race, determining which candidates have the money to mount serious contests, with the grassroots organizing ability and television firepower to withstand the early contests.

"It's really what we would call in the business a pre-sell," says a senior Republican strategist about Bush's visit to Washington this week. "They'll come back in the next 60 days and do some big fundraising, and they'll hope to get a lot of those same people to be on their committee."

For those keeping score, the results of such appeals will be the ones that count, not the applause of activist crowds. In this democratic process, the voices of the people only matter after the first waves of money have been counted.

USA Today: "Cruz, Paul, Rubio spar on Cuba policy at desert forum"

By Sammy Roth

January 26, 2015, 2:51 a.m. EST

Three likely contenders for the Republican presidential nomination shared a stage in Rancho Mirage, Calif. on Sunday night, where they outlined similar visions for helping the middle class but differed sharply on foreign policy, including Cuba.

The wide-ranging panel discussion — which featured U.S. Sens. Ted Cruz of Texas, Rand Paul of Kentucky and Marco Rubio of Florida — was part of an annual desert gathering for high-profile Republicans, sponsored by a group aligned with the billionaire industrialists David and Charles Koch. The summit is traditionally closed to outsiders, but in a limited concession to their critics, the Koch brothers allowed members of the media — but not the public — to watch a live stream of Sunday's panel.

The three Republican senators — none of whom has officially declared a presidential candidacy — largely avoided criticizing each other directly, in an event that some observers described as the first debate of the 2016 election. But they didn't hesitate to attack President Barack Obama, starting with the rosy economic outlook he presented in his State of the Union Address last week.

"It seemed to me like we were watching a description of an alternate reality," Cruz said. "It reminded me of 'Alice in Wonderland.'"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

POPULIST TONE

The Republican senators did, however, echo Obama's focus on the middle class and income inequality, with Cruz and Rubio especially looking to strike a populist note. Rubio said income inequality has "increased dramatically" under Obama's economic policies, while also tweaking Mitt Romney's 2012 campaign.

"The central narrative of the last campaign, what the voters heard, is, 'We don't have to worry about the 47 percent,'" Rubio said, recalling Romney's now-infamous remarks at a private fundraiser. "I think Republicans should be the party of the 47 percent."

Generally, the candidates had similar prescriptions for helping the middle class: smaller government, lower taxes across the income spectrum, and other policies they said would grow the economy as a whole. They criticized government as much as they criticized Obama, with Paul saying that government "is not stupid, but it's a debatable question."

"Income inequality is indirectly, if not directly, related to big government," he said.

But pressed by moderator Jonathan Karl for specifics on hot-button economic policy issues, the candidates at times equivocated. While all three said they oppose raising the federal minimum wage from $7.25 per hour, Cruz and Paul wouldn't say whether they support having a minimum wage at all. Rubio came closest to answering the question, saying that "as a practical matter," he's not calling to abolish the minimum wage.

CRUZ, RUBIO CONDEMN CUBA POLICY

The biggest disagreements of the night came when the conversation shifted from economic policy to foreign policy. Cruz and Rubio strongly condemned Obama's recently announced plan to normalize relations with Cuba, but Paul said he sees a lot to like about the new policy.

"We have embassies everywhere. Diplomacy is a good thing, not a bad thing," Paul said. "Reagan talked to the Russians. Every president we've ever had talked to the Russians for 70 years, and it's a damn good thing they did."

The candidates were similarly divided on Iran, with Paul arguing that Congress should let ongoing negotiations over Iran's nuclear program play out before approving more economic sanctions. Cruz and Rubio painted the negotiations as a waste of time, calling for a more aggressive stance against Iran.

Asked by Karl whether Republicans should nominate a candidate with no foreign policy experience — which none of the three senators on stage in Rancho Mirage had — Rubio took a shot at Hillary Clinton, Democrats' likely 2016 presidential nominee.

"I think it would be a mistake to elect as president the architect of Obama's foreign policy," he said. "That would be a terrible mistake."

Forbes: "Hillary's Lead Over GOP Frontrunners Shrinks"

By John Zogby

January 25, 2015, 6:30 p.m. EST

The January Zogby Analytics Poll shows former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton keeping her leads over possible GOP contenders in 2016 – but her leads narrowing significantly. In the January 16-18 online poll of 890 likely voters, Mrs. Clinton leads former Florida Governor Jeb Bush by only 8 points — 45% to 37% (down from 49% to 34% in mid-December's Zogby Analytics Poll) – and 9 points over former Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney, 46% to 37% (down from 48% to 33%). The poll has a margin of sampling error of +.-3.4 percentage points.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A lead is still a lead but her margins are narrowing among several key subgroups. For example, among women she now leads Bush 48%-34%, where it was 55% to 30% just last month. Her leads have shrunk from 35 points to 16 points among 18-29 year olds, 28 points to 17 points among 30-49 year olds, 16 points to 10 points among independents, and 58 points to 24 points among Hispanics. She has actually gone from a 20 point lead among Catholics to a 6 point deficit.

The numbers are showing very much the same trend line against Romney. In two other races, she now leads Kentucky Senator Rand Paul by 14 points (48% to 34%), while last month it was 18 points (51% to 33%). Against New Jersey Governor Chris Christie, Clinton now leads by 12 points (45% to 33%), whereas last month it was by 15 points (48% to 33%).

Now these are not good numbers for Republicans. While these are the only four candidates we tested, they are all prominent and none of them even hits 40% — a very bad sign for a national party. But essentially, Clinton simply running against herself is not doing well, certainly not enough to close any deal. In fact, during the course of a year of polling, she has dropped into the mid-40s, down from the mid-50s. And, very significantly, these numbers include "leaners" – i.e. those who initially said they were undecided and were asked if they had to choose a candidate today. More leaners chose the GOP candidates than chose her.

This is only a temporary reading and there is a very long way to go. For now, there is some movement already and we are watching it closely.

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· February 24 – Santa Clara, CA: Sec. Clinton to Keynote Address at Inaugural Watermark Conference for Women (PR Newswire)

· March 4 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton to fundraise for the Clinton Foundation (WSJ)

· March 19 – Atlantic City, NJ: Sec. Clinton keynotes American Camp Association conference (PR Newswire)

· March 23 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton to keynote award ceremony for the Toner Prize for Excellence in Political Reporting (Syracuse)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Craig Minassian" <craig@minassianmedia.com>
To: "Brian Fallon" <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 4/19/2015 1:29:13 PM
Subject: Re: FOR REVIEW: Statement for NYT story on Clinton Cash

Looks good. Thank you.

Sent from my iPhone

On Apr 19, 2015, at 8:09 PM, Brian Fallon <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

All,

As you are all aware, Jo Becker from the NYT's investigative unit is one of several reporters at work on stories based on material provided by the publisher of the upcoming Clinton Cash book. Jo's story is scheduled to run in as soon as one week.

Separately, this afternoon, Amy Chozick from the NYT called us to indicate she had obtained a copy of the book on her own and intends to file a separate story tomorrow. Her story will not unpack all of the book's claims -- she will leave that to Jo. Instead, she will do a more process-y story about the book's existence, the fact that the publisher has approached multiple media outlets in advance of the book's publication to spoon-feed them some of the book's research, and also remark on the fact that Rand Paul continues to drop hints about the book's contents such that it appears they may be some coordination with individual Republican campaigns.

We think this story, though it was not originated by us, could end up being somewhat helpful in casting the book's author as having a conservative agenda. Moreover, we think Amy is suspicious of the arrangements that the book's publisher has reached with the various media outlets (including her own paper). In fact, Jo Becker is apparently trying to get this story killed because she thinks it will undermine her investigative piece later this month. But so far it is running in tomorrow's paper.

Amy is seeking a response from us on what our approach is to the looming publication of the book and the apparently well coordinated rollout. We have drafted the below response, and wanted you all to see it and provide feedback before we sent it off. Please note, however, that in order to get the statement into the story, we probably need to provide it by about 8:30 tonight. So apologies for the tight turnaround, but here it is:

> "We always expected that while Hillary Clinton was focused on how to help everyday Americans get ahead, the Republicans would focus their efforts on attacks rather than ideas. It appears that this book is being used to aid this coordinated attack strategy, twisting previously known facts into absurd conspiracy theories. It will not be the first work of partisan-fueled fiction about the Clintons' record, and we know it will not be the last."

Thank you,
Brian

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "German Marshall Fund" <press@gmfus.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 4/19/2015 6:00:00 PM
Subject: Transatlantic Take: Transatlantic Unity Makes Russia Sanctions More Effective

If you have problems viewing this email, you can view it as a web page. To view the mobile-friendly web page click here.

Transatlantic Unity Makes Russia Sanctions More Effective

Douglas Hengel — April 20, 2015

WASHINGTON—It has been a year since the United States, European Union, and other allies first sanctioned Russia for its illegal annexation of Crimea and aggression toward Ukraine. As Russia's destabilization of Ukraine continued, the United States and Europe broadened sanctions in an effort to persuade Vladimir Putin's government to change its behavior and to deter Russia from further belligerence in Ukraine and elsewhere in the neighborhood. The measures included asset freezes and visa bans on individuals considered to be responsible for actions against Ukraine's territorial integrity (including several in Putin's inner circle), and limits on business dealings with some Russian banks, defense companies, and energy firms.

Predictably, the restrictions imposed on Russia have been controversial, as sanctions regimes generally are. Some complain they are too weak, citing as evidence Russia's continued lack of compliance with the Minsk agreements to ensure a ceasefire and stabilize eastern Ukraine. Others argue the actions are not only ineffective but counterproductive. They lead the Russian people to close ranks around their leaders, undermine efforts to integrate Russia into the global economy (setting back Russian political and economic reform), and cause other collateral damage to the long-term interests of the transatlantic community.

The debate about the effectiveness of sanctions is a hardy perennial. Some sanctions regimes have been judged to be more effective (e.g., South Africa, Burma, Iran) than others (e.g., Cuba, Zimbabwe). The international community is much better able now to target measures against specific rogue actors (so-called "smart" sanctions), but unintended consequences are almost always part of the equation. So, collateral damage is a cost that should be considered, while recognizing there is also a cost to doing nothing. Sanctions also take time to have their intended impact. The phenomenon of rallying around the flag is often the first reaction when sanctions are imposed on a country, but that tends to fade over time as costs mount, or as the citizenry better understands what is truly causing their economic distress, as in the case of Iran.

It is important to remember that sanctions are a tool meant to help gain a policy outcome. They are not an end in themselves, and are unlikely to be effective if they are the only instrument deployed. Sanctions are also much more likely to achieve the desired result when they are multilateral. This can mean the measures adopted are weaker in some respects than one might like, but the sanctions with the least impact are generally those imposed unilaterally (e.g., by the United States on Cuba). It is critically important that the United States and Europe remain united on Russia and Ukraine.

In that regard, the conclusions of the March 19 European Council are significant. The leaders of the EU agreed that the measures adopted against Russia "should be clearly linked to the complete implementation of the Minsk agreements." This was agreed despite legitimate concerns by some European countries about the cost to them of the sanctions, as well as Russian efforts to divide Europe and Europe from the United States. Disunity would undermine transatlantic efforts and reward the Putin regime.

It is premature to judge the effectiveness of the restrictions imposed on Russia for its misbehavior in Ukraine. Russia is the largest economy on which punitive steps like these have been imposed, so new ground is being broken. The sharp drop in energy prices that occurred as sanctions were ramped up makes it difficult to isolate the particular impact of just the restrictive measures.

Key to judging whether the sanctions are effective will be whether the fragile ceasefire in eastern Ukraine holds and pro-Russian rebels refrain from moving on the key coastal city of Mariupol. Longer term, a key measure of the efficacy of sanctions will be Russia's implementation of its commitments under the Minsk agreement. Nevertheless, it is clear that the restrictions in effect now on Russia are having an impact on particular individuals and companies, and Western signals about possible further sanctions may be a factor in current Russian restraint. Continued unity among the transatlantic community is critical in this regard.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It bears repeating, however, that sanctions alone are not enough. Sanctions can help focus Russia on implementation of the Minsk accords and the return to Ukraine of sovereignty over its entire territory, but the strongest long-term antidote to continued Russian mischief is a more democratic and prosperous Ukraine. Thus the United States and the EU are working with international financial institutions to strengthen the Ukrainian economy and support the implementation of needed reforms. Ukraine's success depends above all on the choices of the Ukrainian people and their government, with the backing of the transatlantic community.

DISCUSS

Douglas Hengel is a Senior Resident Fellow with The German Marshall Fund of the United States. Follow him at @DougHengel54 .

The views expressed in GMF publications and commentary are the views of the author alone.

Policy Leadership Civil Society

Follow

Strengthening Transatlantic Cooperation

Our Organization
About GMF
Career Opportunities
Press Room

Our Work
Leadership
Policy
Civil Society
Research & Analysis
Transatlantic Academy

Our Events
Major Conferences & Forums
Recent & Upcoming Events

Our Experts
Find an Expert

Manage preferences | Forward email | Unsubscribe | Subscribe

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
To: "Scott Lilly" <rscottlilly@hotmail.com>
Date: 8/14/2008 11:31:32 AM
Subject: Re: U.S. Intelligence Failure in Georgia

You should do an oped for the post on this.

On 8/14/08, Scott Lilly <rscottlilly@hotmail.com> wrote:
>
>
> Denis,
>
> I have it on good authority that the DNI was completely caught off guard by > the Russian invasion. He was, according to my information, watching CNN with > his mouth wide open.
> This is a collosal failure of U.S. intelligence.
>
> The word inside the community is that overhead and other resources were so > fully tasked on Iraq and Afghanistan that little was left for the South > Caucuses. That indicates that the security costs presented by the Iraq > occupation are even more profound than believed by many of us who worried > about that issue.
>
> But even that explanation is insufficient to explain how the Russians could > have prepared for such an operation and executed it without our being > alerted. They clearly constrained radio and telephone communications, > covered their efforts to raise unit readiness and set a carefully planned > manuever into motion without tripping a single trigger of U.S. information > collection--all this despite the fact that we had U.S. military forces in > the target country.
>
> The fact that we had so little monitoring raises serious questions about > whether the administration was exercising an appropriate level of scepticism > about Russian intentions. Their desire to recover their lost possessions in > the region--at least Georgia and Azerbaijan--have been widely known and pre > date Putin.
>
> For more than four decades the Republican party has cast itself as heirs to > the traditions of Wiston Churchill and cast Democrats as naive about our > enemies and unwilling to use the force necessary to protect the nation's > interest. The administration's performance with Russia indicates that they > more closely approximate Neville Chamberland than we do.
> Scott Lilly 3110 North 17th Street Arlington, VA 22201

--
Sent from Gmail for mobile | mobile.google.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "German Marshall Fund" <press@gmfus.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 10/21/2015 6:00:00 PM
Subject: Transatlantic Take: Is Saving Refugees Worth the Political Price Tag for Germany?

If you have problems viewing this email, you can view it as a web page. To view the mobile-friendly web page click here.

G | M | F The German Marshall Fund of the United States
STRENGTHENING TRANSATLANTIC COOPERATION

Transatlantic Take

Our Organization | Our Work | Our Events | Our Experts | Support GMF

Is Saving Refugees Worth the Political Price Tag for Germany?

Markus Ziener — October 22, 2015

BERLIN—The influx of refugees into Germany is forcing its leaders to throw aside some of their long-held convictions and face reality. They are making nice with authoritarian Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdoğan to get him to accept more refugees. They are talking to Russian President Vladimir Putin so that he does not further fuel the crisis. They are even negotiating with Syrian President Bashar al-Assad to stem the flood. The refugee influx is now driving German politics, and not the other way around...

FULL ARTICLE

Markus Ziener is a Non-Resident Fellow with GMF's Europe Program, based in Berlin.

The views expressed in GMF publications and commentary are the views of the author alone.

Policy | Leadership | Civil Society

Follow

Strengthening Transatlantic Cooperation

Our Organization
About GMF
Career Opportunities
Press Room

Our Work
Leadership
Policy
Civil Society
Research & Analysis
Transatlantic Academy

Our Events
Major Conferences & Forums
Recent & Upcoming Events

Our Experts
Find an Expert

Manage preferences | Forward email | Unsubscribe | Subscribe

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Terri D. Mansfield" <terribillionairs@aol.com>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 1/18/2015 7:34:29 AM
Subject: email for John Podesta (c/o Eryn) from Edgar Mitchel re meeting ASAP

Dear John,

As 2015 unfolds, I understand you are leaving the Administration in February.

It is urgent that we agree on a date and time to meet to discuss Disclosure and Zero Point Energy, at your earliest available after your departure.
My Catholic colleague Terri Mansfield will be there too, to bring us up to date on the Vatican's awareness of ETI.

Another colleague is working on a new Space Treaty, citing involvement with Russia and China. However with Russia's extreme interference in Ukraine, I believe we must pursue another route for peace in space and ZPE on Earth.

I met with President Obama's Honolulu childhood friend, US Ambassador Pamela Hamamoto on July 4 at the US Mission in Geneva, when I was able to tell her briefly about zero point energy.
I believe we can enlist her as a confidante and resource in our presentation for President Obama.

I appreciate Eryn's assistance in working with Terri to set up our meeting.

Best regards,
Edgar
Edgar D. Mitchell, ScD
Chief Science Officer & Founder, Quantrek
Apollo 14 astronaut
6th man to walk on the Moon

PS Terri's cousin by marriage and former Mayor of Chicago Jane Byrne died recently. Raum Emmanuel was at her funeral.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 12/11/2014 1:07:51 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Thursday December 11, 2014 Morning Roundup

Correct The Record Thursday December 11, 2014 Morning Roundup:

Headlines:

Bloomberg: "Chris Christie Would Lose Badly to Hillary Clinton in New Jersey, Poll Finds"

"Clinton is the only candidate listed who gets a positive favorability rating, 58—35 percent. The Republicans all have negative scores in New Jersey."

FROM MEDIA MATTERS FOR AMERICA: Media Matters for America: "Fox Resurrects Distorted Version Of Hillary Clinton's Benghazi Testimony"

"Fox News hosts criticized a distorted version of Hillary Clinton's congressional testimony on the 2012 Benghazi attacks, falsely suggesting that the former secretary of state had been indifferent to the cause of the attack."

New York Times: "Torture Report Puts Presidential Hopefuls in Quiet Mode"

"On Wednesday, Mr. Christie, the New Jersey governor and potential Republican presidential candidate in 2016, was hardly eager to revisit the torture issue. Among presumptive candidates in both parties — including Hillary Rodham Clinton and Jeb Bush — he had company in his reticence."

Associated Press: "Delays Plague Hillary Clinton's State Dept. Files"

"The State Department has failed to turn over government documents covering Hillary Rodham Clinton's tenure as secretary of state that The Associated Press and others requested under the U.S. Freedom of Information Act ahead of her presumptive presidential campaign."

Wall Street Journal opinion: Karl Rove: "Why Does Hillary Want to Be President, Anyway?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[Subtitle:] “So far it looks like Mrs. Clinton would have at least as many problems in 2016 as she did in 2008.”

MSNBC: “Ted Cruz rips ‘Obama-Clinton’ foreign policy in 2016 preview”

“In a potential preview of the 2016 presidential contest, Senator Ted Cruz lit into the ‘Obama-Clinton foreign policy’ in a speech before the conservative Heritage Foundation on Wednesday.”

Politico: “Poll: Clinton leads among wealthy voters”

“In a CNBC survey of the wealthy released on Wednesday, 31 percent of those with assets of $1 million or more said that they would vote for former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton for president in 2016.”

People: “PEOPLE Magazine Rounds Up the 25 Most Intriguing People of 2014”

“Hillary Rodham Clinton paid tribute to the poet, author and activist, telling PEOPLE: ‘We're a better country today because of Maya Angelou. Our country's struggles, triumphs and progress over the past century are written all over her life.’”

Washington Post blog: The Fix: “Why Elizabeth Warren is liberals’ dream 2016 candidate, in 49 seconds”

“Speeches like the one Warren gave Wednesday will just fuel chatter about why she should challenge Hillary Rodham Clinton in two years. And she knows it.”

The Hill opinion: Lanny Danny: “Why I am ready for Hillary”

“With Hillary Rodham Clinton as the Democratic Party nominee in 2016, it’s time. And it will happen.”

Articles:

Bloomberg: “Chris Christie Would Lose Badly to Hillary Clinton in New Jersey, Poll Finds”

By John McCormick

December 11, 2014, 6:02 a.m. EST

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[Subtitle:] Half of New Jersey's voters don't want to see Christie run for president.

A Jersey Guy in the White House? Fuggetaboutit. New Jersey voters say that America isn't ready for one of their own as the commander-in-chief, and would pick Hillary Clinton over their state's governor, Chris Christie, by a margin of 11 points, according to a Quinnipiac University Poll released Thursday.

A slim majority in the survey say Christie wouldn't make a good president, while half of the state's voters don't think the U.S. is ready for a "Jersey Guy" in the White House. New York neighbor Clinton would, for now, beat all of the prospective Republican 2016 candidates in the state.

Fifty-three percent of the state's voters said Christie wouldn't make a good White House occupant, while 40 percent say he could do the job. Even among Republicans, a fifth hold the view that he isn't presidential material.

The trepidation over electing Christie president might have something to do with an open question about his potential candidacy: Whether his brash style would be accepted in places like Iowa and New Hampshire, where politics tends to be more genteel. Christie made national news in October when he told a constituent who was critical of New Jersey's response to mega-storm Sandy to “sit down and shut up.”

By a margin of 50 percent to 44 percent, the state's voters say they wouldn't like to see Christie run for president. If he does, 62 percent say he should resign as governor.

“If Christie does run—and his New Jersey neighbors say he shouldn’t—he should quit his day job,” Maurice Carroll, assistant director of the poll, said in a statement.

In late January, Christie is scheduled to return to Iowa, where the nomination voting will start in early 2016. The moderate Republican will speak at an event that has so far attracted RSVPs from only the most conservative of prospective GOP presidential candidates, as well as Sarah Palin and Donald Trump.

Electing a president from New Jersey wouldn't be unprecedented, although it's rare. Grover Cleveland is the only New Jersey native to become president, while Woodrow Wilson served as the state's governor and president of Princeton University before occupying the White House, according to the state's website.

On the question of whether Americans are ready for a Jersey president, 49 percent of the state's voters say no and 43 percent say yes. Men are nearly evenly divided, while women are more doubtful, 51 percent to 41 percent. Younger voters think the nation could be open to the idea, while those 35 and older disagree.

"The last Jersey guy who got elected president did not carry the state in his 1916 reelection," Carroll said in a reference to Wilson. "This poll shows we haven't changed in the last century."

If Christie and Clinton run, she would beat him at this point 50 percent to 39 percent. In New Jersey, she would also easily beat former Florida Governor Jeb Bush, Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky and 2012 Republican nominee Mitt Romney.

Clinton is the only candidate listed who gets a positive favorability rating, 58—35 percent. The Republicans all have negative scores in New Jersey.

"She beats all the probable Republican candidates, including the governor," Carroll said. "He does better than the other Republicans but he still loses his home state."

New Jersey voters give President Barack Obama a negative job approval rating in the survey, with 46 percent approving and 50 percent disapproving. That's slightly better than the same poll found in August.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hamden, Connecticut-based Quinnipiac interviewed 1,340 registered voters for the survey, which had a margin of error of plus or minus 2.7 percentage points.

FROM MEDIA MATTERS FOR AMERICA: Media Matters for America: "Fox Resurrects Distorted Version Of Hillary Clinton's Benghazi Testimony"

By Emily Arrowood

December 10, 2014, 3:11 p.m. EST

Fox News hosts criticized a distorted version of Hillary Clinton's congressional testimony on the 2012 Benghazi attacks, falsely suggesting that the former secretary of state had been indifferent to the cause of the attack.

On December 10, the hosts of Outnumbered recalled former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's January 2013 congressional testimony in a discussion on the day's hearing of the Republican-led House Select Committee on Benghazi. Co-host Andrea Tantaros alleged Clinton said, "It doesn't really make a difference what happened on that night" of the attack, and continued, "whether it was men out for a walk." Co-host Kennedy agreed, suggesting Clinton's "strange and insulting line of reflection" evidenced indifference to the lives lost in the attacks. Kennedy went on, "[I]t actually makes a very big difference. If you've got a systemic problem with Al Qaeda who's ready to attack a vulnerable U.S. embassy, then yeah, that's vastly different than a couple people that just get together with some incendiary devices."

That's an egregious stretch of Clinton's remarks.

During her congressional testimony, Sen. Ron Johnson (R-WI) asked Clinton about the State Department's role in editing Obama administration talking points to remove a reference to the Benghazi attackers' motive. In response, she dismissed the relevance of debating who edited a government memo, saying, "[T]he fact is, we had four dead Americans. Was it because of a protest? Or was it because of guys out for a walk one night and decided they'd go kill some Americans? What difference, at this point, does it make?" She emphasized, "It is our job to figure out what happened and do everything we can to prevent it from ever happening again."

Fox figures have tirelessly attempted to scandalize Clinton's innocuous response, even jumping off the remarks to imagine her hypothetical assassination. The distortion has proved too egregious even for other members of the right-wing media -- Weekly Standard writer (and Fox contributor) Stephen Hayes called out his fellow conservatives for misrepresenting her remarks, saying Clinton's critics have "badly mischaracterized the now infamous question." According to Hayes, Clinton's "question, which came in the middle of a heated back-and-forth with U.S. senator Ron Johnson, was not so much a declaration of indifference as it was an attempt to redirect the questioning from its focus on the hours before the attacks to preventing similar attacks in the future."

New York Times: "Torture Report Puts Presidential Hopefuls in Quiet Mode"

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg and Michael Barbaro

December 10, 2014

WASHINGTON — In 2002, not long after President George W. Bush named him the top federal prosecutor in New Jersey, Chris Christie emphatically and unexpectedly denounced torture as a means of gathering evidence.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I cannot believe, given the history of this country, that no matter what the threat to our country that we would forsake our protection of liberties to the extent that we would advocate torture as a way of getting evidence,” he said then, adding, “You have to be coolheaded in times of crisis to be able to not go too far.”

But on Wednesday, Mr. Christie, the New Jersey governor and potential Republican presidential candidate in 2016, was hardly eager to revisit the torture issue. Among presumptive candidates in both parties — including Hillary Rodham Clinton and Jeb Bush — he had company in his reticence.

Most of the possible presidential candidates have not plunged into Washington’s debate over the Senate Intelligence Committee’s withering report on the Central Intelligence Agency’s brutal interrogation tactics — and some are ducking questions entirely, illustrating the delicate politics of national security.

One senator who did agree to talk, Marco Rubio, Republican of Florida, criticized the public release of the Senate report but also decried torture as an interrogation technique. Asked specifically about the use of waterboarding and rectal feeding, which were both documented in the report, Mr. Rubio said he did not want to discuss “specific methods” but suggested that he did not support such practices, noting that they have been discontinued. “And I’m not advocating that we continue those practices.”

But Mr. Rubio struck the same theme as many in his party, condemning the report and its release for being “conducted in a way that was partisan and unfair.” Releasing it, he said, “puts in danger the lives of Americans.”

Few would-be candidates want to be seen as defending torture, particularly in the aftermath of the graphic techniques depicted in the panel’s findings. At the same time, Republican candidates in particular do not want to be seen as soft on terrorism. The report puts one Republican, Mr. Bush, in an especially unenviable position, because it resurrects the most controversial policies of his brother’s administration.

For Mrs. Clinton, the challenge is different: She must balance her desire to be seen as tough on national security against pressure from her party’s liberal wing to not only condemn the gruesome tactics but punish those involved. The report provides an opportunity for potential Clinton challengers to stake out a position to her left — and one Democrat, Gov. Martin O’Malley of Maryland, took it.

While Mrs. Clinton has previously said she did not want to see the officials who conducted the interrogations prosecuted, Mr. O’Malley, in an interview, called on the Justice Department to name a special prosecutor to investigate.

“I think there needs to be some accountability so this doesn’t happen again,” he said.

The likely Republican candidates and their advisers recognize that their party base still has a hawkish impulse when it comes to terrorism, especially given the warnings that the publication of the report could prompt new threats on Americans.

“Look at the polling, and elected Republicans pretty much reflect where their constituents are: largely supportive of the C.I.A. program with little interest in the details, a small minority opposed as a matter of principle, but no one shedding any tears for the terrorists who got roughed up,” said Michael Goldfarb, a neoconservative strategist.

Yet Mr. Christie’s refusal to weigh in — the governor said in a brief interview that it would not be “responsible to comment” on a report he had not read — irritated Mr. Goldfarb, who said in a post on Twitter that the governor was “irresponsible” in avoiding questions Wednesday about the interrogation methods.

For presidential hopefuls outside Washington, there is little upside in commenting, said Kevin Madden, who advised Mitt Romney, the 2012 Republican nominee. Mr. Romney did not comment. Three other Republican governors — Bobby Jindal of Louisiana, Scott Walker of Wisconsin and John R. Kasich of Ohio — also declined to comment on the report.

Mike Huckabee, the former Arkansas governor, issued a statement calling the report “a highly partisan attack on the previous administration” that “puts Americans at grave risk as it fuels propaganda efforts of radical Islamic terror groups and sympathizers already trying to destroy our nation.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But among senators who might run for president, there was more pressure to respond, Mr. Madden said, because it is “part of their day-to-day job.”

Senator Ted Cruz, Republican of Texas, on Wednesday delivered a blistering attack on President Obama’s foreign policy — while linking Mrs. Clinton to it. “Today, the consequences of the Obama/Clinton foreign policy is that our friends no longer trust us, and our enemies no longer fear us,” he said in remarks prepared for a speech at the Heritage Foundation.

Of the likely Republican candidates, Senator Rand Paul, Republican of Kentucky, may have the most difficult balance. Approached outside his office on Wednesday, he would not answer questions. Mr. Paul’s libertarian-leaning followers disdain the aggressive Bush-era national security policies, but the Kentuckian has been careful on foreign policy to not appear as out of the Republican mainstream.

The awkwardness of his position was on display after the report was released Tuesday. Speaking to Politico, he said, “I think we should not have torture,” and he generally praised government transparency, but questioned whether releasing gruesome details would be “beneficial or inflammatory.”

Mr. Bush, the former Florida governor, last week gave a speech calling for a more assertive and muscular American foreign policy, but he has not spoken out on the interrogations. His silence on the report stands in contrast to his quick response on Facebook to Mr. Obama’s executive order on immigration.

Mrs. Clinton has been nearly as quiet. Her memoir from serving as Mr. Obama’s first-term secretary of state included only a single sentence on torture, and the words “torture” and “interrogation” are not in the index. In remarks at the Council on Foreign Relations over the summer, however, she called for the release of the report, saying, “The American people deserve to see it,” but she also noted that she opposed prosecuting “people who were doing what they were told to do.”

Senator Bernard Sanders, the Vermont independent who calls himself a Democratic socialist, denounced the tactics described in the report and said in an interview that he was especially disturbed by the Senate panel’s conclusion that the C.I.A. misled the White House and Congress about them. “If anyone is lying to elected officials, they should be fired immediately,” he said.

Jim Webb, the Democratic former Virginia senator, was more cryptic. He posted on Twitter about the report, posing questions: “Were these acts individual, institutional, or national policy? Did intelligence committee use its oversight power?”

Associated Press: “Delays Plague Hillary Clinton’s State Dept. Files”

By Stephen Braun

December 10, 2014, 2:42 p.m. EST

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The State Department has failed to turn over government documents covering Hillary Rodham Clinton's tenure as secretary of state that The Associated Press and others requested under the U.S. Freedom of Information Act ahead of her presumptive presidential campaign. They include one request AP made four years ago and others pending for more than one year.

The agency already has missed deadlines it set for itself to turn over the material.

The State Department denied the APs requests, and rejected the AP's subsequent appeals, to release the records sought quickly under a provision in the law reserved for journalists requesting federal records about especially newsworthy topics.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In its requests, the APcited the likely prospect of Clinton entering the 2016 race. The former first lady is widely considered the leading Democratic contender hoping to succeed President Barack Obama. She has made scores of recent high-profile speeches and public appearances.

On Wednesday, the conservative political advocacy group Citizens United sued the State Department for failing to disclose flight records showing who accompanied Clinton on overseas trips.

Citizens United, which in 2009 mounted a legal battle that led to the landmark U.S. Supreme Court decision overturning campaign finance limits, said the department unlawfully was withholding the records it sought nearly five months ago.

The State Department is among the U.S. government's worst-performing federal agencies under the Freedom of Information Act. There is no direct evidence that political considerations in a Democratic presidential administration have delayed the release of files about the party's leading contender for 2016. But the agency's delays, unusual even by government standards, have stoked perceptions about what could be taking so long.

"There may not necessarily be political interference, but if the department went out of its way to speed these documents there would be no way for people to accuse them of it," said Thomas Blanton, who has previously sued the State Department for access to records as director of George Washington University's National Security Archive, a research organization.

The department "is stonewalling us," said Citizen United's president, David Bossie. He asserted that "these decisions are being made with Hillary Clinton's intentions at heart," but acknowledged he could provide no evidence of political interference.

Bossie, a former Republican congressional investigator who researched figures in the Clinton administration, said his group's film unit wants the records for a sequel to its documentary about Clinton, which spurred the Citizens United court decision.

The group first asked Air Force officials for passenger lists from Clinton's overseas trips but was told all flight records were under the State Department's control. "These were Air Force flights and crews but State has the records?" he said, adding that his group has submitted 15 Clinton-related requests in the past six months.

The AP's requests go further back.

The AP requested copies of Clinton's full schedules and calendars from her four years as secretary of state; her department's decision to grant a special position for longtime aide Huma Abedin; Clinton's and the agency's roles in the Osama bin Laden raid and National Security Agency surveillance practices; and her role overseeing a major Defense Department contractor. The AP made most of its requests last summer, although one was filed in March 2010.

State Department spokesman Alec Gerlach cited the department's heavy annual load of FOIA requests - 19,000 last year - in saying that the department "does its best to meet its FOIA responsibilities." He said the department takes requests "first in, first out," but noted that timing depends on "the complexity of the request." He declined to comment on Citizen United's suit.

In a previous communication, a State Department official apologized for its own delays responding to AP's records requests without offering any explanation for the delays.

"We sincerely regret the delay," said Lela H. Ross of the Office of Information Programs and Services, which administers the agency's requests. The official did not explain the delays but cited the agency's "complex and lengthy administrative FOIA process."

Last May, the State Department told the AP that its search for records pertaining to Clinton and the defense contractor would be completed by August. The agency said it now expects the files to be available later this month. Similarly, the agency said the Clinton and Abedin records would likely be completed in September. Now it says it will not finish until next April. The 4-year-old FOIA request still has no estimated completion date.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The agency's pace responding to requests for Clinton-related files has frustrated news organizations, archivists and political groups trying to research her role at the State Department in the months before Clinton decides whether to formally enter the 2016 race.

At stake is the public's access to thousands of documents that could help understand and define her activities as the nation's chief diplomat under Obama.

Other major document repositories have released thousands of pages of files about Clinton's private and public life.

Since February, lots of previously restricted records from her years as first lady to President Bill Clinton have been made public by the Clinton Presidential Library. Last month, the University of Virginia's Miller Center presidential oral history collection unveiled dozens of interviews with key players from the Clinton White House.

The State Department generally takes about 450 days to turn over records it considers to be part of complex requests under the Freedom of Information Act. That is seven times longer than the Justice Department and CIA, and 30 times longer than the Treasury Department.

An inspector general's report in 2012 criticized the State Department's practices as "inefficient and ineffective," citing a heavy workload, small staff and interagency problems. A study in March by the nonpartisan Center for Effective Government said the State Department was the worst-performing agency because of its delays and frequent failure to deliver the full number of files that people requested.

Wall Street Journal opinion: Karl Rove: "Why Does Hillary Want to Be President, Anyway?"

By Karl Rove

December 10, 2014, 7:42 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] So far it looks like Mrs. Clinton would have at least as many problems in 2016 as she did in 2008.

There have generally been two reactions to former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton 's Dec. 3 statement at Georgetown University that America should try to "empathize" with our nation's "enemies."

One camp holds that Mrs. Clinton simply chose the wrong word to express a banal thought—that the U.S. must understand its enemies. The other camp says her State Department record demonstrates she herself lacks the empathy to know how to deal with America's adversaries or allies.

Both responses are true, yet I have another observation about her speech: It is further evidence Mrs. Clinton is at best a mediocre presidential candidate. She was lackluster in 2008 and worse today. The stiff, off-putting style is familiar. What's more surprising is how sloppy, ill-prepared and tone-deaf she has become.

If Mrs. Clinton intended to say we must understand our adversaries—their motivations, methods and goals—she should have said so. If her speechwriter's draft was unclear, she should have ordered a rewrite. If she can't summon warmth and wit now, how will she display a winning personality in her umpteenth hundred event, assuming she becomes a candidate?

The empathy quote was memorialized on video. It may come back to haunt her: Sounding like President Obama on foreign policy isn't going to help her win in 2016, when the world is likely to be more chaotic and American interests even more threatened.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This is not Mrs. Clinton's first political misstep this year. There was her early summer book tour where she explained she and her husband were "dead broke" when they left the White House, nearly unable to afford their "houses," and then went off on an NPR reporter who was trying to help her explain away her former opposition to gay marriage.

Campaigning for Democrats in the midterms was no better. On Oct. 24 in Boston, she uttered the inanity, "Don't let anybody tell you that, you know, it's corporations and businesses that create jobs." By the way, there are few grateful Democrats whose campaigns she helped since almost all of them lost.

After the election, more mistakes. At a Nov. 21 black-tie gala in New York, Mrs. Clinton endorsed Mr. Obama's executive order on immigration by suggesting the events' servers and food preparers were in the country illegally, as were most construction workers.

Reporters have largely overlooked Mrs. Clinton's blunders, but it is not inconceivable that at least some of them may start holding her accountable to the standard they apply to gaffes uttered by Republican hopefuls.

Meanwhile, Hillary's operation promises to be entertaining. There have been news reports of infighting among her proto-campaign high command (never a good sign) that included the leak of emails thought to be embarrassing to an aspirant for campaign manager (never a good precedent).

Most telling—and damaging—she still has no core message. This is 22 months following her resignation as secretary of state. She suggested to Charlie Rose on July 17 that she might focus on what to do "to tackle growth, which is the handmaiden of inequality." That sounds less like a message than a tactic to placate the Democratic Party's populist Occupy Wall Street wing with a pale imitation of Sen. Elizabeth Warren.

Even her husband frets she doesn't have a message. Former President Clinton recently told CNN that "we've reached a point in our life when we think you really shouldn't run for office if you don't have a clear idea of what you can do and a unique contribution you can make and you can outline that. Now that the book is done, she wants time to think about that and work through it. I think so much of politics is background noise, and we don't need the background noise anymore."

The next presidential election is in 23 months. But no amount of time is likely to be enough for Mrs. Clinton to make herself a much better candidate. She is who she is and cannot change. In 2008 she could not articulate a compelling purpose for her run and stressed only her inevitability and entitlement. So far, it looks like Hillary 2.0 will have at least as many problems as Hillary 1.0.

It's hard for a political party to win three consecutive terms in the Oval Office. Since 1952, only George H.W. Bush was able to do it for his party after Ronald Reagan 's two terms. Unfortunately for Democrats, Mr. Obama is no Reagan—and as they may soon find out, Hillary is no Bush 41.

MSNBC: "Ted Cruz rips 'Obama-Clinton' foreign policy in 2016 preview"

By Benjy Sarlin

December 10, 2014, 6:35 p.m. EST

In a potential preview of the 2016 presidential contest, Senator Ted Cruz lit into the "Obama-Clinton foreign policy" in a speech before the conservative Heritage Foundation on Wednesday.

"Today, the consequences of the Obama-Ciinton foreign policy is that our friends no longer trust us and our enemies no longer fear us," Cruz said.

In closing his remarks, Cruz added that he was "hopeful and optimistic that two years form now we will see a very different president whose word can be trusted by friend and foe alike."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cruz and former Hillary Clinton are both considered potential, perhaps probable, presidential candidates in 2016. The latter's time as secretary of state under President Obama would play a central role in her campaign, for good or ill, making Cruz's remarks a good indicator of how he and other Republican candidates might take her on.

The senator suggested Obama and Clinton had too much "empathy" to effectively confront the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria (ISIS) even as the president, with Clinton's support, oversees a campaign of airstrikes to destroy the group.

"In the Obama-Clinton foreign policy all members of the international community are equal, be they nations or not, and should be dealt with respectfully and with empathy," he said. "Let me be very clear: When it comes to radical Islamic terrorists who are crucifying Christians, who are beheading children, what our foreign policy needs is not additional empathy. It needs clarity and force and resolve to defend the United States of America."

Cruz devoted the most attention to the administration's handling of Russia and Iran, mocking Clinton for declaring a "reset" in relations with Russian leader Vladimir Putin. He called on the administration to provide arms to Ukraine to battle Russian-backed separatists, withdraw from the START missile treaty with Russia the Senate ratified in 2012, and install new missile defense systems in Eastern Europe.

Russia's economy is currently backsliding into recession thanks to weak oil prices and a suite of international sanctions organized by Obama. Cruz waved away the administration's efforts to punish Putin with only a passing mention, saying they "had no discernable effect."

He accused the administration of playing into Iran's hands by engaging in negotiations over its nuclear program, instead proposing instituting new sanctions attached to a demand that the country dismantle any semblance of a nuclear program unilaterally.

"Here's a hint: if a nation calls you the Great Satan, it ain't good," he said.

Cruz tied the Iran sanctions to reports in the Israeli press, recently dismissed by the State Department as "unfounded," that the United States was considering sanctions against Israel over its announcement of new settlements in Palestinian territories.

"It's difficult to imagine a more stunning indictment of the Obama/Clinton foreign policy than the notion that they might believe we should be sanctioning the nation of Israel and lifting sanctions on the nation of Iran," he said.

In a Q&A with audience members afterwards, Cruz also weighed in on the recent bombshell report by the Senate Intelligence Committee that accused the CIA of engaging in, and covering up, a widespread program of torture against detainees. Cruz said torture is "wrong, unambiguously" and Congress was right to ban the practice, but accused the Democratic Senators behind the report of harming America's image abroad by releasing it.

"It endangered Americans across the globe and the risk of retaliation, of violence is real," he said. "But even more broadly it demonstrates an approach that has characterized this administration for six years, which is that everything everything everything is George W. Bush's fault."

Politico: "Poll: Clinton leads among wealthy voters"

By Kendall Breitman

December 10, 2014, 1:39 p.m. EST

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Millionaires are ready for Hillary.

In a CNBC survey of the wealthy released on Wednesday, 31 percent of those with assets of $1 million or more said that they would vote for former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton for president in 2016. Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush came in second place with 18 percent, followed by New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie with 14 percent.

Thirty-eight percent of female millionaires support Clinton for president, while 27 percent of males expressed support for the potential candidate.

Other potential contenders named in the survey included Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.), Vice President Joe Biden, Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas), Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker.

Bush took the lead for support among Republican millionaires, gaining 36 percent of the support among the group. Democrats overwhelmingly support Clinton, with 72 percent of Democratic millionaires supporting the former secretary of state while Warren only gained the support of 14 percent. Twenty-three percent of Independents also supported Clinton, while Christie followed closely behind with 19 percent.

The poll also found that 74 percent of millionaires didn't donate any money to any candidate in 2014 and only about 4 percent donated amounts over $1,000. Democrats reported giving more money to candidates than Republicans.

The CNBC poll has a margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points.

People: "PEOPLE Magazine Rounds Up the 25 Most Intriguing People of 2014"

[No Writer Mentioned]

December 10, 2014, 3:25 p.m. EST

Director, actress and mom-of-six Angelina Jolie may top PEOPLE magazine's list of 25 most intriguing people – but she isn't the only newsmaker who made headlines in 2014.

On the big screen, Reese Witherspoon, 38, turned books into blockbuster hits (producing both Gone Girl and Wild) and Chris Pratt, 35, exploded into stardom with summer's megahit Guardians of the Galaxy.

Meanwhile, Matthew McConaughey, 45, made a more than alright, alright, alright comeback in his Oscar-winning role in Dallas Buyers Club – and everyone's BFF Jennifer Lawrence, 24, continued her leading-lady status in the high-grossing Hunger Games franchise.

And, of course, PEOPLE's Most Beautiful cover girl Lupita Nyong'o, 31, effortlessly took the red carpet by storm during awards season – and took home an Oscar for her emotional role in 12 Years a Slave to boot!

On the small screen, Orange Is the New Black's Laverne Cox, 30, made history as the first openly transgender person to be nominated for an acting Emmy.

TV titan Shonda Rhimes, 44, turned Thursday nights into ShondaLand, adding How to Get Away with Murder to a lineup that already included longtime hit Grey's Anatomy and Scandal. And 40-year-old Jimmy Fallon, who took over the hosting duties on The Tonight Show, became the king of late night with his post-prime time hilarity.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Behind the scenes, comedian and 30 Rock star Tracy Morgan, 46, is still bravely fighting to recover from the injuries sustained in a car crash in June.

And not-so-behind the scenes, hearts broke everywhere when London-based attorney Amal Alamuddin, 36, took longtime bachelor George Clooney, 53, off the market and became Mrs. Clooney during a glamorous September soirée.

PEOPLE also remembers beloved luminaries we lost in 2014, with friends and family sharing memories. Among them: The great Maya Angelou, who died on May 28 at the age of 86. Hillary Rodham Clinton paid tribute to the poet, author and activist, telling PEOPLE: "We're a better country today because of Maya Angelou. Our country's struggles, triumphs and progress over the past century are written all over her life."

Washington Post blog: The Fix: "Why Elizabeth Warren is liberals' dream 2016 candidate, in 49 seconds"

By Chris Cillizza

December 10, 2014, 3:21 p.m. EST

In case you've been hiding under some coats this week, liberals are keyed up on the idea of recruiting Elizabeth Warren to run for president in 2016. Warren showed why in a speech on the Senate floor Wednesday, protesting the inclusion of a measure that would loosen restriction on derivative trading in a $1 trillion spending bill Congress is expected to approve this week.

It's worth watching the entire speech -- it's less than eight minutes from beginning to end -- but if you are either super busy or an easily distracted millennial, pay particular attention to the first 49 seconds of this clip.

Here's the key line: "I come to the floor today to ask a fundamental question -- who does Congress work for? Does it work for the millionaires, the billionaires, the giant companies with their armies of lobbyists and lawyers? Or does it work for all of us?"

Warren's anti-Wall Street, populist rhetoric, heavily focused on reducing or eliminating income inequality, sits at the core of the Democratic base's belief system at the moment. In a recent NBC-Wall Street Journal poll, almost six in 10 Democrats (58 percent) agreed with the idea that economic and political systems are stacked against them. As WSJ's Neil King notes, that sense of a rigged system is far from a Democrats-only belief; "51 percent of Republicans; 55 percent of whites; 60 percent of blacks; 53 percent of Hispanics; as well as decent majorities of every age and professional cluster, including blue-collar workers, white-collar workers and retirees," all hold it, according to King.

But, the sense of not only a widening gap between haves and have-nots but also a sort of a built-in institutional unfairness to it runs extremely strong within the Democratic base. That goes double when the very likely nominee for the party in 2016 is neither a) a populist or b) anti-Wall Street.

Speeches like the one Warren gave Wednesday will just fuel chatter about why she should challenge Hillary Rodham Clinton in two years. And she knows it.

The Hill opinion: Lanny Danny: "Why I am ready for Hillary"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Lanny Davis

December 10, 2014, 7:52 p.m. EST

Last week, on Dec. 4, I helped organize a Ready for Hillary fundraiser in Montgomery County, Md., in the immediate suburbs of Washington, D.C. The organization, an independent grassroots committee, has been at work for the past year gathering millions of names and small donations in support of Hillary Rodham Clinton for president — that is, just in case she decides to run in 2016.

When I began working on this event, I was not sure many prominent statewide or local elected officials would be willing to sign up on the invitation as members of the host committee, especially because the outgoing Maryland governor, Martin O'Malley, has made it apparent that he is running for president.

But what happened surprised me. Many of the major Maryland statewide elected officials signed up, including the attorney general, state treasurer and state Senate president. Early in the week at a Baltimore event, so did Maryland's two popular U.S. senators: Barbara Mikulski and Benjamin Cardin. In Montgomery County, also leading the host committee were the current popular and recently reelected African-American county executive, Ike Leggett; the revered former county executive Sidney Kramer; and six out of seven members of the county council, including the incoming council president.

The guest of honor was the congressman representing the location of the fundraiser (Potomac), Rep. John Delaney. The congressman offered three facts about Clinton — the reasons she should be our next president.

First, Clinton's record and vision for America's future focuses on economic growth and job creation — and, particularly, on addressing economic challenges still faced today among the working poor and the broad middle class across the nation.

Second, she is a progressive Democrat who knows how to work with the private sector and with Republicans to find solutions. This is what she did again and again, Delaney pointed out, when she served in the Senate from 2001 to 2009.

And third, she is by far the most qualified of all potential candidates, Democratic or Republican. No one has Clinton's combination of years in public service and experience at the state and federal levels, combined with her international and national security/anti-terrorism experience during four years of able service as secretary of State. In a dangerous world, she implemented her "smart power" approach: avoiding over-reliance on U.S. military intervention and, rather, using the "soft power" of America's economic strength, trade and human rights and democratic values.

I would add a fourth attribute of Clinton that may be, in terms of electability and ability to govern, most important of all: She is one of the kindest, warmest, most empathetic and caring people in public life today.

Some people don't see these qualities in her. I have known Secretary Clinton for more than 45 years. I know that in 2016 more and more people will come to know her as she truly is.

Proof that this has already begun to happen can be found in her consistently high ratings on personal characteristics in virtually every poll in recent years. Just this past Monday, the respected Bloomberg Politics poll, with a statistically large national voter sample, showed Clinton with significant leads over every Republican presidential aspirant on the four crucial personal / electability questions: Who "cares about people like you?" Who "shares your values?" Who "has a vision for the future?" And who is "a strong leader?"

Finally, there is the issue of gender. Do I believe that people should vote for her solely because she is a woman? No. But should she be supported because she is the most qualified candidate with a vision for the future of America and the ability to get things done — and she is also a woman? Yes.

I have a daughter and two granddaughters. I want to give them a good answer to the question they and many women and girls in America ask: How come there have been women presidents and prime ministers in countries all over the world but never once in America? Up to now, I have not had a good answer.

Now I have one: With Hillary Rodham Clinton as the Democratic Party nominee in 2016, it's time. And it will happen.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· December 15 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton discusses closing gender data gaps with Michael Bloomberg (AP)

· December 16 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton honored by Robert F. Kennedy Center for Justice and Human Rights (Politico)

· January 21 – Saskatchewan, Canada: Sec. Clinton keynotes the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce's "Global Perspectives" series (MarketWired)

· January 21 – Winnipeg, Canada: Sec. Clinton keynotes the Global Perspectives series (Winnipeg Free Press)

· February 24 – Santa Clara, CA: Sec. Clinton to Keynote Address at Inaugural Watermark Conference for Women (PR Newswire)

· March 19 – Atlantic City, NJ: Sec. Clinton keynotes American Camp Association conference (PR Newswire)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Brent Budowsky" <brentbbi@webtv.net>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 2/28/2015 8:49:45 AM
Subject: ISIS

John, people can agree or not with my views on ISIS, but here the text of a memo I sent today to someone very high level in the USG suggesting a United Nations force against ISIS modeled after the Uniting for Peace resolution during the Korean War:

With ISIS now committing genocide against Christians alongside mass crimes against humanity I would revive my suggestion to enact a resolution of the U.N. General Assembly, based on the precedent established under the Uniting for Peace Resolution during the Korean War, to create an international force, against the ISIS terrorist state. The General Assembly would actually be preferable to the Security Council, even if Russia would not veto, because a General Assembly-created force could put reclaimed territory in Syria under international supervision rather than under Assad.

Personally I am not interested in waiting for the next 20 terror attacks before we devise an effective response. We are now embroiled in arcane discussions with a dysfunctional Congress over inadequate policies. There will be multiple aggressive terror attacks including on American and European soil that are programmed as inevitable under the current policies. If there is one matter the nations of the world should be able to unite against, and act against, it is the crimes of ISIS.

A General Assembly created force could be significantly larger than any alternative force with minimal contributions required of any single nation. My guess is that the prospect of facing this kind of force would have such a powerful ideological and military impact, with a united world behind it, that much territory now controlled by ISIS could be liberated within a reasonable time frame.

On current course I do not believe that any of the leaders of the U.S., Europe, the Middle East or the world will be proud of their legacy or historical reputations following what is clearly a humiliatingly inadequate and inept response to ISIS. If there is one purpose for which the United Nations was created for and should stand for today it is putting a stop to the mass murder, genocide and crimes against humanity that ISIS pursues today.

Sent from my iPad

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Hannah Richert" <Hannah@presidentclinton.com>
To: "Zayneb Shaikley" <zshaikley@clintonfoundation.org>
"Bruce Lindsey" <blindsey@clintonfoundation.org>
"Stephanie Streett" <sstreett@clintonfoundation.org>
"Tina Flournoy" <Tina@presidentclinton.com>
Date: 2/22/2013 9:31:17 AM
Subject: Re: Biweekly Report

Thank you

From: Zayneb Shaikley <zshaikley@clintonfoundation.org >
Date: Friday, February 22, 2013 4:24 PM
To: Hannah Richert <hannah@presidentclinton.com >, Bruce Lindsey <blindsey@clintonfoundation.org >, Stephanie Streett <sstreett@clintonfoundation.org >, Tina Flournoy <tina@presidentclinton.com >
Cc: Laura Graham <lgraham@clintonfoundation.org >, Valerie Alexander <valexander@clintonfoundation.org >, Scott Curran <scurran@clintonfoundation.org >, Amitabh Desai <adesai@clintonfoundation.org >, Dennis Cheng <dcheng@clintonfoundation.org >, Bari Lurie <blurie@clintonfoundation.org >, Angel Urena <Angel@presidentclinton.com >, Jon Davidson <jon@presidentclinton.com >, 'John Podesta' <john.podesta@gmail.com >, Ali Rubin contact <ali@chelseaoffice.com >, Brittany Doyle Contact <brittany@chelseaoffice.com >, Philippe Rosen <prosen@clintonfoundation.org >, Margaret Steenburg <Margaret@presidentclinton.com >
Subject: Biweekly Report

Hannah,
Attached and below is President Clinton's latest biweekly report. Please let me know if he has any questions or feedback.
Thanks,
Zayneb

Biweekly Report
William J. Clinton Foundation
February 22, 2013

MAJOR DOMESTIC INITIATIVES

Alliance for a Healthier Generation

- [NOTE:This information is embargoed until next Thursday, 2/28] The Alliance will be prominently engaged in a new Let's Move initiative, "Let's Move at Schools," that will be announced by First Lady Michelle Obama on Thursday, February 28th in Chicago. Specifically, the Alliance will serve as one of three managing partners that will oversee the implementation of Let's Move Active Schools. The other managing partners are the President's Council for Fitness, Sport, and Nutrition and the American Association for Health, Physical Education, Recreation, and Dance. As a managing partner of the Let's Move at Schools (LMAS) effort, the Alliance will:

    - Leverage the Healthy Schools Program six-step process to help school leaders increase physical activity opportunities. The process includes: building support with students, administrators and staff; completing a self-assessment; creating an action plan; finding resources to support efforts; taking action based on the plan; and celebrating success upon completion of the program.

    - Host the LMAS self-assessment tool to determine the school baseline of physical activity within the five Comprehensive School Physical Activity Program, or CSPAP, areas. The self-assessment tool will reside on the Alliance server and website, and the landing page within the Alliance site will indicate its distinct relationship with LMAS. The existing Healthy Schools Program Physical Education and Student Wellness modules will serve as the basis of the LMAS self-assessment (aka the HSP Inventory).

    - Provide phone, email and in-person expert technical assistance to school champions and participating schools/ districts to implement system change in Physical Education and Student Wellness. Support will be provided through the following outlets:

        - Provide HSP Ambassadors—physical activity champions—to support the in-person professional development trainings

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

▪ Support Let's Move! Active Schools in the transition to the Healthy Schools Program

· These activities will be supported by an initial grant provided by Nike and over time, by other partner corporations. We expect that this effort will accelerate our progress towards meeting our goal of reaching 30,000 schools across the country and helping to deepen our impact on kids' levels of physical activities.

Clinton Health Matters Initiative

· CHMI will be featured prominently at the 2013 HIMMS Conference, at which YOU will be making remarks. Verizon has invited CHMI to serve as a panelist during a session on secure exchange of medical information and to have a presence at its exhibit.

· CHMI released the Coachella Valley Blueprint for Action this week, which outlines the steps the community will take over the next five years to improve overall health and to close health disparity gaps.

· CHMI had a successful meeting with Jacksonville Mayor Alvin Brown about the launch of its community initiative in the Greater Jacksonville region.

Clinton Economic Opportunity Initiative

- Inc. magazine is meeting with Bank of America this week to discuss the possibility of securing its sponsorship for a Women's Summit. Depending on the outcome of these discussions, Inc. may be ready to move forward with discussions around the Clinton Foundation's possible involvement in specific aspects of the Summit (e.g., keynote/ panel speaker, mentoring-related tie-ins, panel topics) as part of a new partnership.

- A six-month post-mentoring program check-in was performed on key pairings from the Philadelphia EMP program. A small handful of these mentee-mentor pairs were only beginning to see the impact of their work together at the conclusion of the program last August, and had noted they believed they would see the greater part of the program's impact in future months.

- For one mentee-mentor pairing, what had already proven to be an impactful mentoring relationship has gone on to become an even larger success:

  Angelo Salandra is the President and CEO of Quality Management Services, a records management, administrative support and onsite management services company. Angelo recognized the need to diversify his customer base and sought out a mentor to help him expand his business into the government sector. Working closely with Hubin Jiang, President & CEO of ECOMPEX, Inc., a significant provider of similar services to the government, Angelo was able to quickly learn the ropes to government procurement resulting in a new government contract. By the program's completion in August 2012, the new government work Angelo was able to garner as a result of his collaboration with Hubin through the Entrepreneur Mentoring Program had helped him to hire an additional five full time employees to his firm (18% increase in workforce) and had driven a 9% increase in the company's annual revenue. Six months later, with Hubin's continued support, Angelo has been able to secure four additional contracts, resulting in an overall increase in annual revenue of over 30%.

MAJOR INTERNATIONAL INITIATIVES

Clinton Development Initiative

Malawi

· CDI is moving forward quickly to develop its plan for building the new Anchor Farm in Tanzania. Walker Morris is working to schedule a meeting with the Minister of Agriculture on his trip to Tanzania in March to discuss an MOU and to look at options for the location of the first commercial farm.

· AGRA has asked CDI to host a field day at Mpherero Farm in Malawi to show representatives from a number of organizations working in agriculture, including USAID and IITA, the work of the Anchor Farm Project.

Rwanda (CHDI)

· Construction on the Mt. Meru Soyco site is 75% complete, and the production of edible oil is expected to begin in July 2013. The government has promised CHDI full support, particularly in terms of production of raw materials. This week, the Prime Minister visited the factory and was very pleased with its progress.

· CHDI has been participating in various exhibitions organized at the District level to demonstrate our work and help farmers understand the difference between varieties of maize and soybean.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Construction of the coffee roasting factory has been on hold for the last three weeks due to a construction permit issue. However, approval has been obtained by the city council and the official construction permit will be signed by the city's mayor next week.

Clinton Giustra Sustainable Growth Initiative

Peru

- On February 15th, the Peru Cataracts project achieved its 50,000 surgery commitment. The goal was reached within 80% of the original budget and ahead of the four year schedule.

- In Apurimac, Peru, CGSGI's remote distribution pilot is entering its sixth week of operations. The program provides low-income women, many of whom are single heads of household, with the opportunity to become entrepreneurs and sell hard to access products to their remote communities. The product offering is being designed to include fast moving consumer goods such as soaps, cooking oil, yarn and clothing, and extends to over-the-counter pharmaceuticals and multivitamins as well as pro-poor products such as solar lamps and clean cook stoves. The first twelve entrepreneurs have completed their training and have sold approximately 2,000 products under consignment over the last five weeks. The venture provides life-changing income opportunities for these women and has the dual benefit of providing last mile distribution to the poor communities where they reside. Another six women have recently been recruited and are undergoing product sales training including the selling of low-cost VisionSpring reading glasses. If successful in Apurimac, CGSGI intends to scale this venture throughout Peru and possibly to other developing nations.

Clinton Global Initiative

Annual Meeting

- CGI currently has 160 paying members registered for the 2013 Annual Meeting, which represents an increase of 33 members since the last bi-weekly report and a reduction of the year-over-year variance from -52 to -22. Of the total number of registrants, 133 are renewals, 35 fewer than last year at this time, and 27 are new, 13 more than last year at this time.

Winter Meeting

- 370 individuals attended the Winter Meeting. Of that total, 40% had not previously attended a CGI event. This includes representatives from organizations that have never been CGI members as well as representatives from current members who have never attended a prior CGI event. Outreach to recruit potential paying members from this pool is underway.

- The plenary session, four of five breakout sessions, the CGI Orientation and the Girls and Women special session were standing room only.

- CGI is still tabulating the results of a survey distributed to participants and will report back any notable findings in the next bi-weekly report.

CGI University

Confirmed program participants for CGI U 2013 include: Sal Khan, Jack Dorsey, Stephen Colbert, and Muhammad Yunus.

The acceptance rate for applicants is 35% this year. Applicants will be notified of their status by the end of the day today.

CGI America

- CGI America has 95 paying participants, including 8 Annual Meeting members and 87 non-Annual Meeting members. There were two paying participants at this time last year.

Recent and Upcoming Convenings

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Arts & Development in Post-Conflict Communities: Why the Arts Matter for Resilient Societies (2/19/2013)

Women Leading Women in Information and Communication Technologies (ICT): A Commitment Workshop (2/19/2013)

Integrating Women-Owned Businesses in Supply Chains: A Commitment Workshop (2/21/2013)

Sustainable Agricultural Training for Rural Farmers (2/21/2013)

Haiti Action Network (2/27/2013)

Coastal Resilience (3/5/2013)

Best Practices for Delivering Health Solutions at the Base of the Pyramid (3/15/2013)

Skills-Based Volunteering to Mentor Young Entrepreneurs (3/8/2013)

Democratic Republic of Congo Action Network (3/19/2013)

The Early Years (3/20/2013)

Oceans: Economic Development for Coastal Communities (3/21/2013)

Oceans: Protecting Ecosystems (3/28/2013)

Oceans: Catalyzing the Fishing Industry (4/4/2013)

Zayneb K. Shaikley
Associate Counsel & Initiative Liaison | William J. Clinton Foundation
77 Water Street, New York, NY 10005
Direct: 917.720.0295 | Mobile: 646.873.0244
zshaikley@clintonfoundation.org | www.clintonfoundation.org

This e-mail, and any attachments hereto, is intended only for use by the addressee(s) named herein and may contain legally privileged and/or confidential information. Any unauthorized use or dissemination of this message in whole or in part is strictly prohibited. If you have received it by mistake please notify the sender by return e-mail and delete this message from your system.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "t r u t h o u t" <messenger@truthout.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 12/15/2014 9:24:52 AM
Subject: Navy's Electromagnetic Warfare Training Would Harm Humans and Wildlife

View Recent Newsletters

Tell a friend about Truthout!

Monday, 15 December 2014

truthout

Donate Today!

Truthout is a 501(c)3 nonprofit organization; donations are tax deductible.

Dahr Jamail | Documents Show Navy's Electromagnetic Warfare Training Would Harm Humans and Wildlife

Dahr Jamail, Truthout: While the US Navy claims "no significant impacts" will occur to wildlife or humans from its electromagnetic war games over the Olympic National Forest, military documents and an expert on the human impact of electromagnetic radiation fields say otherwise.

Read the Article

Marjorie Cohn | Torture Report Confirms Team Bush War Crimes

Marjorie Cohn, Truthout: "Even after many years of writing books and articles about the Bush torture policy, I was unprepared for the atrocious pattern of crimes our government committed against other human beings in our name."

Read the Article

Ferguson Outrage Grows From Local Protests to Global Movement

Crystal Shepeard, Care2: People have let out a collective cry of frustration at the lethal force used disproportionately against people of color in the United States. When a grand jury failed to indict the officer who killed Eric Garner in an illegal chokehold, the protests became a global movement.

Read the Article

Dean Baker | Economic Policy Myths of 2014: Dead and Enduring

Dean Baker, Truthout: The good news is that two economic myths that caused great confusion over the last several years are now headed to the trash bin of history. Unfortunately, many of our great national myths have survived 2014.

Read the Article

John Pilger | War by Media and the Triumph of Propaganda

John Pilger, Truthout: The times we live in are so

BuzzFlash

The National War on the Homeless Continues: Mass Eviction in San Jose

Mark Karlin, BuzzFlash at Truthout: It appears that a growing urban trend is to regard destitute humans as "urban blight" and to make them disappear.

Read the BuzzFlash Commentary

Sen. Warren Warns Against Wall Street Returning to Casino Gambling

Listen to the Interview at NPR

Gun Nuts' Racial Duplicity

Read the Article at Salon

Anti-Nuke Activists Fight

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

dangerous and so distorted in public perception that propaganda is no longer, as Edward Bernays called it, an "invisible government." It is the government.
Read the Article

It's Not the Law - but Prosecutors - That Give Immunity to Killer Cops

Glen Ford, Black Agenda Report: It is not "the law" that stands like a brick wall of impunity for police, but the interpretation of the law by attorneys general and their subordinates, who view prosecutions of police as akin to unnatural acts that cannot be performed in public view.
Read the Article

Citigroup Will Be Broken Up

Simon Johnson, The Baseline Scenario: The supposedly brilliant people who run Citigroup have, in the space of a single working week, made a series of serious political blunders with long-lasting implications. Sen. Elizabeth Warren articulated the core of the problem and what needs to be done.
Read the Article

Black Youth-Organized Millions March NYC Draws Tens of Thousands in Movement's Biggest Protest Yet

Amy Goodman, Samantha Riddell and Juan González, Democracy Now!: Saturday's nationwide actions against police killings and racial profiling was the largest single protest of the post-Ferguson movement and the culmination of daily actions in New York City since a grand jury elected not to indict the police officer who killed Eric Garner.
Watch the Video and Read the Transcript

US Torture: Past, Present... and Future? Beyond the Torture Report

Rebecca Gordon, TomDispatch: "Be shocked, be disgusted, be appalled, but don't be fooled. The Senate torture report, so many years and obstacles in the making, should only be the starting point for a discussion, not the final word on US torture."
Read the Article

Scalia Is Dead Wrong on Torture

The Daily Take Team, The Thom Hartmann Program: Even if torture was an effective way to get information from terrorism suspects during a ticking time bomb scenario - and there's no evidence that it is - it would still be unconstitutional, despite what Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia says.
Read the Article

Mutated Flu Virus Could Signal More Hospitalizations, Deaths This Season

Tony Pugh, McClatchy Newspapers: This season's flu vaccine may not be as effective against new and possibly more virulent strains of the virus that could become the nation's dominant form of influenza in the young flu season.
Read the Article

On the News With Thom Hartmann: Washington Passes Disastrous $1.1 Trillion Spending Bill, and More

In today's On the News segment: Washington passed a disastrous $1.1 trillion spending bill; activists staged a protest outside the Office of the US Trade Representative to demand that secret trade negotiations come to an

to Close Diablo Canyon
Read the Article at EcoWatch

US Marine Charged With Killing Filipino Transgender Woman
Read the Article at The Guardian

Oil Spill in Bangladesh Threatens World's Largest Mangrove System
Read the Article at Global Voices

These Seven Men Owned the Company Linked to CIA Torture
Read the Article at Business Insider

The Devalued US Worker
Read the Article at The Washington Post

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

end; corporations that donate to political campaigns are getting a massive return on their investment; and more.

Watch the Video and Read the Transcript

Support Truthout with a tax-deductible donation

Please add messenger@truthout.org to ensure you receive our messages

Truthout is a proud member of the New spaper Guild/CWA, Local 36047

Subscribe | Unsubscribe

Privacy Policy

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Eizenstat, Stuart" <seizenstat@cov.com>
To: Jake.Sullivan@gmail.com
Date: 6/27/2015 12:28:23 AM
Subject: Re: Letter

Jake,
If you are still going forward with the letter, please be sure to add Mort Zuckerman, who has been outspoken on the Iran nuclear issue, on the negative side (e.g. Jerusalem Post op-ed, June 23, 2015)
Stu

----- Original Message -----
From: Eizenstat, Stuart
Sent: Saturday, June 27, 2015 11:33 AM
To: 'Jake.Sullivan@gmail.com' <Jake.Sullivan@gmail.com>
Cc: 'John.Podesta@gmail.com' <John.Podesta@gmail.com>; 'huma@hrcoffice.com' <huma@hrcoffice.com>
Subject: Re: Letter

I agree. The question is whether this will be in the agreement, since it is outside the 10 year window.
Stu

----- Original Message -----
From: Jake Sullivan [mailto:jake.sullivan@gmail.com]
Sent: Saturday, June 27, 2015 02:22 AM
To: Eizenstat, Stuart
Cc: John.Podesta@gmail.com <John.Podesta@gmail.com>; huma@hrcoffice.com <huma@hrcoffice.com>
Subject: Re: Letter

I read that to mean that it not acquire 25 kgs of HEU, which surely is the White House position!

> On Jun 26, 2015, at 5:51 PM, Eizenstat, Stuart <seizenstat@cov.com> wrote:
>
> Jake,
>
> Right after the paragraph #5, is the paragraph to which I referred. It says, in part, "Most importantly, it is vital for the United States to affirm that it is US policy to prevent Iran from producing sufficient fissile material fron a nuclear weapon-or otherwise acquiring or building one-both during the agreement and after it expires."
>
> This should a point Hillary could take-up.
>
> I hope this is helpful. Best wishes,
>
> Stu
>
> ----- Original Message -----
> From: Jake Sullivan [mailto:jake.sullivan@gmail.com]
> Sent: Friday, June 26, 2015 01:07 PM
> To: Eizenstat, Stuart
> Cc: John.Podesta@gmail.com <John.Podesta@gmail.com>; huma@hrcoffice.com <huma@hrcoffice.com>
> Subject: Re: Letter
>
> Stu - which line in the letter are you referring to? I don't have it in front of me but don't recall a specific section on fissile material.
>
>
>
>> On Jun 26, 2015, at 12:39 AM, Eizenstat, Stuart <seizenstat@cov.com> wrote:
>>
>> Dear Jake,
>>
>> The Washington Institute letter complicates not only Kerry's efforts, but also Hillary's response, especially the insistence after the 10 year period that Iran have less nuclear fuel than needed for one bomb.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

>>
>> I will be with Dennis Ross this weekend in Jerusalem, since we co-chair the Jewish People's Policy Institute, and we have our annual board meeting. I will get more texture on the letter.
>>
>> Best wishes,
>>
>> Stu

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "David Donnelly" <ddonnelly@campaignmoney.org>
To: "Moira Whelan" <mwhelan@nsnetwork.org> bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 6/13/2008 9:23:29 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Re: McCain's 70th Bday bash with Russian tycoon...

Check out the EADS/Airbus connection.

Seven lobbyists for EADS/Airbus are helping McCain. McCain's raised more money from EADS/Airbus than any other politician. McCain intervened on Airbus's behalf in a contract worth up to $100 billion.

Here's the ad we ran this week:

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=b8OXXZCn9QI

DD

On 6/13/08 4:15 PM, "Moira Whelan" <mwhelan@nsnetwork.org> wrote:

> #35
> Online Journal
> http://onlinejournal.com
> June 12, 2008
> John McCain's 70th birthday bash held on boat of Russian tycoon By Wayne Madsen Online Journal Contributing Writer
>
> (WMR) -- John McCain's campaign is trying to make political hay out of the conviction of Chicago tycoon Tony Rezko, a one-time fundraiser for presumptive Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama. However, the McCain campaign wants to bury the story of McCain's 70th birthday bash held on board the yacht of a Russian aluminum tycoon in the Adriatic Sea. The party was held on August 29, 2006, McCain's birthday and followed a congressional junket by McCain and five other GOP senators to the Republic of Georgia.
>
> The host for McCain's yacht party off the coast of the Republic of Montenegro was, according to WMR sources with close links to the Republican Party, Oleg Deripaska, one of Russia's most powerful tycoons who made his billions in cornering Russia's aluminum market in the 1990s.
>
> The 40-year old Deripaska is also > politically-connected, having married the daughter of Russia's late President Boris Yeltsin. Unlike most other Russian tycoons, who now live in exile abroad and are protected by Israeli passports, Deripaska maintains close relations to Russian Prime Minister Vladimir Putin and another Russian tycoon, Roman Abramovich, who was also invested in Russia's aluminum industry. In 2000, Deripaska merged his firm, Basic Element, with Abramovich's firm, RusAl. Both tycoons maintain expensive homes in London.
>
> Deripaska has attracted the attention of U.S. law enforcement and he has been the subject of several civil law suits filed against him because of his business practices. However, no federal criminal charges have been brought against Deripaska. That is because Yeltsin's son-in-law counts, in addition to McCain, former GOP Senator and 1996 GOP presidential candidate Bob Dole among his most ardent supporters. In 2005, Deripaska paid Dole $500,000 in lobbying fees and was granted a visa to enter the United States.
> However, in 2006, the Wall Street Journal reported that the U.S. government refused to grant Deripaska another visa because the FBI discovered he made "inaccurate statements" to the bureau.
>
> In the past, the Canadian firm Magna
> International, in which Deripaska is a $1.5 billion investor, attempted to buy Daimler Chrysler. The deal ultimately fell through.
>
> McCain and Deripaska first met at a dinner party held concurrently with the Davos World Economic Forum in January 2006 in Switzerland. The party was hosted by Canadian gold mining billionaire Peter Munk, owner of Barrick Gold, which has counted former President George H. W. Bush, former Canadian Prime Minister Brian Mulroney, former Senator Howard Baker, major Democratic Party lawyer/lobbyist Vernon Jordan, and former German Central Bank President Karl Otto Pohl among the members of its International Advisory Board. The party was arranged by McCain's 2000 campaign manager Rick Davis of the Washington lobbying group Davis Manafort. Attending the meeting in Davos were McCain, Davis, Deripaska, and Senators Saxby Chambliss (R-GA) and John Sununu (R-NH), as well as the host, Munk.
>
> On August 29, 2006, McCain attended a dinner party in Montenegro that was followed by a champagne reception on a yacht that was hosted by Deripaska. Also reportedly in attendance was Davis, whose lobbying firm was representing the government of Montenegro; Munk; and Nathan Rothschild who, on March 20 of this year held a controversial fundraiser for McCain at Spencer House in London. The fundraiser raised questions about McCain receiving illegal "in kind" contributions from a foreign national.
>
> The 70th birthday bash was reportedly a promise of huge cash donations to McCain's forthcoming presidential campaign, another indication of violations of law prohibiting donations from foreign sources. The quid pro quo for Derpaska was that McCain and his top lobbyists were pushing the European Aeronautic Defense and Space Company (EADS) and its Airbus subsidiary to receive the lucrative US Air Force contract to replace the Air Force's fleet of refueling tankers. The reported source for the aluminum in the Airbus tanker aircraft is Deripaska's Russian Aluminum Company (RusAl).
>
> Some two weeks after the McCain birthday bash in Montenegro, the Russian state-owned Vneshtorgbank announced that it was acquiring more than 5 percent of EADS. At the same time, it was announced that RusAl was in negotiations to merge with a Russian aluminum competitor, SUAL, and Glencore of Switzerland, the firm owned by billionaire American fugitive Marc Rich.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The nexus of McCain with Russian oligarchs like Deripaska, as well as Munk, Rothschild, and Rich signifies that McCain is owned and operated by the very same entrenched global interests who have held sway in Washington during the seven-plus years of the George W. Bush administration.

Previously published in the Wayne Madsen Report.
Wayne Madsen is a Washington, DC-based investigative journalist and nationally-distributed columnist. He is the editor and publisher of the Wayne Madsen Report.

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Mark Lippert" <mlippert@barackobama.com>
To: Ricesusane@aol.com
"Denis McDonough" <dmcdonough@barackobama.com>
djsberg@gmail.com
"Antony \(Tony\) Blinken" <tblinken@barackobama.com>
john.podesta@gmail.com
john.podesta@ptt.gov
Date: 11/7/2008 7:37:50 AM
Subject: Re: Proposed Briefings to be Requested

Its pretty big so I'd seperate it outm. Moreover, you seperate it away from the standard run of mill operations like carrier battle group deployments and the like.

From: ricesusane@aol.com
To: Mark Lippert; Denis McDonough; djsberg@gmail.com ; Antony (Tony) Blinken; john.podesta@gmail.com ; john.podesta@ptt.gov
Sent: Fri Nov 07 14:29:13 2008
Subject: Re: Proposed Briefings to be Requested
yes, we envisioned that as part of ongoing operations. Would you separate it out?

Come to think of it, we should also ask for AFRICOM brief.

-----Original Message-----
From: Mark Lippert <mlippert@barackobama.com>
To: Ricesusane@aol.com; Denis McDonough <dmcdonough@barackobama.com>; djsberg@gmail.com; Antony (Tony) Blinken <tblinken@barackobama.com>; john.podesta@gmail.com; john.podesta@ptt.gov
Sent: Fri, 7 Nov 2008 3:19 pm
Subject: Re: Proposed Briefings to be Requested

Just skimming - I'd throw CTJF-HOA brief into the mix for DOD.

From: ricesusane@aol.com
To: Denis McDonough; Mark Lippert; djsberg@gmail.com ; Antony (Tony) Blinken; john.podesta@gmail.com ; john.podesta@ptt.gov
Sent: Fri Nov 07 14:17:07 2008
Subject: Proposed Briefings to be Requested

Below is the list of briefings Jim and I propose we request of the IC and others for senior transition national security staff over the coming weeks.

A subset of these TBD could subsequently be requested for POTUS-E and VPOTUS-E. We leave it to others to decide if it is desirable and appropriate for POTUS-E to request any or all of these in his meeting with Bush on Monday).

We welcome your thoughts.

IC

Iraq
Iran
Afghanistan
Pakistan
Russia
China
MEPP and region
Mexico
Counter-narcotics and Crime
North Korea
Al Qaeda and global CT threat
Global WMD Threat (bio, chem and nuclear)
Cybersecurity and CI
IRDPA briefs

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

NSC

Policy briefings on:

Iraq
Iran
Afghanistan
Pakistan
Russia
China
MEPP and region
North Korea
Al Qaeda and global CT threat
Global WMD Threat (bio, chem and nuclear) Cybersecurity
Mexico
Counter-narcotics and Crime
Syria
Lebanon
Egypt
Saudi Arabia
Darfur
Zimbabwe DRC
Weak States strategy

OMB

Budget briefing

DOD

Ongoing Operations
Iraq
Afghanistan
Pakistan
Nuclear safety and security
Readiness

Homeland Security

Infrastructure security
Border security
Disease/pandemic preparedness
First respone/disaster preparedness
Crisis Response plans/processes and continuity in government

Instant access to the latest & most popular FREE games while you browse with the Games Toolbar - Download Now!

Instant access to the latest & most popular FREE games while you browse with the Games Toolbar - Download Now!

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Brent Budowsky" <brentbbi@webtv.net>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 5/14/2015 8:06:28 AM
Subject: 'Clinton Cash' author owes Hillary Clinton an apology | TheHill http://thehill.com/blogs/pundits-blog/presidential-campaign/242105-clinton-cash-author-owes-hillary-clinton-an-apology

Sent from my iPad

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Melissa Cantrell" <mcantrell@hillaryclinton.com>
To: hrcrapid@googlegroups.com
"Jennifer Palmieri" <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>
"Kristina Schake" <kschake@hillaryclinton.com>
"Meredith Thatcher" <mthatcher@hillaryclinton.com>
"Julie McClain" <jmcclain@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 5/19/2015 12:23:36 PM
Subject: 5.19.15 HRC TV Coverage

National

-- Interviewed Howard Dean about HRC's answer on the Iraq invasion; used footage of HRC's answer today; Dean said HRC's response on her Iraq record was absolutely brilliant, "end of issue for Hillary Clinton." MSNBC's The Ed Show , 5.19.15

-- Report on the State Department's rejected proposal of a January 2016 deadline to produce HRC's emails from her tenure as Secretary of State; judge gave the State Department one week to come up with an alternative rolling schedule; interviewed Mercedes Schlapp and Angelo Carusone; Schlapp said HRC wants the emails out because they distract from her campaign; Carusone said there was no difference because Republicans would find a way to hit HRC regardless of when the emails are released. MSNBC's The Ed Show , 5.19.15

-- Led with HRC breaking her silence with the press; discussed HRC's State Department emails – mentioned the federal judge's decision that the State Department must release the emails on a rolling basis – used footage of HRC talking in Iowa today about her emails; Heilemann said the email situation was out of HRC's hands; Halperin said HRC has been on the side of public disclosure in the case of her email server; Halperin said the redactions from the emails were not addressed today; shifted into conversation about Blumenthal; used footage of HRC talking about Blumenthal today; Heilemann said the Clintons have an insatiable appetite for people who work in the dark arts which is why they would stand by Blumenthal; shifted into conversation about HRC's wealth and used that footage from today; shifted into conversation about The Clinton Foundation and used that footage from today; shifted into conversation about HRC's perspective on the TPP and used that footage from today; throughout all of this, Heilemann hammers the press for asking poor questions today. Bloomberg's With All Due Respect, 5.19.15 [Part Two]

-- Report on HRC's use of two private email addresses as Secretary of State; report on HRC breaking her silence after Ed Henry's outburst; used footage of HRC's discussion of her emails; said HRC addressed her relationship with Sidney Blumenthal; Dana Perino said HRC handled the interruption by Henry well; Perino said HRC wants people to see her emails because they are her hand-selected emails; Perino said Obama would probably be concerned that Blumenthal was running a rogue information system at the State Department. Fox News' The Five, 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC taking five press questions today; interviewed Jeff Zeleny who said HRC was very practiced at answering questions – she just didn't decide to until today; used footage of HRC answering questions about her emails as Secretary of State; mentioned the federal judge's order to the State Department to speed up the process of releasing HRC's emails; shifted into a report on Sidney Blumenthal, used footage of HRC's answer about Blumenthal today; said HRC answered questions today about The Clinton Foundation; used footage of HRC's answer about her Iraq War support; discussed how HRC answered questions about her wealth; said HRC walked a fine line on trade; teased HRC's events in New Hampshire later this week. CNN's The Lead With Jake Tapper, 5.19.15

-- Led with HRC taking press questions; used footage of HRC answering a question about her emails; reported on the State Department's timeline of releasing HRC's emails; reported on HRC's answer today about her and WJC's wealth; interviewed Jason Leopold, Jess McIntosh, and Nick Confessore; McIntosh pointed to HRC's speeches on immigration policy and criminal justice reform; Leopold said he expected the State Department to comply with the federal judge's order and start releasing emails in July; Confessore said the rolling release schedule serves the public interest; McIntosh said the Clintons' wealth did not complicate HRC's message to the working class, said the Clintons are a couple who come from a working-class background; interviewed Confessore about Sidney Blumenthal; Confesssore said HRC's description of Blumenthal of someone she knew before she got into politics was unusual since they met after she was involved in politics. MSNBC's NOW With Alex Wagner, 5.19.15 [Part Two]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-- Led with HRC taking questions from reporters; report on The New York Times' Sidney Blumenthal story; report about the State Department's announcement it would release HRC's emails in January 2016; interviewed Alex Seitz-Wald who said that local press didn't seem to care about HRC not talking to the press; interviewed Patricia Murphy about Sidney Blumenthal; Murphy said there were a series of smaller stories that were adding up for the Clintons; Murphy said HRC's campaign was in denial that they need to talk to the press; Murphy said HRC would have to explain her time as Secretary of State; Murphy said she thought it was a mistake for HRC to coast to the nomination; Murphy said HRC hit her Iraq War answer out of the park. MSNBC's The Cycle , 5.19.15 [Part Two]

-- Led with HRC taking questions from reporters; reported that reporters mainly question HRC on her emails; said that a federal judge ordered the State Department to start releasing HRC's emails next week; interviewed Ed Henry; Henry talked about how he interrupted HRC's panel; used footage of HRC talking about the Clintons' wealth; interviewed John Bussey who said HRC is likely to come out and support the TPP; used footage of HRC discussing Iraq today; Bussey said this was HRC saying that she goofed on Iraq; Harris Faulkner (the guest host) said that HRC deleting her emails created conflict-of-interest questions; Faulkner (the guest host) said HRC threw the State Department under the bus by saying State needed to speed the process of looking through her emails. Fox News' Shepard Smith Reporting , 5.19.15 [Part Two]

-- Warren said it was interesting that HRC was not able to see the current version of the TPP; Warren said that was a reason to not support the TPP; Warren said HRC said she was opposed to the Investor State Dispute Resolution, and Warren would like HRC to be clearer on that; Warren demurred when asked if TPP would affect who she would support in 2016. Bloomberg's Bloomberg Markets , 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC talking to the press today; interviewed Ed Henry; Henry said he tried to interrupt respectfully when there was a pause in HRC's speaking; Henry said HRC may be listening to Axelrod; brief report on HRC's email exchanges with Sidney Blumenthal and HRC's comments about it today; Henry reported on HRC's comment about HRC and WJC's PFDs; shifted into interview with Kirsten Powers; said the State Department said it would comply with the court order to hand over emails; Powers said there was not enough information to determine whether Blumenthal's emails were a problem; Carlson revisited the hashtag she launched yesterday and read some of the responses. Fox News' The Real Story With Gretchen Carlson , 5.19.15

-- Interview with Bernie Sanders; Sanders said he had been talking about income inequality for years; Sanders said HRC may be in the top one percent; Sanders demurred when Blitzer asked him whether HRC and WJC's speaking fees were a problem; Sanders refused to answer a direct question about whether HRC was committed to the cause of affordable college; Sanders said he wanted to raise taxes on the wealthiest Americans; Sanders said Iraq was a fair topic to draw a contrast with HRC. CNN's Wolf , 5.19.15

-- Report on the State Department's order to come up with a rolling schedule for releasing HRC's emails; interviewed Alex Seitz-Wald who said HRC wanted her emails released sooner; follow-up of HRC and WJC's PFD, quickly shifted into HRC's comment on her finances today, "the deck is still stacked against those at the top"; interviewed Mark Murray about handling her question about Iraq today; Murray noted HRC's answer was almost word-for-word from "Hard Choices." MSNBC's Live With Thomas Roberts , 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC's Q&A after her Iowa small-business roundtable; footage of Kristen Welker asking HRC about whether she had a conflict of interest in giving paid speeches ahead of her run for President; HRC said no; HRC said she wanted her emails released more than anyone; HRC said she was proud of the Foundation; led into comments from the State Department about creating a rolling schedule to release HRC's emails; interviewed Alex Seitz-Wald about why HRC spoke to the press today; Alex Seitz-Wald said it was to address mounting pressure from the press. MSNBC showed an unscientific Pulse poll that showed 7 percent of viewers said HRC's email controversy would impact their vote. MSNBC's Live With Thomas Roberts , 5.19.15

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-- Report on HRC's comments about Iraq today; interviewed O. Kay Henderson; Henderson said Iraq was not an issue on the Democratic side but could be if Webb started to talk about it in Iowa; Henderson said pocketbook issues motivated voters more than anything else; Henderson said HRC had reached a tipping point at which she needed to speak to the press. MSNBC's Live With Thomas Roberts , 5.19.15

-- Led with HRC breaking her silence on Iraq; used footage of HRC answering a question about the Iraq War; interviewed Jeff Zeleny who said she had been pressured by Democrats to make her position clear on trade; Zeleny said HRC was not defensive and came over to talk to the press with a smile on her face; used footage of HRC answering questions about her emails; Zeleny said he believes HRC when she said she wanted her emails released soon; interviewed Dana Bash and David Chalian; Bash said HRC is staying on message; Chalian said HRC's press gaggle was a sign that she was improving as a candidate; Bash said HRC looks and feels more comfortable with people she picked "but real human beings" none the less; teased HRC's fundraisers tomorrow in Chicago and events in New Hampshire later in the week. CNN's Wolf , 5.19.15

-- Report on Sidney Blumenthal emails; interviewed Rich Lowrey and Alan Colmes; Colmes said he'd like to see HRC answer questions from the press; host said HRC was either lying or wrong when she said she didn't have two devices; Lowrey said HRC was passing along information from Blumenthal who had a business interest in certain happenings in Libya; discussed the State Department releasing HRC's emails in January 2016. Fox News' America's Newsroom with Bill Hemmer and Martha MacCallum, 5.19.15

-- Led with report on the State Department's announcement it would not release HRC's emails until 2016; report that HRC used two email accounts while working as Secretary of State; the State Department requested a deadline of January 15, 2016; used footage from HRC's UN press conference in March; noted the Benghazi committee did not have response yet; mentioned David Axelrod's Meet The Press appearance this weekend; interview with Chris Stirewalt who said the sooner the emails came out the better for HRC; discussed the New York Times story about HRC's communication with Sidney Blumenthal and her use of a second email address; MacCallum said HRC was passing Blumenthal's information to Jake Sullivan. Fox News' America's Newsroom with Bill Hemmer and Martha MacCallum, 5.19.15

-- Report on the State Department's request to release HRC's emails in January 2016; shifted into New York Times report about Blumenthal, saying the Benghazi Committee will subpoena Blumenthal; interviewed Michael Tomasky; Tomasky said HRC would probably prefer for her emails to be released sooner than January; showed footage of Christie hitting HRC for her use of a private email server, footage of Santorum saying HRC has not been transparent; Tomasky said the email story would go away if there was nothing in the emails; discussed Blumenthal; Tomasky said he couldn't make heads or tails of The New York Times story, he said he didn't understand what the story was about. MSNBC's News Nation , 5.19.15

-- Report on Sidney Blumenthal emails about Libya; indicated Gowdy wanted to subpoena Blumenthal; Blumenthal had business interests in the State Department following his advice; interviewed AB Stoddard and Charles Hurt; Hurt said he marveled at the Clintons' staying power; Stoddard said that HRC would pass along Blumenthal's emails to other members of the State Department; Stoddard noted that Huma Abedin also worked for private enterprises while advising HRC; noted the Obama administration rejected Blumenthal's employment at the State Department; Hurt said Obama must be mad about HRC talking to Blumenthal behind his back. Fox News' Happening Now, 5.19.15

-- Report on how presidential candidates are responding to questions about the invasion of Iraq; noted HRC voted in favor of the use of force against Saddam Hussein; showed footage of HRC's appearance on BBC Newsnight from June 2014; noted The Washington Post's clock counting time since HRC last answered questions. Fox News' Happening Now , 5.19.15

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-- 20-minute report on HRC's avoidance of the press; led into report on a federal judge's order for the State Department to turn over HRC's emails from the State Department on a rolling basis; led into report on HRC's emails with Sidney Blumenthal; panel conversation with Nick Confessore, Chris Cillizza, and Susan Page; Confessore described Blumenthal from the panel; Page said all of these stories coming out about HRC show that HRC may not be as vetted as we thought; Cillizza butchers a Faulkner quote, "The past is never past;" Mitchell noted that HRC and WJC's PFDs were released on a Friday night; Mitchell said the Blumenthal story and the delayed Benghazi Committee hearing get wrapped up in a narrative that cannot be helpful to HRC; shifted into footage of HRC talking about trade; Page said HRC needs to come down on trade; interviewed Alex Seitz-Wald who said HRC did talk about the emails during her Q&A and her wealth; Seitz-Wald said HRC's Q&A would sate the cries of the press for a while; played footage from HRC's Q&A; Confessore said he could not see how extending the State Department vetting process would benefit HRC; Mitchell said this is the most extensive Q&A she's seen HRC give; Seitz-Wald said HRC was running a classic front-runner campaign; Page said HRC could handle any question thrown at her. MSNBC's Andrea Mitchell Reports , 5.19.15 [Part Two]

-- Report on HRC answering questions from the press; used footage of HRC talking about Sidney Blumenthal, her emails from the State Department, and her speaking fees from her Q&A today; interviewed Ed Henry, who said the reason she had a news conference was because Henry started to yell questions at her; Henry said HRC had not said she wanted the emails out ASAP before; Tantaros said that HRC's statement that she could not provide her emails directly to the American public was a flat-out lie; Henry said the State Department needed to go through the emails and see what was confidential and what wasn't; Tantaros said the emails sets up a back-and-forth between the Clinton camp and the Obama administration; Tantaros said HRC's server was paid for by The Clinton Foundation in a potential quid pro quo. Fox News' Outnumbered , 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC answering questions from the press; led into the news that the State Department said it would take until January 2016 to review all of HRC's emails; showed footage of HRC answering questions from the press in Iowa. CNN's Legal View With Ashleigh Banfield , 5.19.15

-- Report on the State Department's announcement that HRC's emails would not be available until January 2016 and HRC's avoidance of reporters; interviewed Alex Seitz-Wald and Jackie Kucinich; Seitz-Wald said one of the benefits of Clinton Cash is it airs a lot of the email stories now before people are paying attention in the primaries when the emails will likely be released; Seitz-Wald said the tension between HRC and the press was natural; Kucinich said Americans weren't paying attention yet. MSNBC's The Rundown With Jose Diaz-Balart , 5.19.15

-- Report on the State Department's announcement that HRC's emails would not be available until January 2016; interviewed Kristen Welker; report about HRC's use of a private email server while she was Secretary of State; included footage of Christie hitting HRC for use of the private server; mentioned HRC and WJC's PFD; footage of Rick Santorum knocking HRC for not being transparent; coverage of HRC not taking questions from the press; campaign officials did not weigh in on the State Department's intended release of HRC's emails; led into interview with Ken Vogel who said this delay on the emails was bad for HRC because it would lead to a rush of scrutiny around the Iowa Caucus; Welker said holding smaller events was a strategy for HRC; Vogel said Blumenthal was a bad story for HRC. MSNBC's The Rundown With Jose Diaz-Balart , 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC's trip to Iowa today; mentioned Sidney Blumenthal emails about Libya; Jeff Zeleny said reporters and Republicans were criticizing HRC's demurral of the press; Zeleny said HRC would push the economy today, but quickly pivoted to talking about Blumenthal's emails; Zeleny noted it was like HRC had two different campaigns in two different universes. Also, Carol Costello says, "email scandal schmandal." CNN Newsroom With Carol Costello, 5.19.15

-- Brief report that HRC had a second private email address as Secretary of State; said the account was used to communicate with Sidney Blumenthal about Libya. CNN Newsroom With Carol Costello. CNN Newsroom With Carol Costello, 5.19.15

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-- Brief report on George Stephanopoulos's donations to The Clinton Foundation; angle is that ABC signed a $105 million contract extension with Stephanopoulos last year; led into HRC using a second private email address at the State Department. Fox News' Fox and Friends , 5.19.15

-- Interviewed Laura Ingraham about HRC's use of multiple email address at the State Department; Ingraham said HRC had been castigated; Ingraham said HRC's team would get away with what they could get away with until there was an evidentiary equivalent of a blue dress; Ingraham talked about Blumenthal for a bit as an example of old Clinton cronyism. Fox News' Fox and Friends , 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC's use of more than one personal email account as Secretary of State; Doocy said it looks like either HRC or her lawyer did not tell the truth; Kimbell said he was annoyed it would take until 2016 to get HRC's emails; footage of Christie from The Kelly File in which Christie said to Kelly that HRC's use of private email should be looked into; led into Stephanopoulos's salary from ABC News. Fox News' Fox and Friends , 5.19.15

-- Interview with Robert Gates, who is releasing new book "Duty." Gates says he's unimpressed with 2016 field. Gates says he's sorry HRC hasn't come out in favor of the trade agreement. Gates said Clinton private email was a "risky way" to do business. Gates weighs in on ISIS threat and foreign policy history leading up to creation ISIS. Gates says Jeb Bush made a mistake in the way he answered question on Iraq war Gates says Bush's answer should have been about lessons learned from Iraq war, not what he would have done. Gates predicts trouble in the middle east will continue for a long time. Gates say U.S. doesn't have a strategy in middle east and seems to play it day by day. Gates says splitting Iraq up, as suggested in the past, would be problematic. Discussion of policy towards Turkey. says Turkey is one of the few stable players in middle east. MSNBC's Morning Joe, 5.19.15

-- Interviewed Michael Schmidt about HRC's use of Blumenthal at the State Department, even when Blumenthal had a conflict of interest since he was contracted to work for businessmen who were working to establish business in Libya; Schmidt said Blumenthal's were different than other emails from the outside because of their format and frequency. MSNBC's Morning Joe , 5.19.15

-- Preview of a story on the delayed release of Hillary Clinton's emails until "right before the Iowa caucus." CNN's New Day , 5.19.15

-- Panel talking about the State Department's delayed release of HRC's emails, the Sidney Blumenthal emails, and HRC not taking reporters' questions; included Gloria Borger, Olivier Knox, and Jackie Kucinich spoke; Borger said it remains to be seen whether the public cares about HRC's emails. CNN's New Day , 5.19.15

-- Brief report on the State Department's inability to produce HRC's emails until 2016; mentioned the New York Times' report on Sidney Blumenthal. CNN's New Day , 5.19.15

-- O'Reilly said HRC would have to deal with questions about Iraq because she was Secretary of State; O'Reilly pondered whether HRC had an ISIS strategy. Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor , 5.18.15

-- Report on HRC and WJC's PFD; interviewed Juan Williams and Mary Katharine Ham; Ham said the scale of the Clintons' speaking fees was questionable; Ham said HRC embodies a bad feeling Americans have about political culture and that HRC is slimy; Williams challenged Ham and said that HRC understood everyday Americans; O'Reilly said HRC gave speeches at public universities that were paid by the taxpayers; Williams said Democrats wanted a populist champion like Elizabeth Warren; Ham said Democrats were stuck with HRC; Ham said HRC's staffing was shady with Blumenthal; O'Reilly noted that HRC's poll numbers have not changed. Fox News' The

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Reilly Factor, 5.18.15

-- Interview with Chris Christie; Christie said HRC was pandering when she said she supported a path to citizenship; said HRC's position was not based on an educated study of the issue. Fox News' The Kelly File , 5.18.15

-- Report on HRC and WJC's PFD; mentioned HRC's dead broke comment; Van Susteren said people at Fox were talking about it a lot and asked her panelists AB Stoddard and John McCormack whether people in Iowa were talking about it; McCormack mentioned the New York Times uranium story; Stoddard said HRC has to win over skeptics. Fox News' On The Record With Greta Van Susteren , 5.18.15

-- Interview with Peter Schweizer about George Stephanopoulos's donations to The Clinton Foundation; Schweizer touched on Stephanopoulos also participating in events with The Clinton Foundation; Schweizer said ABC did not find Clinton Cash not credible, that was just Stephanopoulos; used footage of Stephanopoulos from "The War Room"; Schweizer said this was worse than the Brian Williams case. Fox News' Hannity , 5.18.15

-- Report on HRC's Iowa visit; included footage from HRC's Mason City stop; mentioned HRC and WJC's PFD; said HRC did not speak to the media at her Mason City stop; included clip of Santorum saying HRC should answer questions; report contrasted Santorum's accessibility at a town hall with HRC's closed-press events; used clip of David Axelrod from Meet the Press saying HRC should speak to the press; included Bernie Sanders on State of the Union pressuring HRC. Fox News' Fox News' Special Report With Bret Baier , 5.18.15

-- Gloria Borger touched on HRC's involvement in the Iraq War vote and noted that HRC's explanation for her vote changed over time; Sara Murray said Republicans were impressed at how HRC's team dealt with the Iraq War question because she hasn't had to speak about it. CNN's Situation Room With Wolf Blitzer , 5.18.15

-- Panel discussion with Dana Perino and Lewis Black; Wilmore said the Clintons can't get out of their own way with Clinton Cash and the emails; Perino said WJC would hurt and help HRC. Comedy Central's The Nightly Show With Larry Wilmore, 5.18.15

States

Iowa:

-- Report on HRC's Cedar Falls roundtable where the reporter noted she talked to caucus goers about her plan for "supporting entrepreneurs and spurring small-business growth." WHO-DM NBC Channel 13 News at Noon, Des Moines (IA), 5.19.15

--Report on HRC's private email use. Used footage from today's event's press Q&A about the state department releasing emails. KWWL News at Noon, Iowa City (IA), 5.19.15

--Report on HRC's Cedar Falls roundtable and Mason City event. Used footage from yesterday's event on "clean energy." Reporter Marlie Hall talks about HRC's use of two private emails to conduct state department business. Includes report on Huckabee's visit and said he took a shot at HRC saying she is "run[ning] from the very people that want to trust you to lead the country" by not taking questions from anyone CBS KCCI 8 News at Noon, Des Moines (IA),5.19.15

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-- Report on HRC's private email use. Reporter noted how the emails are dominating her political headlines today, rather than Cedar Falls roundtable. Discussed Mason City event and HRC's views on same-sex marriage. Used footage from Iowa GOP leader Charlie Szold who accused her of not answering questions about emails/ finances. WOI ABC Local 5 News Midday, Des Moines (IA), 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC's private email use. Noted that the agency is responding to FOIA lawsuits seeking all of HRC's emails. Included footage from March announcement about emails. KCRG TV9 News at 11, Iowa City (IA), 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC's Cedar Falls roundtable. Noted that her focus was on making it easier for small businesses to grow and stay competitive. KCRG TV9 News at 11, Iowa City (IA) 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC's Cedar Falls roundtable. Used footage from yesterday's event about strong American workers and families. Reporter discussed HRC's answer to trade deal press question. KCRG TV9 News at 11

-- Report on Republican's Iowa visits. Noted Huckabee criticized HRC and Santorum said he would be a stronger candidate than HRC. KCRG TV9 News at 11, Iowa City (IA), 5.19.15

-- Report on HRC's private email use. Noted email release date is interesting timing given her presidential run and the Iowa caucuses/following primaries dates. Said used Twitter to address the subject. CBS KCCI 8 News This Morning, Des Moines (IA), 5.19.15

--Report on HRC's Mason City event. Included footage from yesterday's event on smaller group events. Mentioned Cedar Falls event is happening later in the day. CBS KCCI 8 News This Morning, Des Moines (IA), 5.19.15

-- Preview of HRC's Iowa visits from today and yesterday. Fox 28 Morning Live, Iowa City (IA), 5.19.15

--Preview of HRC's Iowa visits and why she wants to "keep her events small."Today in Iowa at 6, Des Moines (IA), 5.19.15

--Report on HRC's Mason City event. Noted that she would increase minimum wage and lower college debt. Included footage from yesterday's event on smaller group events. Today in Iowa at 5

--Report of Santorum explaining why he would be a strong candidate than HRC. KCRG TV9 Morning News, Iowa City (IA), 5.19.15

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Ilyse G. Hogue, NARAL Pro-Choice America" <can@prochoiceamerica.org>
To: "John Podesta" <John.Podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 10/12/2015 11:07:31 AM
Subject: Hands. Off. Planned. Parenthood.

NARAL Pro-Choice America

Republicans just created a special full-time committee to attack Planned Parenthood. Will you chip in $15 to help fight back?

Dear John,

The war on Planned Parenthood just went nuclear.

Anti-choice Republicans just created a special Benghazi-style committee to attack and investigate Planned Parenthood.[1]

They've spent almost two years and $4.6 million investigating Benghazi—all with the admitted goal of driving down Hillary Clinton's poll numbers.[2]

Now they're going to do the same thing to defund Planned Parenthood.

We all need to redouble our efforts to stop the attacks on Planned Parenthood. Will you chip in $15?

Yes, I'll donate $15 to help defend Planned Parenthood and reproductive rights.

Can you imagine members of Congress rummaging through Cecile Richards' personal emails like they have with Hillary Clinton's? Calling her to testify day after day after day?

This is nothing but a taxpayer-funded campaign of harassment.

The good news is that Planned Parenthood is still more popular than just about any other political entity in America. And with 7 in 10 Americans supporting legal abortion, any elected official who joins the attacks on Planned Parenthood is risking their political hide.

That's why we've launched the "Own It" campaign—to make sure anti-choice politicians can't get away with whitewashing their records with phony ads aimed at female voters right before the election.

Will you chip in $15 to help stop the attacks on Planned Parenthood and defend reproductive rights?

Thank you for helping to make reproductive freedom real for all women.

Ilyse G. Hogue
President, NARAL Pro-Choice America

DONATE NOW

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sources:

1. Republicans Keep Forming New Committees To Take Down Planned Parenthood , ThinkProgress, October 8, 2015

2. Benghazi Investigation: The Cost to Taxpayers , Select Committee on Benghazi Minority Site, accessed October 8, 2015

This message was sent to: John.Podesta@gmail.com | If you'd like to sign up for emails in a different account, click here . If we need to update your contact information, please click here .

We believe that emails are a crucial way for NARAL to stay in touch with supporters. However, if you'd like to unsubscribe, click here .

© Copyright 2015 NARAL Pro-Choice America
1156 15th Street, Suite 700, Washington, DC 20005
All rights reserved.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 11/14/2014 6:46:40 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Friday November 14, 2014 Afternoon Roundup

Correct The Record Friday November 14, 2014 Afternoon Roundup:

Tweets:

Pres. Bill Clinton @billclinton: I was "Happy" to be honored! MT @Pharrell: It was an honor to perform for @BillClinton w @herbiehancock at Thelonious Monk Jazz Institute [11/13/14, 7:05 p.m. EST]

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: .@HillaryClinton supported a job training and placement program for court reporters #HRC365 http://1.usa.gov/1pzBbdH [11/14/14, 11:30 a.m. EST]

Headlines:

MSNBC: "Clinton network gathers in Little Rock to reminisce and plot"

"The formal program kicks Friday morning with an all-day symposium featuring major Clinton administration figures and continues Saturday with Hillary and Chelsea Clinton. In-between, once-and-possibly future Clinton staffers say there will be plenty of talk about Hillary Clinton's future plans."

Washington Post blog: Post Politics: "Participants assess the (Bill) Clinton legacy as Clinton library turns 10"

"The long weekend is sort of like a destination wedding for Clintonistas past and maybe future."

New York Times: "Spurred by Midterm Losses, Liberal and Moderate Democrats Square Off Over Strategy"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Hillary Rodham Clinton, should she run, will face tension between the business-friendly wing of the party that was ascendant in the economic boom during her husband's administration and the populism of Senator Elizabeth Warren, Democrat of Massachusetts, that has gained currency of late."

U.S. News & World Report: "Terry McAuliffe: 60 Days Until Hillary Decision"

"Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe says Hillary Clinton will know whether she's running for president in 2016 within the next 60 days."

Bloomberg: "Jim Webb and the Lost History of the Pre-Obama Left"

"There's no soft-pedaling that criticism. The new Democratic Party expects to win the 2016 election by, for the thirteenth consecutive time, losing the white vote but racking up huge wins with minorities."

Articles:

MSNBC: "Clinton network gathers in Little Rock to reminisce and plot"

By Alex Seitz-Wald

November 14, 2014, 7:18 a.m. EST

LITTLE ROCK, Arkansas – The sprawling Clinton network will gather here this weekend to celebrate the tenth anniversary of the former president's library – and to look forward to the likely next presidential franchise of the Clinton enterprise.

All three Clinton family members, along with hundreds of friends, former aides, donors, and supporters – not to mention a sprinkling of celebrities – are expected in the city where Bill Clinton was once governor. It's one part alumni reunion, one part citywide festival, and one part pre-game huddle ahead of an almost certain fourth Clinton family presidential run.

The city is hosting weeks of events and exhibitions to showcase its favorite son, from an exhibition on Hillary Clinton's handbags to a bike tour of Bill Clinton's favorite haunts.

The formal program kicks Friday morning with an all-day symposium featuring major Clinton administration figures and continues Saturday with Hillary and Chelsea Clinton. In-between, once-and-possibly future Clinton staffers say there will be plenty of talk about Hillary Clinton's future plans.

It's one of two major Clinton network gatherings this month in the critical interregnum between the midterm election and the start of Clinton's expected second presidential campaign, which is likely to come early next year.

If the Little Rock event is colored with nostalgia for the last Clinton White House, the other event, a meeting of the largest donors to the pro-Clinton Ready for Hilary super PAC in the first family's other home of New York City, is decidedly more focused on a future Clinton White House. That event will bring together later this month hundreds of the groups largest donors, along with top strategists and Clinton insiders in the same hotel that hosts the annual Clinton Global Initiative.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Together, the events will help chart the course for Clinton's first moves out of the gate next week. There will be plenty of unsolicited advice.

While Clintons may spend more time these days in Manhattan or Washington, Arkansas may still be there place where their presence is most felt.

To get to William J. Clinton Presidential Center in downtown Little Rock, you fly into Bill and Hillary Clinton National Airport, then head West past the Clinton School of Public Policy at the University of Arkansas, before turning onto President Clinton Avenue, which takes you past the Clinton Presidential Park and the Clinton Presidential Park Bridge. The city's visitor bureau offers a "Billgrimage" tour for those seeking more.

The library opened under inauspicious circumstances in 2004, as a cold rain dampened the outdoor event as then-Presidents George W. Bush, his father George H.W. Bush, and Jimmy Carter huddled under umbrellas along with 30,000 onlookers.

The $165 million-dollar library, built on a formerly blighted plot of land downtown on the river, has revitalized the area. The library and museum complex has been responsible for $2.5 billion in economic development, the city's tourism board is eager to note, and helped put Little Rock on several magazine's list of best places to live.

Its downtown is now filled with restaurants and bars, and the city touts that it is "home to the most LED-illuminated bridges, spanning a major body of water, in the country."

The dedication ceremony included a performance by U2 frontman Bono, while this year's celebration centers around a major concert Saturday night featuring pop star Nick Jonas, Kool and the Gang, "House of Cards" star Kevin Spacey and others.

Washington Post blog: Post Politics: "Participants assess the (Bill) Clinton legacy as Clinton library turns 10"

By Ann Gearan

November 14, 2014, 11:40 a.m. EST

LITTLE ROCK — Cabinet members, senior advisers and a long list of loyalists and retainers gathered Friday for an all-day retrospective of Bill Clinton's two terms as president that also crackled with the possibility of another Clinton White House.

To mark the 10th anniversary of the Clinton Presidential Center here, the Clinton library scheduled panel discussions on foreign, domestic and economic policy decision-making during the two Clinton terms. The discussion Friday inaugurated a four-day celebration of all things Clinton.

The long weekend is sort of like a destination wedding for Clintonistas past and maybe future. On the schedule after Friday's wonky start are an event highlighting Hillary Rodham Clinton's work on behalf of women and girls, a discussion of how the Clinton library has improved the economic bottom line of Little Rock, a free concert and a barbecue.

The University of Virginia's Miller Center will be releasing a trove of more than 130 oral history interviews with Clinton administration participants later Friday. The project is in collaboration with the Clinton Center, a gleaming modernist glass and steel affair that has anchored an economic revitalization of a formerly blighted waterfront industrial zone.

Neither former president Bill Clinton nor former secretary of state Hillary Clinton was on hand as former national security adviser Sandy Berger and others began an examination of Clinton national security policy Friday. Haitian refugees, North Korean nuclear weapons and Balkan chaos were among the topics at hand Friday morning.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Some of Hillary Clinton's besties were there, however, including Capricia Marshall and Cheryl Mills. Both served both in the Clinton White House and at Hillary Clinton's State Department, and are expected to be part of a 2016 campaign should Clinton mount one.

Berger put the task of any White House in coping with fast-moving world events in colorful context. Being national security adviser, Berger said, "is like riding on the elephant and then having to clean up after the elephant when you're done."

New York Times: "Spurred by Midterm Losses, Liberal and Moderate Democrats Square Off Over Strategy"

By Jonathan Martin

November 14, 2014

WASHINGTON — The Democrats' widespread losses last week have revived a debate inside the party about its fundamental identity, a long-running feud between center and left that has taken on new urgency in the aftermath of a disastrous election and in a time of deeply felt economic anxiety.

The discussion is taking place in post-election meetings, conference calls and dueling memos from liberals and moderates. But it will soon grow louder, shaping the actions of congressional Democrats in President Obama's final two years and, more notably, defining the party's presidential primary in 2016.

"The debate will ultimately play out in a battle for the soul of the Clinton campaign," said Matt Bennett, a senior official at Third Way, the centrist political group.

Hillary Rodham Clinton, should she run, will face tension between the business-friendly wing of the party that was ascendant in the economic boom during her husband's administration and the populism of Senator Elizabeth Warren, Democrat of Massachusetts, that has gained currency of late.

"I want her to run on a raising wages agenda and not cater to Wall Street but to everyday people," Richard Trumka, president of the AFL-CIO, said of his expectations for Mrs. Clinton.

Straddling the two blocs could prove difficult. Progressives have been emboldened to criticize party leaders after the Republican rout, particularly given a lack of a coherent Democratic message to address the problem of stagnant wages.

Sifting through returns showing that lower-income voters either supported Republicans or did not vote, liberals argue that without a more robust message about economic fairness, the party will continue to suffer among working class voters, particularly in the South and Midwest.

Mr. Obama's wide popularity among activists and his attempt to transcend the traditional moderate-versus-liberal divide have largely papered over Democratic divisions on economic policy for the last six years. The party was also brought together by passage the health care law, a goal of Democratic presidents since Harry Truman. But with Mr. Obama's popularity flagging, and an economic recovery largely benefiting the affluent, Democrats are clashing anew.

Unlike the 1980s, when heavy losses prompted moderates to plead with the party to move away from liberal interest groups and toward to the middle, it is now progressives who are the most outspoken.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And they are seizing on the election results to reorient the party. “Too many Democrats are too close to Wall Street, too many Democrats support trade agreements that outsource jobs and too many Democrats are too willing to cut Social Security — and that’s why we lose elections,” said Senator Sherrod Brown, Democrat of Ohio.

Mr. Brown said he had talked to over 60 Ohio Democrat leaders and activists since they got trounced in every statewide election and saw their state chairman quit. “The message I heard from all of them was: the Democratic Party should fight for the little guy.”

Continue reading the main story

To help provide a bridge to liberals, Senate Democrats on Thursday named Ms. Warren as part of their leadership.

While overwhelmingly in sync on the substance of cultural issues, some of the populists believe Democrats placed too much emphasis on such matters and not enough on economic fairness, depressing voter turnout.

"Gay marriage, abortion and birth control are important,” said Terry O’Sullivan, president of the Laborers International Union. “But people join our organization for their livelihood, and that’s what our people vote on: their economic self-interest. I do think the party needs to re-examine what it stands for and get back to bread-and-butter issues.”

Labor is having its own struggles, with membership declining and Republican-controlled states moving to limit union power. Democrats lost crucial races in part because of their candidates’ struggles in traditional union enclaves like eastern Iowa, suburban Detroit and parts of Wisconsin.

For example, in losing to the Republican they perhaps most wanted to beat, Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, unions saw their members’ turnout slip. After making up 32 percent of all voters in the 2012 recall attempt against Mr. Walker, union households made up just 21 percent of the Wisconsin electorate last week.

Part of that drop is a result of Mr. Walker’s pushing through changes to collective bargaining law that thinned the ranks of his state’s union members. But what exasperates some labor leaders is that Mary Burke, the Democrat who tried to unset Mr. Walker, would not even commit to undoing the changes that have crippled unions.

Echoing many liberals, Steve Rosenthal, a longtime Democratic strategist with ties to labor, said progressive organizations and unions should become more engaged in primaries and push candidates to stand for their agenda just as the right tries to make Republican candidates hew to conservative orthodoxy.

“I think it’s critical for folks on the left to do more of the same,” Mr. Rosenthal said

There were a handful of bright spots in an otherwise dismal year for Democrats, and progressives are holding up as models the success of three Senate candidates who ran as populists: Senator Al Franken of Minnesota, Senator Jeff Merkley of Oregon and Senator-elect Gary Peters of Michigan.

Mr. Merkley won by 19 percentage points with a campaign centered on the loss of well-paying jobs, the spiraling cost of college tuition and his opposition to trade deals that he said send jobs overseas. While Democrats nationally were losing whites without a college degree by 30 percentage points, Mr. Merkley narrowly carried that bloc of voters.

“We didn’t lose them here in Oregon because we talked about what they care about,” Mr. Merkley said.

But some center-left Democrats believe that this is the exception and that the party should give up on winning a majority of such voters.

“Slowly and steadily since 1968, culture has trumped economics with voting and the white working class,” said Kenneth Baer, a former Obama administration official who has written a book on modern liberalism. “It’s become the great white whale for a shipful of Democratic strategists. Obama proved that while we cannot get wiped out with that demographic, the future of the coalition is among growing parts of the electorate which are neither white nor working class.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The question of which voters to pursue captures the party’s broader debate about its agenda. Centrist Democrats have chalked up the party’s losses to an insufficient performance among moderate and middle-class voters.

“We talk about policies helping the middle-class, but the ones we promote the most are ones that don’t speak to the middle-class, like raising the minimum wage,” said Al From, who founded the moderate Democratic Leadership Council in the 1980s to counter the party’s move to the left and helped propel Bill Clinton to the White House in 1992.

Many liberals believe the disconnect between the politics of the party’s grass-roots and the message they hear from Democratic administrations has left blue-collar voters unenthused. “We do not have to struggle for an agenda that connects with working-class voters,” said Representative Rosa DeLauro, Democrat of Connecticut. “We have an agenda that does that, but it does not get vocalized at the top.”

Yet many progressives concur that simply pushing an increase in the minimum wage is an inadequate solution. Liberals want tougher restrictions on banks, more generous federal student loan aid, enhanced collective bargaining rights and a reassessment of the country’s trade policy.

Mr. Obama has made clear he intends to work with congressional Republicans to push for fewer restrictions on trade. Some union leaders said they intended to fight those efforts, and would be looking for an ally in Mrs. Clinton.

“The next six months we’re going to be relentless on trade,” vowed Larry Cohen, president of the Communications Workers of America. “I hope she comes to our side on this fight. The president is not starting out there.”

U.S. News & World Report: “Terry McAuliffe: 60 Days Until Hillary Decision”

By David Catanese

November 14, 2014, 12:35 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] The close Clinton friend says Hillary will decide on 2016 by mid-January.

Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe says Hillary Clinton will know whether she's running for president in 2016 within the next 60 days.

That's the timeline the Clinton confidante outlined to U.S. News' Nikki Schwab Thursday night during a conversation at the Knock Out Abuse gala, an anti-domestic violence charity event held at The Ritz-Carlton in Washington.

Here's what McAuliffe said:

"She’s got to make that decision and she’s got to spend the next 60 days making that decision. Obviously I’m close friends with the Clintons, I chaired her last campaign. If you know Hillary, she’s going to make up her own mind. I tell you, I hope she runs. It’s time for a woman president of the United States of America. Put the woman issue aside for a minute – she’s tough, she is smart, she is very pro-business, she will get this economy going. She will help the middle class. So I’m hoping she runs, but you know, it’s her decision. But I’m really hoping she runs, but I’m leaving that decision to her."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sixty days from now would place Clinton's decision around mid-January. When she reveals that decision is an entirely different question.

When Schwab floated a Clinton-McAuliffe ticket, the former Democratic National Committee chairman and legendary fundraiser just laughed.

"I'm just happy to support her," he replied.

Bloomberg: "Jim Webb and the Lost History of the Pre-Obama Left"

By David Weigel

November 13, 2014, 11:57 a.m. EST

[Subtitle:] The "centrist" critic of Hillary Clinton is not centrist at all.

In post-election stories about Hillary Clinton's 2016 campaign—and its discontents—one-term Virginia Senator Jim Webb is sometimes described as a challenger from Clinton's right. The latest example comes from Maggie Haberman and Hadas Gold's sharp story about the left-wing media's approach to Clinton: "Even Webb, who was Ronald Reagan's Navy secretary and claims to have told President Barack Obama that health care reform would be a 'disaster,' has gotten some love on the left."

But Webb isn't exactly a figure of the right, or even the center-left. In 2006, when he was writing books and columns critical of the Iraq War, Webb was drafted into Virginia's U.S. Senate race by progressives. Virginia's blue blogs (like the defunct Raising Kaine) and the progressive hub Daily Kos were hotbeds of pro-Webb sentiment. As Daily Kos founder Markos Moulitsas wrote in 2013, community members "raised millions of dollars and generated on-the-ground activism" for Webb and other candidates who were not traditionally left-wing.

Has anything changed? "Webb was the best we could do in a state like Virginia in 2006," wrote Moulitsas in an e-mail. "He was the epitome of Netroots ideological pragmatism. That same pragmatism tells us that we could do far better than Webb today pretty much anywhere outside the Deep South or Idaho, and he certainly isn't someone who could credibly run to Hillary's LEFT. So his flirtations are pretty much a joke."

Fair enough. But Webb's criticisms of the Obama-era Democrats are not particularly right-wing. His anger over the Affordable Care Act started with the process, in which "five different congressional committees voted out their version of health-care reform, and so you had 7,000 pages of contradictory information." Few progressives disagree with that. Webb never took back his vote for the law, or for the idea of universal health care. When he called it a "disaster," he was describing the process that created a law that's heading toward its second Supreme Court challenge. His beef with the Democratic Party was not that it moved left per se, but that it "evolved too strongly into interest groups rather than representing working people, including small business people."

There's no soft-pedaling that criticism. The new Democratic Party expects to win the 2016 election by, for the thirteenth consecutive time, losing the white vote but racking up huge wins with minorities. (The national "white vote" is skewed by the Democrats' abysmal numbers with white voters in the South.) Most Democrats now believe that Hillary Clinton can bend the map enough to win. Webb is a specter from a recent Democratic past when activists hoped that the party could do much more—without abandoning any "left" principles.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace" <info@centerpeace.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 6/24/2015 12:02:24 AM
Subject: News Update - June 24, 2015

S. DANIEL ABRAHAM
CENTER FOR MIDDLE EAST PEACE

Israel and the Middle East News Update

Wednesday, June 24

Click here for a printer-friendly version.

Headlines:

- Israel Air Force Strikes in Gaza After Rocket Explodes in Israel
- UNHRC: Israel can't Drop One-Ton Bomb on a Neighborhood
- Iran Leader Dramatically Toughens 'Red Lines' for Nuclear Deal
- Herzog Aligns with Netanyahu on Iran
- PM: We will Capture Those from Druze Lynch Mob
- Palestine Prepares to Submit File to see Israeli Officials Indicted
- AIPAC Prepares to Battle Obama Over Iran

Commentary:

- The Washington Institute: "Don't Let the Deadline Drive the Deal"
  - By Dennis Ross
- Ha'aretz: "Obama has a Stronger Record on Israel than you Might Have Been Led to Think"
  - By Greg Rosenbaum

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ynet News

IAF Strikes in Gaza After Rocket Explodes in Israel

The Israeli Air Force struck a target in the northern Gaza Strip from which a rocket was launched earlier Tuesday night. A Salafist group sympathetic to the Islamic State group, the "Omar Brigades," claimed responsibility. Yisrael Beytenu Chairman MK Avigdor Lieberman said after the incident that "He who is willing to absorb 'trickles' will ultimately get torrential rain. "We cannot accept this situation. No government has a right to exist if it is willing to accept a situation in which less than a year after a military operation that cost us dearly in soldiers' lives and disruption of national life for two months. This situation is intolerable, unacceptable, and we must put an end to it."

See also, "Rocket fired from Gaza explodes in southern Israel" (Ha'aretz)

Ha'aretz

UNHRC: Israel can't Drop Ton Bomb on Neighborhood

American jurist Mary McGowan Davis, who headed the independent UN probe into the events of last summer's war in Gaza, told Haaretz in an interview that the main message committee members wanted to transmit is that Israel must reexamine its policy of using its military might, because it led to unprecedented destruction in Gaza and to the killing of about 1,500 innocent civilians. "We wanted to make a strong stand that the whole use of explosive weapons in densely populated neighborhoods is problematic and that the policy needs to change," she emphasized in a phone interview from Geneva. "Because it wrong to drop a one-ton bomb in the middle of a neighborhood."

Times of Israel

Iran Leader Toughens 'Red Lines' for Nuclear Deal

Iran's supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei dramatically toughened his country's red lines for a nuclear deal Tuesday in an intervention during a meeting with President Hassan Rouhani and top officials. Contradicting agreements reached in a preliminary accord in Lausanne in April, and speaking days before a permanent deal is supposed to be finalized, Khamenei said he would "not accept long-term limitations" on his country's nuclear program, and insisted on the right to ongoing nuclear research and development. He Also said that Banking and other economic sanctions imposed by the UN and the United States must be lifted "immediately" if a nuclear deal is signed.

See also, "Iran passes bill to protect nuclear program from deal" (Times of Israel)

Jerusalem Post

Herzog Aligns with Netanyahu on Iran

Opposition leader Isaac Herzog presented Israel as a unified front against the proposed Iranian nuclear deal in his meetings in London over the last few days, sources close to him said Tuesday. Herzog discussed Iran as well as the Palestinian issue with advisers to British Prime Minister David Cameron at 10 Downing Street. "There is no difference between me and Netanyahu in reading the threat of Iran," Herzog said in an interview with The Telegraph. "There is no daylight between us on this issue at all. I do not oppose the diplomatic process."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ynet News

PM: We will Capture Those from Druze Lynch Mob

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu addressed rising tensions in Israel's northern Druze communities Tuesday morning at an international cyber conference, saying that authorities wound capture those responsible for a Druze lynch mob that attacked an IDF ambulance on Monday night, wounding two soldiers and killing a Syrian rebel who was delivered to a hospital. "We are a State of laws," said Netanyahu. "We are not part of the anarchy that's spreading around us. We won't let anyone take the law into their hands; we won't let anyone interfere in the missions of IDF soldiers." "I call on the leaders of the Druze community, which is a magnificent community with which we have brotherhood, I call on them to calm things down and say to every Druze citizen in Israel, respect the law, respect the soldiers, do not take the law into their own hands."

Guardian

Palestine Prepares to Submit File to I CC

Palestinian foreign minister, Riyad al-Maliki, will arrive Thursday morning with a delegation at the office of the prosecutor of the international criminal court in The Hague He will hand over a file running to hundreds of pages. Those documents describe to prosecutors for the first time in detail the Palestinian complaint against Israel for alleged breaches of international law, including serious war crimes. In doing so al-Maliki will set in motion a chain of events that could eventually see senior Israeli military and political officials indicted for breaches of international law. The presentation will be given added impetus as it follows hard on the heels of the UNHRC report on Monday, which accused both Israel and Hamas of potential war crimes and called for those responsible to be "brought to justice". Previewing the contents of the submission last week, Palestinian official Ammar Hijazi said it would detail alleged violations of international law by Israel. The ICC chief prosecutor, Fatou Bensouda must decide based on the complaint whether to order a preliminary examination and then a full criminal investigation. And as states themselves cannot be indicted, only individuals, she will also have to determine which Israelis can potentially be held culpable.

Bloomberg View

AIPAC Prepares to Battle Obama Over Iran

As U.S. and Iranian negotiators approach the June 30 deadline to reach a nuclear deal, America's largest pro-Israel lobby is campaigning to kill such an accord in Congress. Since last month, the American Israel Public Affairs Committee has mobilized its members to press legislators to endorse five principles for a nuclear deal -- principles that are almost certain not to be reflected in a final agreement. For example, AIPAC's principles say a deal should last "decades," while the framework for the nuclear agreement released in April would begin easing restrictions on Iran's program after a decade. Another principle says inspectors must be given "anytime, anywhere" access to suspected sites, "including all military facilities." Iran's leaders have consistently said there will be no inspections on military sites.

Parallel to this campaign, major donors to AIPAC and other pro-Israel causes are forming a new and independent 501(c)(4) advocacy organization, according to fundraisers and other lobbyists involved in the effort. The new organization will buy TV, radio and Internet ads targeting lawmakers from both parties who are on the fence about the nuclear deal, these sources say.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Washington Institute– June 19, 2015

Don't Let the Deadline Drive the Deal

To get the best nuclear pact with Iran, Washington might have to let the June 30 target slide.

By Dennis Ross

As both a practitioner and also a student of high stakes negotiations, I am well-acquainted with the use of deadlines to push toward agreements in difficult talks. With the June 30 date for concluding an agreement looming in the negotiations with Iran, there are those who argue that the deadline is important and must be met. Others see it differently. They worry that it creates pressures on us, with the Iranians prone to use the deadline as a lever to gain concessions given what they may see as our desire for the deal. Both arguments have merit.

Often times in difficult negotiations, it makes sense to impose a date by which a decision must be made -- or in other words, to create an action-forcing event. When I mediated between the Israelis and Palestinians on redeployment in Hebron, a highly controversial issue for the Likud-led government at the time, I imposed a deadline for two reasons: First, I felt there was a danger that an extraneous event or an act of violence would sink the negotiating process at a point when we were close to an agreement. Second, I could see how to resolve the remaining issues and the real challenge was to get each leader -- Yasser Arafat and Benjamin Netanyahu -- to make the final decisions and not try to hold out for what might be marginal gains. At the time, I knew each leader would face criticism for doing the deal and there was a natural instinct on both sides to postpone facing a likely backlash even as they tested to see if they could concede less.

It is rare for any national leader to seek out criticism. Putting off difficult or painful decisions is natural and it is one of the reasons deadlines in negotiations are so often employed. But to be credible, they have to be real. Each side has to see that failing to reach the agreement by a deadline truly threatens the possibility of having an agreement. If there is a balance of interest in reaching the agreement, and a comparable fear about the consequences of failing to do so, the deadline can work. Some may question whether the U.S. and Iran have a balance of interest and fear when it comes to reaching or failing to reach an agreement on the Iranian nuclear program.

Certainly, if one pays attention to public pronouncements, Iran's supreme leader, Ali Khamenei, has gone out of his way to suggest that his country does not need a deal. He speaks of not giving into the "bullying" of the "arrogant powers"; of not providing access to Iran's military sites or permitting inspectors to "interrogate" its nuclear scientists; of the Islamic Republic's need to develop a "resistance economy" to ensure it can tolerate sanctions; and that there are "no commitments" that Iran has made in the framework understanding. The tone of the Obama administration has obviously been different -- with the president calling the framework understanding a "historic opportunity" and other leading officials saying that there is no alternative to an agreement -- with some conjuring up the fear that war may be the only way to prevent Iran from becoming a nuclear weapons state if the deal is blocked.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To be fair, President Barack Obama and Secretary of State John Kerry have both also said that "no deal is better than a bad deal" and that the military option remains on the table. But those words seem to carry less weight than the emphasis given to the dire consequences of the alternative to turning the framework understanding into an agreement. From a negotiator's standpoint you never want to signal that you need an agreement more than your partner or adversary at the table, and the conventional wisdom at this point is that the administration has not only positioned itself that way but that the Iranians also perceive that to be the case.

While the Iranians may have such a view, we should not discount that whatever their public posturing, their stake in reaching an agreement is high. Why else do the Iranians so insist on trying to get all sanctions lifted immediately -- notwithstanding Khamenei's call for a resistance economy? Moreover, the announcement of the framework understanding triggered spontaneous celebrations on the streets of Tehran. The Iranian public clearly wants an end to sanctions, the prospect of a better economy and less isolation internationally. No doubt the supreme leader's initial silence and subsequent downplaying of what had been achieved and announced in Lausanne, Switzerland -- saying there were no commitments and there was no deal -- were designed to lower expectations lest those become an increasing pressure on Iran to take steps to conclude the deal.

Moreover, as Mehdi Khalaji has pointed out, there seems to be a difference between the supreme leader's public pronouncements and his private instructions to his negotiators. Notwithstanding his declarations that there would be no access to military sites, the Islamic Republic's foreign minister and his deputy told the Iranian parliament that there would be "managed access" to military facilities under the rubric of the Additional Protocol of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty -- and they explained, when criticized for negotiating such understandings, that they had done so under "instructions." Only Khamenei could give such authoritative orders.

The Iranians clearly understand that they have much to gain by reaching an agreement, and there is probably much more of a balance of interest in reaching a deal than their public posture would suggest. While that could argue for sticking to the June 30 date to force decisions, there are two reasons not to do so: First, there is a pattern to the negotiations in which the Iranians hold out until the deadline, offer minimal concessions and count on us to creatively overcome the gaps. That creates too much pressure on us if there is deadline. Second, the sanctions clearly are a pressure on them, so why relieve them if they are not prepared to meet our essential minimums for the deal?

Precisely because the framework understanding offers the Iranians a lot -- it is essentially a roll-back of sanctions in return for transparency, not a roll-back of sanctions for a roll-back of their nuclear infrastructure -- we should not let the deadline push us toward any softening of what we need both on transparency and the high consequences that must be imposed if that transparency reveals that the Iranians are cheating. That Iran will be permitted to have a large nuclear infrastructure, and after 15 years not be limited in expanding it, creates a premium not just on thorough visibility into Iran's nuclear activities but also on ensuring unmistakable consequences for any transgressions. As such, it is the content of transparency and the agreed, meaningful costs for cheating -- not the deadline itself -- that matter. The administration would be wise to make that clear both to the Iranians and members of Congress.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ironically, for those members of Congress who might be inclined to seize on the failure to meet the June 30 date to try to adopt new sanctions, this might be a reassuring message. It would certainly signal that the administration is holding out and won't be driven to accept something less than it needs -- and that could be used to get Congress to hold off on pressing immediately for new sanctions at a time when the other members of the P5+1 (the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council as well as Germany) are likely to oppose such action. In other words, if fear of congressional action is creating a pressure on the administration to try to meet the June 30 date, there ought to be a way to manage this concern.

For now is not the time for the administration to treat June 30 as an inviolable deadline. As Yitzhak Rabin once said about the timetable of the Oslo process, there are no "sacred dates." And, certainly, while June 30 might be a target, we should not regard it as a sacred date, particularly if we are to avoid it becoming a point of pressure on us and not the Iranians.

Ha'aretz – June 23, 2015

Obama has a Stronger Record on Israel than you Might Have Been Led to Think

While Democrats sometimes get a bad rap, let's not forget that Republicans have a mixed record on standing with Israel, which continues to be top recipient of U.S. foreign military financing*.

By Greg Rosenbaum

The past week has seen the latest episode in an unrelenting campaign to delegitimize President Barack Obama's strong commitment to Israel. It's time to set the record straight on a president who has stood with Israel in times of crisis and has strengthened the Jewish state's security in concrete ways, ensuring it maintains a qualitative military edge.

From his campaign for office to his recent talk at Adas Israel, a synagogue in Washington, D.C., Obama has made it clear that his commitment to Israel is and always will be unshakable. "It would be a moral failing on my part if we did not stand up firmly, steadfastly not just on behalf of Israel's right to exist, but its right to thrive and prosper," he has said.

Obama's actions prove his commitment.

Israel continues to be the top recipient of U.S. foreign military financing, and for fiscal year 2016, the administration requested $3.1 billion in funding. The two nations also have begun preliminary talks on a long-term package that would provide up to $45 billion in security assistance grant aid through 2028. Early this year, Israel signed a contract with the United States for the purchase of 14 F-35 fighter jets, amounting to $3 billion.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Since Obama entered office, Israel has received more than $20.5 billion in foreign military financing. Unlike President George W. Bush, who rejected Israel's request for bunker-buster bombs, Obama became the first president to approve the sale of these advanced weapons, and in the fall of 2012, the U.S. and Israel participated in Austere Challenge 12, the largest joint military exercise ever to be held between the two countries.

Under Obama, the U.S. and Israel have continued Juniper Cobra, a joint exercise that has been held every two years since 2001 to test our joint ability to respond to missile attacks and improve preparedness, as well as coordination between our armed forces.

Unlike Bush, who gave Israel's Iron Dome system a frosty response, Obama has led the way in funding and supporting the research, development and production of the Iron Dome — which has been crucial in helping Israel defend itself against terrorist rocket attacks — as well as the joint U.S.-Israel missile defense systems David's Sling, the Arrow II and Arrow III. Since 2011, the United States has provided Israel with more than $1.3 billion for the Iron Dome system alone.

The military cooperation has been so strong that in a 2012 speech to the Israel National Defense College, then-Defense Minister Ehud Barak said, "The security ties between us and the current administration are at the highest level they have ever been."

In the international arena, under Obama's leadership, the U.S. has fought for Israel's full participation in the United Nations, has voted against resolutions in the General Assembly condemning Israel, cast the only "no" votes on five anti-Israel measures last year in the Human Rights Council, and worked to ensure that the General Assembly held its first-ever session on anti-Semitism. Obama also prevented the Palestinians from unilaterally declaring an independent state.

Under Obama, the United States continues to support the Binational Industrial Research and Development Foundation, or BIRD, which facilitates U.S.-Israel cooperation in such areas as agriculture, healthcare and homeland security. Supporting collaboration between the U.S. Department of Energy and Israel's National Infrastructure, Energy and Water Resources Ministry, BIRD-Energy has facilitated nearly $50 million in U.S.-Israel cooperation.

Obama has been unfailing in supporting Israel's right to exist and defend itself against its enemies, and has been a phone call away when Israel needed assistance in times of crisis, taking personal steps to help avoid a catastrophe when a mob attacked Israel's embassy in Cairo and providing unprecedented support in fighting Israel's major forest fire on Mount Carmel in 2010.

Regardless of political attacks against Obama's pro-Israel record, let's not forget the mixed record of Republican presidents when it comes to standing with Israel. Let's briefly give some historical context to the relationship between the two countries under Obama.

Not only did George W. Bush refuse to stand with Israel on promoting Iron Dome and selling bunker-buster bombs, but in 2005 he also froze nearly all U.S.-Israeli joint defense projects. And, just before Bush left office, the U.S. abstained rather than veto a one-sided UN Security Council resolution calling for a cease-fire in the Gaza Strip. Under Ronald Reagan, the U.S. joined a Security Council resolution condemning Israel for its destruction of Iraq's Osirak nuclear facility and, despite Israel's strong objections, undermined the Jewish state's qualitative military edge by selling AWACS surveillance planes to Saudi Arabia. Dwight Eisenhower threatened to isolate Israel during the Suez War; and George H.W. Bush opposed loan guarantees to Israel.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There is no question that Obama is committed, both in word and deed, to the safety and security of Israel — and in many ways is more committed than his Republican predecessors.

Greg Rosenbaum is chairman of the National Jewish Democratic Council.

S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace
633 Pennsylvania Ave. NW, 5th Floor, Washington, DC 20004
www.centerpeace.org

2015 S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace, All rights reserved.
YOU ARE RECEIVING THIS EMAIL BECAUSE YOU SIGNED UP FOR OUR NEWS UPDATES.

unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>
To:	"Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>
Date:	2/8/2015 8:01:19 AM
Subject:	HRC Clips | 2.8.15
Attachments:	20150208 HRC Clips.docx

Office of Secretary Clinton
News Analysis
February 8, 2015

HRC

House Benghazi Committee lines up Obama administration witnesses (Politico)
Clinton builds a different campaign for 2016. Will she be different, too? (WAPO)
The Insiders: Obama's week of jaw-dropping follies (WAPO)
Economic Plan Is a Quandary for Clinton '16 (NYT)
Sen. Paul Criticizes Libya Intervention as 'Hillary's War' (WSJ)
Boris to court Hillary on tour (Sunday Times)
Sanders promises 'clash of ideas' with Hillary Clinton if both run in 2016 (The Hill)
New Hampshire Poll: Jeb Bush Grabs Narrow Lead (Bloomberg)
Brian Williams is not alone: Hillary Clinton, Stephen Glass and other famous fabrications (Yahoo News)
De Blasio commissioner worked closely with Hillary Clinton on women's rights (NY Daily News)

National

Paul hopes low-key style, atypical pitch can set him apart (WAPO)
Zombie statistic about Obama's Affordable Care Act refuses to stagger away (WAPO)
The Great American Dream, Still Deferred (NYT)
Are C.E.O.s That Talented, or Just Lucky? (NYT)
Stream of Foreign Wealth Flows to Elite New York Real Estate (NYT)
Probes Spook Some Christie Backers (WSJ)
Fed's Rate Dilemma: Job Gains vs. Inflation (WSJ)
Labor talks test mayor's resolve; Garcetti's course could set the tone with unions for the rest of his tenure (LAT)
Uncertain times for N. Dakota oil boom (LAT)
The battle over the Minimum Wage Albany debate coming on Cuomo's push to raise state level to $10.50 (Newsday)
Wolf being pressured to restrict gas drilling (Philadelphia Inquirer)
Vaccine opt-outs put state at risk (San Francisco Chronicle)
Study shows likelihood of being shot in Chicago (Chicago Sun-Times)

International

Whodunit? In Obsessed Nation, Question Becomes Who Didn't (NYT)
A month after deadly siege, French Jews plan exodus (WAPO)
Europe Pushes for Diplomatic Solution in Ukraine Amid Calls for Arming Kiev (WSJ)
Shiite Militia Drives Back Islamic State, but Divides Much of Iraq (NYT)
Iran, IAEA to Step Up Talks on Nuclear Program, Agency Chief Says (WSJ)
U.S. citizen joins Kurds in battle (LAT)
A sign of a shift in Afghan-Pakistani ties (LAT)
The enemy of our enemy in Yemen (LAT)
Nigeria Postpones Elections, Saying Security Is a Concern (NYT)
U.S.-Thai military exercise to go on despite coup (WAPO)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

House Benghazi Committee lines up Obama administration witnesses (Politico)

By Lauren French
February 6, 2015
Politico

The House Benghazi Committee is set to interview nearly two dozen senior Obama administration officials in the next three months.

Republican Chairman Trey Gowdy announced on Friday that top officials close to both President Barack Obama and former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton have been called to appear for the House panel investigating the 2012 terrorist attacks in Libya.

Included on the witness list is former White House press secretary Jay Carney, Gen. Martin Dempsey, former national security adviser Tom Donilon, current adviser Susan Rice, Jake Sullivan, a former deputy chief of staff to Clinton, deputy national security adviser Ben Rhodes, former CIA Director David Petraeus and former Secretary of Defense Leon Panetta.

White House chief of staff Denis McDonough is on Gowdy's witness list as well.

"I am announcing an ambitious timeline for interviews consistent with my plan to speed-up the pace of the investigation" Gowdy said. "I intend to stay with this schedule and will issue subpoenas if necessary."

Also included are State Department "whistleblower" Mark Thompson, former Assistant Secretary of State Andrew Shapiro, former U.S. Ambassador Thomas Pickering, former Director of the National Counterterrorism Center Matt Olsen, retired Navy Adm. Mike Mullen, former deputy director of the Central Intelligence Agency Michael Morell, Clinton Chief of Staff Cheryl Mills, State Department official Charlene Lamb, State Department Undersecretary of State for Management Patrick Kennedy, former White House National Security Council staffer Benjamin Fishman and retired foreign service officer William Burns.

Sullivan and Lamb are considered key figures in "Clintonland" while Mullen and Pickering chaired the State Department's investigation into the attacks — a probe Gowdy has criticized for failing to interview Clinton.

Gowdy added in a letter sent to ranking member Rep. Elijah Cummings (D-Md.) that he plans to schedule an interview with Clinton "as soon as possible." Cummings said in January that Clinton told him verbally she would appear before the panel to answer questions on the Obama administration's response to the attacks.

The witnesses will appear before the panel without a subpoena, but Gowdy warned in his letter that if the State Department, CIA and Obama administration do not meet a timeline set between Gowdy and the administration, he would be prepared to issue formal requests for testimony.

"All told, over the next three months, the committee will gain access to information not fully considered by any committee of Congress to date from the nearly three dozen witnesses identified," Gowdy wrote.

The White House would not be forced to comply with any subpoenas as the bulk of the witnesses requested would be shielded by executive privilege.

Cummings criticized the witness list on Friday, calling it redundant.

"A majority of these witnesses have already provided information to Congress through prior interviews and testimony – in some cases multiple times – during seven previous congressional investigations," the Maryland Democrat said.

Democrats on the panel have grown increasingly critical of Gowdy's direction of the committee since the beginning of the year. Cummings has blasted the chairman for moving too slowly with hearings and investigations, shutting Democrats out of key interviews and arguing that Gowdy is operating outside the normal bound of committee rules.

"This new list of 20 senior officials was released to the press before the Committee actually invited a single one of these individuals to come in for an interview, raising further questions about the purpose of these interviews," a Democratic staffer said on background.

The interviews will be completed by the end of April, Gowdy said.

Thompson previously testified to the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee that Clinton allegedly cut the State Department's counterterrorism bureau from the response to the Sept. 11, 2012, attacks, which left Ambassador Chris Stevens dead.

Naming these key witnesses is, to date, the most aggressive action Gowdy has taken since the panel was created last May. The loquacious Republican has preferred to operate in private when interviewing witnesses and requesting troves of documents from the State Department and CIA. The committee has received more than 40,000 documents, Gowdy said last month, but is still in negotiations with the Obama administration for thousands more.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Gowdy has repeatedly stressed that he was unwilling to call in key witnesses before he felt confident with the information the committee received.

Rice's inclusion on the list is a signal the seven Republicans on the panel will focus on a series of talking points that the national security adviser, then the U.S.'s ambassador to the United Nations, delivered on the Sunday shows following the attacks. The details Rice presented have been heavily criticized for purporting that an anti-Islamic video spurred the attacks.

There also has been great attention paid to the White House's involvement in drafting and revising those talking points.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton builds a different campaign for 2016. Will she be different, too? (WAPO)

By Dan Balz
February 8, 2015
The Washington Post

No one can say what kind of candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton will be once she starts actively campaigning later this year. Last summer's book tour and later public appearances highlighted the degree to which she is both rusty as a candidate and still grappling with the message for a 2016 campaign.

There are clear indications, however, that she is determined to put together a campaign organization that is markedly different from the one she had in 2008, designed to avoid both the tactical and strategic mistakes that contributed to her undoing against Barack Obama and the debilitating infighting that bedeviled the inner circle of what became for a time a dysfunctional campaign.

The uppermost tier of Clinton's new team speaks to the changes between 2008 and a 2016 campaign. In John Podesta, designated as the likely chairman, Clinton has something she lacked eight years ago. Podesta is someone who can speak to her almost as a peer. He should be able to offer unvarnished and critical counsel from the perspective of someone who was White House chief of staff in her husband's administration and is now a top adviser to President Obama. In contrast to many of the people in the upper ranks of the 2008 campaign, Podesta likely will not be timid about speaking frankly.

Beyond quiet advice to the candidate, there is an even more important role that Podesta could play in a Clinton 2016 campaign. Because of his stature, personality and long-standing relationship with the Clintons, he can speak authoritatively for the candidate, internally and externally. He brings order - to the extent that anyone can - to an operation that otherwise could be plagued by freelancing among the Clintons' vast and extended network. He has the opportunity to draw clearer lines of authority and enforce the rules.

In Robby Mook, the designated campaign manager, Clinton has a trusted young strategist who earned her confidence in 2008 by helping to pull off victories in Nevada, Ohio and Indiana. Mook is far younger than Podesta, but he has something that Podesta doesn't have: fluency in how modern campaigns are run.

Other members of the senior team recruited so far have long, collective experience in presidential campaigns and White House operations, and they have been both allies and rivals.

Joel Benenson, the designated chief strategist, and media adviser designate Jim Margolis were key players in the Obama campaign that defeated Clinton in 2008. Others from Obama's team are expected to play other key roles. Communications director designate Jennifer Palmieri has top-level White House experience. Communications strategist Mandy Grunwald has been part of Clinton world dating back to Bill Clinton's 1992 campaign.

Clinton has been reluctant to begin rigorous campaign activity this spring, given the absence of any serious competition for the Democratic nomination at this point. She has often remarked that her husband didn't announce his candidacy until the fall of 1991. But her team has been warned by veterans of the Obama campaigns not to take the absence of stiff competition for the nomination as an excuse to start slowly. The advice has been pointed: don't waste 2015. Clinton appears to be taking that to heart.

Even in the eight years since she first ran for president, Clinton campaign operations have changed dramatically, particularly in the areas of data, analytics, targeting, digital, social media and organizing. These are enormously challenging - and time-consuming - aspects of a presidential campaign.

Obama's reelection campaign spent most of 2011 trying to build the political, financial and especially the technological infrastructure necessary to wage a general election - and needed every bit of that time and more to work out many of the bugs. And they weren't starting from scratch, as Clinton will be doing. They had spent the years after the 2008 campaign testing, experimenting and refining their operation.

Mechanics are one thing, but candidate performance is another. Clinton may be building a different campaign operation, but will she be a different candidate in 2016 - and does she need to be?

She is in an unusual - and possibly unusually difficult - position. The lack of competition for the nomination may seem like a gift at this point, leaving her plenty of time to think through issues, outline a message and let Republicans fight among themselves. But she is not exactly like an incumbent running for reelection. She has never won her party's nomination, nor faced a Republican presidential nominee in the heat of a general election.

Enough questions remain from her last campaign that she cannot long afford to take for granted her position atop the Democratic field.

How, for example, does Clinton demonstrate to voters in Iowa, where she stumbled in 2008 and where activists expect serious courtship, that she will be a better and more accessible candidate this time?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She is reluctant to begin too early, but is she prepared eventually to travel more extensively there than before? That will be an early sign of the kind of candidate she intends to be this time. Before a formal announcement, is another listening tour, which she used when she began her campaign for Senate in 2000, the way to make those connections?

How does she engage the media, which long has been a quarrelsome issue for her? She gave numerous interviews during her book tour, but as a candidate in 2008 she was far less accessible. Her relations with the traveling press corps in 2008 were often difficult. Today's press corps is larger, more encompassing and more intrusive today than eight years ago.

Here's another small but potentially knotty issue: What does she do about debates with other candidates, to the extent there are others? At this point it's far too early to worry about, but at some point it could become relevant. Does she debate? When and against whom? Could she go through the nomination process without ever debating - and would that put her at a disadvantage against the Republican nominee in a fall campaign?

Clinton has many assets as she gets ready for the campaign that everyone now expects her to run - but vulnerabilities and liabilities as well. Her new team has the experience to help her get ready and to weather whatever unexpected problems arise. She is sending signals that she accepts that this campaign must be different than the last. But the answer to what kind of candidate she will be rests squarely on her shoulders - and remains to be answered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Insiders: Obama's week of jaw-dropping follies (WAPO)

By Ed Rogers
February 8, 2015
The Washington Post

As President Obama enters the uninhibited twilight of his presidency, some of what we are witnessing from him is shocking yet informative. In the past week, Obama's words and actions have revealed the thought process behind how policy decisions are made in his administration. Some of these recent incidents demand urgent responses from our Republican leaders, who are obligated to oppose the president when he crosses the line. But also, Republicans need to do what they can to pull Hillary Clinton into the fray. She has been getting a pass while Obama lurches to the left and Republicans generate distracting headlines.

First, the president's comments yesterday at the National Prayer Breakfast were jaw-dropping. He said, "Lest we get on our high horse and think this is unique to some other place, remember that during the Crusades and the Inquisition, people committed terrible deeds in the name of Christ." Why would the president tell the Islamic State, a terrorist group, that he is keeping its actions in perspective? This is an incredible and alarming statement; Republicans need to voice their strong objections and force Democrats to state whether or not they agree with the president. And as the Democrats' presumptive presidential nominee, Clinton should also let us know where she stands. Does she think today's actions and sentiments toward the Islamic State should be shaped by the Muslim-Christian battles of more than 900 years ago? Does she also want us to keep those battles in mind, get off our high horse and temper our objections to the Islamic State?

Second, the president seems to be pressing for a unilateral deal with Iran on its nuclear program, despite the objections of our allies, Congress and former administration officials. As the Post editorial today states, "[The] Obama administration has declined to counter increasingly aggressive efforts by Iran." The Post doesn't say it, but I think Obama is seeking a friendly agreement with Iran that it will not construct a nuclear bomb until after he leaves office. Obama appears willing to leave Iran's nuclear infrastructure in place and accept at face value the Iranian government's laughable assurances that it wants only peaceful nuclear technology. He is choosing to ignore all Iran's previous lies. Maybe deep down he sees a form of "fairness" in letting Iran have nuclear weapons. After all, we have them — and since he dismisses American exceptionalism, he probably doesn't think we are worthy stewards of these weapons. Israel has them, and this president has made clear that he thinks very little of Israel's defense posture.

And besides, if Obama can explain away the behavior of Islamic State terrorists by rationalizing it as a quid pro quo for the ancient behavior of some Westerners, he can certainly rationalize why Iran wants to have a nuclear weapon. The president is already maneuvering to escape congressional oversight or approval of his agreement with Iran. Am I extrapolating too much? I hope so, but the stakes are high. Skeptics can't be ignored. Again, Republicans and Democrats in Congress need to voice their opposition. And potential 2016 candidates should speak up. Would Clinton embrace the Obama deal and similarly pretend that Iran won't acquire nuclear weapons, or will she vow to stop Iran?

Third, the release of the president's surreal, liberal dream-budget gives us a government blueprint that shows what he would do if he were King of America. It is almost Chavez-like in its confiscation of wealth, higher taxes, new borrowing and uninhibited spending. Obama wants to reach into the pockets of U.S. companies everywhere, raise taxes on just about every form of wealth and spend more and more on social schemes that corral citizens into the care of the state and freely heap new debt on future generations.

Presidents are supposed to lead, guide and convince. Instead, Obama makes excuses for our enemies, ignores economic reality and acts unilaterally. I know this may sound harsh or partisan, but I don't feel like I'm straining to reach these conclusions. It is up to Republicans to stand firm, pass alternatives to the president's policies in Congress and not just be hecklers in the crowd. And Hillary Clinton, Democratic leaders in Congress and their candidates everywhere all need to be asked whether they are Obama-ites or something different.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Economic Plan Is a Quandary for Clinton '16 (NYT)

By Amy Chozick
February 8, 2015
The New York Times

With advice from more than 200 policy experts, Hillary Rodham Clinton is trying to answer what has emerged as a central question of her early presidential campaign strategy: how to address the anger about income inequality without overly vilifying the wealthy.

Mrs. Clinton has not had to wade into domestic policy since before she became secretary of state in 2009, and she has spent the past few months engaged in policy discussions with economists on the left and closer to the Democratic Party's center who are grappling with the discontent set off by the gap between rich and poor. Sorting through the often divergent advice to develop an economic plan could affect the timing and planning of the official announcement of her campaign.

Although people close to Mrs. Clinton say she has not yet settled on a specific platform, she is expected to embrace several principles. They include standard Democratic initiatives like raising the minimum wage, investing in infrastructure, closing corporate tax loopholes and cutting taxes for the middle class. Other ideas are newer, such as providing incentives to corporations to increase profit-sharing with employees and changing labor laws to give workers more collective bargaining power.

Behind many of these proposals is a philosophy, endorsed by Mrs. Clinton's closest economic advisers and often referred to as inclusive capitalism, that contends that a majority of Americans do not want to punish the rich; they just want to feel that they, too, have a chance to succeed. It also calls for corporations to put less emphasis on short-term profits that increase shareholder value and to invest more in employees, the environment and communities.

Whether Mrs. Clinton's approach will be enough to satisfy the unease over growing economic disparity is unclear. In a Gallup poll conducted last month, 67 percent of Americans said they were dissatisfied with the way income and wealth are distributed in the United States. In the 2008 Democratic presidential primary, Mrs. Clinton's economic message -- summed up by a frequent refrain, "If you work hard, you play by the rules, you ought to be able to get ahead" -- resonated with white, working-class voters, who overwhelmingly supported her over Barack Obama.

But in the years since, Mrs. Clinton has come under criticism for delivering speeches to Wall Street banks at more than $200,000 each, roughly four times the median annual household income in the United States, and for comments she made about her family's financial situation, including a lament about being "dead broke" after leaving the White House. And she must convince a middle class that feels frustrated and left behind that she understands its struggles, even as she relies heavily on the financial industry and corporate interests to fund her candidacy.

Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton, said she had "a record of bringing people together to solve big problems, while also putting a real premium on accountability."

Asked whether creating an economic message could affect the timeline for her presidential campaign, Mr. Merrill said, "There's no red X on a calendar somewhere, but make no mistake: If she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges."

Mrs. Clinton's economic plan would be more populist and reliant on the government than the centrist approach of trade agreements, welfare reform and deficit reduction associated with her husband, former President Bill Clinton.

"It's not enough to address upward mobility without addressing inequality," said Lawrence H. Summers, a Treasury secretary in the Clinton administration who is among those talking with Mrs. Clinton. "The challenge, though, is to address inequality without embracing a politics of envy."

The debate is extending beyond the Democratic Party as Republicans wade into the issues. "If Americans are working harder than ever, earning less than they once did, our government and our leaders should step up, offer a plan, fix what's wrong," former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida said in a speech in Detroit last week as he laid the groundwork for his potential 2016 candidacy.

Mrs. Clinton was secretary of state when some major economic debates took hold on Capitol Hill, and as a result, her economic views are still not broadly known. Her approach to poverty was forged in the 1970s, when she went door to door while working for the Children's Defense Fund, leaving her a committed advocate for early childhood education, equal pay for women and paid leave.

But later experiences complicated her worldview. Many of the advocates who knew Mrs. Clinton as a champion for the poor and working-class women felt betrayed in 1996 when, as first lady, she supported Mr. Clinton's overhaul of the welfare system, which gave states more power to remove people from welfare rolls and pledged to cut federal spending on assistance for the poor by nearly $55 billion over six years. She was more skeptical about the North American Free Trade

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Agreement, which Mr. Clinton signed into law in 1993 and which has also been accused of hurting American workers.

After being elected in New York to the United States Senate in 2000, Mrs. Clinton had another constituency to represent: Wall Street. In 2001, she supported bankruptcy legislation that some Democrats -- most notably Elizabeth Warren, now senator from Massachusetts -- argued hurt working families and single mothers, and they accused her of doing the bidding of the financial industry. Mrs. Clinton has said she worked to improve the bill.

As a presidential candidate in 2008, Mrs. Clinton angered some of her Wall Street donors when she came out early in support of the regulation of derivatives and other complicated financial products and called for eliminating the "carried interest" loophole that allowed some financiers to avoid paying millions in income taxes. She also said that as president, she would create a cabinet-level position to fight poverty.

When the housing market collapsed, Mrs. Clinton, who had returned to the Senate full time after Mr. Obama defeated her, proposed legislation similar to a New Deal-era program that would allow the government to help homeowners refinance their mortgages. She voted in favor of the Emergency Economic Stabilization Act of 2008, which led to the Troubled Asset Relief Program and the multibillion-dollar bailout for automakers.

Last month, Mrs. Clinton reiterated her support for the 2010 Dodd-Frank financial regulation law. "Attacking financial reform is risky and wrong," she wrote on Twitter.

As she dives back into domestic policy, Mrs. Clinton faces an economy in which, even amid steady job growth, weekly earnings for low- and middle-income workers have remained virtually unchanged for 15 years.

"Where has the money gone?" asked Robert B. Reich, a secretary of labor during the Clinton administration. "That is the topic that is embarrassing for people to talk about, particularly in Washington, because even mentioning it creates the potential charge of class warfare."

Mr. Reich, who recently sent Mrs. Clinton a five-page memo laying out his ideas, said candidates in both parties needed to abandon the politically safe discussion of upward mobility for the poor and middle class that dominated the 1990s, and instead take on the stickier issue of income distribution.

"Upward mobility, equal opportunity -- those are safe phrases and safe aspirations," he said in an interview. "I don't want to minimize their importance, but they obscure the real issue."

Mr. Reich is one of some 200 economists and academics who have offered Mrs. Clinton ideas and guidance as she settles on an economic doctrine. Several of Mr. Clinton's former advisers, including Alan S. Blinder, Robert E. Rubin and Mr. Summers, maintain influence. But Mrs. Clinton has cast a wide net that also includes Joseph E. Stiglitz, a Nobel laureate in economics who has written extensively about inequality; Alan B. Krueger, a professor at Princeton and co-author of "Inequality in America"; and Peter R. Orszag, a former director of the Office of Management and Budget under President Obama. Teresa Ghilarducci, a labor economist who focuses on retirement issues, is also playing a prominent role.

Last month in Washington, a 17-person commission convened by the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank with close ties to Mrs. Clinton, presented a 166-page report on "inclusive prosperity," which is among the numerous economic blueprints Mrs. Clinton has reviewed. For some, the solutions proposed by the committee, of which Mr. Summers was co-chairman, did not go far enough.

Dean Baker, an economist and co-director of the Center for Economic and Policy Research, has pushed the idea of a government fee on the sale or purchase of certain financial assets, which he believes could hold Wall Street accountable while funding social services. "Clinton people didn't want to go near it," Mr. Baker said.

Mrs. Clinton has not commented on the financial transaction tax or on profit-sharing.

She has expressed support for many of the proposals Mr. Obama laid out in his State of the Union address last month, signaling that they could help shape her agenda. In a post on Twitter, she said the speech had "pointed way to an economy that works for all. Now we need to step up & deliver for the middle class."

Mrs. Clinton frequently talks about the economic success of the Clinton administration, under which median family income, adjusted for inflation, increased to $56,080 in 1999 from $48,884 in 1993, compared with a decline to $51,017 in 2012 from $55,987 in 2000, according to census data. But she has acknowledged that a globalized economy calls for new ideas, and many are urging her to go beyond her comfort zone and address the deeper frustrations of those who have not shared in that economy's benefits.

"Long-term answers about education and skills that help change mobility don't get at the current frustrations and aggravations," said Austan D. Goolsbee, an economic adviser to Mr. Obama and a professor at the University of Chicago.

"People want to answer the question, 'Are we going to be O.K.?' " Mr. Goolsbee said. "And then the natural question is, 'Whose fault was that, and let's go find those people.' "

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sen. Paul Criticizes Libya Intervention as 'Hillary's War' (WSJ)

By Byron Tau
February 7, 2015
The Wall Street Journal

MARSHALLTOWN, Iowa--Calling it "Hillary's war," Sen. Rand Paul (R., Ky.) told voters in this politically potent state that the U.S. intervention in Libya has been an "utter disaster" that empowered radical Islamist groups.

Mr. Paul, on a swing through the state that holds the first nominating contest of the presidential election, argued that U.S. foreign policy in Libya, Syria and elsewhere had helped create threats such as Islamic State, among other groups.

Mr. Paul said Hillary Clinton was to blame for what he described as foreign-policy failures, previewing lines of attack for a potential general election match-up. Mrs. Clinton served as secretary of state under President Barack Obama until 2013 and was a proponent of interventions during popular uprisings against the ruling regimes in Libya and Syria.

"Hillary's war in Libya has been an utter disaster," Mr. Paul said Saturday, speaking to a small group of voters and activists. "There are now jihadists roaming all across Libya. It's a jihadist wonderland."

Under Mr. Obama, the U.S. government was part of an international coalition to oust Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi from power in 2011. In Syria, the U.S. has expressed support for the ouster of Bashar al-Assad and has provided both humanitarian and lethal aid to some Syrian opposition groups.

In the aftermath of Mr. Gadhafi's ouster, Islamist groups operating in Libya staged an attack in 2012 on the United States consulate in Benghazi, killing four Americans, including U.S. ambassador Christopher Stevens. Mr. Paul said that Mrs. Clinton had failed to provide adequate security for the U.S. mission to that country which, he said, "should forever preclude her from being considered for the presidency."

A request to Mrs. Clinton for comment on Mr. Paul's remarks wasn't immediately answered.

The administration has reiterated its support for the 2011 intervention in Libya, congratulating the country for holding elections last year. "The United States was proud to support the Libyan people in the darkest days of their revolution and through their efforts to end the Gadhafi regime," Mr. Obama said in a 2014 statement.

Mr. Paul called the former secretary of state the "biggest cheerleader" for intervention in Syria and Libya and said that those policies had empowered radical Islamic groups in both countries.

"Gadhafi was a secular dictator," the senator said. "Not the kind of guy that we want to have representing us in country, but he was secular. He didn't like radical Islam, and he kept them down because they were a threat to him. What happened when we toppled the secular dictator? Chaos. More radical Islam."

In Syria, Mr. Paul said that Islamic State -- a militant group operating in Syria and Iraq that is also known as ISIS -- was essentially created by the U.S. aid program under the Obama administration.

"I think we have to do something about ISIS, he said. "But, you know why we're doing something and why we have to be there again? Because of a failed foreign policy that got us involved in a Syrian Civil War . . . . By supporting the Islamic rebels, ISIS grew stronger and stronger and stronger. And now we have to go back."

Mr. Paul, a libertarian-leaning senator, has broken sharply with the more hawkish wing of his party, prompting a major foreign policy debate within Republican circles about American military power and the role of the United States in the world.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Boris to court Hillary on tour (Sunday Times)

By Tim Shipman
February 8, 2015
The Sunday Times

BORIS JOHNSON will hold talks with Hillary Clinton, a fellow leader in waiting, on a whistle-stop tour of America this week.

The mayor of London will meet the former US secretary of state, the Democrat frontrunner to be the next president, in New York on Wednesday.

Johnson will also use the visit, which takes in Boston and Washington, to drum up business for Britain while burnishing his credentials as a potential prime minister.

He and Clinton will discuss terrorism and the war in Syria and Iraq against Isis, also known as Islamic State.

Johnson wrote in 2007, when she was competing with Barack Obama for the Democrat presidential nomination, that he wanted her to win the White House to "get Bill Clinton once again padding over the shag pile carpet of the Oval Office, even if it is only to bring his wife a cup of tea".

The mayor is hedging his bets for the 2016 presidential election. He said he had met Jeb Bush, the frontrunner for the Republican party's nomination, when he visited the UK recently. "I [thought] very highly of him," he said.

Johnson will also meet Bill de Blasio, the mayor of New York, his predecessor Michael Bloomberg, the police commissioner Bill Bratton and British stars of Broadway and New York fashion week.

In Boston tomorrow he will make a speech on how innovation can help the poor, positioning himself as a "one nation" candidate for the Tory leadership when David Cameron steps down.

In Washington, Johnson will be the guest of honour at a reception given by Sir Peter Westmacott, the British ambassador.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders promises 'clash of ideas' with Hillary Clinton if both run in 2016 (The Hill)

By Ben Kamisar
February 7, 2015
The Hill

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) said Saturday morning that voters will see stark differences between himself and Hillary Clinton if the two both decide to run for the White House in 2016.

“Trust me, there will be a real clash of ideas,” Sanders said on MSNBC’s “Up with Steve Kornacki.”

“I happen to like and respect Hillary Clinton, but I suspect on issues like massive investments in infrastructure, on real tax reform, on the need to deal in a very bold way with the planetary crisis of climate change, with the transpacific partnership, I suspect we will have some real differences.”

Sanders is flirting with entering the 2016 Democratic presidential primary, but Clinton is a prohibitive favorite. Despite her huge lead for the nomination in opinion polls, however, there are signs of discontent among progressives, especially when it comes to Clinton’s economic worldview.

If Sanders runs, he’d likely trumpet the goals of the progressive wing of the party, which wants bold policies aimed at addressing rising income inequality.
“I think we need a political revolution in this country, we need to get people once again actively involved in the political process and take on the people who have the real power in America,” Sanders said. He added that income inequality is at its starkest since 1929 and that, since the 2008 recession, the vast majority of all new income generated has gone to the wealthiest one percent.

His wish-list includes robust infrastructure spending, raising the minimum wage and a “national health care program that guarantees health care” to all.

His proposals would both increase government spending and expand the bounds of government more generally — neither of which are things that Republicans are likely to support. But Sanders said that if progressives can rally a majority of Americans behind their message, they could force change in Congress.

“If some of us are successful in mobilizing the American people and in a sense, giving the Republicans an offer they can’t refuse, yes, we can be successful,” he said.

“We may not get everything we want, I think we can push the Republicans to raise the minimum wage a lot higher than it is right now.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

New Hampshire Poll: Jeb Bush Grabs Narrow Lead (Bloomberg)

By Michael Bender and Lisa Lerer
February 8, 2015
Bloomberg

Jeb Bush has taken a slight lead over other potential Republican presidential candidates in a new Bloomberg Politics/Saint Anselm New Hampshire poll, even though his party's voters have doubts about his famous last name and his positions on immigration and education.

Even if Bush should overcome those doubts to prevail in what is shaping up as one of the most wide-open Republican primaries in the state's recent history, the poll suggests that he is deeply unpopular with likely general-election voters. It's a worrisome sign for his campaign in a battleground state that both parties have targeted during the past several presidential elections.

The poll also shows former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton dominating her potential Democratic rivals. Clinton, who won the state's presidential primary in 2008, is the first choice of 56 percent of Democratic primary voters. Senator Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts, who has said she isn't running, is second at 15 percent, while Vice President Joe Biden and Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont both have 8 percent.

The poll, taken Jan. 31-Feb. 5 by Washington-based Purple Insights, surveyed 400 Republican primary voters and 400 Democratic primary voters almost exactly a year out from the 2016 New Hampshire primary. It has a margin of error of plus or minus 4.9 percentage points.

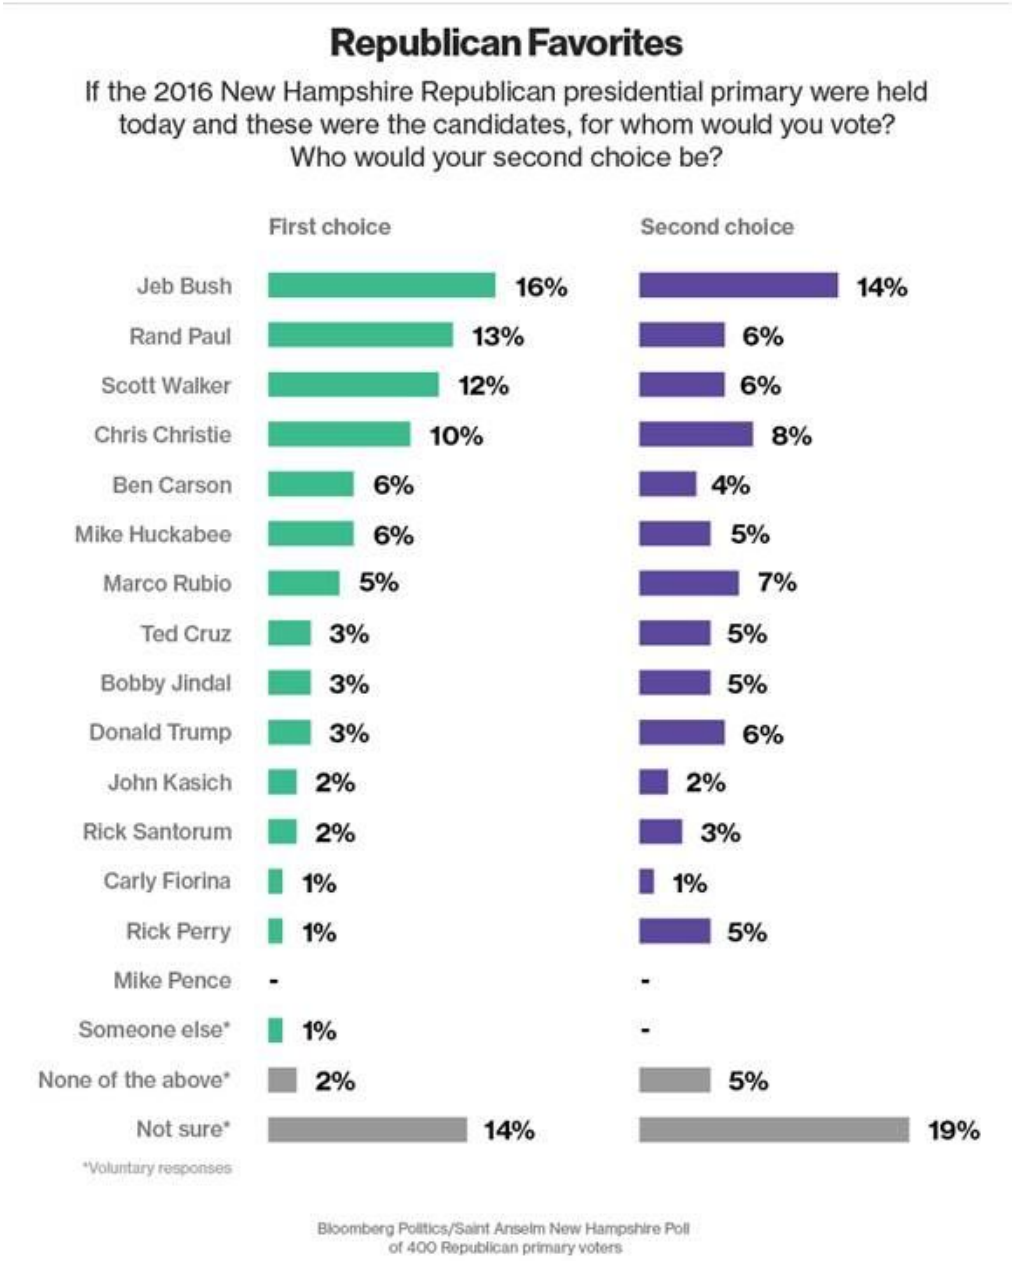
Mitt Romney's decision to forgo a third presidential bid clearly upended the Republican contest, with candidates now scrambling to pick up his supporters. Romney, who won the Granite State's 2012 primary on his way to winning the nomination, led a Bloomberg Politics/Saint Anselm poll in November by 19 percentage points; Bush now leads with just 16 percent. Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky is second with 13 percent, Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker is at 12 percent, and New Jersey Governor Chris Christie, coming off a controversy-filled overseas trip, is at 10 percent.

New Hampshire, which traditionally holds the second presidential nominating contest after Iowa, presents a complicated electorate for Bush. The state's Republican voters rejected his brother, George W. Bush, in 2000 in favor of John McCain. His father, George H.W. Bush, lost the state's primary in 1980 but won it in 1988 on his way to the White House.

In a snapshot of potential problems facing the former Florida governor, nearly three out of five Republican primary voters said his strength as a potential candidate was based on his family connections to politics, while just 31 percent said it was due to his unique qualities and achievements. When Democrats were asked the same question about Clinton, only 21 percent cited her family connections as her main strength.

Nancy Clark, a real estate broker based in Gilford, N.H., said she's supporting Bush—at least for now. "I'm just wondering about how people are going to feel about having three Bushes in the White House," Clark said in an interview after the poll was taken. "I'm definitely open. I just want a Republican in the White House, so it's who is going to be able to pull that off."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



Bush acknowledged during a speech in Detroit last week that he must present himself to voters in a way that distinguishes him from his father or brother. But the poll shows trouble spots beyond family history. As in Iowa, Republican primary voters are suspicious of Bush's support for immigration reform and the national educational standards known as Common Core.

One in five Republican primary voters said Bush's support of Common Core was a “deal-killer” that would prevent them from supporting him. His support for letting undocumented immigrants remain in the country was a deal-killer for 41 percent.

And the issue may make it hard for Bush to expand his support. Almost half of the Republicans who didn't pick Bush as their first or second choice said his immigration positions were a deal-killer for them.

Still, 14 percent of Republican primary voters named him as their second choice, while no other Republican candidate broke single digits.

Rounding out the rest of potential Republican candidates: Former Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee and retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson each scored 6 percent; Senator Marco Rubio of Florida was at 5 percent; Louisiana Governor Bobby Jindal, Senator Ted Cruz, and businessman Donald Trump were all at 3 percent; former Senator Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania and Ohio Governor John Kasich had 2 percent; and former Texas Governor Rick Perry and businesswoman Carly Fiorina were both at 1 percent.

Not a single Republican voter named Indiana Governor Mike Pence as first or second choice, the same result as last month's Bloomberg Politics/Des Moines Register Iowa Poll.

While GOP voters may be ready to support Bush, general-election voters appear more dubious. His unfavorability rating from a sample of 503 general-election voters was 50 percent, compared to 35 percent favorable. Clinton, by contrast, had a 54 percent favorable rating and a 42 percent unfavorable score.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Of the 21 possible Democratic and Republican presidential candidates named, only Trump's unfavorable rating was higher than Bush's, at 66 percent.

More conservative Republicans such as Huckabee and Cruz had lower unfavorable ratings among general-election voters (45 and 33 percent, respectively) than Bush. But nearly all the Republicans were generally viewed unfavorably. Among the party's 15 potential presidential candidates tested, 11 had unfavorable ratings that exceed their favorability, unlike any of the six possible contenders in the Democratic poll. Christie's favorable rating was 40 percent positive, 46 percent negative.

Paul, known for his libertarian leanings, and Kasich had evenly split favorable/unfavorable ratings of 40 percent and 12 percent, respectively. Walker and Carson were the only two Republicans in the poll viewed more favorably than unfavorably by general-election voters. The general-election sample has a margin of error of plus or minus 4.4 percentage points.

The poll suggests that Walker has the most room to grow in New Hampshire. Despite strong showings in recent polls, the Wisconsin governor remains relatively unknown—just 54 percent of GOP primary voters expressed an opinion about him. That opinion was overwhelmingly positive, with those with a favorable view of him outnumbering those with a negative view by better than 4 to 1.

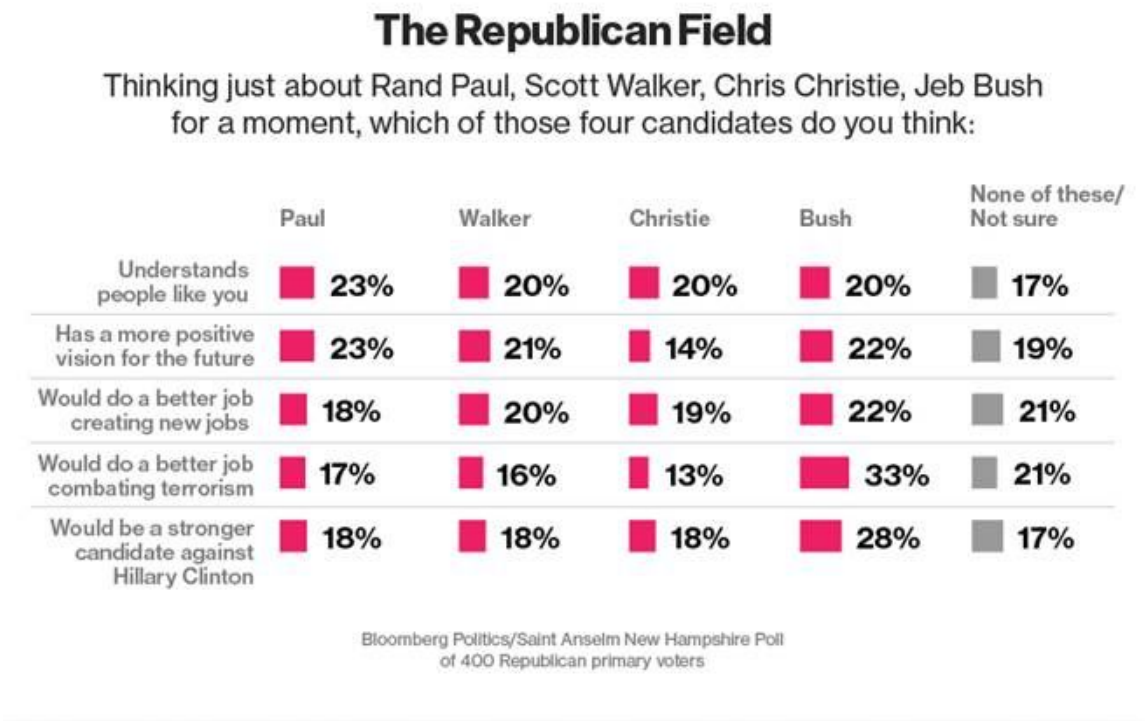
Paul also has reason for optimism. He was second in the Republican poll, the same position he held in November. Paul's favorability rating among Republican primary voters is down three points at 63 percent, but it is the highest among the 15 potential GOP candidates named in the poll.

“Rand Paul, in some ways, is the turtle here while the others are popping up and down,” said Purple Insights' Doug Usher.

Bush’s favorability was 61 percent and Christie’s was 59 percent, up 9 percentage points since November. Still, 29 percent of Republicans said they have an unfavorable view of Christie, tied with Huckabee for second-worst. Trump was the most disliked Republican included in the survey, with 53 percent of Republican primary voters expressing a negative opinion of him.

Like Walker, Rubio is relatively unknown in the state but well-liked among those who had an opinion: 52 percent think favorably of him, while just 14 percent have an unfavorable view.

While there were danger signs for Bush, there were also positives.



Republicans said the former governor would be far better than Walker, Paul, or Christie when it comes to combating terrorism—a top issue for the party's voters—and would be a stronger candidate against Clinton in the general election. By a narrower margin, they also said he would be the best of the four at creating jobs. Paul had a slight advantage when voters were asked who understands people like them, and who had a more positive vision for the future.

“Jeb Bush is out of the gate and in the lead, and those are very good things,” Usher said. “To the extent that he’s banking on some notion of inevitability, I think it’s a disconcerting poll.”

Walker's fast rise—he vaulted to the top of the Bloomberg Politics/Des Moines Register Iowa Poll on the strength of his speech at the Iowa Freedom Summit in January—is likely to attract more attention, both from curious voters and from rivals eager to start attacking a frontrunner. He wasn’t included in the November poll, but he probably wouldn’t have registered much support at that point, Usher said.

“He may be the horse that pops up on the carousel right now,” Usher said. “If you take a look at 2012 on the Republican side, there were a whole bunch of horses that popped up and down on the carousel. So his sustainability is impossible to predict at this point."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

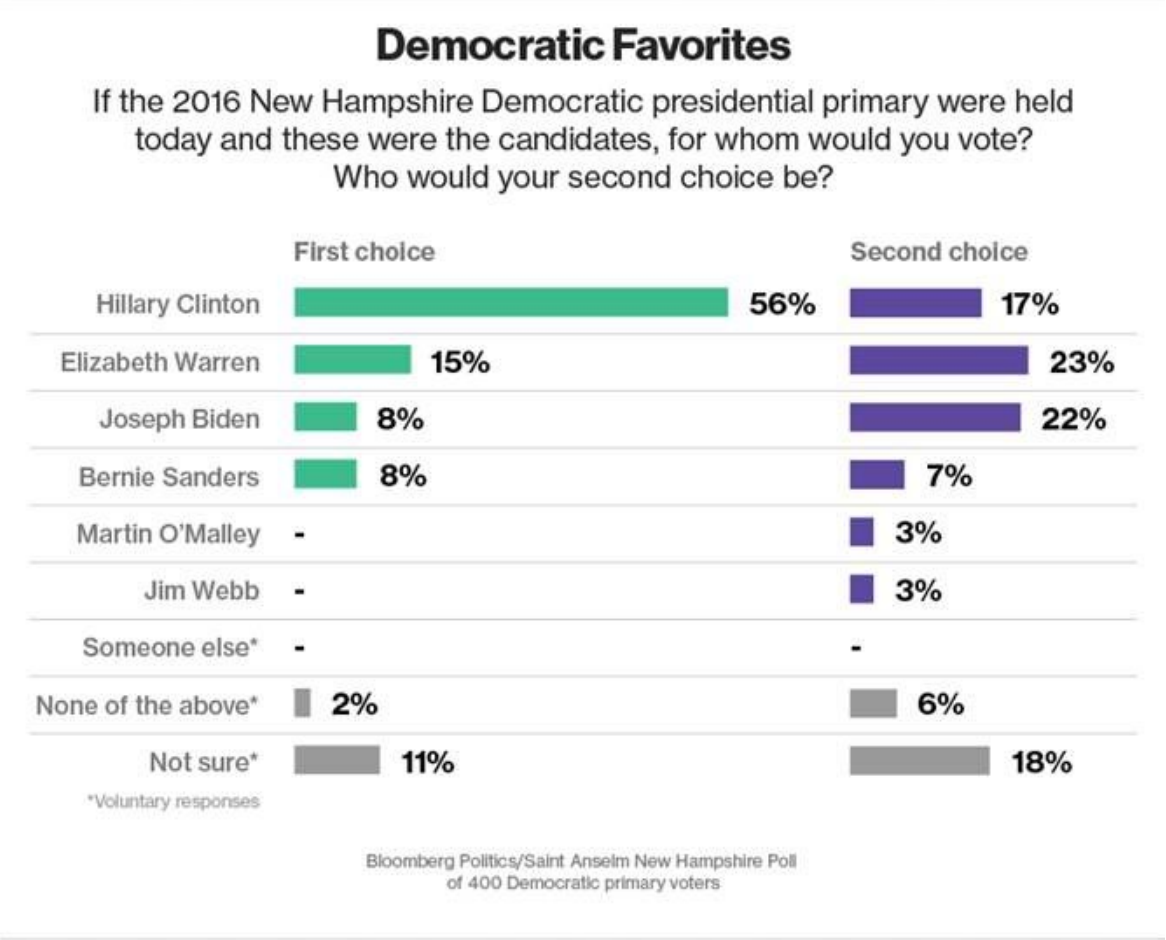
In New Hampshire, 69 percent of Republican voters said Walker's fight against public-employee unions were either a very or somewhat convincing reason to back him for president. Similar majorities said the same about his three statewide victories in a Democratic-leaning state, and the fact that he is a fresh face who can bring new ideas to Washington.

There are potential pitfalls for Walker, too. Nearly a third of Republican voters said they wouldn't vote for Walker because of the numerous campaign-finance scandals facing him, including one that has been called a "criminal scheme" by prosecutors. Walker has denied wrongdoing and has not been charged with a crime.

About one-fifth said they wouldn't support him because he wouldn't know how to get things done in Washington, while 28 percent cited his lack of foreign policy experience as a reason not to vote for him.

"There's been too many Bushes and Clintons and it's time for change," said Richard Kaufman, a retired professor in Dover, N.H. who participated in the poll. "I'm not necessarily settled on Walker, but I think he's one of the new people.

"At this point," Kaufman said, "I think it's just wait and see who throws their hat into the ring."



This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Brian Williams is not alone: Hillary Clinton, Stephen Glass and other famous fabrications (Yahoo News)

By Caitlin Dickson
February 8, 2015
Yahoo News

Brian Williams admitted this week that, contrary to previous claims, he was not aboard a helicopter that was grounded by rocket grenades during the U.S. invasion of Iraq. But he's not the first public figure who has been caught stretching the truth.

The beloved anchor's confession — that the harrowing story he and NBC News had repeated multiple times since 2003 was not true —has prompted an investigation by the network and called Williams' other reporting, such as his Hurricane Katrina coverage, into question. This weekend Williams, who is managing editor of the NBC Nightly News, announced that he'd be temporarily taking himself off the air.

Williams' apology, in which he insisted he'd "misremembered" the details of the events, prompted comparisons to Hillary Clinton, who came down with her own case of the misrememberings while on the campaign trail in 2008.

In a speech, as well as a number of interviews, the then-presidential candidate recalled having to run from sniper fire with her daughter, Chelsea, upon arriving in war-torn Bosnia in 1996. It was a dramatic anecdote, and one that seemed to back up the foreign policy experience Clinton said she'd gained during her eight years as first lady. That story also, however, raised some eyebrows from the media, and it wasn't long before video of the Bosnia trip was unearthed to counter Clinton's account.

"I remember landing under sniper fire," Clinton had said of the Bosnia trip during a campaign speech in Washington. "There was supposed to be some kind of greeting ceremony at the airport, but instead we just ran with our heads down to get into the vehicles to get to our base."

Yet the video showed a much calmer version of events, with Clinton and her daughter walking from their plane to a tension-free ceremony on the tarmac. When confronted with the inconsistencies, Clinton said:

"So I made a mistake. That happens. It proves I'm human, which, you know, for some people is a revelation."

Then-Sen. Barack Obama used the Bosnia embellishment to challenge his Democratic opponent's foreign policy experience. And while Clinton went on to lose the nomination, the scandal didn't prevent Obama from appointing her secretary of state once he was elected.

Former Sen. Tom Harkin was caught, not once but twice, in his own campaign-trail yarn. First during his 1984 Senate run and again while making a bid for the 1992 Democratic presidential nomination, the details of Harkin's military service were scrutinized.

Although Harkin, a Navy vet, had previously claimed to have spent a year in Vietnam as a combat pilot, a skeptical Wall Street Journal eventually got Harkin to admit that he was never stationed in Vietnam during the war, but rather in Japan, and occasionally flew recently repaired aircraft on test missions in and out of the embattled country. Harkin did not make it past the 1992 Democratic primaries, losing to fresh-faced Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton. But his career was hardly over. He retired this year after three decades in the Senate.

Clinton and Harkin are just two in a long history of politicians who've exaggerated — or flat-out lied — about their war experience. In fact, some might consider it a political tradition. And as history has showed, being outted for such transgressions may cost you an election, but it's not necessarily a career killer. Sen. Mark Kirk and former presidents George W. Bush and Ronald Reagan are other survivors of fabricated heroism.

Unfortunately for Williams, he is not a politician but a journalist — his profession is one in which lying is still, technically, frowned upon. And unlike the politicos mentioned above, the most notorious liars in journalism are best known for the their career-ruining fabrications. Jayson Blair resigned from the New York Times in disgrace after his tangled web of plagiarized and fabricated stories was exposed. Janet Cooke's Pulitzer Prize was revoked when the subject of Cooke's award-winning Washington Post article, an 8-year-old heroin addict named Jimmy, turned out to be a figment of her imagination. Stephen Glass is still haunted by the ghosts of fabricated sources, as his well-documented reign as The New Republic's most egregious scam artist not only ousted him from journalism but has proven a roadblock to his pursuit of a law career.

Whether Williams will manage to escape this disaster unscathed remains to be seen.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

De Blasio commissioner worked closely with Hillary Clinton on women's rights (NY Daily News)

By Annie Karni
February 8, 2015
New York Daily News

Penny Abeywardena had never met Mayor de Blasio when he reached out to her about becoming his commissioner for international affairs. But they had a powerful connection in common — Hillary Clinton.

Abeywardena, who at 37 is one of the mayor's youngest and most glamorous commissioners, was hired four months ago from the Clinton Global Initiative, where she worked closely with the former secretary of state around Clinton's core issue of women's rights.

For a mayor who cultivates a global profile — he even called newly elected Greek Prime Minister Alexis Tsipras last month to congratulate him on his progressive values — poaching someone from Clinton's circle was a coup.

"She has a massive Rolodex — she has contacts that even de Blasio doesn't have," said a political operative who knows Abeywardena.

The commissioner, who earns $192,198 — the same salary as the cultural affairs and consumer affairs commissioners — uses those contacts to raise de Blasio's international standing.

After the Charlie Hebdo attack in Paris last month, she immediately got Paris Mayor Anne Hidalgo on the phone and spearheaded de Blasio's 24-hour solidarity trip to France.

When the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge descended on New York City last December, Abeywardena organized their events with de Blasio and his wife, Chirlane McCray, and accompanied the duchess to Harlem.

For a mayor who cultivates a global profile, poaching someone from Clinton's circle was a coup. Abeywardena is picturedhere with Mayor de Blasio and two Paris police officers during a January trip to Paris.

For a mayor who cultivates a global profile, poaching someone from Clinton's circle was a coup. Abeywardena is picturedhere with Mayor de Blasio and two Paris police officers during a January trip to Paris.

And when the Pope visits the city later this year, Abeywardena will be the city's liaison.

During an interview in her corner office near the United Nations, with a sweeping view of the East River, she says she gave up "a pretty great job" to join city government but didn't burn any bridges.

"Secretary Clinton could not have been a bigger supporter or happier for me to be in this post," she said, adding that the mayor and Clinton had "a good laugh about it."

It was now-departing senior mayoral adviser Peter Ragone who pitched Abeywardena to the mayor, citing her Clinton connections and experience. "Penny's work at the Clinton Foundation matched the mayor's approach to public service in so many ways," Ragone said.

The role was created under former Mayor Michael Bloomberg, who renamed the Commission for the United Nations, Consular Corps and Protocol and appointed his sister, Marjorie Tiven, to the job. Tiven did not accept a salary.

But Abeywardena said she has bigger plans for the job — including filling out her staff to create a 14-person office.

When the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge descended on New York City last December, Abeywardena organized their events with de Blasio and his wife, Chirlane McCray, and accompanied the duchess to Harlem.

When the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge descended on New York City last December, Abeywardena organized their events with de Blasio and his wife, Chirlane McCray, and accompanied the duchess to Harlem.

"The vision the mayor and I have for this is to create a global platform from which to promote what's working in New York City, but also engage this diplomatic community with its local immigrant communities," she said.

Abeywardena, who was born in Sri Lanka and grew up in Los Angeles, said she's approaching the job through a "women's lens" — a viewpoint that's a perfect fit with de Blasio and McCray.

"The mayor and the first lady, they're some of my favorite feminists," she said. "You think about universal pre-K, paid sick leave, even the municipal ID — these are things that particularly support single working mothers."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Her interest in women's rights stems from personal experience.

"I'm a domestic violence survivor," she said. "Mental illness and alcoholism sort of defined my father's situation. When we left my dad, my mom had no bills, nothing in her name and we had to rely on the community to help pick up from there."

Abeywardena fell in love with New York City 15 years ago when she attended graduate school for international studies at Columbia University.

Abeywardena, who was born in Sri Lanka and grew up in Los Angeles, said she's approaching the job through a 'women's lens' — a viewpoint that's a perfect fit with de Blasio and McCray.

Abeywardena, who was born in Sri Lanka and grew up in Los Angeles, said she's approaching the job through a 'women's lens' — a viewpoint that's a perfect fit with de Blasio and McCray.

"I like to say I was reborn in New York," she said.

She also met her husband here. Last summer Abeywardena married colleague Daniel Schaefer, the IT director at the Clinton Foundation. Pictures of the Montauk beach wedding were featured on Glamour.com.

Abeywardena's associates would not be surprised to see her play some role in Clinton's expected 2016 campaign. But she said she plans to stay in her job as long as the mayor does.

"I would not have taken this job if I thought I would go elsewhere," she said.

At the moment, she has a lot on her plate — including the looming papal visit in September.

If she could, she said, she would love to show Pope Francis the Bronx or Staten Island.

"I would take him to one of our pre-school locations or community centers," she said.

"Then we would go to a local joint and have some Sri Lankan food. I'd say, 'Sir, it's a little spicy, but you're going to love it.'"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Paul hopes low-key style, atypical pitch can set him apart (WAPO)

By Robert Costa
February 8, 2015
The Washington Post

AMES, Iowa - Sen. Rand Paul, nursing a cold, did not shake many hands on the first day of his swing through Iowa this weekend. Instead, he elbow-bumped activists as he made his way through crowds and hoarsely thanked them for their support.

The Republicans who showed up Friday at Paul's rally did not mind. In a state where caucus- goers often demand warm interactions with presidential contenders, they were happy to hear Paul's riffs on monetary policy and Montesquieu from a distance.

As Paul (Ky.) moves closer to a 2016 bid, he is betting that in a field of big personalities, his low-key style and atypical pitch - mixing snarky asides, dovish takes on foreign policy and a compassionate plea for criminal-justice reform - will set his candidacy apart.

"Just look at who's here," said David Fischer, a former Iowa GOP official, as he surveyed the crowd at Paul's gathering Friday at a Des Moines winery. "He is actually bringing women, college students and people who are not white into the Republican Party."

The challenge for Paul is whether his approach, which has echoes of his father, former Texas congressman Ron Paul, will enable him to do better than the elder Paul's third-place finish in the 2012 GOP presidential caucuses in Iowa.

"The son is a little more mainstream," said former Republican congressman Jim Leach, who represented eastern Iowa for 15 terms. "If he can stay there and play into the desire on the conservative side for someone new, he could find an opening."

The latest poll of Iowa Republicans, conducted by Bloomberg Politics and the Des Moines Register, shows Paul in second place among potential GOP candidates. Gov. Scott Walker (Wis.), boosted by his breakout speech in late January at a conservative summit, narrowly leads with 15 percent. Paul is at 14 percent, and former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee is at 10 percent.

For now, in this early stage of the primary scramble, Paul is focused on reviving his father's political base in Iowa, which begins the primary process, by attacking an institution that has long frustrated the libertarian right: the Federal Reserve.

Before Paul took the stage at Jasper Winery, Liberty Iowa organizers played a video featuring archival clips of both Ron and Rand Paul delivering critiques of the central bank.

Minutes later, Paul, who last month introduced the Federal Reserve Transparency Act, drew raucous applause when he warned its policies are undermining U.S. currency.

"Anybody here want to audit the Fed?" Paul said. "Anybody feel that the Fed is out to get us? They're all over the TV! They're going to be out there saying, 'Oh, we can't audit the Fed.' What, are they too big to be audited? Too secret to be audited?"

Turning to civil liberties, where he has quarreled with hawkish Republicans, Paul chastised the National Security Agency for its surveillance tactics. "It's none of their damn business what you do on your phone," he said.

"Got to love it," said Joey Gallagher, 22, a community organizer with stud earrings, as he nursed a honey-pilsner beer. "It's a breath of fresh air."

But the rest of Paul's nascent stump speech signaled that as much as he wants to target his father's lingering network, he is eager to be more than a long-shot ideologue.

Paul cited two liberals, Sen. Bernard Sanders (I-Vt.) and Rep. Alan Grayson (D-Fla.), during his Friday remarks and said he agrees with outgoing Attorney General Eric H. Holder Jr. on curbing federal property seizures and softening sentencing laws for nonviolent drug offenders - all a nod to his efforts to cast himself as a viable national candidate who can build bipartisan relationships and expand his party's political reach.

"Putting a kid in jail for 55 years for selling marijuana is obscene," Paul said.

Paul's trip comes after a rough week for the freshman senator and physician. He was at the middle of a national controversy over childhood vaccines after he discussed the possible health risks of inoculations and found himself under fire for a CNBC appearance during which he "shushed" a female interviewer.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Paul's visit also comes amid speculation in Iowa Republican circles that one of his state-based advisers, former Iowa GOP chairman A.J. Spiker, could hinder Paul's chances because of Spiker's strained relationships with allies of Iowa Gov. Terry E. Branstad (R), who has voiced concern about the Paul bloc's influence.

Steve Grubbs, a Paul strategist in Iowa, defended Spiker in an interview and said Paul would not be making changes to his political team in spite of the calls from some party insiders for a shake-up.

"Our plan is to combine liberty voters with other Republican voters," Grubbs said. "A.J. is part of that. And remember, no one goes through politics without picking up a few enemies. We're going to proceed as planned and hopefully win, place or show next year."

Craig Schoenfeld, an Iowa Republican consultant who guided George W. Bush's victorious 2000 Iowa campaign, said Paul's ambition to woo center-right Republicans will be tested by former Florida governor Jeb Bush, who has tapped David Kochel, a veteran Iowa operative, as his likely campaign manager.

Bush is scheduled to speak next month at an agricultural summit in Des Moines.

"The Bush factor is there," Schoenfeld said. "The folks involved may have more gray hair but they're ready to go to war for him in Iowa. Same with the people with [New Jersey Gov.] Chris Christie. The battle for that wing of the party is going to be fierce."

Among former Ron Paul backers, there are pockets of unease about whether Rand Paul is moving too far to the center. Drew Ivers, who chaired Ron Paul's 2012 Iowa campaign, said he is "not sure" whether he will get behind the younger Paul in 2016.

"He is playing to the middle, rather than having the middle move toward him," Ivers said. "I would like to see him do more to talk about small-government principles."

Between stops, Paul shrugged off questions about his camp and its fundraising abilities.

On Saturday afternoon, Paul sat courtside at Iowa State University's men's basketball game at the Hilton Coliseum with Steve Sukup, a wealthy businessman who has endorsed him. Before the game, wearing a light-blue fleece under a navy jacket, he mingled at a private reception with Iowa State boosters and administrators, and Rep. Steve King (R-Iowa).

Even as he courted donors, Paul was careful to not veer far from his outsider persona. He parted with Sukup at halftime to meet with students - most wearing "big government sucks" stickers - at a campus game-watch, where he weighed in on constitutional rights and college costs before posing for a round of pictures.

Speaking earlier Saturday at Legends American Grill in Marshalltown, Paul showcased his unorthodox presentation, quoting French political philosopher Montesquieu as attendees ate waffles and eggs at the dimly lit sports bar, and then turned to foreign policy.

"Montesquieu said that when the executive branch begins to legislate, then a form of tyranny will ensue," Paul said, referencing President Obama's unilateral policy decisions, including the legalization of millions of undocumented immigrants.

Criticizing former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton, the all-but-certain front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination, Paul referred to U.S. intervention in Libya as "Hillary's war" and an "utter disaster" that has led to "jihadists roaming all across Libya. It's a jihadist wonderland."

"He isn't real flamboyant," said retiree Diane Cox, 69, as she left the restaurant. "A lot of the others, they give you more of a stir and get you going. But he is factual and talking about the terrible debt facing my grandchildren."

In the afternoon, as he slowly stepped through Iowa State's snow-covered parking lot, where his father four years ago participated in the Iowa GOP's straw poll, Paul said he had fond memories of those past runs. But he believes he can win what Ron Paul never did: the presidential nomination.

"We used to have an 'end the Fed' dunk booth over there," Paul said, pointing toward a nearby sidewalk. "People threw balls at Ben Bernanke in order to get someone in the tank." After chuckling, he added: "If I run, I think we can attract people who weren't attracted before."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Zombie statistic about Obama's Affordable Care Act refuses to stagger away (WAPO)

By Glenn Kessler
February 8, 2015
The Washington Post

"Under Obama, Average Family Premiums Have Increased $4,154" - Republican National Committee tweet and "fact check"

The RNC circulated this talking point during the State of the Union address, and it is now popping up in the Twitter feeds of Republican House members and state parties.

But this is a zombie statistic; a version of it keeps coming back no matter how many times we try to debunk it. So let's try to explain once again why it does not really say much about health-care inflation under the Affordable Care Act, a.k.a. Obamacare.

We first spotted a version of this statistic back in 2012, in a television advertisement sponsored by the RNC.

Then, the ad claimed "the average cost of a family policy is up $1,300" as a result of the Affordable Care Act. The source was the 2011 Kaiser Family Foundation annual survey of employer health benefits, and the RNC simply took the difference between average family premium for 2011 ($15,073) and 2010 ($13,770).

At the time, few of the Affordable Care Act provisions had taken effect, so it was rather silly to blame the health-care law for the increase in premiums. The Kaiser report, in fact, noted that "many of the most significant provisions of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act (ACA) will take effect in 2014."

Moreover, the survey is taken between January and May, meaning some of the data referred to the period before the law was even approved by Congress. The RNC earned Three Pinocchios for that ad.

Fast-forward to today. The law was fully implemented in early 2014, so perhaps the 2014 survey has more relevance. The RNC's number is now $4,154, which certainly sounds large, especially compared with $1,300 just three years ago.

But if you dig into the 2014 Kaiser report, you see that two things happened. First, the rate of premium increases has slowed, compared with that in previous years. Second, the RNC changed the baseline to make Obama's numbers look even worse. (Perhaps that was in response to the sudden slowdown in premium increases?)

To come up with $4,154, the RNC has to reach all the way to 2008, the year before Obama took office. Never mind that it previously had measured the increase starting in 2010. Under the RNC's previous baseline, the increase would have been $3,064. But it would make more sense to have a baseline starting in 2011, so you are capturing what happened after at least some of the Obamacare provisions went into effect; that's an increase of $1,761.

More to the point, the Kaiser survey noted the rate of increase has slowed in recent years. In the past five years (2009 to 2014), the increase has been 26 percent, compared with 34 percent in the preceding five-year period. If you want to compare presidents, the rate of increase in Obama's first five years was 26 percent, compared with 66 percent in the first five years of George W. Bush's presidency.

The reasons for the sudden slowdown are not clear, and it is certainly too early to attribute the shift to Obamacare. Health-care costs across the industrialized world have experienced slower growth since the 2008 economic downtown, according to the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development. So it's too soon to break out the champagne.

Note: Republicans frequently pair this stat with a foolish claim that Obama made in 2008 as a presidential candidate: that his health-care plan would reduce health-care costs by $2,500 a year.

As we have noted before, Obama's pledge came with a very large asterisk: He was not saying premiums would fall by $2,500, but that health-care costs per family would be that much lower than anticipated. In other words, if overall costs - not just premiums - were expected to rise by $5,000 by 2012, they would rise by only $2,500. When Obama made this claim in 2008, he was quickly called out by fact checkers. The Fact Checker at the time awarded Obama Two Pinocchios for the pledge, saying it was based on shaky assumptions.

Still, in 2014, Obama started to suggest he had begun to meet this pledge, claiming that health-care premiums would have been $1,800 higher under the rate of growth in the 10 years before 2010. (Here, too, Obama was using the Kaiser annual employer health benefits survey.) The savings virtually disappear if one uses a different period of comparison: 2006 to 2010. Obama earned Two Pinocchios for that claim, in part because he called it "a $1,800 tax cut."

Kris Anderson, research director of the RNC, said the 2008 baseline was taken "to encompass the growth in premiums across [Obama's] entire term." He said that "it's the metric we've used for quite some time for examining how premiums have grown during his entire time in office." He did not explain why a different baseline was used for the 2012 ad.

Regular readers know that The Fact Checker is often dubious about raw numbers that appear to have little context. Healthcare premiums, like the costs of most goods, go up year after year. What matters is the rate of increase - and right now, health-care inflation is at its lowest rate in decades.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So the RNC has managed to take a good-news story and try to turn it into something negative. That alone would result in another Three Pinocchios. But to make the numbers look even worse, the RNC changed the baseline and went all the way back to a year before Obama became president. That's worthy of Four Pinocchios.

Is it a small thing to ask that we finally put this zombie stat to rest?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Great American Dream, Still Deferred (NYT)

By Jeff Sommer
February 8, 2015
The New York Times

The housing market has shown signs of life recently. Prices have risen, mortgage rates are very attractive and construction is reviving.

But recall where the market has been over the last 20 years and you'll start to see a less cheerful picture. In fact, from a longer perspective, it appears that the housing market, as it stands now, isn't stable or sustainable. It is, arguably, still on artificial life support.

Return for a moment to November 1994. That's when President Bill Clinton told the National Association of Realtors that many more Americans should own their own homes, because homeownership went "to the heart of what it means to harbor, to nourish, to expand the American dream." He called on the nation to embark on a public-private effort to lift the homeownership rate, which then stood at just above 64 percent.

In Mr. Clinton's vision, so-called government-sponsored enterprises -- the mortgage-financing giants known as Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac -- were to play an outsize role in providing affordable home mortgages to ever-widening groups of people.

To a surprising extent, that vision became reality. The homeownership rate began to soar -- census figures show that it peaked in 2004 at a little above 69 percent. That was during the Bush administration, which also embraced the dream of expanding homeownership. Anyone who was awake during those years knows that America had a colossal housing boom, followed by a monumental bust that shook the global economy.

The housing market is now much improved. But the trauma of the public-private housing industry isn't entirely over.

That is evident in a startling statistic reported last month by the Census Bureau: The homeownership rate dropped all the way to 63.9 percent at the end of 2014. That's lower than it was when Mr. Clinton said homeownership was too low. The rate has declined consistently for years now, a drop that accelerated with the wave of foreclosures set off by the housing crash.

With thousands of people still owing more on their mortgages than their houses are worth, national preferences have been shifting and fewer people say they believe they should buy a home. A national consumer survey conducted for Fannie Mae in December asked whether people would buy or rent if it were time to move. The share who said they would buy fell to 61 percent -- a record low. Those who said they would rent rose to 34 percent.

This sea change in attitudes might be proceeding even more briskly if it weren't for national policy aimed at giving people an inducement to buy homes. Consider mortgage rates: The average rate for standard 30-year fixed mortgages is under 3.6 percent, an extraordinarily low rate made possible, in large part, by the intervention of governmental or quasi-governmental authorities.

First, there's the Federal Reserve, which stepped into the market for mortgage-backed securities in 2009, filling the yawning gap that opened after banks and investors shunned that market after the subprime mortgage crisis. As of Feb. 4, according to data compiled by the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis, the Fed held $1.74 trillion in such securities, giving it a dominant position.

While it stopped adding to its holdings in October, the Fed is keeping those it owns, reducing supply. That, as basic economics tells us, tends to increase prices. In fixed-income markets, interest rates, or yields, move in the opposite direction of prices: The Fed is holding mortgage rates down.

Until now, its actions have helped to fuel whatever housing recovery we've seen, but the Fed's current policy bias is to tighten monetary conditions. As a result, mortgage rates are likely to rise.

That does not bode well for the housing market. As Barclays Research said in a report last Wednesday to clients on the outlook for housing: "History suggests a rise in mortgage rates causes a decline in housing demand and residential investment." Unless the incomes of working people rise sharply, which virtually no one predicts, housing will undergo "a bumpy ride toward normalization," the report said.

Then there are government agencies whose main focus is housing, like the Federal Housing Administration, which guarantees mortgage loans, and those two government-sponsored enterprises, Fannie Mae and its sibling, Freddie Mac.

Fannie and Freddie are, technically, private companies. Until 2008, when they required a $188 billion bailout, they were often said to be both independent of the government and backed by it. That unusual status gave their bonds a cachet close to that of United States Treasuries.

Now, Fannie and Freddie are wards of the government. They are, officially, in "conservatorship," regulated chiefly by the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Federal Housing Finance Agency. And while their cash flow is positive, they haven't been building up capital as a cushion against losses from risky loans: Since 2012, the Obama administration has required that they send nearly all of their profits directly to the Treasury.

That's helping the government's finances over the short term, but taxpayers will be liable if Fannie and Freddie's loans sour again. The agencies don't issue mortgages. They buy them from lenders, rebundle them into securities and guarantee them if they default -- guarantees that have kept the market humming, reducing mortgage rates. Together, Fannie and Freddie are backstopping more than $5 trillion in loans, according to testimony in a congressional hearing on Jan. 27. Without that backing and those Fed purchases, the housing market would be in much worse shape.

At the same time, statistics being compiled by the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative research organization, suggest that risky housing loans are again becoming more common. Most of these loans are being guaranteed by the F.H.A. and Fannie and Freddie, said Edward J. Pinto, co-director of the institute's International Center on Housing Risk. The riskiest pockets of the country, he says, are in parts of California that were hit hardest during the housing bust. They include the Central Valley and Riverside and San Bernardino Counties. A longtime critic of federal housing policies, Mr. Pinto said: "We're not in a crisis at the moment, but the trend is troubling. We're heading in the wrong direction."

Melvin L. Watt, director of the Federal Housing Finance Agency, says those agencies are monitoring risk carefully, while also trying to fulfill their mandates to keep the housing market liquid and affordable. Mr. Watt has begun funneling some of the agencies' money into a trust fund to provide housing for low-income groups and to reduce mortgage fees and required down payments.

Those moves have raised the ire of congressional Republicans, like Jeb Hensarling of Texas, chairman of the Financial Services Committee. Mr. Hensarling said last month that the federal housing agencies were competing "to become the nation's biggest subprime lender."

Mr. Watt, for his part, says it's up to Congress to figure out what to do with Fannie and Freddie. With Republicans and Democrats at loggerheads, it's highly unlikely that any decision will be forthcoming.

In the meantime, it's hard to be satisfied with the state of the housing market. It's in far better shape than it was five or six years ago, when prices were plummeting and financing was frozen. We're not in an urgent crisis. But it seems likely that we will be if some of these problems aren't resolved.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Are C.E.O.s That Talented, or Just Lucky? (NYT)

By Robert Frank
February 8, 2015
The New York Times

The divorce of the oil billionaire Harold G. Hamm from Sue Ann Arnall has gained attention largely for its outsize dollar amounts. Mr. Hamm, the chief executive and founder of Continental Resources, who was worth more than $18 billion at one point, wrote his ex-wife a check last month for $974,790,317.77 to settle their split. She's appealing to get more; he's appealing to pay less.

Yet beyond the staggering sums, the Hamm divorce raises a fundamental question about the wealth of executives and entrepreneurs: How much do they owe their fortunes to skill and hard work, and how much comes from happenstance and luck?

Mr. Hamm, seeking to exploit a wrinkle in divorce law, made the unusual argument that his wealth came largely from forces outside his control, like global oil prices, the expertise of his deputies and other people's technology. During the nine-week divorce trial, his lawyers claimed that although Mr. Hamm had founded Continental Resources and led the company to become a multibillion-dollar energy giant, he was responsible for less than 10 percent of his personal and corporate success.

Some in the courtroom started calling it the "Jed Clampett defense," after the lead character in "The Beverly Hillbillies" TV series who got rich after tapping a gusher in his swampland.

In a filing last month supporting his appeal, Mr. Hamm cites the recent drop in oil prices and subsequent 50 percent drop in Continental's share price and his fortune as further proof that forces outside his control direct his company's fortunes.

Lawyers for Ms. Arnall argue that Mr. Hamm is responsible for more than 90 percent of his fortune.

While rooted in a messy divorce, the dispute frames a philosophical and ethical debate over inequality and the obligations of the wealthy. If wealth comes mainly from luck or circumstance, many say the wealthy owe a greater debt to society in the form of taxes or charity. If wealth comes from skill and hard work, perhaps higher taxes would discourage that effort.

Sorting out what value is created by luck or skill is a tricky proposition in itself. The limited amount of academic research on the topic, which mainly looks at how executives can influence a company's value, has often found that broader market forces often have a bigger impact on a company's success than an executive's actions.

"As we know from the research, the performance of a large firm is due primarily to things outside the control of the top executive," said J. Scott Armstrong, a professor at the Wharton School at the University of Pennsylvania. "We call that luck. Executives freely admit this -- when they encounter bad luck."

A study conducted from 1992 to 2011 of how C.E.O. compensation changed in response to luck or events beyond the executives' control showed that their pay was 25 percent higher when luck favored the C.E.O.

Some management experts say the role of luck is nearly impossible to measure because it depends on the particular industry. Oil, for instance, is especially sensitive to outside forces.

"Within any industry, a more talented management team is going to tend to do better," said Steven Neil Kaplan of the University of Chicago Booth School of Business. "That is why investors and boards of directors look for the best talent to run their companies. That is why company stock prices often move a lot, in both directions, when a C.E.O. dies or a new C.E.O. is hired."

The Hamm case hinged on a quirk in divorce law known as "active versus passive appreciation." In Oklahoma, and many other states, if a spouse owns an asset before the marriage, the increase in the value of an asset during marriage is not subject to division if the increase was because of "passive" appreciation. Passive appreciation is when an asset grows on its own because of factors outside either spouse's control, like land that appreciates without any improvements or passively held stocks. Any value that's not deemed as "passive" is considered "active" -- meaning it increased because of the efforts, skills or funding of a spouse and can therefore be subject to division in a divorce.

The issue has been at the center of some other big divorces. In the 2002 divorce of the Chicago taxi magnate David Markin and Susan Markin, filed in Palm Beach, Fla., Mr. Markin claimed he was "merely a passenger on this corporate ship traveling through the ocean," according to the judge. But he ruled that Mr. Markin was more like "the captain of the ship. Certainly he benefited by sailing through some good weather. However, he picked the course and he picked the crew. In short, he was directly responsible for everything that happened." Ms. Markin was awarded more than $30 million, along with other assets.

Mr. Hamm, now 69, also had favorable conditions after founding Continental Resources well before his marriage in 1988 to Sue Ann, then a lawyer at the company. By this fall, when the trial ended, Continental had a market capitalization of over $30 billion; Mr. Hamm's stake of 68 percent and other wealth exceeded $18 billion.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Their divorce trial was closed to the public, and all but a few of the documents are under seal. Neither Mr. Hamm nor his lawyers or representatives would comment. Ms. Arnall and her spokesman also declined to comment.

According to people with knowledge of the case, however, Mr. Hamm's chief strategy was to claim most of his wealth as passive appreciation, and therefore not subject to division. During his testimony, the typically commanding Mr. Hamm, who had been the face of the company for decades, said he couldn't recall certain decisions, didn't know much about the engineering aspects of oil drilling and didn't attend critical meetings.

Mr. Hamm's lawyers calculated that only 5 to 10 percent of his wealth came from his own effort, skill, management or investment. It's unclear how they squared this argument with his compensation, which totaled $42.7 million from 2006 to 2013, according to Equilar, an executive compensation data company.

Ms. Arnall called more than 80 witnesses -- from Continental executives to leading economists like Glenn Hubbard and Kenneth Button -- to show how much better Continental had done than its peers and that Mr. Hamm made most or all of the key decisions about the company's strategy, finances and operations. They estimated that Mr. Hamm was responsible for $14 billion to $17 billion of his $18 billion fortune.

The judge's ruling in November largely sided with Mr. Hamm and awarded Ms. Arnall about $1 billion, a fraction of what many divorce experts had expected.

"It was surprising," said Jeffrey D. Fisher, the Florida divorce lawyer who represented Susan Markin. "But when you're dealing with numbers that high, there are times when the court just says, 'Enough is enough.' "

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Stream of Foreign Wealth Flows to Elite New York Real Estate (NYT)

By Louise Story and Stephanie Saul
February 7, 2015
The New York Times

On the 74th floor of the Time Warner Center, Condominium 74B was purchased in 2010 for $15.65 million by a secretive entity called 25CC ST74B L.L.C. It traces to the family of Vitaly Malkin, a former Russian senator and banker who was barred from entering Canada because of suspected connections to organized crime.

Last fall, another shell company bought a condo down the hall for $21.4 million from a Greek businessman named Dimitrios Contominas, who was arrested a year ago as part of a corruption sweep in Greece.

A few floors down are three condos owned by another shell company, Columbus Skyline L.L.C., which belongs to the family of a Chinese businessman and contractor named Wang Wenliang. His construction company was found housing workers in New Jersey in hazardous, unsanitary conditions.

Behind the dark glass towers of the Time Warner Center looming over Central Park, a majority of owners have taken steps to keep their identities hidden, registering condos in trusts, limited liability companies or other entities that shield their names. By piercing the secrecy of more than 200 shell companies, The New York Times documented a decade of ownership in this iconic Manhattan way station for global money transforming the city's real estate market.

Many of the owners represent a cross-section of American wealth: chief executives and celebrities, doctors and lawyers, technology entrepreneurs and Wall Street traders.

But The Times also found a growing proportion of wealthy foreigners, at least 16 of whom have been the subject of government inquiries around the world, either personally or as heads of companies. The cases range from housing and environmental violations to financial fraud. Four owners have been arrested, and another four have been the subject of fines or penalties for illegal activities.

The foreign owners have included government officials and close associates of officials from Russia, Colombia, Malaysia, China, Kazakhstan and Mexico.

They have been able to make these multimillion-dollar purchases with few questions asked because of United States laws that foster the movement of largely untraceable money through shell companies.

Vast sums are flowing unchecked around the world as never before — whether motivated by corruption, tax avoidance or investment strategy, and enabled by an ever-more-borderless economy and a proliferation of ways to move and hide assets.

Alighting in places like London, Singapore and other financial centers, this flood of capital has created colonies of the foreign super-rich, with the attendant resentments and controversies about class inequality made tangible in the glass and steel towers reordering urban landscapes.

Where it made landfall in New York, in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks, was the Time Warner Center. More than a decade on, even as a row of sky-piercing palaces rises on the southern rim of Central Park, the Time Warner Center remains the New York archetype of the global phenomenon, reflecting intertwined trends — the increasing sums of foreign money in high-end real estate and the growing use of shell companies.

About $8 billion is spent each year for New York City residences that cost more than $5 million each, more than triple the amount of a decade ago, according to the website PropertyShark. Just over half of those sales last year were to shell companies.

The Times examination reveals the workings of an opaque economy for this global wealth. Lacking incentive or legal obligation to identify the sources of money, an entire chain of people involved in high-end real estate sales — lawyers, accountants, title brokers, escrow agents, real estate agents, condo boards and building workers — often operate with blinders on. As Rudy Tauscher, a former manager of the condos at Time Warner, said: "The building doesn't know where the money is coming from. We're not interested."

As an indication of how well-cloaked shell company ownership is, it took The Times more than a year to unravel the ownership of shell companies with condos in the Time Warner Center, by searching business and court records from more than 20 countries, interviewing dozens of people with close knowledge of the complex, examining hundreds of property records and connecting the dots from lawyers or relatives named on deeds to the actual buyers.

Yet in some cases it is nearly impossible to establish with certainty the source of money behind shell companies. Purchasers can register shell companies in the names of accountants, lawyers or relatives. Purchases are often made not just by individuals but on behalf of groups of investors or numerous family members, further obscuring the origin of the funds. What is more, ownership of shell companies can be shifted at any time, with no indication in property records.

The high-end real estate market has become less and less transparent — and more alluring for those abroad with assets they wish to keep anonymous — even as the United States pushes other nations to help stanch the flow of American money leaving the country to avoid taxes. Yet for all the concerns of law enforcement officials that shell companies can hide illicit gains, regulatory efforts to require more openness from these companies have failed.

"We like the money," said Raymond Baker, the president of Global Financial Integrity, a Washington nonprofit that tracks the illicit flow of money. “It’s that simple. We like the money that comes into our accounts, and we are not nearly as judgmental about it as we should be.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In some ways, officials are clamoring for the foreign wealthy. In New York, tax breaks for condominium developments benefit owners looking for a second, or third, residence in one of Manhattan’s premier buildings. Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said on his weekly radio program in 2013, shortly before leaving office: “If we could get every billionaire around the world to move here, it would be a godsend.”

Among the Time Warner Center owners identified by The Times are at least 17 billionaires on Forbes magazine’s annual list of the world’s richest people. Five of the world’s leading art collectors own units, as do eight people who have been chief executives of major companies. And it has been home to numerous celebrities, including the singers Jimmy Buffett and Ricky Martin, the New England Patriots quarterback Tom Brady and the talk show host Kelly Ripa.

A look behind some doors revealed more complicated tales.

Units 72B and 51E are owned by the Amantea Corporation, which The Times traced to a mining magnate named Anil Agarwal. His company was fined for polluting a major river near a copper mine in Zambia, which sickened nearby residents. And judicial committees in his native India determined that his company had violated the land rights of an indigenous tribe near a proposed mine.

When Anna Ai Fang purchased Condominium 58E in 2004 for $2.1 million, the forwarding address on the deed was a decidedly more modest location: her dorm, Ruggles Hall, at Columbia University. At the time, her father, Fang Fenglei, had ended a long career running state-affiliated banks in China and would soon begin working for Goldman Sachs.

Unit 62CE belongs to Prime International Management Group, which in turn is controlled by Alexander Varshavsky, who runs auto dealerships in Russia.

Few, if any, questions were raised by those involved in the deal when Mr. Varshavsky paid cash for the 4,300-square-foot apartment. But his condo shopping did not go unnoticed.

“Agents observed defendant Varshavsky enter several buildings in the Central Park area with a real estate agent, including 25 Columbus Circle, New York, New York,” according to a criminal complaint filed in federal court in Newark, recounting surveillance by federal agents at the Time Warner Center. “In June 2011 defendant Varshavsky purchased an apartment located at that address for approximately $20.5 million in cash.”

In December 2013, Mr. Varshavsky, who is now a United States citizen, was charged with failing to report the existence of a foreign bank account. A lawyer for Mr. Varshavsky disputed the allegations and said he expected the complaint to be dropped.

Meanwhile the case is pending, and Mr. Varshavsky posted bail — his Time Warner condo.

Ownership Becomes Opaque

It was not all that long ago that Columbus Circle was the makeshift residence of dozens of homeless people squatting at the site of the abandoned New York Coliseum, the Robert Moses-era convention center.

The demolition of the coliseum and the creation of the Time Warner Center — two residential towers with a retail atrium, corporate offices and the Mandarin Oriental Hotel — transformed the area into a vibrant shopping and dining destination in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks. The condos also sparked development of a billionaires row of residential towers overlooking Central Park.

By marketing the condos to wealthy foreigners, Time Warner’s developer was at the forefront of luring cash from overseas to New York real estate. Twenty-six percent of the original sales were to people from other countries, a proportion that has grown to more than half among recent buyers. The complex’s dark glass exterior offers a sheen of both exclusivity and secrecy.

It is no more transparent inside. There are no door buzzers or mail slots with residents’ names. You are unlikely to bump into neighbors wandering the halls because only about a third of the owners live there at any one time, according to people familiar with their comings and goings. The building’s annual holiday party is a lonely affair, they say.

“It’s a really closely guarded secret who is in that building,” said Al D’Elia, an architect who has worked there. “It’s just the way they treat you, what you have to do to get in the building.”

The hallways are spare, but many apartments are loaded with the sort of amenities that have become standard in luxury real estate: panoramic views, stone bathtubs and custom everything — sound systems, millwork, lighting fixtures.

Even the numbering of the floors was a bit of upwardly mobile sleight of hand, calibrated to enhance the perception of what the developer, the Related Companies, marketed as “Five Star Living.” So, the 80th-floor penthouses are actually on 53.

The building’s layout and protocols facilitate anonymity. There are multiple entrances to its 192 condos — not just through the two towers’ main doors, but also through an adjacent parking garage and through the Time Warner Center shops. And while the building has a book listing the names of people associated with units, the owners do not have to be listed for them to get access to the building. They could walk in alongside someone whose name is in the book. Or, if they are cleared to visit, they could enter the complex through the shops or the hotel, and then take the secure elevators to the condos.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“An owner could be obscured from our view,” said David Spector, who helped manage the condos until 2011.

Over the decade since the Time Warner condos came on the market, high-end real estate sales in general have become increasingly opaque. In 2003, one-third of the units sold in Time Warner were purchased by shell companies. By 2014, that figure was over 80 percent.

Across the United States in recent years, nearly half the residential purchases of over $5 million were made by shell companies rather than named people, according to data from First American Data Tree analyzed by The Times.

Public records, dating back to at least the 1800s in New York, set real estate apart as more transparent than bank accounts or stock portfolios. “There’s a whole Jeffersonian rhetoric about land ownership,” said Hendrik Hartog, a professor of the history of American law at Princeton. “There was a goal to make land transparent, and it was justified by civic values and a whole range of moral judgments like not hiding ownership.”

One type of corporate structure now commonly used in real estate transactions, limited liability companies, or L.L.C.s, did not even exist in the United States before the late 1970s. At first, they were primarily used by oil and gas traders in Wyoming to shield individual owners from liability — if, say, a well worker was hurt — and to avoid taxation of both the company and the investor.

Nothing in the genesis of limited liability companies suggested they would be used to purchase personal real estate, said Susan Pace Hamill, a University of Alabama professor who worked on L.L.C. policy while at the Internal Revenue Service in the 1990s. However, L.L.C.s are now commonly used in real estate for privacy, wealth transfer or shared ownership.

What becomes clear combing real estate records is that many Time Warner buyers have taken even greater steps, beyond using L.L.C.s, to keep their names out of sight. On many deeds, the line for the buyer’s signature is left blank, is illegible or is signed by a lawyer or other representative. Phone numbers are registered under lawyers’ names; the owner’s line on renovation permits is signed by Time Warner staff members; tax statements are addressed to the L.L.C.s.

And because most of the sales are in cash, there are few mortgage statements, another public document that might identify an owner or trigger scrutiny.

A spokeswoman for the Related Companies, Joanna Rose, said the developer had followed all federal and local laws in its sales at the Time Warner Center, adding, “With all of our sales, we know the identity of the purchasers.”

However, documents and interviews with a half-dozen people involved in the sales show that in many cases, the company did not know the actual source of the money behind the sales.

David J. Wine, the former vice chairman of the Related Companies, spoke bluntly of the lack of concern with buyers’ identities. “You pretty much go by financial capacity,” Mr. Wine said. “Can they afford it? They sign the contract, they put their money down with no contingency and they close. They have to show the money, and that is it. I don’t think you will find a single new developer where it’s different.”

Real estate agents say commitment to anonymity is essential. “One thing of being a high-end broker is we have to protect the privacy of our clients,” said Hall F. Willkie, president of Brown Harris Stevens. “If we didn’t, we wouldn’t have them as clients. We’re very much like private bankers in that sense.”

The shift to secrecy also reflects a fundamental change in the ownership structure of luxury real estate in New York. Many of Manhattan’s finest addresses were traditionally organized as co-ops in which residents were joint owners of the building. Co-op boards generally prefer full-time residents and often subject would-be buyers to excruciating scrutiny.

“Those co-ops wouldn’t accept billionaires, especially foreigners,” said Raphael De Niro, a broker at Douglas Elliman.

By contrast, Time Warner and most new luxury buildings are condos; residents own individual units and boards have less power to screen prospective buyers. In addition, at the Time Warner Center and many other buildings, if a condo board rejects a buyer, building rules say all the residents have to chip in to buy the unit, creating a disincentive for the board to be too picky.

“That’s the joy of the condos,” said Julie Maxey-Allison, an agent for Brown Harris Stevens. “That’s why the L.L.C.s buy them. It’s a way foreigners can do whatever they want here.”

In fact, interviews show, condo boards are not always aware of the individuals behind the shell companies.

Seamus McMahon, a former Time Warner owner, said he had no idea units were sold to members of the Saudi royal family while he was on the board in 2006, including one connected to Princess Haifa bint Faisal, the daughter of a former Saudi king, and her husband, Prince Bandar bin Sultan, the former ambassador to the United States. A few years earlier, Princess Haifa had been in the news because of reports that some of her money had gone to a figure who aided the Sept. 11 hijackers. (The United States commission that investigated the attacks found no evidence that the money assisted the hijackers, either directly or indirectly.)

Mr. McMahon said the Related Companies did not usually share details about buyers with board members and did not inform them of the Saudi sale. “They probably asked to keep it quiet,” he said, referring to the Saudis. “Related would have kept it quiet.”

Behind Door 74b

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When the company with the complicated name of 25CC ST74B plunked down $15.65 million in 2010 for a condo in the Time Warner Center, there was no telling whose money was in play.

But in January 2013, the company accused a contractor of overbilling in a classic New York City renovation dispute. The lawsuit identified the apartment's owner as "Vitaly Malkin, a Russian senator who is domiciled in Russia and generally is not present in New York." Less than two weeks later, a new complaint was filed with a change: It now said the apartment was owned by a trust whose beneficiaries included Mr. Malkin's son, Leonid, and that Mr. Malkin was neither a trustee nor a beneficiary of the trust.

In a deposition, a former employee of the contractor said that while he understood that the client was "the senator, the Russian oligarch," he was not allowed to refer to the client by name. If he did use the family name, he said he was reprimanded and told "to make sure I just used 25CC."

In fact, Vitaly Malkin had been in public view for more than a decade, sometimes tied to controversy.

Mr. Malkin, 62, made a fortune in metals and banking and was one of the wealthiest members of the Federation Council, Russia's upper legislative house. He resigned from the Council in March 2013 after Aleksei Navalny, the Russian anticorruption activist, revealed that he had failed to disclose property he owned in Canada and that he had dual Israeli citizenship.

But the case that has dogged Mr. Malkin involves a 1996 deal to restructure Angola's $5 billion debt to Russia, an arrangement that has become a symbol of official plundering in Africa among anticorruption advocates.

The debt, incurred during Angola's long civil war, was cut to $1.5 billion in a deal partly negotiated by Arcadi Gaydamak, a Russian-born businessman. But the debt payment was conveyed through an intermediary company in which Mr. Malkin had a share, according to documents from the Canadian government and Swiss investigators.

When Angola paid the debt, Mr. Gaydamak received $130 million of the payment and Mr. Malkin received $48.8 million, the documents show. A portion also went to various Angolan officials, including President José Eduardo dos Santos, who received $36 million, according to a report by the advocacy group Corruption Watch.

Mr. dos Santos and Mr. Gaydamak did not respond to inquiries from The Times.

"Everyone knew exactly what happened," Rafael Marques, an Angolan journalist and activist, said of the payment to the president. "That money was for personal enrichment. They were kickbacks."

The episode became an issue for Mr. Malkin in 2007, when he tried to gain entry to Canada, where he had business interests. Two years earlier, a Canadian immigration official had deemed Mr. Malkin "inadmissible," writing that he had "massively misrepresented" his net worth and how he obtained his assets, according to court documents obtained by The Times.

When Mr. Malkin reapplied in 2007, among the issues was his role as Mr. Gaydamak's banker in the Angola debt deal, the documents show. In addition to facing questions in the debt deal, Mr. Gaydamak was under investigation in France in connection with arms sales to the Angolan government. He was later sentenced to three years in a French prison for money laundering and tax fraud.

Canadian immigration officials again declared Mr. Malkin inadmissible, this time because of what they called an "extended association with persons suspected to be involved in organized crime and money laundering."

In court papers, Mr. Malkin vehemently denied involvement in organized crime, calling the allegations by the Canadian authorities unsupported and noting that he had been free to travel to other countries. Mr. Malkin sued the Canadian authorities, and in June 2009 a judge ruled that the case should be reviewed because Mr. Malkin had not been given a chance to respond to the allegations.

Mr. Malkin was allowed to visit Canada in 2012, his lawyer, Gregory Sidlofsky of Toronto, said in an email, adding, "Canadian authorities never had nor provided any evidence of any wrongdoing by Mr. Malkin." In the Angola debt case, he said, Swiss investigators ultimately found no wrongdoing. Mr. Sidlofsky said the $48.8 million was a dividend reflecting his client's share of the intermediary company. As for the long-running renovation of the Time Warner condo, he said, "Mr. Malkin does not own the apartment, nor has he had any recent involvement in the renovation."

The American Bar Association suggests that government officials like Mr. Malkin warrant enhanced scrutiny in real estate deals, but its guidelines are voluntary. Marc Isaacs, the New York lawyer who handled the condo purchase, said his firm's client vetting goes beyond an online search, but he would not elaborate. Asked about Mr. Malkin, Mr. Isaacs said he could not discuss specific clients.

The real estate agents on the Time Warner deal included Brenda S. Powers and Elizabeth L. Sample, who represent many foreign clients and who live in the building. Ms. Sample said that her focus when vetting buyers was this: "They have to have the money. Other than that, that's it. That's all we need."

A Blind Eye

Federal banking guidelines are clear: "Banks should take all reasonable steps to ensure that they do not knowingly or unwittingly assist in hiding or moving the proceeds of corruption." This means screening customers to determine whether they are "politically exposed people" — foreign officials and their relatives and associates — and filing a "suspicious activity report" if the customers transfer unusually large amounts of money.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But such checks are not required on money flowing into the country through shell companies to purchase high-end real estate.

L.L.C.s and other entities can be established in various states without revealing their true owners. Even when such companies move money through a bank account, banks are not required to know who is behind the transaction because of a loophole in the law.

In many ways, the government has allowed the real estate industry to turn a blind eye to the source of money used to buy luxury properties.

It might not have turned out this way. In the late 1990s, after congressional hearings highlighted corrupt foreign officials with money in the United States, the Justice Department sought to expand the list of industries required to screen the financial activities of politically exposed people. That included jewelry sales, hedge funds and real estate.

The proposal gained momentum after Sept. 11, when the Justice Department pushed to make it part of the Patriot Act. The rules were included in the law and handed to the Treasury Department to put into effect.

The real estate and legal professions sprang into action, arguing that background checks were impractical and would hurt the economy. “The money-laundering risks presented by real estate closings are relatively small, compared to other types of financial assets,” the American Land Title Association said in comments on the proposed rules.

Businesses insisted that tainted money was not likely to flow into real estate. “Anonymity and liquidity, two characteristics important to money launderers, typically do not exist in real estate transactions,” the Dechert law firm wrote.

The industry’s assertions ignored the increasing use of shell companies and how often wealthy foreigners sought out high-end real estate as a safe deposit box.

At the Time Warner Center, for instance, at least a dozen purchases would have received greater scrutiny under the expanded rules.

But the Treasury Department never imposed the requirement on real estate or some other industries. Similarly, a proposal to extend the concept of the “know your customer” banking rule to the identities of people behind L.L.C.s and other shell companies that open bank accounts has been stalled for nearly three years in the Treasury Department.

Banking associations say it would impose undue costs on them because there are no reliable federal or state databases with shell company owners.

In fact, registering shell companies has become profitable for states like Delaware and Nevada, which also have lobbied against transparency.

“I don’t see some kind of global effort to stop all this because the money’s too good,” said David M. Crane, a Syracuse University law professor who oversaw the United Nations’ effort to recover money from Charles Taylor, the former Liberian president who was convicted of war crimes and thought to have plundered his country.

A number of states do not require people forming companies to reveal the names of the owners or show any identification.

This opacity presents challenges for law enforcement officials, who say billions of dollars in suspicious money move through shell companies each year. “It can be very, very difficult to penetrate who is the beneficial owner of these shell companies,” said Leslie R. Caldwell, chief of the Justice Department’s criminal division.

She said that the department’s Kleptocracy Initiative has found that foreign officials often use shell companies or immediate family members to move large amounts of money to United States real estate.

In 2010, a Senate committee investigating corrupt money moving into the country drew attention to a shell company used by the sister of the president of Gabon to buy a $2 million residence in Manhattan, and to an L.L.C. used by the son of the president of Equatorial Guinea to purchase a $30 million home in Malibu, Calif.

The proliferation of shell companies incorporated in the United States has hurt Washington’s attempt to get other countries to crack down on Americans who move money offshore to avoid taxes.

“We are in a totally inconsistent position,” said Carl Levin, a Michigan Democrat who pushed for transparency in shell companies when he served in the Senate. “We’re way behind in terms of keeping up with what the international standard is, and it weakens our argument when we go to try to crack down the use of these offshore tax havens.”

About a year ago, after the Group of 8 industrialized nations issued goals requiring identification of shell company owners, a British representative met with Justice Department officials to complain about the United States’ failure to comply.

According to two people at the meeting, the British representative, Dominic Martin, delivered a stern message: The lax American laws were being used by other countries as an excuse for inaction.

Such a message resonates with Justice Department officials who have advocated tightening the rules.

“For a long time we’ve taken the view that you have to focus on the people that manage the gateway to the financial system, and those guys are not only the banks,” said Stefan Cassella, a Justice Department lawyer. “Bad guys who are trying to invest money in the financial system — they use lawyers, they use accountants, they use real estate, they use jewelers and private jets."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Transactions Amid Investigations

Just two months after the collapse of the Ponzi scheme run by Bernard L. Madoff in 2008, another Ponzi schemer was arrested: James Nicholson, whose Time Warner condominium was frozen. Mr. Nicholson's $8.5 million unit would become the only one in the complex to be seized and sold off by law enforcement officials, even though other owners have been accused of wrongdoing. The difference is that Mr. Nicholson is an American citizen.

Foreigners who buy real estate in the United States often have an easier time keeping it out of the reach of investigators, victims and plaintiffs back home.

Take the case of Pablo Ardila, a former provincial governor in Colombia known for hunting trophies and lavish spending. Mr. Ardila acknowledged to The Times in 2004 that he and his parents had set up a shell company to buy a $4 million condo in the building. In 2007, while he was in office, Mr. Ardila was arrested and immediately jailed by local officials on charges of enriching himself illicitly.

While Mr. Ardila was behind bars, the shell company sold the condo, making a $2 million profit. By then, the forwarding address on property records was no longer in Colombia, but went to a Jhon Ballesteros, in Weston, Fla. John Burger, a real estate agent who represented the seller, said recently that he did not know Mr. Ardila was involved.

An extensive Colombian government analysis of Mr. Ardila's holdings filed in court failed to unearth the Time Warner condo.

Despite international agreements, the authorities in smaller countries have difficulty recovering assets from abroad. "Judges in Colombia have been struggling a lot to get this money back to Colombia," said Elisabeth Ungar Bleier, executive director of the Colombia branch of Transparency International, an anticorruption nonprofit.

Mr. Ardila was released from jail after two years and nine months without having been convicted. However, Arnulfo Mendez Castro, a spokesman for Colombian prosecutors, said Mr. Ardila was still under investigation.

Mr. Ardila's lawyer, Mauricio Cristancho, said his client was the victim of "an absurd prosecution." Despite what Mr. Ardila had told The Times about the condo, the lawyer said, the unit belonged to Mr. Ardila's father, a wealthy businessman. He said Mr. Ballesteros, who did not reply to inquiries, was an assistant to the family.

The Ardila condo was not the only foreign-owned unit in Time Warner that was sold after an owner faced an investigation.

Mr. Contominas, the Greek businessman, sold his condo nine months after he was arrested in January 2014 and accused of using a commercial loan for personal expenditures. His lawyer, Grigorios Tsolias, said Mr. Contominas "is strongly denying any criminal accusation."

Stewart Ford, another Time Warner owner, was facing a fraud investigation in October 2010 when he transferred the $6 million condominium he had bought in his own name to a shell company. At the time, Mr. Ford's firm, Keydata Investment Services, was at the center of one of the biggest financial collapses in Britain, with an estimated 30,000 victims.

That summer, it had been revealed that he had transferred close to $60 million out of Keydata investments before his company was put in receivership by the British government, and moved it into shell companies and trusts that benefited his family.

Phil Burbidge, a disabled former teacher, said he invested through Keydata in 2008 but lost his life savings when the firm imploded the next year. "I'm in complete and utter poverty," Mr. Burbidge said. "It's all gone. I can't even mend the roof."

British financial authorities have concluded their investigation and notified Mr. Ford that they plan to take enforcement action, a spokesman for the British Financial Conduct Authority said in an email to The Times.

Mr. Ford, in turn, is appealing the authority's decision, the spokesman said. In an interview, Mr. Ford said the government should not have put his company into receivership. He added that the funds he transferred out of Keydata investments were fees legitimately owed to entities his family controlled.

He has since sold the Time Warner condo.

Mr. Ford's critics say he appears adept at keeping his assets out of reach of the authorities and bereft investors.

"We don't believe he's got any assets that are touchable," said Geoff Hartnell, a financial adviser in Britain who invested in Keydata products and also sold them to 70 clients. "First of all, we know that he had trusts set up in the Dutch Antilles, trusts in Tortola, in the Virgin Islands." He added: "If they turn around and fine him, then he says, 'I'm not going to pay it.' Since it's civil, what can they do?"

Even a computer server in the company's office proved difficult for the authorities to examine. When British regulators seized it, Mr. Ford sued and said he did not own it. In fact, it was owned by a company that promoted Scottish culture, which in turn was owned by a shell company that was 70 percent owned by a trust, which, it was eventually revealed, was set up for Mr. Ford's four children.

Anonymous In New York

Like most Time Warner owners, Anil Agarwal, an Indian mining magnate, is anonymous in New York. While interviews and private documents reviewed by The Times confirm he is behind condos purchased by the Amantea Corporation for $9.1 million in 2004, his name appears nowhere on public records. The deeds for Amantea's Time Warner condos — one on the "maids floor" and another with sweeping views of Central Park — are signed by a New York lawyer named Constance Cranch. When contacted, she said: "You cannot say anything with respect to me. It's a client of mine's apartment, and I pay their bills."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For all the secrecy at Time Warner, Mr. Agarwal is hardly private about his wealth. He spends much of his time in London and told a newspaper in 2005: "I have to have a Bentley, the best of chauffeurs and butlers."

But Mr. Agarwal and his company, Vedanta Resources, are known in some parts of the world for having left financial and environmental problems in their wake.

He moved his company from India to London in the late 1990s, after it was banned from the Mumbai stock exchange for involvement in a prominent insider trading case.

Ten months before he closed on his Time Warner condos, Mr. Agarwal, his father and his brother were found to have illegally moved money out of India using shell companies in Mauritius and the Bahamas. The Agarwals, an Indian judge later wrote, "tried to pull wool over the revenue's eyes and manipulated foreign exchange."

There were also complaints about Vedanta's environmental record and treatment of residents near its operations.

In September 2004, an Indian Supreme Court committee stated that Vedanta had dumped thousands of tons of "arsenic-bearing slag" around its factory in the southern state of Tamil Nadu. Gro Nystuen, a lawyer who evaluated companies for Norway's pension fund, said the pollution was "harming the environment to such an extent that it also harmed the people living in the neighborhood."

The next year, another Supreme Court committee accused the company of forcing 102 indigenous families from their homes in Odisha State, in eastern India, where it sought to mine bauxite for use in an aluminum refinery. According to the committee's report, residents were "beaten up by the employees of M/s Vedanta."

"An atmosphere of fear was created through the hired goons," the report said. "After being forcibly removed they were kept under watch and ward by the armed guards of M/s Vedanta and no outsider was allowed to meet them. They were effectively being kept as prisoners."

As Vedanta pursued its mining plan over several years, the plight of the indigenous tribe in Odisha became a focal point for international activist groups. The cause was taken up by Rahul Gandhi, the son of a former prime minister, as well as by Bollywood stars such as Gul Panag, who withdrew from a Vedanta marketing campaign.

The British commerce agency issued a rebuke of Vedanta's actions in Odisha, and the Church of England's investment funds sold their shares in the company in protest. "It was just very apparent that the lives of the villagers immediately around the refinery had been made worse, rather than better," said Edward Mason, the chief of responsible investment for a $9 billion church fund. "The villagers had not been properly consulted about the process, or properly compensated."

Vedanta's operations elsewhere have drawn intense criticism. Its copper mine in Zambia has been a source of both pollution and suspicion of financial improprieties. In 2006, two years after Vedanta acquired the mine, the company dumped hazardous waste into the Kafue River, a major source of drinking water for the country, according to a lawsuit filed on behalf of 2,000 residents. Fish were dying, according to the ruling in the case, and local residents experienced skin diseases, lung pain and diarrhea.

The company was fined by a local judge who wrote: "This was lack of corporate responsibility and criminal and a tipping point for corporate recklessness."

Last year, Zambian officials began an audit based on suspicions that Vedanta was not paying the government its proper fees. Hundreds of former mine workers are fighting Vedanta for severance or disability pay. "This company is making its own rules in Zambia," said Darious Yundayunda, a former miner who has been active with a group called Foil Vedanta. "People are struggling."

Mr. Agarwal declined The Times's interview requests over several months. But Vedanta has said publicly, "We remain fully committed to pursuing all our investments in a responsible manner, respecting the environment and human rights."

Despite the complications and controversy, Mr. Agarwal's fortune, according to Forbes, has grown from $1 billion to an estimated $3.5 billion since he purchased his condos at Time Warner.

Big Spenders

When Mr. Bloomberg set out the welcome mat for the world's billionaires, the idea was this: Money they spent would trickle down to the doormen, concierges, cleaners, drivers and construction workers, as well as to the shopkeepers and restaurateurs who sell $5,000 handbags and $450 sushi dinners.

And many of the players at the Time Warner Center are indeed big spenders.

After Maxim Finskiy, a Russian business associate of the Brooklyn Nets owner Mikhail Prokhorov, moved in, he imported his Bentley.

Robert Tsao, who gave up his Taiwanese citizenship after authorities there sued him unsuccessfully for investing in mainland

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

China, owns one of the world's most renowned private collections of Asian art.

Adam Chen, who graduated from New York University in May, was one of several college students to use the complex as a dormitory. He celebrated his birthday last year at the restaurant Per Se in the Time Warner Center, dining on its famous starter, Oysters and Pearls, all captured in photographs on Instagram.

The precise impact of wealthy foreigners on the city may be more complex, though. As nonresidents, they pay no city income taxes and often receive hefty property tax breaks. A program aimed at new condo development doles out about a half-billion dollars in tax breaks a year, according to the city's independent budget office. These savings are passed on to owners in the form of lower property taxes. The Time Warner Center was not part of the most lucrative tax break program, but many other buildings around Central Park have benefited.

The city's first condo costing more than $100 million, which sold in the last few weeks at the new luxury tower One57, had property taxes this past year of $17,268, according to the city's finance office. Those taxes will go up over time, but for now that is a savings of more than $359,000.

The Fiscal Policy Institute, a nonprofit in New York, recently suggested a downside to the influx of billionaires who are in the city only sporadically.

"In terms of the local economy, you don't have people who are going to plays, going to restaurants," James Parrott, the institute's chief economist, said. "They're not spending at the dry cleaners, the grocers and all of that, so it deprives New York of all that local multiplier effect."

What is more, Mr. Parrott said, the skyrocketing prices of the pieds-à-terre are affecting the price of real estate in the city more broadly. "There's a downside to having such pressure at the top. It pulls up the prices overall. When owners of $10 million condos see that there's a big market for $95 million condos, they're more likely to raise their prices," he said. "Then the person at $2 million raises his prices, then the person at $1 million sees that and there aren't any prices below $1 million."

Through a spokesman, Mr. Bloomberg said last month that he had hoped billionaires who moved to New York would not simply be part-timers but would live in the city and pay taxes "so we could use that revenue for government services that, incidentally, disproportionately benefit lower-income New Yorkers."

Some local politicians have suggested taxing the owners of pieds-à-terre who are not city residents.

"We are spending money to keep them safe and maintaining the infrastructure," said Brad Lander, a city councilman. "Should there be the equivalent of a commuter tax? An international residents tax?"

A proposal from the Fiscal Policy Institute would impose a graduated tax on pieds-à-terre worth $5 million or more. The group estimates it would generate $665 million a year in revenue for the city, mostly from owners of the approximately 445 apartments valued at more than $25 million.

Peeling Back Layers

There is no simple way to unmask ownership of a shell company. Exploring each of the more than 200 shell companies that have owned units in the Time Warner Center became its own journey, with its own surprise ending.

The case of Columbus Skyline, which paid $25.6 million for three condos, began with two clues: a barely legible signature and a forwarding address.

The signature on the deeds was difficult to read, but in one spot it could be made out: Wang Zi. A search of that name did not yield obvious results, but a Wang Zi did register a phone number at Time Warner. The Times cross-referenced that number and found it was tied to a firm called MQ Realty with an address at an apartment in a public housing complex in Chinatown. A visit to that apartment yielded little more than a conversation in Chinese with a neighbor who said the person behind MQ Realty had recently moved. It was a dead end.

The second clue proved more promising. Columbus Skyline was formed in New York State. While the state filing does not list the name of the L.L.C.'s owner, it does have an address: 10 East 39th St., Suite 1110. In public records, one name comes up as having used that address: Wang Wenliang.

Further searches turned up a prominent Wang Wenliang. This Mr. Wang is a former municipal official in Dandong, a city on China's border with North Korea, and a member of the National People's Congress, China's parliamentary body. Among his businesses is a construction empire that has worked on numerous consulates and embassies for the Chinese government, and he is worth hundreds of millions of dollars. He is on the board of trustees of N.Y.U., where he donated $25 million.

But establishing that Mr. Wang from Dandong was the owner of the Time Warner condos required more confirmation.

The lawyer listed on the condo sales was David Glassman. A search of commercial property filings showed that Mr. Glassman had also done legal work for an affiliate of Mr. Wang's company, China Rilin Construction Group.

When The Times called Mr. Glassman, he briefly discussed the condos and said he would ask Mr. Wang if he would be interviewed about his ownership.

Another round of searches found a less glamorous side to real estate used by Mr. Wang's company in the United States. In February 2011, the housing task force in Jersey City followed up on a complaint from a resident on Pavonia Avenue about the number of people living in a single-family residence rented by Rilin. "We conducted the inspection and uncovered conditions that were very troubling to say the least," wrote Mark Redfield, the task force chairman.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"There were 15 Asian males with no identification, passports, or work visas all residing in this one-family attached rowhouse," an internal email from Mr. Redfield said. "The house was divided up into sleeping quarters to accommodate 28 roomers," he wrote, adding, "The crammed quarters were extremely unsanitary and posed an imminent hazard."

The same day, Jersey City officials found "the same conditions" at another house that was used by Rilin for its workers, according to city records.

In 2013, Jersey City inspectors reported finding an illegal rooming house at another location used by Rilin. An internal city email said the building was "housing Chinese workers who work for the Chinese Embassy as construction workers. This is the same group China Rilin Construction Corp. that the task force issued summonses to in 2011 for housing multiple Chinese workers."

Rilin paid fines of several thousand dollars for the 2011 violations. The outcome of the 2013 case was unclear from city records, but the company said it had been dismissed.

Mr. Wang's lawyer said Rilin "took the allegations very seriously, and the reported violations were all quickly remedied by the company or dismissed." He disputed the idea that 28 people lived at the Pavonia Avenue house, saying the top bunks had been used for storage. He said the Wang family had purchased the Time Warner condos through a shell company partly because a disgruntled former employee had threatened to harm them.

When The Times asked Ms. Sample, the Time Warner real estate agent who represented Mr. Wang, for information about his condo purchases, she shot back: "How do you know about him?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Probes Spook Some Christie Backers (WSJ)

By Josh Dawsey and Heather Haddon
February 7, 2015
The Wall Street Journal

When New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie visited South Carolina last month, Phyllis Henderson, a longtime backer there, threw him a party.

Now she isn't sure of his presidential chances in 2016. Last Friday, she ventured to Washington to meet with another possible contender: Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker.

"He's a strong Christian, he survived a recall, there's no black cloud," Ms. Henderson said. "Scott Walker could pull off an Iowa, South Carolina, New Hampshire triple."

New revelations and investigations have spooked some of Mr. Christie's supporters, complicating his path in an already crowded Republican field.

United Airlines said Friday it received subpoenas related to an investigation of former Port Authority Chairman and Christie ally David Samson, as was first reported by the Bergen Record. A spokeswoman for Mr. Samson declined to comment.

Also this week, Bennett Barlyn, a former local prosecutor in New Jersey, said he met with federal investigators about a so-called whistleblower suit he filed in 2010. It related to his firing after objecting to the quashing of indictments against officials with ties to Mr. Christie.

A spokesman for Mr. Christie declined to comment, as did a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Paul Fishman. Mr. Christie has denied any involvement in the case, and the state's attorneys have argued that Mr. Barlyn has no case and that it was in their right to dismiss the indictment. The case is currently in discovery proceedings in Mercer County.

The federal investigation into the George Washington Bridge case is likely to hang over Mr. Christie as potential supporters gauge his chances at a 2016 run. Mr. Christie hasn't been charged with any wrongdoing.

People close to the governor say his administration is preparing to deal with fallout from indictments related to the bridge probe and that the biggest problem could be mounting a campaign amid media scrutiny and possible trials.

"It would be a relief to just see it wrapped," said a person familiar with Mr. Christie's thinking on the investigations. "It's gone on long enough."

"All of these issues accumulate," said Steve Schmidt, who advised U.S. Sen. John McCain of Arizona on his 2008 presidential campaign and has helped Texas Gov. Rick Perry fight criminal charges. "No right-minded person could look at their effort and say it's off to a good start."

Many people who have met Mr. Christie say they are impressed with his personality and willingness to take on issues in New Jersey.

Mike DuHaime, Mr. Christie's longtime political adviser, said the 2016 race still had no declared candidates, and any talk about electability isn't yet meaningful.

On a conference call with donors on Wednesday, Christie aides outlined a schedule of fundraising events for his political-action committee, which he formed last month, and are looking for bundlers to bring in $50,000 to $100,000 each, said a supporter who was on the call.

Ray Washburne, Mr. Christie's finance chairman, said the various investigations aren't likely to resonate outside the Northeast, and fundraising is going well.

Tony Carbonetti, a Wall Street backer of Mr. Christie, brought him to meet colleagues at Perella Weinberg Partners two weeks ago. These people, he said, aren't concerned about investigations -- in politics, they expect them.

"They want to pick a winner," said Kathy Wylde, the chief executive of the Partnership for New York City, a business-backed group with prominent executives as its board. "They're not recoiling in moral horror."

Still, there are hurdles. Al Cardenas, an adviser to Jeb Bush said the former Florida governor is "covering the country from coast-to-coast, east-to-west." Ms. Wylde said more people seemed to be meeting with Mr. Bush in recent weeks.

What concerns some Christie backers is the skepticism he faces from conservatives. In Iowa and New Hampshire, he is trailing other candidates, according to several recent polls. Leighton Lord, a college friend who hosted an event for him in

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

South Carolina, said he faces more questions about Mr. Christie's conservative record than investigations into his administration.

While Mr. Christie's stance on issues like taxes pleases conservatives, "some of the policy issues and other parts of his record do make his path more problematic," said Tim Phillips, president of Americans for Prosperity, a conservative group backed by brothers Charles and David Koch.

Mr. Christie's allies have begun defending his record. Mr. Lord personally assures people of the governor's integrity and conservative ideology, he said. "I don't want to minimize the importance of causing a horrendous traffic jam, but it wasn't like they were stealing money. They were just playing rough."

Mr. Christie will return to Iowa on Monday to speak to the conservative Dallas County Republican Party. Tyler de Haan, the county chairman, said his members lean toward Mr. Walker, Mr. Perry and Ben Carson, a retired neurosurgeon who has been making waves in conservative circles, but they are interested in hearing Mr. Christie.

Gary Kirke, an Iowa entrepreneur who tried to get Mr. Christie to run for president in 2012, still thinks the New Jersey governor is a good man. But he worries about the federal probe.

"That's still a cloud over his head," Mr. Kirke said. "Time will tell."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Fed's Rate Dilemma: Job Gains vs. Inflation (WSJ)

By Jon Hilsenrath
February 7, 2015
The Wall Street Journal

The robust January jobs report highlights a dilemma for Federal Reserve officials as they enter a critical stretch in their policy deliberations: How hot can they let the job market run before raising short-term interest rates?

The labor market in recent months has shown vigor not seen in more than a decade, but the economy is emitting few obvious signs of wage pressure or consumer price inflation sometimes associated with such strength.

The stronger job market gives officials reason to consider raising short-term interest rates to prevent the economy from overheating, but low wage growth and inflation suggest such overheating isn't near and give them cause to wait.

Fed Chairwoman Janet Yellen faces a busy public calendar in the next few weeks where she could provide new clues to her thinking. She is set to present her semiannual monetary-policy report to Congress on Feb. 24 and 25. On March 18, the Fed will conclude a two-day policy meeting and she will hold a press conference.

At both turns, Ms. Yellen and her colleagues will be weighing whether to formally open the door to possible interest-rate increases in June. Most Fed officials have said they expect to start raising their benchmark short-term rate from near zero this year, and several have pointed to midyear as a likely time for liftoff.

For now, many are looking for ways to maximize their flexibility. "I think all possibilities from June on should remain open," Atlanta Fed President Dennis Lockhart said in a speech Friday. "I don't at this juncture have a prediction or preference."

At the heart of the challenge facing the Fed is a notion in economics that there is a short-run trade-off between unemployment and inflation. At some low rate of unemployment, the thinking goes, slack in the job market disappears; if unemployment goes below this point then wage and inflation pressures build as firms compete for a dwindling supply of workers.

Economists call this cutoff point a non-accelerating inflation rate of unemployment, or Nairu, and also point to a "natural rate" of unemployment where inflation is stable in the longer-run.

The problem is nobody knows the cutoff point. Economists merely estimate it.

At their December meeting, Fed officials estimated this rate lies somewhere between 5.2% and 5.5%. Unemployment in January, at 5.7%, is close to the top of that range.

But the estimate of how low unemployment can go is imprecise and moves around depending on what else is happening in the economy. In the early stages of the financial crisis, Fed officials estimated the jobless rate could drop to between 4.8% and 5% without causing inflation. A year ago some officials thought the upper limit of the range might be as high as 5.8%.

In the absence of hard-and-fast rules, Fed officials are watching wage gains, which have been sluggish through the recovery. Policy makers want to see them pick up, a sign the economy is nearing full employment, but not so much that the economy overheats and consumer price inflation gets out of control.

Some economists doubt the trade-off between unemployment and inflation is very strong. The logic of such a trade-off failed during the 2007-09 recession -- the jobless rate soared but inflation didn't fall as much as many economic models predicted. The relationship broke down during the 1970s, when both inflation and unemployment soared, and during the 1990s, when both were low. Explanations for why have varied.

Fed officials are now debating whether the natural rate of unemployment is lower than previously thought. One study by economists at the Chicago Fed found an aging workforce might be increasing the economy's ability to bear low unemployment without causing inflation. That's because older workers tend to have lower jobless rates than younger workers.

If they conclude the economy can bear a lower jobless rate, officials might conclude they should wait longer before raising interest rates.

Unsure how low they can let the jobless rate go, some Fed officials want to keep their options open as they prepare for the March meeting.

The Fed has said it will be "patient" in deciding when to start raising short-term interest rates. Ms. Yellen said use of that word means the officials likely wouldn't raise rates at the next two policy meetings. If they dropped the patient phrase from the March statement, that would indicate they could move in June, but wouldn't guarantee it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The January jobs report bolsters the odds Fed officials will alter or scrap the promise to be patient at the March meeting.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Labor talks test mayor's resolve; Garcetti's course could set the tone with unions for the rest of his tenure (LAT)

By Peter Jamison
February 8, 2015
Los Angeles Times

As behind-the-scenes contract talks with the unions representing more than half the city's civilian workforce grind to a standstill, Los Angeles Mayor Eric Garcetti is facing the first meaningful test of his proclaimed resolve to curb organized labor's sway at City Hall.

Sources familiar with the city's position in the ongoing talks -- normally kept confidential -- say Garcetti's administration is holding to an aggressive bargaining stance, demanding a three-year freeze on raises for roughly 20,000 city workers and greater contributions to employees' healthcare and retirement costs, among other cost-saving concessions. After nearly a year of negotiating, union leaders haven't budged and are planning a brief work stoppage Tuesday morning to put pressure on elected leaders.

To some extent, the impasse is emblematic of the squeeze public-employee unions have faced across the country since the Great Recession began to sap cities' tax revenue. But it is also a bellwether for an ambitious young politician whose fraught relationship with labor has been a theme of his rise as the leader of America's second-largest city.

A progressive Democrat and long-standing labor ally, Garcetti watched the city's largest and most powerful public-employee unions throw their clout and cash behind his opponent in the 2013 mayoral race. He turned the snub to his advantage, casting the unions' chosen candidate, former City Controller Wendy Greuel, as beholden to special interests.

The question now is what tone the mayor wants to set with unions for the rest of his tenure at City Hall -- and beyond. Criticizing labor's influence on local politics played well for Garcetti in a low-turnout citywide election. But in Democrat-dominated California, many still consider union support a prerequisite for the sort of higher office Garcetti, 44, is widely thought to crave.

"It would be extremely difficult to win statewide office without the support of organized labor," said longtime Democratic strategist Darry Sragow.

Such support could be more difficult for Garcetti to secure if he stays his present course in contract talks with the Coalition of L.A. City Unions, which represents most civilian municipal employees. The coalition, which includes Service Employees International Union Local 721 and the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees District Council 36, has an enviable track record at City Hall. It won a nearly 25% pay raise in 2007, just as the economy was about to tank.

The city's current contract proposals are less generous, according to those familiar with them. They include no raises for at least three years and a first-ever requirement that workers pay 10% of their healthcare premiums. Many currently pay no premiums.

Proposed pension reforms would increase the retirement age to 65, reduce pensions and eliminate free healthcare for retirees' spouses. A similar package of cost controls was adopted when Garcetti was on the City Council, but unions are challenging that action in court.

The combined savings from the city's demands could total more than $70 million per year, according to city budget analysts. The city's annual budget is about $8.1 billion.

Employees and union leaders argue that they've already shouldered a fair share of the city's financial burdens in recent years by agreeing to increase their pension contributions and taking furlough days, among other things.

Similar battle lines have been drawn in other U.S. cities, as Democratic mayors seeking to stabilize budgets have pushed back against the labor bosses they once called allies. Chicago Mayor Rahm Emanuel clashed energetically during his first term with teachers' unions. In San Jose, Democratic Mayor Chuck Reed pushed through cost-cutting reforms to the city's pension system, incurring the permanent enmity of labor.

"The unions will be supportive as long as you give them what they want," said Reed, who returned to practicing law last year after he was termed out of office. "In hard times, it's impossible to give them what they want."

Garcetti doesn't have full control over the city's negotiating stance. He is part of a five-member committee that bargains with unions on behalf of the city. In an interview Friday, however, he said the city's present demands represent his position.

"I think I originated it," Garcetti said when asked if he supported the package of a proposed pay freeze and healthcare and pension changes.

"There's nothing I'd like to do more than give workers a raise and even expand benefits," he added. "But we can only spend what we have. I look forward to light coming down the tunnel soon, but it's not there."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Garcetti said his split with the coalition and other major labor groups in the 2013 mayoral race isn't a factor in the current talks.

"I have tremendous respect for these unions. I've worked really closely with them," he said. "The campaign feels like it was a lifetime ago."

But late last week union leaders were calling attention to the distance between the two sides. On Thursday night, one coalition union sent an email urging a broad range of city employees, including clerical, animal-shelter and sanitation workers, to take part in a 10-minute work stoppage Tuesday morning.

"City of Los Angeles management has refused to budge from their concessionary agenda in our contract negotiations ... we are standing together to let them know that we are tired of the attacks on middle-class jobs and public services," the email said.

Coalition Chairwoman Cheryl Parisi declined to comment for this article, citing the confidentiality of contract talks.

Since taking office in July 2013, Garcetti has completed some deals with labor. That year, the union representing most Department of Water and Power workers -- which opposed Garcetti's election -- agreed to forgo raises. City firefighters last year agreed to a two-year contract with a single, relatively modest 2% raise.

Late last year, the 4,500-member Engineers and Architects Assn., one of the few unions that backed the mayor in 2013, agreed to the same concessions the city is now seeking from the coalition. Some inside City Hall saw the little-publicized agreement as an important blueprint for contracts with other unions because it signaled the mayor's willingness to drive a hard bargain even with a labor ally.

Not all are convinced such toughness would be a liability if Garcetti pursues higher office.

As cities' financial problems grow more acute and taxpayers pick up the tab, some see more risk, even for Democrats, in acceding to organized labor than in crossing it.

In five or 10 years, "it will be politically in vogue for anyone who had a reformist position" on controlling expenditures on public employees, said Arnie Steinberg, a GOP strategist and former pollster for Mayor Richard Riordan.

Garcetti, he said, "probably has the ability to stake out a leadership position now as someone who was making tough decisions."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Uncertain times for N. Dakota oil boom (LAT)

By Matthew Brown
February 8, 2015
Los Angeles Times

High crude prices catapulted North Dakota into the top tier of the global oil market and doubled or tripled the size of once-sleepy towns that suddenly had to accommodate a small army of petroleum workers.

But now that those prices have tumbled, the shifting oil market threatens to put the industry and local governments on a collision course. Farming and ranching communities that committed to building homes, roads and schools for the swelling population are worried about how they will pay for those improvements as oil-related tax revenue evaporates.

"Everyone is asking the same question: Holy cats, where do we go from here?" said Dean Bangsund, an economist at North Dakota State University who has tried to help oil-rich McKenzie County gauge its needs, with an eye toward balancing growth against revenues. But none of his economic models were pessimistic enough to match how low oil prices dropped.

For now, the oil extraction goes on. Despite the price plummet, drilling remains profitable in the heart of the state's Bakken oil patch, due to the sheer volume of crude flowing from so-called hot-spots.

And so the building continues in Watford City, a century-old town that once marked the end of the line for the Great Northern Railroad. Roughly 60 rigs are drilling in surrounding McKenzie County -- 40% of the rigs statewide. New neighborhoods and retail centers creep ever deeper into former wheat fields.

"We're making a new, 15,000-person city in the middle of a pasture," said Brent Sanford, mayor of Watford, the county seat. "The question is if we get money put into the pot to do it."

The county, which a decade ago had a population of about 5,000, has become a magnet for "man camps," where newly arriving workers and their families live in trailers, RVs and just about any other structure that can stand up to North Dakota's whipping winds.

The pace of growth over the past decade has been "hyperventilating," slackening only slightly as oil prices have fallen, Sanford said. "You can't catch a breath."

With oil prices hovering near $100 a barrel for most of the last four years, ambitious plans were laid out to transform the city from a chaotic, sprawling crash pad for transient workers into a larger, more livable community. Sanford and other local leaders drafted a long wish list -- more housing, more schools, better roads, a new water treatment plant and expanded law enforcement.

Developers eager to cash in started construction of thousands of apartments and single-family homes. A new high school and civic center began to take shape. A new bypass was built to the south of town to ease traffic jams.

Then oil prices began to drop, falling to roughly $50 a barrel now.

Daniel Kuo, vice president of a Chinese-backed real estate company that's building a 2,000-unit housing complex on the outskirts of Watford, keeps a close eye on oil prices. He's met with McKenzie County economic-development agents to soothe any worries that the company might pull back.

"You're in too deep to let a price blip derail you," Kuo concluded at the end of one meeting. He shared the optimism expressed by Sanford and many others in Watford that oil prices will rebound.

Leaders in the North Dakota Legislature have pledged to keep public-works improvements as a priority. Whether that's sustainable depends on how long oil prices stay down. Oil and gas revenue forecasts for the state already have dropped $4 billion, reducing earlier projections by roughly half.

Watford and McKenzie County have joined other western North Dakota counties in seeking help from the state. Politicians and business leaders from the region flocked to the Capitol in Bismarck to press the Legislature for a larger stake of what's left of the oil revenues.

Towns like Watford are worried about getting saddled with all the downsides of the boom -- dangerously crowded roads, overtaxed utilities, jam-packed schools and unchecked growth -- without the financial means to impose order.

"At this point, it's like downtown Seattle," said Aaron Pelton, who owns Outlaws' Bar and Grill along Watford's main thoroughfare. "If you can't come to a small community and have a quality of life, what do you have?"

Like many oil towns, Watford has endured the boom-bust cycle before. Oil was first found in McKenzie County in 1952.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Within a decade, hundreds of workers had moved on.

Another boom kicked off in 1976, with up to 100 wells a year being drilled until prices started plummeting four years later.

In the last decade, the industry refined the hydraulic fracturing, or fracking, technology that allows drillers to pull oil out of rocky shale. The fracking rush has seen more than 11,000 wells drilled, and analysts predict a total of 50,000 to 60,000 before all the oil is gone.

Industry observers expect the wells already in place to sustain last year's production level of 1.1 million barrels a day at least through 2015.

Still, the sudden drop in prices caught most observers off guard and shook confidence in the boom.

"If I could tell everybody that we'd have $70 oil in 2016, we could breathe easier," said Gene Veeder, director of the McKenzie County Job Development Authority.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The battle over the Minimum Wage Albany debate coming on Cuomo's push to raise state level to $10.50 (Newsday)

By Laura Figueroa And Aisha Al-Muslim
February 8, 2015
Newsday

Low-wage workers praise Gov. Andrew M. Cuomo's proposal to increase the state minimum wage to $10.50, labor activists criticize it for not going far enough and business owners say it will force them to cut hours and employees.

Cuomo said last month that he wants to raise the state minimum wage to $10.50, and $11.50 in New York City, by the end of 2016. If the State Legislature approves the measure, New York State would have the highest minimum wage in the nation.

The measure is likely to come up for debate before a vote on Cuomo's 2015-16 budget. Although the wage hike is likely to pass in the Democrat-controlled Assembly, its fate is unclear in the Republican-dominated Senate.

State lawmakers approved Cuomo's first bid to increase the minimum wage in 2013, boosting it from $7.25 to $8 at the end of the year and $8.75 last year. An increase to $9 will occur Dec. 31.

In unveiling his wage proposal, Cuomo said the recent hikes weren't keeping up with the rising cost of living.

"The wage gap has increased," said the governor, who argued that the economy "is strong" enough to handle higher wages.

Cuomo's push comes as President Barack Obama continues to call on Congress to pass a stalled measure that would raise the federal minimum wage from $7.25 per hour to $10.10 by the end of the year. The likelihood of federal legislation passing this year remains uncertain because Republicans, who generally have opposed an increase, control the Congress and say an increase will stunt job growth.

Cuomo's proposal also followed a recent recommendation by the state Wage Board that acting State Labor Commissioner Mario J. Musolino, a Cuomo appointee, raise the wage tipped workers receive from $5 an hour to $7.50.

Labor Department spokesman Chris White said the Wage Board will submit a report to Musolino, "who will act on the final report as quickly as possible."

Public support, unsure fate

Kenneth Sherrill, professor emeritus of political science at Hunter College in Manhattan, said a state minimum wage increase likely will pass the Assembly. The resignation of Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver (D-Manhattan), a longtime backer of a minimum wage hike who in 2012 put forward his own increase proposal before withdrawing it after budget negotiations, is not expected to affect the outcome, Sherrill said.

"If there is a battle it will be by some Republicans in the Senate," Sherrill said.

Although some Republican senators "might make speeches supportive of business ... [interests], when push comes to shove, they do not want to be on record voting against a minimum-wage increase," Sherrill said. "Raising the minimum wage is so popular I don't think any Republican senator in a competitive district ... is going to want to defend themselves against voting against the minimum wage."

A March 2014 poll by the Siena Research Institute found 77 percent of New Yorkers favored increasing the federal minimum wage to $10.10, with 22 percent opposed.

Michael Whyland, spokesman for the Assembly's Democratic majority, said the caucus would continue to push for the minimum-wage increase.

"No one who works full time should live in poverty, and the members of the conference will continue the fight for a higher minimum wage," Whyland said.

'It's a trade-off'

Scott Reif, spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Dean Skelos (R-Rockville Centre), did not return emails and calls.

In November, Skelos told reporters, "We're not doing minimum wage," when asked which items from Cuomo's agenda the Senate would discuss this legislative session.

"The legislation that we passed a couple of years ago - the minimum wage is being increased in stages," Skelos said. "So it's not like there hasn't been a minimum-wage increase. That's happening now." He added that he is "always willing to discuss things."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

John Rizzo, economist for the Long Island Association, the region's largest business group, said a minimum-wage increase would boost consumer spending - but would raise the expenses of employers, who may cut employees or reduce hours.

"It's a trade-off," Rizzo said.

Rob Basso, president of Advantage Payroll Services in Freeport, said an increase would hurt small- and midsize-business owners.

"Just because it is popular doesn't mean it is the right thing to do," said Basso, who does payroll for about 3,000 small and midsize companies, most of them on Long Island. "Minimum wage is supposed to be a starting wage. It wasn't supposed to be living wage. The only effect is raising prices. If labor costs go up, the cost of labor and services go up, or you make less profit."

Henry Stampfel, recording secretary of the Nassau Council of Chambers of Commerce, said, "The reality is that any increase is just putting more pressure on small Main Street businesses who have been bearing the burden of a sluggish economy with the added competition of online entertainment and retail sales." Stampfel owns two independent movie theaters, Malverne Cinema and Art Center and Bellmore Movies and the Showplace.

Stampfel said Cuomo's proposal could boost his payroll by $5,000. He employs 30 people, most of them part-timers. This month, he boosted adult admission from $9.50 to $10 to cover the state minimum wage increase to $8.75.

"I don't mind a payroll increase if other people don't mind paying for it, but in reality we can't always pass these increases along to our customers as many are retired and on limited incomes," Stampfel said.

Calls for further increases

If business owners such as Stampfel think the Cuomo proposal goes too far, unions and labor activists argue the minimum wage increase does not go far enough.

The Working Families Party, which endorsed Cuomo for re-election last year, has been pushing for an increase to $15. New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio has said the city should be allowed to set its own wage indexed to inflation.

"The truth is it's nearly impossible to raise a family in this state on even $12 or $13 an hour," said state Working Families Party director Bill Lipton.

Concepcion Saenz, 44, a car wash worker who lives in Brentwood, is among those advocating a statewide minimum wage increase, and a hike for tipped service workers.

Saenz, a member of the community activist group Make the Road New York, said he is paid $500 to $800 a week working five days at a car wash and detailing cars on his days off, though a back injury has kept him from working recently.

He said he would often work 60 to 70 hours a week to afford his $500 rent, and to be able to send money to his daughters in El Salvador.

"All we're asking for is a wage that is just and allows us to survive," Saenz said.

MINIMUM WAGE HIKE PLAN

Gov. Andrew M. Cuomo is seeking to increase New York's minimum wage, his second effort since 2013. A plan passed that year boosted the minimum wage to the current $8.75 an hour, and an increase to $9 will occur at the end of the year. Cuomo's move comes as President Barack Obama also is seeking a hike in the federal wage.

Cuomo's proposal: Statewide, the minimum wage would rise to $10.50 by the end of 2016. New York City would have the authority to boost it to $11.50.

Current federal minimum wage: $7.25.

White House plan:

Passage this year of a bill to boost it to $10.10.

Sources: Office of the governor; WhiteHouse.gov

NEW YORK'S MINIMUM WAGE

1962 $1.15

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

1964 $1.25

1967 $1.50

1968 $1.60

1970 $1.85

1974 $2.00

1975 $2.10

1976 $2.30

1978 $2.65

1979 $2.90

1980 $3.10

1981 $3.35

1990 $3.80

1991 $4.25

2000 $5.15

2005 $6.00

2006 $6.75

2007 $7.15

2009 $7.25

2013 $8.00

2014 $8.75

2015 $9.00

2016 $10.50*

NYC $11.50*

*PROPOSED

Before 1962, state minimum wage rates varied from industry to industry.

SOURCES: 2015-16 GOVERNOR'S BUDGET PROPOSAL; NEW YORK STATE DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Wolf being pressured to restrict gas drilling (Philadelphia Inquirer)

By Andrew Maykuth
February 8, 2015
The Philadelphia Inquirer

Environmental advocates are applying pressure on the Wolf administration to broaden restrictions on natural gas drilling on Pennsylvania state lands.

Gov. Wolf's Jan. 29 moratorium on new gas leasing, signed on his 10th day in office and hailed by environmentalists, had symbolic importance, but it went only so far.

The ban undid a limited Corbett administration policy that allowed new leasing of lands where no surface disturbance was involved. Corbett's executive order, which was never carried out, affected a relatively small universe of public lands that could be accessed from neighboring tracts where drilling is already permitted.

Much of Pennsylvania's finest recreational areas in the Marcellus Shale region remain available to natural gas development. About 1.5 million of the state's 2.2 million acres of state forests lie over the gas-rich shale. The mineral rights underlying nearly 700,000 acres are controlled by gas interests and are unaffected by the governor's leasing ban, which was erroneously reported in some media as a drilling ban.

State Rep. Greg Vitali of Delaware County, the ranking Democrat on the House Environmental Resources and Energy Committee, said he was exploring ways to restrict drilling on state lands already under lease.

Wolf's options are limited because the legislature remains firmly in Republican control. "Anything that requires passing a bill is going to be a problem," Vitali said.

One of the new administration's more pressing issues will be drilling on state parklands. The state does not own the mineral rights on about 80 percent of the state's parks in the shale region. No drilling companies have yet dared to access natural gas in the parks; such an act would likely trigger a backlash.

Wolf appears to be sympathetic to calls to restrict drilling on public lands. As a candidate, he declared his opposition to drilling in state parks, though legally there may not be much the state can do to overrule a drilling company's private property rights.

Wolf told the nonprofit Allegheny Front radio program in Western Pennsylvania last year that he would explore using gas revenue to buy the mineral rights underlying Ohiopyle State Park, a 19,000-acre park in Fayette County considered the most vulnerable to drilling.

Wolf also said he would support a special impact fee for drilling on state parkland and strengthening the guidelines for administering oil and gas activities on lands controlled by the Department of Conservation and Natural Resources (DCNR).

Until his new administration settles into place, Wolf's strategy is likely to lack specifics. His new cabinet includes an all-star cast of environmentalists who are expected to endorse a harder line with the gas industry.

John Hanger, whose appointment as secretary of planning does not require Senate approval, was environmental secretary in Gov. Ed Rendell's administration. John Quigley, Wolf's choice as secretary of the Department of Environmental Protection, is Rendell's former conservation secretary and a vocal opponent of Corbett's drilling policies on public lands.

Quigley's appointment, along with Cindy Adams Dunn's as conservation secretary, will attract Senate scrutiny. Dunn served as president of the environmental advocacy group PennFuture before Wolf tabbed her at the DCNR.

For advocates like Vitali, the Wolf administration holds promise. "It's nice having access to the administration again," Vitali said. "With people like Hanger, Quigley, and Dunn, it's almost like having friends in there."

One of the thorniest issues the Wolf administration will face is managing gas development on state lands where it does not own the mineral rights. Under common law, the owners of the underground gas are allowed access to the land's surface in order to extract their minerals.

Of the nearly 700,000 acres of state forests leased for drilling, about 290,000 acres are privately owned. The state does not receive rents and royalties from these acres.

Those lands include the 25,000 acres known as the Clarence Moore Lands in Loyalsock State Forest in Lycoming County near Williamsport, which environmental advocates say presents the state with its best opportunity to restrict drilling.

The gas producers Anadarko Petroleum Corp. and Southwestern Energy Co. own or lease the mineral rights on the Clarence

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Moore Lands, so named for a previous owner. The lands include some of the region's most treasured recreational attractions: the entire Old Logger's Path, part of Rock Run waterway, Pleasant Stream Valley, Sharp Top Vista, and the ghost town of Masten.

Commonwealth Court in 1989 found that, because of an unusual deed restriction, the right of the subsurface owner to enter upon the surface expired in 1983 on about 19,000 acres. Some legal experts say the ruling is open to challenge.

The Corbett administration's position has been to negotiate access to the surface with the gas companies in exchange for controls over a broader expanse of land over which it legally would have little or no say.

Mark Szybist, a PennFuture lawyer, said the Wolf administration could more aggressively assert the state's rights to block surface access.

"We think that with the new administration, the time is ripe for the DCNR to revisit its position on its property rights," he said.

Candidate Wolf last year told Allegheny Front that he favored no drilling. "I will support the commonwealth's right to block drilling on those tracts of the Clarence Moore lands in which the courts have ruled that the state has exclusive surface control," he said.

The new governor is slightly more circumspect. "Gov. Wolf will explore his legal options to prevent drilling on these tracts of land," said his spokesman, Jeffrey Sheridan.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Vaccine opt-outs put state at risk (San Francisco Chronicle)

By Erin Allday
February 8, 2015
The San Francisco Chronicle

In a state with some of the most lenient childhood immunization laws in the country, thousands of California children enter kindergarten every year with incomplete vaccination records, and it's easy for parents to opt out of vaccinating their kids.

California's immunization rates are lower than the national average for almost all vaccine-preventable diseases, including measles, which is still spreading widely in the largest outbreak in the state in more than a decade. More than 100 cases have been reported so far this year, 14 of them in the Bay Area and most tied to an outbreak that started at two Disney theme parks in Southern California.

Low immunization rates, public health and infectious disease experts say, leave the state exceptionally vulnerable to outbreaks, not just of measles but potentially other diseases like mumps, rubella and whooping cough.

As the case count climbs for measles this year, that vulnerability has sparked furious public debate over how best to persuade parents to vaccinate their children, and it has inspired new pleas to tighten California's lax immunization laws. Last week, two state senators said they would introduce legislation to ban "personal belief exemptions" that allow parents to choose not to vaccinate their children.

"The Supreme Court ruled over 100 years ago that if you're going to require immunization, you must allow exemptions," said Dr. Art Reingold, head of epidemiology at the UC Berkeley School of Public Health. "But there's enormous variability among the states in terms of what's allowed. The easier you make it to not vaccinate, the higher the proportion of unvaccinated kids, and the higher the likelihood of clusters of disease. There's clearly a link."

Easy exemptions

To public health experts, California's vaccination regulations are notoriously forgiving. It's one of 20 states allowing personal belief exemptions. Another 28 states allow religious exemptions, and all states allow medical exemptions for kids with compromised immune systems or who have identifiable problems with vaccines.

Only two states — Mississippi and West Virginia — allow no exemptions beyond those for medical reasons. Those states also have exceptionally high vaccination rates — for measles, 99 percent of Mississippi kindergarteners are fully immunized, as are 96 percent of West Virginia kindergartners — and neither state has had a case of measles in more than 20 years.

Meanwhile in California, reports of measles are on the rise after the number of annual cases dropped to record lows between 2000 and 2010. Last year there were 61 measles cases in California — the highest since the disease was declared eliminated in the United States in 2000. The state beat that number in the first month of this year.

"On scale of 1 to 10, California is 8.9, 10 being most lenient," said Y. Tony Yang, a health policy professor at George Mason University in Fairfax, Va. "It's one of the most lenient states. And California has more outbreaks."

More telling than statewide vaccination averages are the immunization rates in pockets all around the state. Marin County has among the lowest kindergarten immunization rates and the highest rate of parents choosing personal belief exemptions in the state. Only 84 percent of Marin County students entering kindergarten are fully vaccinated, and 6.5 percent of children have a personal belief exemption.

Personal belief exemptions are intended for parents who have either a philosophical or religious objection to vaccinations.

Public criticism

Those parents have come under attack in recent weeks for their choice not to vaccinate. They've been shamed on national television and social media platforms and criticized by other mothers and fathers who accuse them of being selfish and uninformed.

It's critical, public health experts say, that as many people as possible get vaccinated to maintain herd immunity and prevent diseases like measles from spreading and infecting those who can't be immunized.

The current measles outbreak — along with large outbreaks in California and a handful of other states last year — underscores the need to tighten the state's immunization rules, said state Sen. Richard Pan, D-Sacramento, an author of the proposal to do away with personal belief exemptions.

"We've been having ever larger outbreaks of vaccine-preventable diseases," Pan said. "People are realizing that this is something that can affect them. It's not just a fringe group of parents that have beliefs that don't impact me and my family."

The first mandatory vaccines in the United States were for smallpox. Routine smallpox vaccination stopped in the early 1970s, after the disease was eradicated in most parts of the world. Now, children are required to get five vaccines before entering kindergarten.

California has allowed personal belief exemptions since 1961. They were rarely used then, because very few families wanted to miss what were celebrated as life-saving preventive medicines.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Personal belief exemptions remained low in California — below 1 percent — for 40 years. But in 1998, a now-discredited study was published in the United Kingdom suggesting a link between the measles vaccine and autism in children. Over the next decade exemption rates spiked, to a high of more than 3 percent statewide. Pockets of under-vaccinated children popped up in communities around the state like Marin County.

Even after years of research showing the autism link was unfounded, and after the 1998 paper was declared fraudulent and retracted by the journal that published it, the damage lingers. Many vaccine-hesitant parents say they don't necessarily believe immunizations cause autism, but they don't trust the shots anyway.

"People want to protect their children and do what's right," said Dr. George Rutherford, director of UCSF's Institute for Global Health. "But we need high levels of vaccination in order to prevent transmission. Or else we could just go back to the 19th century and put up with these diseases again."

Two years ago, Marin County public health officials surveyed 493 local parents about their attitudes toward vaccination. Among those who chose not to vaccinate, most cited concerns about their children getting too many shots over too short a period of time as their primary worry, followed by their doubts about the safety of newer vaccines. On average, the vaccine-hesitant parents said they were "not sure" whether vaccines can cause autism.

Dr. Matt Willis, the Marin County public health officer, said the survey serves as a primer for pediatricians and other health care providers to talk to parents who are reluctant to vaccinate. As long as vaccination remains a choice, "we have no choice but to engage in respectful conversation" with parents who don't want to vaccinate, he said.

"Every parent is obviously acting in what they think is their child's best interest," Willis said. "These are good people who want their children to thrive. And they are operating on misinformation."

The Marin County survey came at a good time. Last year, a state law took effect that requires parents to meet with a health care provider and discuss the benefits and risks of vaccination before getting a personal belief exemption.

In the year after the new law, personal belief exemptions dropped 1 percentage point in Marin County, and immunization rates improved for all five vaccines required for kindergarten entry. Similar improvements in vaccination levels were seen throughout the state.

But personal belief exemptions aren't the only reason many children start school under-vaccinated. Roughly 35,000 California children — or about 6.5 percent of all new students — enter kindergarten on a conditional basis, which means their parents intend to immunize them but they've missed at least one shot.

It's tough to say how at risk these children are. Some may be missing a final dose of the measles vaccine, for example, which would mean they're about 95 percent protected from measles instead of 99 percent. Others may be missing multiple vaccines.

The reasons these children aren't fully vaccinated are varied, but state regulations say the kids must be tracked to ensure they end up fully immunized. Counties and school districts say that doesn't always happen. With limited resources — including a severe shortage of school nurses, who often are charged with following up with under-vaccinated students — children may never be fully immunized and no one at the school would know it.

Typically, schools send letters to the parents of conditional students giving them a deadline to get their children vaccinated or else risk the kids' being excluded from class, said Larry Alegre, principal at Sanchez Elementary in San Francisco. Districtwide, nurses and other health workers follow up with families struggling to meet immunization requirements, said school district spokeswoman Gentle Blythe.

In Alameda County, the conditional entry students are of at least as much concern as students who enter with personal belief exemptions, said Dr. Erica Pan, director of communicable disease in the Alameda County Public Health Department. The county is trying to develop policy to better follow up with the conditional students, Pan said.

To improve statewide immunization rates, doctors and public health officials need to reach both groups of under-vaccinated children — those whose parents choose not to vaccinate and those who need help getting all the required shots.

"We clearly need to make sure there are no financial barriers and that it's as easy as possible to get vaccinated," said Reingold at UC Berkeley. "But I don't think that's sufficient to deal with the problem we have at the moment. The issue of how we get parents to understand issues of safety and the need for vaccines — it's a very difficult problem. I don't have the answer."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Study shows likelihood of being shot in Chicago (Chicago Sun-Times)

By Frank Main
February 8, 2015
Chicago Sun-Times

If you and another person get arrested together in Chicago, you're both part of a loose network of people with a high risk of getting shot in the future, Yale University researchers say in a newly published study.

Only 6 percent of the people in Chicago between 2006 and 2012 were listed on arrest reports as co-offenders in crimes, the study says. But those people became the victims of 70 percent of the nonfatal shootings in the city over the same period.

The study, called “Tragic, but not random: The social contagion of nonfatal gunshot injuries,” was published in the January 2015 issue of Social Science & Medicine. It shows the risk of becoming a gunshot victim in Chicago is “more concentrated than previously thought,” according to Andrew Papachristos, one of the authors.

More than ever, the Chicago Police Department is borrowing ideas from academics like Papachristos to fashion anti-violence strategies. For instance, the department used his social network theories to generate its own list of at-risk people.

Police Supt. Garry McCarthy believes that list is helping his beat officers concentrate on those people most likely to become shooting victims — or to shoot someone else.

According to the department, many became gun victims anyway: Since it was created in 2013, dozens of people on the list have been shot. But what can't be measured is the violence the list might have prevented, department officials say. They say the list is part of the reason murders and nonfatal shootings were down in 2014 compared to 2012, the year before the list was created.

Papachristos — an associate professor of sociology at Yale and a former Chicagoan with an expertise in gangs — said his study found that exposure to gunshot victims also increases one's odds of becoming a shooting victim.

And as was previously known, race was a key risk factor in getting shot, the study noted. For every 100,000 people, an average of one white person, 28 Hispanics and 113 blacks became victims of nonfatal shootings every year in Chicago over the six-year study period.

But Papachristos and his team sought to go beyond a racial explanation for nonfatal shootings. They were trying to explain why a specific young African-American male in a high-crime neighborhood becomes a shooting victim, while another young black man in the same neighborhood doesn't, the study said.

Such social network analysis allows the manpower-strapped Chicago Police Department to “discern who's at risk rather than casting the net really wide,” he said.

The latest Yale University study was built on Papachristos' previous social network research into murders on the West Side. He had studied killings between 2005 and 2010 in West Garfield Park and North Lawndale. About 70 percent of the killings occurred in what Papachristos found was a social network of only about 1,600 people — out of a population of about 80,000 in those neighborhoods. Inside that social network, the risk of being killed was 30 out of 1,000. For the others in those neighborhoods, the risk of getting murdered was less than one in 1,000.

The Chicago Police Department is employing social network strategy in several ways.

Since 2010, Chicago Police officials, prosecutors and community leaders have organized meetings with members of opposing gang factions after murders are committed in their neighborhoods. Many of those gang members called to the meetings are on parole or probation and are required to show up. According to the police department's guidelines for such “call-ins”: “The general message conveyed is, ‘We will help you if you will let us, but we will stop you if you make us.' There will be a clear message that the group will be dismantled if they do not comply.”

Papachristos said he's getting ready to release a study on the effectiveness of call-ins in Chicago. He would not provide details, but said: “We are seeing a reduction in shootings that these groups [gang factions] are involved in. It seems to be working.”

In March 2013, meanwhile, the department devised its so-called “two degrees of separation” list modeled on Papachristos' work. The department started with people who were killed between 2010 and 2012. People who were once arrested with those victims were placed on the list, along with people who were once arrested with those associates of the victims. About 100,000 people were on the original citywide list.

Then the department whittled the list to several hundred people at the highest risk of being killed. They included 73 people in the Grand Crossing District and 30 people in the South Chicago District. Every other district had no more than 20 people on the list.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Since March 2013, 40 of the 504 people on the list have been shot, three fatally. Another person was murdered in an incident that didn't involve a gun, according to the department.

Beat officers have been urged to pay special attention to people on the list because they pose the greatest danger to the public and themselves, said Robert Tracy, chief of crime control strategy for the department. Whenever officers nab someone on the list, they are required to note “two degrees of separation” on the arrest report, he said.

District commanders have even met personally with some on the list to give them “custom notifications” that they're being watched and will get arrested if they step out of line. They're also offered social services to get out of a life of crime.

“This is tough love,” Tracy said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Whodunit? In Obsessed Nation, Question Becomes Who Didn't (NYT)

By Simon Romero
February 8, 2015
The New York Times

BUENOS AIRES -- The president did it. No, it was the Argentine spymaster plotting against her. Maybe it really was a suicide, the tragic fall of a man whose case was coming undone. Or was it Iran, the Israeli Mossad, the C.I.A.? And what about the lingering influence of the Nazis who fled here after World War II?

Ever since the fatal shooting of Alberto Nisman, the prosecutor who accused President Cristina Fernández de Kirchner of conspiring with Iran to cover up responsibility for the bombing of a Jewish community center, this country has been awash in theories about who pulled the trigger, and why.

Whether in hushed conversations in cafes, at corner news stalls, or at a lonely beach town hot-dog stand, much of Argentina seems to have an idea about how Mr. Nisman ended up on his apartment floor with a gunshot wound to the head -- the night before he was scheduled to testify about his accusations to lawmakers.

"It has to either be the armed faction of narco-Nazi-jihadist international terrorism, or it has to be the Jewish-Marxism mafia that also involves the C.I.A., Israel and the Mossad," said Carlos Wiesemann, 65, a hot-dog vendor in the town of Pinamar, weighing his list of suspected forces while drinking whiskey with a friend.

Indeed, the obsession with Mr. Nisman's death -- and the expansiveness of the theories to explain it -- has grown so intense that some Argentines are poring over the case in one of the country's most intimate sanctuaries: the psychotherapist's office.

"All my clients are talking about the case," said María del Carmen Torretta, 67, a psychoanalyst who treats about 15 clients a week in Villa Ballester, a suburb of Buenos Aires. "People are tired and scared," she said. "It's a red-hot issue."

Pollsters have even surveyed Argentines to see who they think is responsible. One recent poll by Rouvier showed that about 48 percent of people in 800 telephone interviews across Argentina thought that Mrs. Kirchner's government was behind the prosecutor's death. Nearly 20 percent said the opposite -- that he was a victim of a conspiracy against the government -- while 33 percent acknowledged that they just did not know. The survey's margin of sampling error was plus or minus three percentage points.

The loss of Mr. Nisman is the latest installment in a Latin American tradition: landmark political deaths that spur an array of clashing theories, often for decades.

"Many people are in anguish over Nisman's death and they're grasping for ways to explain it," said Diego Sehinkman, a psychologist and author here. "If Argentina were a patient, it would appear to have a disorder involving repetition compulsion over traumatic unsolved deaths."

Much like the Kennedy assassination in the United States, suspicious deaths have become staples of political debate in the region, sometimes pushing the courts and the authorities to go to great lengths to resolve them.

In recent years, the body of President Salvador Allende of Chile was exhumed to determine whether he took his own life or was shot dead as troops stormed the presidential palace in an American-supported coup on Sept. 11, 1973.

The remains of Pablo Neruda, the Nobel Prize-winning Chilean poet, were recently exhumed to figure out whether he died of cancer or foul play shortly after the coup in 1973. Investigators recently disinterred João Goulart, a Brazilian president deposed in a 1964 coup supported by the C.I.A. to see if he was poisoned by spies while in exile in Argentina.

And in a particularly dramatic event, President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela had the sarcophagus of Simón Bolívar, the 19th-century aristocrat who freed much of South America from Spain, opened on national television to determine whether he died of arsenic poisoning instead of tuberculosis in 1830, as historians had long accepted.

In each of these cases, investigators failed to find evidence of foul play in the deaths.

Here in Argentina, many people said that Mr. Nisman's death reminded them of another mysterious episode in the country's history: the 1995 death of the son of Carlos Menem, Argentina's president at the time.

After Carlos Menem Jr. died in a helicopter crash, his mother claimed that her son had been killed, prompting yet another exhumation. Mr. Menem, now 84 and a senator, officially contended as well last year that his son had been murdered.

Mrs. Kirchner made it clear in January that she believed Mr. Nisman, the prosecutor, had been killed, pointing to three previous episodes, two from 1998 and one from 2003, in which "cases of suicide were never cleared up." Mrs. Kirchner and her inner circle have rejected Mr. Nisman's accusations of wrongdoing and cast suspicion in his death on a range of figures, including the assistant who lent Mr. Nisman the gun and the ousted spymaster who worked with Mr. Nisman to compile the allegations against the president.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Though neither Mrs. Kirchner nor her government has accused anyone of murder directly, she has described Mr. Nisman's death as part of a plot to smear her, saying, "They used him while he was alive and then they needed him dead."

But given that Mr. Nisman's 289-page criminal complaint accused Mrs. Kirchner of trying to reach a secret deal with Iran to derail his investigation into the 1994 bombing of the Jewish cultural center, which killed 85 people, many Argentines argue that her government is the logical place to look for suspects.

"This is a country where mafias can artfully make a murder look like a suicide," said Ana Rosa Di Serio, 65, a newsstand operator who said she believed that government officials supporting Mrs. Kirchner had Mr. Nisman killed, though without the president's knowledge.

Others reject that theory, siding with the government.

"It doesn't suit the government to have a death in an election year," said Claudia Rúmolo, 55, the owner of Mordisquito, a bar lined with bookcases in downtown Buenos Aires, referring to the presidential election later this year. "A rogue branch of the Intelligence Secretariat did it, responding to opposition sectors nationally or abroad."

Confused yet? The theories get far more complex.

While investigators have still not ruled whether Mr. Nisman was killed or took his own life, few of the theories heard on the streets accept suicide as an explanation.

One claim involves a local assassin targeting the prosecutor with the help of Venezuelan spies. Some bloggers have cast suspicion on what they describe as the Chinese mafia. A rabbi here put forward a complex interpretation of the Torah, pointing to a codified reference to the surname "Nisman" to deduce that the prosecutor was pressured by others into killing himself.

"I don't know who did it, but I'm sure we will never find out," said Marcus Macias, 29, an attendant selling snacks and soft drinks at a kiosk while watching a zombie movie on a flat-screen television under the glow of neon lights.

"These things happen everywhere," he said. "The Nisman case is just like Kennedy."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A month after deadly siege, French Jews plan exodus (WAPO)

By Griff Witte
February 8, 2015
The Washington Post

SAINT-MANDE, France - For all her 30 years, Jennifer Sebag has lived in a community that embodies everything modern Europe is supposed to be.

Inclusive, integrated, peaceful and prosperous, the elegant city of Saint-Mandé - hard against Paris's eastern fringe - has been a haven for Jews like Sebag whose parents and grandparents were driven from their native North Africa decades ago by anti-Semitism.

"I've always told everyone that here, we are very protected. It's like a small village," Sebag said.

But in an instant on the afternoon of Jan. 9, Sebag's refuge became a target. A gunman who would later say he was acting on behalf of the Islamic State walked into her neighborhood's kosher market and opened fire, launching a siege that would leave four hostages dead - all of them Jewish.

A month later, the Jews of Saint-Mandé are planning for a possible exodus from what had once appeared to be the promised land.

In homes, in shops and in synagogues guarded night and day by soldiers wielding assault rifles, conversations are dominated by an agonizing choice: stay in France and risk becoming the victim of the next attack by Islamic extremists, or leave behind a country and a community that Jews say they are proud to call home.

The French government has scrambled to persuade them not to go, aware that if Jews see little future for themselves in Saint-Mandé - where Muslims, Christians and Jews have long lived in harmony - then there's no chance for the European ideal of interfaith coexistence.

And yet, for a rapidly rising number of Jews, here in Saint-Mandé and across France, the decision has already become clear.

"The question is not will they leave or won't they leave," said Alain Assouline, a prominent Saint-Mandé doctor and president of a Jewish community center. "The question has become when they will leave."

For Sebag, her husband and their three young sons, the answer is within months. After pondering a move for economic reasons, the attack on a market where they regularly shop erased all doubts.

They will travel this summer from the only home they have ever known to Israel, where they have no close friends or relatives, where they don't speak the language, and where war flares all too regularly. There they will start anew, much as Sebag's grandparents did decades ago.

"They came here from Morocco and Tunisia because France was a wonderful country," said Sebag, a cheery real estate agent who lives with her family in an airy, prewar apartment overlooking one of Saint-Mandé's chic shopping districts. "They made all sorts of sacrifices, and we've had a really nice life here - until today."

The attack on the kosher market was the last in a three-day series of radical Islamist assaults that traumatized the nation. By the end, 17 victims lay dead, including much of the staff at the satirical newspaper Charlie Hebdo.

But of all the communities affected, France's half-million Jews have perhaps felt the consequences most acutely.

French Jews were already on edge by the time Amedy Coulibaly, a 32-year-old small-time criminal and son of Malian immigrants, took hostages at the Hyper Cacher grocery on the border of Paris and Saint-Mandé.

Anti-Semitism had been rising in France, as it had across Europe. In Britain last year, for instance, there were more than 1,100 anti-Semitic incidents recorded, double the number from 2013, according to data released Thursday by the Jewish nonprofit Community Security Trust.

But the fears of rising violence have been especially pronounced in France after a 2012 attack at a Jewish school in Toulouse that left a teacher and three students dead.

The Jewish Agency, which encourages immigration to Israel, says the number of French Jews leaving for Israel each year had been steady at about 2,000 until 2013, when it hit 3,400. Last year, it jumped to more than 7,000 - making France the leading contributor of immigrants to Israel and marking the first time that more than 1 percent of a Western nation's Jewish population has left for Israel in a single year, according to Avi Mayer, a spokesman for the Jewish Agency.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Since the Hyper Cacher attack, calls to the Jewish Agency's Paris office have more than tripled, Mayer said, and the agency is predicting that 15,000 French Jews will move to Israel in 2015.

Many others will choose to leave for the United States, Britain, Canada, Australia and beyond.

At the kosher butcher's shop two doors down from the still-shuttered Hyper Cacher one recent day, the talk focused on whether to go, and where.

"My husband's ready, but not me," a young woman picking up a chicken told the butcher. "I was in Tel Aviv in July, and I watched rockets fly into the sea. I wouldn't feel safe there, either."

The butcher, a 20-year-old named Aaron Sultan, said he and his fiancee are deciding where to start their life together and are leaning toward Israel.

"My parents left Tunisia during the Yom Kippur War [in 1973]. My mom tells the story that they fled for France when the Arabs were at their door, ready to kill them," said Sultan, who wears a black kippah, or prayer cap, atop his close-cropped dark-brown hair.

Now he is preparing to flee France, but his parents are reluctant. "I've asked my mom, 'Do we wait for the same thing here? Until the Arabs are at our door, ready to kill us?' " said Sultan, who spent the afternoon of the attack hiding on the shop floor as the crack of bullets pierced the air a few yards away. "It's hard to leave, but when we don't feel safe, we have no choice."

The government has tried to reassure the country's Jews by dispatching more than 10,000 camouflage-clad troops to guard "sensitive sites," including synagogues and Jewish schools and community centers. Three soldiers guarding one such center were attacked Tuesday by a knife-wielding assailant in the southern city of Nice.

Far from comforting, the troops' presence has become for many Jews a symbol of their vulnerability.

"It's more stressful than reassuring," said Sebag, who walks past the troops each day as she drops her kids at preschool. Even with all the threats facing Israel, she notes, soldiers are not regularly deployed to defend toddlers.

And yet, Saint-Mandé Mayor Patrick Beaudoin said, the country also needs to defend its Jewish population at all costs. "They belong to this country. France needs them," he said.

A mass exodus from Saint-Mandé could be ruinous for a city where about a third of its 22,000 residents are Jewish and where the faith's roots run deep. The formidable white stone walls of one of the area's main synagogues have been standing for the past century.

The community has changed in recent years, with the original Ashkenazi Jews - those with European origins - supplemented by an influx of Sephardic Jews from North Africa.

Muslims from North Africa have also begun to make the area home, adding to a national Muslim population of about 5 million, though their community in Saint-Mandé is considerably smaller than the Jewish one. By nearly all accounts, the new arrivals have been welcomed to the city, with Jews and Muslims befriending one another and going into business together. Assouline, the doctor and Jewish community center leader, has two partners in his practice: one Catholic, the other Muslim.

Jewish residents of Saint-Mandé say the problem of Islamic extremism doesn't exist here. But as they discovered Jan. 9, it's not far away, either, lurking in the less-salubrious suburbs, where last month's attackers had their roots.

"We can't say that these are jihadists imported from Iraq or Syria," said Marc Krief, rabbi at the Synagogue of Vincennes - Saint-Mandé. "They were French citizens. They grew up in the suburbs. They went to the local mosques. They learned their way of thinking from here."

Krief said he has told his congregants that if they want to leave France for economic or cultural reasons, they should go ahead. But he does not want them fleeing in fear when the scourge of anti-Semitism is global.

"I don't see a country in the world that's safe enough," Krief said. "In Israel, there's war. In the United States, there could be another terrorist attack. It wouldn't change anything to leave."

And yet, given the lessons of Jewish history, the impulse to leave Europe amid increasingly ominous warning signs runs strong.

"Personally, I have faith in our community. I'm an optimist," said Assouline, who intends to stay. "But whenever I say that, there's always someone who reminds me, 'In 1933, there were two types of Jews: the pessimists and the optimists. The pessimists left and went to the U.S. The optimists ended up in the death camps.' "

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Europe Pushes for Diplomatic Solution in Ukraine Amid Calls for Arming Kiev (WSJ)

By Anton Troianovski, Laurence Norman and Julian Barnes
February 8, 2015
The Wall Street Journal

MUNICH—The diplomatic scramble to calm the resurgent Ukraine crisis spilled into the open here on Saturday, as Ukrainian President Petro Poroshenko urged an immediate cease-fire, while German Chancellor Angela Merkel countered calls from some U.S. senators for the West to deliver weapons to Ukraine.

The international push for an agreement that would stop the fighting accelerated after Ms. Merkel and French President François Hollande held emergency talks in Kiev and Moscow in recent days. German and French officials stayed behind in Moscow this weekend to work on the deal after Ms. Merkel and Mr. Hollande departed late-night talks there Friday, a sign that substantive negotiations were continuing, a Western official close to the talks said.

Mr. Poroshenko on Saturday said the success of a first step in a peace plan—a cease-fire initiative—could be known "in very few hours or maybe maximum a few days."

Meanwhile, differences between Western allies over an approach to the crisis were apparent on Saturday. Pressure has been building in the U.S. to send lethal weapons to Ukraine, going beyond the humanitarian and nonlethal aid sent so far.

The German chancellor, who has acted as the West's chief interlocutor with Russian President Vladimir Putin in the crisis, bluntly rejected those calls on Saturday. "The problem is I cannot imagine a situation in which an improved arming of the Ukrainian army leads to President Putin being so impressed that he believes he will lose militarily," Ms. Merkel said at the Munich Security Conference in response to criticism from some U.S. senators. "This cannot be won militarily. That is the bitter truth. The international community must think of something else."

Ms. Merkel and Mr. Hollande have been working to forge a plan acceptable to the rivals that would build on the peace agreements that were reached in Minsk, Belarus, in September. A major sticking point in the talks, the official close to the talks said, was how to balance Russia's demands for more autonomy for rebel-held areas and Western efforts to preserve Ukraine's territorial integrity.

U.S. Vice President Joe Biden said in Munich the Franco-German peace initiative was "very much worth the effort," but he appeared skeptical that Mr. Putin would follow any agreement. In recent days, Mr. Biden has noted repeatedly that Russia has ignored a series of deals seeking to calm the fighting in Ukraine.

"Too many times President Putin has promised peace and delivered tanks, and troops, and weapons," Mr. Biden said. "We will continue to provide Ukraine security assistance. Not to encourage war but to allow Ukraine to defend themselves."

The vice president said the U.S. doesn't believe there is a military solution in Ukraine. "But let me be equally clear: We do not believe Russia has the right to do what they're doing," he added.

Several U.S. Senators criticized Ms. Merkel at the Munich conference for opposing the sending of arms, a move the White House has been considering. Sen. Lindsey Graham (R, S.C.) said the German government was turning its back "on a struggling democracy."

Referring to the German leader, Mr. Graham said he said he hoped she "remembers all the sacrifices that were made by so many over so long a period of time to achieve what we have today in Germany."

While the U.S. senators were adamant about supplying Kiev with arms, it still wasn't clear where the Obama administration stands on the issue. On Saturday, Mr. Biden didn't directly address the question of providing lethal weapons. U.S. officials are divided over whether to provide lethal aid and what arms exactly should be provided.

But Ashton Carter, the veteran Pentagon official nominated by the White House to head up the U.S. Defense Department, on Wednesday told senators he likely would support proposals to give Ukraine lethal arms in its battle with Russia-backed separatists.

Elsewhere, the battle over eastern Ukraine continued on the ground, as five Ukrainian servicemen were killed and 26 wounded in fighting over the past 24 hours, Ukrainian security council spokesman Volodymyr Polyovyi said on Saturday.

The rebels lost 4 killed and 10 wounded over the same period, a military representative of the self-proclaimed Donetsk People's Republic told a local news agency. At least 10 civilians have been killed in the shellings, officials from both sides said.

A local truce was extended Saturday to provide a safe corridor for evacuation of civilians from the heavily-shelled area around a transport hub of Debaltseve, Mr. Polyovyi said in Kiev. The cease-fire, which came into effect Friday, helped to evacuate more than 600 people from the danger zone.

Fighting has intensified in the area in recent weeks, raising concern that Ukraine and Russia could be heading toward a full-scale war.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Large shipments of Russian armor as well as fighters have been crossing into Ukraine to support the rebels, according to Western intelligence assessments. Moscow has repeatedly denied such charges.

On Saturday, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov, speaking after Ms. Merkel in Munich, voiced optimism about the peace talks even while harshly criticizing the U.S. for fomenting the Ukraine conflict. “We believe there is every chance to reach a result and agree on recommendations that will allow all sides to truly resolve this conflict," Mr. Lavrov said.

Mr. Biden met with several European leaders on the sidelines of the conference, including Ms. Merkel and Mr. Poroshenko. He emphasized in those meetings that the U.S. would insist in raising the costs to Russia further if Mr. Putin didn't change his approach to Ukraine, U.S. officials said.

Many senior officials also believe the U.S. taking a more aggressive stand will provide some muscle behind Mr. Hollande and Ms. Merkel's peace efforts.

Ukraine's Mr. Poroshenko later on Saturday tried to play down the debate over arming his country, saying his top priority was securing nonlethal weapons, such as sophisticated radars, to aid the fight.

Ms. Merkel is scheduled to fly to Washington on Sunday for a meeting with President Barack Obama at the White House on Monday, with the Ukraine crisis high on the agenda.

In her speech to the security conference, Ms. Merkel said Russia's actions in Ukraine were in stark contradiction to its international obligations. But she also emphasized the possibility of compromise, noting diplomacy with Russia over the Iran nuclear talks and the removal of chemical weapons from Syria show that cooperation with Moscow on important international challenges was possible.

Ms. Merkel's spokesman described the German leader's talks with Mr. Putin in Moscow on Friday as constructive and substantial, saying the countries involved were working on what he called a new joint document on how to implement a Ukraine peace deal that was reached in Minsk, Belarus , in September.

The Minsk agreements, cosigned by Russia, called for a cease-fire, the withdrawal of foreign troops, the return of Ukrainian government control over its side of the Russia-Ukraine border and steps leading to greater autonomy for the separatist regions. The agreements didn't hold.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Shiite Militia Drives Back Islamic State, but Divides Much of Iraq (NYT)

By Kareem Fahim
February 8, 2015
The New York Times

CAMP ASHRAF, Iraq -- At their victory rally, the Shiite militiamen used poetry, song and swagger to sweeten their celebration of an ugly battle.

More than a hundred fighters from the militia, the Badr Organization, had been killed in the farms and villages of Diyala Province in recent fighting against the Sunni extremists of the Islamic State. During the battle, thousands of residents had been forced from their homes -- including Sunni families who accused Shiite paramilitary groups like Badr of forced displacement and summary executions.

But the militias had pushed the Islamic State back from key areas in a crucial battle. So on Monday, the Badr Organization convened in a mosque at Camp Ashraf, its base in Diyala, to celebrate its "liberation" of the province -- and to serve notice that it was the vanguard force battling the Islamic State, also known as ISIS or ISIL.

Speaking at the rally, to an audience that included giddy fighters barely past their teens, the head of the Badr Organization, Hadi al-Ameri, boasted of the towns his men and allied militias had set free. "These were big operations that others must learn lessons from," he said.

But even as Mr. Ameri was fishing for broad support and recognition, his group stands among the most divisive in Iraq, accused of atrocities against Sunnis and known for its close ties to Iran. The new government of Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi, which has promised to rule inclusively, has been under pressure to distance itself from retaliatory attacks against Sunnis by both Shiite and Kurdish militiamen.

At the same time, Mr. Ameri's boast rings true: His militia has been among the most effective fighting forces against the Islamic State, gaining ground even as the Iraqi Army has faltered in many places despite support from American airstrikes and trainers.

Now, the Badr Organization's leaders have asserted that their fighters and other allied militias -- organized under the banner of "popular mobilization" forces -- are ready to advance to neighboring provinces and other Iraqi cities menaced by the Islamic State: a shadow army to Iraq's official security forces, flush with its own success.

At their celebration on Monday, the militia's leaders were feeling expansive. Tribal sheikhs had been invited to Camp Ashraf from around the country, some milling around a small photo exhibit of the Diyala battles. Journalists had been asked to join as well, to listen to speeches and to tour the liberated villages.

A group of young fighters in fatigues gathered in a circle, singing religious hymns, and broke to join the mob that formed around Mr. Ameri, the guest of honor.

Standing in front of a backdrop that said "Diyala Wins. Iraq Wins," Mr. Ameri lightly admonished supporters who chanted his name, telling them to praise Iraq instead. He reached out to Sunnis, pledging that Diyala would be a "safe area," and responded to the accusations of atrocities by his fighters, warning that there would be consequences for abuses, including kidnappings and killings, though he did not explicitly acknowledge that they had happened.

"We are determined to complete our mission," Mr. Ameri added, listing other Iraqi provinces that his fighters would liberate soon. "God willing, we will defeat Daesh in Iraq," he said, using the Arabic acronym for the Islamic State.

His fighters seemed to be spoiling for the coming battle. Haidar Aidan, 25, described eight days of grueling work in the village of Mansouriya, dodging snipers and defusing explosive devices. Twenty-five other Badr fighters, he said, had been killed there.

Families had been displaced, but Mr. Aidan seemed confident that they would be able to return soon, echoing the assurances of his superiors. Now that Mr. Ameri had declared the province free of Islamic State militants, "we will go find other places to liberate," he said.

Ali Jassim Kadham, another fighter, also said it was important to return Sunni families to their homes. But his talk of reconciliation faded as he spoke about Sunni tribes who he asserted were allied with the Islamic State.

Collaborators were worse than the terrorists, he said, warning, "Their punishment will be more severe than Daesh's."

Fears of retaliation by the militias in Diyala grew last month after residents of the Sunni-majority village of Barwanah accused Shiite militiamen of executing 72 people. Mr. Ameri and other Badr officials have denied that their fighters were responsible, even as they have promised to clamp down on abuses.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A local Badr leader in Diyala, Harath al-Rubai, said he had been in Barwanah on the day the executions occurred, checking the identity cards of refugees from other villages.

He said he had heard about the killings only the next day. "I don't know how and when they were killed," he added. The government has promised a full investigation into the allegations.

Erin Evers, a researcher for Human Rights Watch, said it was dangerous for the government to outsource military operations to Badr and other militias in Diyala, a mixed province home to Sunnis, Shiites, Kurds and Turkmen.

"It's a place where anywhere you light a match, it's guaranteed to start a fire," she said. She said her organization had received reports that the militias, with the cooperation of some Iraqi security forces, had been "disappearing" people in the province for at least the last year and a half.

Salah al-Jabouri, a Parliament member from Diyala, said there had been attempts by "bad people" in the militias to alter the province's demographic balance by not allowing Sunnis to return to their homes. "Violations against Sunni society in Diyala will weaken the strength of the popular mobilization and make Daesh stronger," he said.

But there were few signs of tension as Badr militiamen, accompanied by Iraqi security forces, led journalists on a tour of the province in a heavily armed convoy on Monday. A militia anthem blared from speakers on a truck toward the head of the convoy, catchy but dark, a warning to Badr's enemies: "Fight them!" men sang. "Kill them!"

The fighters proudly showed off the Sudour irrigation dam, which the Sunni extremists had taken over, causing water shortages in the region. The water was flowing again, and a bridge over the dam that was damaged had been temporarily repaired, allowing passage over the waterway.

The Badr Organization's signs were freshly planted along the roads of Muqdadiya District, in a show of authority.

Things appeared to be slowly returning to normal even in villages like Al Aqoud, where a battle between the militias and militants had left stores burned and some homes in rubble.

One shopkeeper, Hafiz Hussein, said that some of the residents, especially Sunni neighbors, were frightened by the Shiite militias and had fled. He said he hoped they would return.

For many who had stayed, the militias had brought only relief. "Daesh was like hell," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Iran, IAEA to Step Up Talks on Nuclear Program, Agency Chief Says (WSJ)

By Laurence Norman
February 8, 2015
The Wall Street Journal

MUNICH, Germany—Talks between Iran and the United Nations' atomic agency have yielded no significant progress in recent months, although the two sides agreed to step up senior-level dialogue, the agency's head said this weekend.

Yukiya Amano, director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, met Iranian Foreign Minister Javad Zarif on Saturday on the sidelines of the Munich Security Conference annual meeting.

Iran has been in talks with the IAEA for years on past work the West suspects Iran carried out as part of a nuclear weapons program. Iran had promised to step up cooperation with the agency in November 2013, at the same time as the country intensified a separate set of talks with six world powers aimed at setting limits on Tehran's future nuclear activities.

After some initial progress, Iran has offered little new information to the IAEA since May.

“There has not been significant progress," Mr. Amano told The Wall Street Journal. “Much more needs to be done" to clarify outstanding issues.

Asked if Mr. Zarif promised to step up the pace of cooperation, Mr. Amano said that wasn't yet clear.

“He listened to me and he agreed to further intensify the dialogue," he said. “He didn't say no."

The IAEA produces quarterly reports on its negotiations with Iran and the next one is due to be sent out to member states over the next couple of weeks.

Mr. Amano said Mr. Zarif did agree that senior Iranian and IAEA officials should “interact more intensively and more frequently."

He said there should be another top-level meeting between the two sides in the coming weeks, although no date is yet set.

In a November 2011 report, the IAEA raised 12 areas of concern about Iran's past nuclear work. Much of the report focused on work that Tehran did more than a decade ago.

Iran has partially addressed one of those issues and in May it promised to answer the agency's questions within three months on two further areas. Mr. Amano confirmed there had still been no real progress on those two issues and that Tehran has still not picked new areas it will discuss in future.

Iran has repeatedly stymied IAEA requests for access to leading scientists, documents and military sites where Western officials say nuclear work may have been carried out. Iran has always denied it had a military nuclear program.

U.S. and other senior Western officials have previously said Iran must answer some of the key questions about its past work if it hopes to convince the international community its current nuclear activities are purely peaceful. However, while Western officials once demanded progress in talks with the IAEA before concluding a final nuclear deal, that precondition seems to have faded.

Mr. Amano said that for Iran, failing to address the issues thrown up by its past work “is not an option."

The IAEA chief said he still sensed political determination to strike a deal on the broader nuclear talks between Iran and the six powers. The IAEA isn't directly involved in those talks, in which Tehran negotiates with the U.S., the U.K., Russia, China, Germany and France.

“Now, we sense there is a political will. They have covered various issues and they have disagreement in some areas as I understand it," he said. “So all the elements are there."

Iran and the six powers have set a late March deadline to complete the framework of a final deal. They have placed a new June 30 deadline for sealing a detailed final nuclear accord.

An agreement would gradually lift tight international sanctions on Tehran in exchange for limiting Iran's future nuclear activities.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

U.S. citizen joins Kurds in battle (LAT)

By Vivian Salama and Bram Janssen
February 8, 2015
Los Angeles Times

As Kurdish fighters gathered around a fire in this damp, frigid mountain town in northwestern Iraq, exhausted from battling the Islamic State group, a surprising recruit wearing a tactical vest with the words "Christ is Lord" scribbled on it joined them.

The fighter, with a sniper rifle slung over his shoulder and a Rambo-styled bandanna around his head, is 28-year-old Jordan Matson from Sturtevant, Wis., a former U.S. Army soldier who joined the Kurds to fight the extremist group now holding a third of Iraq and neighboring Syria.

"I'm not going back until the fight is finished and ISIS is crippled," Matson said, using an alternate acronym for the militant group. "I decided that if my government wasn't going to do anything to help this country, especially Kurdish people who stood by us for 10 years and helped us out while we were in this country, then I was going to do something."

Matson and dozens of other Westerners now fight with the Kurds, spurred on by Kurdish social media campaigners and a sense of duty rooted in the 2003-2011 U.S.-led military intervention in Iraq. And while the U.S. and its coalition allies bomb the extremists from the air, Kurds say they hope more Westerners will join them on the ground to fight.

Foreigners joining other people's wars is nothing new, from the French Foreign Legion to the International Brigades of the Spanish Civil War. The Kurds, however, have turned to the Internet to find warriors, creating a Facebook page called "The Lions of Rojava" with the stated aim being to send "terrorists to hell and save humanity." The page also frequently features portraits of smiling, beautiful and heavily armed Kurdish female commanders and fighters.

Matson, three other Americans and an Australian national who spoke to the Associated Press all said they arranged to join Kurdish forces through the Facebook page, run by the People's Protection Units, or YPG, the main Syrian Kurdish militia fighting in northern Syria and Iraq.

They crossed from Turkey into Syria, now in its fourth year of civil war, before later joining a Kurdish offensive sweeping into Iraq last month. They now are based in Sinjar, where stone homes painted green, pink and yellow have been damaged in fighting and are surrounded by sandbags and piles of rubble. Thousands of Yazidi residents fled into the surrounding mountains last year during the Islamic State offensive.

Foreigners like Matson say they are drawn to helping Kurds, Yazidis and other minority ethnic groups caught up in the battle, facing possible destruction at the hand of extremists.

"How many people were sold into slavery or killed just for being part of a different ethnic group or religion?" Matson said. "That's something I am willing to die to defend."

The other Westerners spoke on condition of anonymity, fearing the reaction of their families, who didn't know where they were, or possible legal troubles if they make it back home.

So far, the U.S. hasn't banned Americans from fighting with militias against the Islamic State group, though it considers the Turkey-based Kurdish Workers' Party, commonly known as the PKK, a terrorist organization. The PKK has been fighting alongside the YPG in Sinjar and in the Syrian town of Kobani.

Australians are forbidden by law from fighting with any force outside of the Australian national army. Australia was also one of the first countries to criminalize travel to Syria's Raqqa province, where the Islamic State group has established the de facto capital of its self-styled caliphate.

The U.S. Embassy in Baghdad had no immediate response to a query about Americans fighting with the Kurds.

It's unclear how many foreigners total are fighting with the YPG and other Kurdish forces, though both foreigners and Kurds say there are "dozens."

There's a clear camaraderie among the foreign fighters in Sinjar, who mostly travel in pairs.

A number of YPG fighters, many of them as young as 17, joke and tease their new foreign friends, speaking to them in the local Kurdish dialect.

One fighter, 21-year-old Khalil Oysal from Syria, spends much of his time with the foreigners since he can speak English.

"We learn from them and they learn from us," said Oysal, who American and Australian fighters have nicknamed Bucky.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"They speak with us and they like to joke. They share with us many things."

Western fighters in Sinjar say there is a major drive to recruit as many foreigners as possible, especially those with military training, as many of young Kurdish fighters have little or no experience. The young fighters often pick up weapons and ammunition from dead Islamic State militants. They also have no body armor.

Two of the foreign fighters said they had just returned from visiting an American fighter badly wounded in battle. They said another foreign fighter, a Dutch national, was severely wounded in battle in Syria last week.

"You need to know what you're getting into," Matson said. "A lot of times you're going out, you're in a mud hut. ... You have bullets and a blanket, and sometimes you just have bread, but you need to hold the line."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A sign of a shift in Afghan-Pakistani ties (LAT)

By Ali M. Latifi
February 8, 2015
Los Angeles Times

For the first time, Afghanistan has sent members of its security forces for training in neighboring Pakistan.

The 18-month program at a military facility in the northwestern Pakistani city of Abbottabad involves only six Afghan army cadets, but is a sign of increased cooperation between the two countries under new Afghan President Ashraf Ghani.

During former President Hamid Karzai's administration, Afghanistan repeatedly denied Pakistan's requests for closer cross-border military cooperation. Distrust between the neighbors ran deep, with Afghanistan accusing Pakistan of supporting the Taliban and other militant groups while Pakistan complained that Afghanistan did not stop cross-border attacks.

Ghani's decision has been met with skepticism at home, with many Afghans saying it is too soon to reach out to Pakistan. Afghanistan has also given Pakistan permission to interrogate Islamist extremist fighters captured by Afghan forces.

Amrullah Saleh, former head of Afghanistan's intelligence agency, the National Directorate of Security, said Pakistani authorities must "commit themselves to stop training the Taliban" before military cooperation is expanded. He said the step could prove "dangerous and shortsighted."

Pakistan has said it would crack down on all militant groups operating in its territory. Since a December attack on an army-run school killed 132 children and about a dozen staff members, Pakistan has been under growing pressure to end a policy under which it tacitly sheltered some extremist groups that did not attack the state.

Pakistan has long sought deeper ties with the Afghan military as a way to counter the influence of India, which already trains a small number of Afghan forces. Ghani has sought to normalize relations with Pakistan in an effort to restart peace talks with the Taliban.

Few details on the military training, which began Thursday, have been made public.

Saleh said many issues between the countries have yet to be resolved, including border security and counter-terrorism operations.

For years, the eastern provinces of Afghanistan have been subjected to shelling, which residents and officials say comes from the Pakistani side of the border. Two women in Kunar province were killed Oct. 31, when 11 artillery shells were fired from Pakistan, officials said. From 2012 through 2014, local officials reported that about 5,000 rockets were fired on the province from inside Pakistan.

Afghans have never hidden their suspicion of Pakistan, but the training comes at a time when Pakistani officials and citizens have become increasingly distrustful of the more than 2 million Afghan refugees on Pakistani soil.

The International Organization for Migration has reported more than 22,000 undocumented Afghan migrants fleeing Pakistan, citing increased persecution after the attack on the army school. The attack in the city of Peshawar was carried out by the Pakistani Taliban, a domestic insurgent organization, but international officials say many Pakistanis have taken out their anger on foreigners.

Afghanistan's ambassador to Islamabad, Janan Mosazai, said the training was an "important step in both countries' efforts to strengthen, broaden and deepen security and particularly military-to-military relations and cooperation in all areas."

Graeme Smith, a Kabul-based analyst with the International Crisis Group, said such military exchanges were a "textbook way of building confidence between security forces" that are both facing insurgencies on their soil.

"There's almost zero trust between Afghanistan and Pakistan military forces at the moment," Smith said.

Smith said Ghani was preparing for a future in which U.S.-led international forces will no longer be around to support the Afghan army and police.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The enemy of our enemy in Yemen (LAT)

By Doyle Mcmanus
February 8, 2015
Los Angeles Times

The Houthis, Shiite Muslim rebels who announced that they were taking control of Yemen's government last week, don't seem much like natural allies of the United States.

One of their favorite slogans is "Death to America, death to Israel, damn the Jews." U.S. officials say they've received money, weapons and training from Iran. An Iranian official boasted recently that thanks to the Houthis, Yemen's capital is now "in the hands of Iran," along with those of Iraq, Syria and Lebanon.

And yet, last week, Obama administration officials were scrambling to contact Houthi leaders and assure them that the United States doesn't consider them an enemy. "We're talking with everybody," an official told me -- "everybody who will talk with us." The Houthis' top leaders haven't been willing to meet so far, but the Americans are working on it.

Why so much eagerness for a working relationship with a group that wants less U.S. influence in its homeland, not more? Because the Houthis and their allies are now in charge in Yemen, one of the main battlegrounds in the long U.S. war against Al Qaeda. And the Houthis hate Al Qaeda.

U.S. officials consider the Al Qaeda branch in Yemen a bigger threat than any other terrorist group because of its penchant for long-distance attacks against Americans. Al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula, as the group is known, has made several attempts to explode bombs on U.S. airliners, although none has succeeded.

The Houthis are Shiite Muslims and Al Qaeda is rigorously Sunni, but the antipathy isn't mainly sectarian; it's an old-fashioned struggle over territory and power. The Houthis have ruled most of northwestern Yemen for centuries, and they've been alarmed by Al Qaeda's incursions to their south. The two factions have already fought battles on the ground. One of the Houthis' complaints against the Yemeni government they just overthrew was that it wasn't putting enough force into the battle against Al Qaeda. Last week, Al Qaeda issued a statement accusing the Houthis -- a little prematurely, perhaps -- of being "faithful partners of the United States."

In other words, for the U.S., the enemy of my enemy is my friend. But what about the Houthis' Iran problem? Should we be worried that the enemy of our enemy Al Qaeda is also friends with our other enemies -- adversaries, anyway -- in Tehran?

"Iran is on the march," Sen. John S. McCain (R-Ariz.) warned last week . "In Yemen, it's not AQAP that's taken over the government, it's the Houthis." McCain said the solution was "more boots on the ground" -- not a U.S. invasion force, but special operations forces.

Obama administration officials insist that those fears are overblown. The Houthis "get support from Iran, but they're not controlled by Iran," one official told me last week.

Houthi leaders dissolved Yemen's parliament on Friday after weeks of political negotiations deadlocked. Now they are trying to form a new transitional government, and they say it will include representatives of most of the country's factions. (Only about a third of Yemen's 25 million people are Houthis; a Houthi-only government would win little support in the Sunni south.)

The central question for U.S. officials is whether that next government can be persuaded to join in counterterrorism against Al Qaeda at all -- let alone as enthusiastically as the last government.

That was tested over the last two weeks as the United States resumed drone strikes in Yemen after a pause of several months amid the political chaos in Sana.

U.S. officials said they were pleased to find that there was no discernible reaction. But that acquiescence seems unlikely to last. Houthi leaders have long denounced U.S. drone strikes as an invasion of Yemen's sovereignty; they say they can handle Al Qaeda themselves.

And American experts on Yemen say the drone strikes are widely unpopular. "It really has fueled tremendous resentment," said Stacey Philbrick Yadav, a professor at Hobart and William Smith Colleges who has lived in Yemen. "I have never met a [Yemeni] defender of the strategy. It's not criticism; it's more like repulsion."

Indeed, the drone strikes may have been a factor in the fall of Yemeni President Abdu Rabu Mansour Hadi, who pleased U.S. officials with his open endorsements of cooperation with the United States but proved incapable of retaining support among his own country's political factions.

In President Obama's view, there's no alternative to trying to keep the partnership alive. But as U.S. diplomats wait hopefully for their appointments with Yemen's new Houthi power-brokers, they may want to remind themselves of some old lessons about power politics in the Middle East:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Be careful before you claim any model as a success (as Obama said of Yemen only last fall), you may live to rue those words.

When a shaky government declares itself your ally, as Hadi did, that doesn't mean it's acquired extra wisdom. And the enemy of your enemy may be your friend today, but that doesn't make him your friend forever.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Nigeria Postpones Elections, Saying Security Is a Concern (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter
February 8, 2015
The New York Times

DAKAR, Senegal -- Nigeria's election agency on Saturday night put off a closely contested presidential election after weeks of pressure to postpone it from the ruling party, which analysts say was facing potential defeat for the first time in more than 15 years.

The move is sure to anger the opposition, which has been arguing against a postponement, and inflame its supporters in a volatile electoral environment.

The election, originally scheduled for next Saturday, will now be held March 28, the election agency head told a news conference in Abuja, Nigeria's capital, late Saturday night. The elections official, Attahiru Jega, after days of what were reportedly heated meetings with the government, cited "security" concerns for the delay. He said that Nigeria's top military men -- themselves close to the government -- refused to ensure that security would be "guaranteed" if the vote went ahead as scheduled.

The country's northeast has been in the grip of an Islamist insurgency waged by the Boko Haram terrorist group for nearly six years, with the country's military unable to contain it. It was not immediately clear how that standoff might change in the coming six weeks.

But days ago the national security adviser, Sambo Dasuki, who is close to President Goodluck Jonathan, made it equally clear that he favored putting off the vote.

Darren Kew, a Nigeria expert at the University of Massachusetts Boston, said: "This is a sign of panic on the part of supporters of the president and the ruling party. The real reason behind it is the opposition is surging right now."

Mr. Jega, the elections official, was presented with a "fait accompli" by the country's generals, Mr. Kew said, when security for the election was "withdrawn," adding that "most of the upper brass is very close to the presidency."

In a statement, the opposition All Progressives' Congress said that this is clearly a major setback for Nigerian democracy.

Mr. Jonathan, a Christian from the south, has faced sharp criticism for his failure to contain Boko Haram, for a series of large-scale corruption scandals involving the government and for a faltering economy battered by the falling price of oil.

He is running against a general who ruled the country as a military dictator in the early 1980s. The general, Muhammadu Buhari, a Muslim from the north, has promised to crush Boko Haram and bring corruption to heel: a campaign pledge previously enacted by him with brutal rigor in his previous stint as head of government 30 years ago.

In a country evenly divided between Muslims and Christians, the general is thought to have an electoral lock on the Muslim north, and solid chances in the mixed-religion middle and southwest. Mr. Jonathan is only sure of support in his native far south. But now, with an additional six weeks of campaigning and unlimited cash, his chances have sharply improved, analysts believe.

But electoral violence and pressure from the streets -- an ever-present factor in a country where 2011 was considered a peaceful election, although nearly 900 were killed after Mr. Buhari was defeated -- will almost certainly now figure in as well, analysts said.

Secretary of State John Kerry issued a statement on Saturday saying that the United States was disappointed by the decision to postpone the election in Nigeria. "Political interference with the Independent National Electoral Commission is unacceptable," he said, "And it is critical that the government not use security concerns as a pretext for impeding the democratic process."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

U.S.-Thai military exercise to go on despite coup (WAPO)

By Craig Whitlock
February 8, 2015
The Washington Post

The Pentagon is sending 3,600 troops to Thailand this week to participate in a major military exercise, U.S. officials said, even though the country remains under the control of Thai generals who ousted a democratically elected government last year.

The Obama administration suspended military aid and exchanges with Bangkok after the military coup in May. Thailand is still under martial law and its military junta has shown little willingness to relinquish power, but the Obama administration has decided to temporarily set aside political objections to the coup and proceed with the annual exercise, dubbed Cobra Gold.

Cobra Gold is billed as one of the largest multinational military exercises in the world. It has been jointly led by Thailand and the United States for more than three decades; this year's version will feature about 13,000 troops from two dozen Pacific nations, including Japan, Indonesia and South Korea.

The Obama administration was reluctant to pull out, fearing it could jeopardize Washington's long-standing military ties with Thailand, an ally for nearly two centuries. It also worried that a break with Bangkok would drive the Thai generals closer to China, which is jousting with the United States for influence in Southeast Asia.

At the same time, U.S. officials are wary of being seen as endorsing or cooperating with the Thai junta and its ruler, Gen. Prayuth Chan-ocha. In contrast to prior years, the Pentagon has played down its involvement in this month's Cobra Gold, which begins Monday and runs through Feb. 20.

Marine Lt. Col. Jeffrey Pool, a Pentagon spokesman, declined to comment, referring questions to the U.S. Embassy in Bangkok.

In an e-mailed statement, Melissa Sweeney, an embassy spokeswoman, said U.S. officials "decided this year to proceed with a significantly refocused and scaled down Cobra Gold 2015 exercise, in light of the Thai military's ouster of the civilian government."

She said this year's exercise would place a greater emphasis on humanitarian assistance and disaster relief. A large-scale amphibious landing exercise has been canceled, she added, though she acknowledged some live-fire training would still take place. The U.S. troop contingent of 3,600 is down from 4,300 last year.

In the past, the Defense Department trumpeted Cobra Gold as one of its most important joint military exercises. Journalists were taken into the jungle to witness survival training courses, with Thai instructors teaching U.S. Marines how to drink cobra blood and eat insects.

The U.S. military is also planning to proceed next month with another joint exercise with Thailand, known as Cope Tiger, Sweeney said. Cope Tiger is an air exercise involving dozens of aircraft and air-defense units. About 160 U.S. troops participated in the last Cope Tiger, in March 2014, at Korat Royal Thai Air Force Base. The Singapore Air Force joined in as well.

The Obama administration reacted sternly at first last May when the Thai generals deposed Prime Minister Yingluck Shinawatra, the second military coup to take place in the country since 2006. U.S. officials suspended about $4.7 million in military aid, canceled some small-scale exercises and halted an officer exchange program.

"While we value our long friendship with the Thai people, this act will have negative implications for the U.S.-Thai relationship, especially for our relationship with the Thai military," Secretary of State John F. Kerry warned at the time.

The Pentagon, however, has been hesitant to cut ties. U.S. military commanders prize the access they have to the Royal Thai Navy Air Field at U-Tapao, which has one of the longest runways in Asia.

Prior to the coup, U.S. defense officials had worked hard to cultivate Thailand, culminating in a 2012 visit by then-Defense Secretary Leon E. Panetta to Bangkok, where he signed an accord to upgrade the military alliance.

Since the coup, U.S. officials have tried to walk a fine line. Last month, a senior U.S. diplomat, Daniel R. Russel, became the highest-ranking Obama administration official to visit Bangkok since the junta took charge. In a Jan. 26 speech, he lauded the history of U.S.-Thai relations but also criticized the generals for their undemocratic ways.

"I'll be blunt here," Russel said. "When an elected leader is deposed, impeached by the authorities that implemented the coup, and then targeted with criminal charges . . . the international community is left with the impression that these steps could be politically driven."

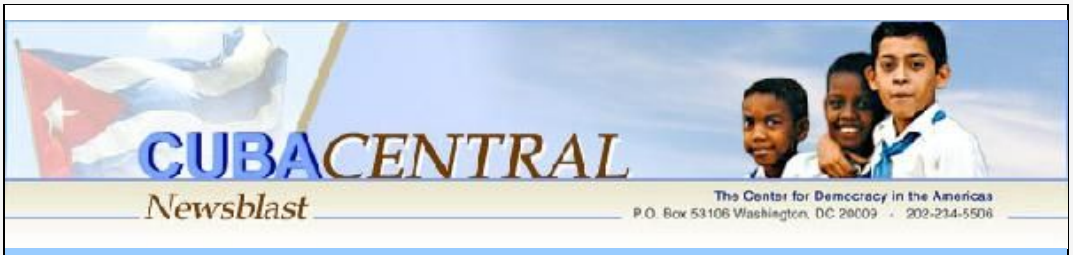
This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Russel's remarks angered the junta, which demanded a formal explanation from the U.S. Embassy.

A few days later, the Thai generals gave a more pointed response. Prayuth, the junta chief, met with China's defense minister in Bangkok, discussed how to expand military cooperation with Beijing, and thanked him for "understanding the political situation in Thailand."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "The Cuba Central Team" <sarah@democracyinamericas.org>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 2/12/2016 10:52:28 AM
Subject: Week In Review: Lift the Embargo? Why don't we just 'gum it' to death instead?



February 12, 2016

Dear Friends:

Last Sunday, someone, somewhere marked the 54th anniversary of the U.S. embargo against Cuba.

We forgot to send a card.

But, perhaps there was a celebration in Australia. An oil company there, MEO, bragged to its shareholders this week about the company's goals for Cuba, where it plans to drill off-shore.

"Cuba Block 9 represents MEO's highest priority asset for near term value creation," says CEO Peter Stickland, who added "MEO's established position in Cuba provides a strong early mover advantage ahead of ongoing strengthening diplomatic relations between Cuba and the U.S."

Take that, Team USA, we got there first...and toss another shrimp on the Barbie.

Cuba has trade relations with more than 160 countries. Its main trading partners include Venezuela, China, Canada, Spain, Brazil, Russia, and Vietnam. These countries have no embargo against Cuba and so, while we in the U.S. talk about doing deals, while the Obama administration - bravely but incrementally - dismantles regulatory barriers to trading with the Cubans, our competitors go to the island and do what we all too often just talk about doing.

The oil company MEO can drill where U.S. oil companies can't because the embargo bars them from doing so. We've followed this issue closely for years, and watched with admiration as Dan Whittle at the Environmental Defense Fund and others fought valiantly to move U.S. policy to the point where the U.S. and Cuban governments can cooperate to defend our coasts against a spill (and there's "a path" for U.S. companies to respond to a crisis). But, Australia's first-mover advantage over U.S. oil companies sidelined by the embargo from drilling remains.

Telecommunications offers a similar case. The administration has made "opening up Cuba" to U.S. telecom firms a high policy priority. It has conscientiously urged Cuba to expand Wi-Fi access to benefit its people and the Cuban economy. After the December 17th diplomatic breakthrough, we've seen and written about the young Cubans crowding together with their smartphones on the streets of Havana adjacent to the Wi-Fi hotspots added by their government which run on equipment supplied by the Chinese company Huawei.

U.S. tourism is much in the same boat. Today, we learned "U.S. airlines could begin more than 100 daily flights to Cuba under [a commercial aviation] agreement that will be signed Tuesday in Havana," USA Today reports. And yes, non-tourist travel to Cuba under President Obama is skyrocketing. But, visitors from the states must search for rooms in hotels built by competitors to U.S.-based Marriott International, Hilton Worldwide, and other familiar U.S. brands which have been left to "circle Cuba," as Reuters wrote last year, because that's all they can do so long as there's an embargo.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Like losers who just get to hang around the lobby, our hoteliers can visit the island, and talk to the relevant ministry officials about someday investing and building properties on the island. But, it is Chinese and British developers who've got the go-ahead to build golf resorts, and it is the Vietnamese who've "inked a deal " to trod the path already blazed by Canadian and Spanish hotel firms.

U.S. agriculture suppliers are slightly better off. After Congress legalized sales of food and medicine to the island in 2000, Cuba became a promising market, and the Cuban government for a number of years lived with onerous payment requirements and became a very good customer. American farmers took a special delight in putting wholesale food at a good price on the tables of Cuban families. The island is so close and the government imports two-thirds to eighty percent of the food their country consumes.

But, as Governor Greg Abbott learned last year, his pitch that "Texas has an abundance of (rice and other products) and a very easy ability to export from Texas to Cuba," wasn't an easy sell to officials who run Cuba's new Port of Mariel. They told him, "Cuba would buy rice from other sources, primarily Vietnam, until the U.S. allowed the communist-run island to buy on credit, a measure currently prohibited by the embargo."

You get the picture. Although the president's been liberalizing the policy since 2009, as he promised to do, he and his administration have been regularly pushing out policy changes, regulatory reforms, and making promising progress with the Cubans since the 2014 diplomatic breakthrough.

Non-tourist travel and the economic activity its boosts are both clearly up. Two U.S. mobile phone companies have scored roaming agreements. Another company based in New Jersey signed a deal to provide direct phone service between our countries.

After the administration loosened the rules for financing certain exports to Cuba in January, as the Wall Street Journal predicted, Caterpillar said it is getting traction from the reforms. The company announced this week "it has signed a deal with a distributor to begin the process of selling its products in Cuba, becoming one of the first U.S. manufacturers to enter the island nation that is emerging from decades-long trade restrictions."

More news will come. After Cuba has hosted visits for the U.S. Secretary of State, Commerce Secretary, Agriculture Secretary, and other officials, the Departments of Commerce and Treasury will next week welcome Rodrigo Malmierca, Cuba's Minister of Foreign Trade and Investment, accompanied by other officials, for the second round of the U.S.-Cuba Regulatory Dialogue.

We favor talk, and engagement, and the step-by-step process is producing results. But, like our friend Bill LeoGrande, who wrote earlier this month, "Obama Needs to Stop Playing Small Ball With Cuba," it has to be frustrating for U.S. companies to be cast as tire-kickers, browsers, and window shoppers as Cuba makes rational decisions about how, when, and with whom it does business, and they're not really in the running.

So, what's to be done?

First, the president retains a significant amount of authority to take additional executive actions that remove restrictions and allow U.S. firms to compete for business in Cuba. Experts like LeoGrande , Stephen Propst (Hogan Lovells), and others have already laid out compelling proposals to lift prohibitions on U.S. investment in Cuba, easing restrictions on U.S. financial institutions processing dollar-denominated transactions, relieving enforcement concerns, and opening up the United States to exports from the island. Did you know that the Cuban bee industry is thriving and that Cuban honey sells for a price that fetches more per liter than oil? The president should do more.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Second, there are reasonable men and women of good will from both political parties who think that repealing not just the travel ban, not just the impediments to agriculture sales, but the embargo in its entirety is a cause that is just.

Members of the bipartisan trade delegation that Reps. Tom Emmer and Kathy Castor will lead to Cuba tomorrow believe that. So, do the Republican and Democratic Governors who wrote the Congressional leadership last year asking for the repeal of all trade restrictions. That is what Congressmen Jim McGovern and Rick Crawford believe - they said it to the U.S. Agriculture Coalition on Wednesday, arguing that a majority of Americans are ready to lift the embargo - if not this year, than certainly next year.

Congress can step up, but should not be asked to do so alone. Beyond joining delegations or visiting Cuba single-file, more U.S. companies and sectors should do what agriculture has been doing for decades and step up so their voices are heard in Congress. We were astonished last year when we read comments by a travel executive who said the "prohibition on tourism will go away" - this is a law that Congress must repeal - as if someone else was going to do it for him, elevating deus ex machina to legislative strategy. No, sir; this takes work.

And that is what Swedish Match believes, too. The third-largest manufacturer of tobacco pouches in the U.S. has lobbied Congress more heavily than another company on trade. They are among the new legions of K Street diplomats for whom talk about ending the embargo just won't cut it anymore. They want action, and so do we. U.S. business must step up.

Our Recommendations

U.S. - Cuba

Council on Foreign Relations outlines 2016 candidates' stances on foreign policy issues, including Cuba, Council on Foreign Relations
In this interactive guide, "Campaign 2016: The Candidates & the World," the Council on Foreign Relations allows users to focus on each candidate by issue. With quotes from the candidates and clearly articulated summaries, we found the Cuba section to be particularly worthwhile.

U.S. expects "probable presidential transition" in Cuba in 2018 , EFE / Fox News Latino
A recent U.S. intelligence report suggests that Cuba may be preparing for a "probable presidential transition" in 2018. This date would coincide with the end of Raul Castro's current term and would reinforce a proposed maximum presidential ten-year term limit. While this report suggests an end to the Castro era, it does not necessarily mean major changes in Cuba's political and social structures. The report made it clear that Cuban leaders will "remain focused on preserving political control," that economic reform and reducing state influence in the economy would be "slow," and that living conditions will continue to be "poor."

Lawmakers Question U.S. Decision to Give Rum Trademark to Cuba , Felicia Schwartz, WSJ
A bipartisan group of 25 U.S. lawmakers (17 of whom represent Florida), have sent a letter to Secretary of State John Kerry and Treasury Secretary Jacob Lew, expressing concerns over the U.S government's decision to grant a trademark for Havana Club rum to the Cuban government. This controversial move, which would allow the Cuban government to sell Cuban-made Havana Club in the U.S. for the first time in decades once the U.S. economic embargo on Cuba is lifted, has also raised concerns that it could undermine protections for American intellectual property rights holders.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Havana primaries , The Economist
Havana residents are weighing in on the US 2016 election. While two Republican candidates, Ted Cruz and Marco Rubio, are the children of Cuban immigrants, they are not positively received back on the island. Some Cubans have expressed that they would rather vote for Donald Trump. On the Democratic side, Hillary Clinton appears to be Cubans' preferred, as many are baffled by Bernie Sanders' open support of what he calls "democratic socialism."

In Cuba

Silicon Island Rebooted: Cuba's Information & Communications Technology Revolution, Timothy Ashby, Harvard International Review
Cuba is making significant progress towards becoming a leading hub of IT innovation in the Caribbean. This technological initiative began with Fidel Castro's announcement of a second revolution called the "Future Project." It has evolved over the past 20 years to include new technology curricula in Cuban high schools and universities, and expanded job opportunities in the IT sector.

Cuban baseball stars, the Gurriel brothers, abandon team , Nelson Acosta, Reuters
Cuban media outlets have reported that brothers Yulieski Gurriel, 31, and Lourdes Gurriel Jr., 22, two of Cuba's most preeminent baseball layers, have defected from Cuba. The two allegedly left the Dominican Republic hotel where they were staying with the rest of Cuba's professional baseball team. The two hope to pursue their future careers in the United States.

Cuba's 'Black Spring' Still Haunts Journalists , David Soler, Global Journalist
The article examines the lives of two exiled Cuban journalists who suffer lasting impacts from the 2003 "Black Spring" -- Fidel Castro's major crackdown on independent journalists inside Cuba. At the time, the international community's attention was focused on the Middle East, but Cuban journalists were facing serious threats, imprisonment, and persecution just ninety miles from U.S. shores.

Cuba's Foreign Relations

Blessed are the peacemakers , Sarah Stephens, Huffington Post
Blessed are the peacemakers, it says in Scripture - and the peacemakers seem to converging in Havana. This Friday, the leaders of Roman Catholicism and the Russian Orthodox Church, Pope Francis and Patriarch Kirill I, will meet in Cuba to try and advance the healing process between Eastern and Western Christianity, churches which have been in schism since 1054. In coming to Cuba to seek peace, they are not alone. After two years of a tightly held negotiation, the United States and Cuba ended six decades of hostilities, and the diplomatic effort to normalize relations rolls forward in both capitals.

Church talks help make Cuba a "perfect place for negotiations," Andrea Rodriguez and Michael Weissenstein, AP/Washington Post
Pope Francis and Patriarch Kirill I of the Russian Orthodox Church will meet on February 12 in Cuba. The meeting's setting is historic and symbolic, as it not only represents efforts to reconcile estranged factions within Christianity, but also sets a precedent in which Cuba can become fertile ground for peace negotiations.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Until next time,

The Cuba Central Team

Like our work? Consider a monthly donation!

DONATE NOW THROUGH Network for Good

The Cuba Central Newsblast is produced by the Center for Democracy in the Americas (CDA). CDA is devoted to changing U.S. policy toward Cuba and the other countries of the Americas by basing our relations on mutual respect, fostering dialogue with those governments and movements with which U.S. policy is at odds, and recognizing positive trends in democracy and governance. For more information, check out the CDA website. You can also like us on Facebook or follow us on Twitter .

See what's happening on our social sites

, PO Box 53106, Washington, DC 20009

SafeUnsubscribe™ john.podesta@gmail.com

Forward this email | Update Profile | About our service provider

Sent by sarah@democracyinamericas.org in collaboration with

Constant Contact

Try it free today

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Lee Fang" <lee@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: "Lee Fang" <lee@progressiveaccountability.org>
Date: 8/27/2008 6:33:03 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 08/27/08

Main Topics: Hillary Clinton's Speech, Convention, Negative Ad

Summary of Shift: Rudy Giuliani and Mitt Romney led the push back against the Democrats this morning. Both praised Hillary while agitating about signs of friction during the convention. Romney warmly admitted the Democratic convention goers were very friendly to him and that Biden would win any debate with his Republican counterpart. Overall, party unity and the Hillary Clinton speech last night were the dominate topics of discussion today. McCain's latest round of attacks on Obama's foreign policy gained some coverage, with at least Fox and MSNBC airing the new ad 'Tiny.' The broadcast networks are making an effort to introduce Joe Biden; all three ran biographical segments on Biden's life, Jill Biden, and other career high lights.

Hurricane Gustav is gaining strength and threatening the Gulf Coast. The hurricane has potential to have considerable symbolic power, since it is believed that the storm will hit New Orleans near the anniversary of Katrina and during the beginning of the Republican Convention. Other news included the FDIC report that many banks are in danger of collapsing, oil prices are expected to loose stability because of fears that the storm will affect refining capability, and a prison break in New Mexico.

Highlights:
1. Giuliani Makes Interview Rounds
   a. CNN: Says Bill Clinton's negative comments aimed at Obama, McCain will follow Pres Kennedy's legacy
   b. MSNBC: Giuliani stumped on why Bush speaking on Labor Day; Brzezinski mocks Ridge
   c. CBS: Continues Clinton X and Y theory, Praises Hillary Clinton's speech
2. CNN: Henry covers McCain's new round of attacks on Obama; mentions POW
3. MSNBC: Romney voices praise for Democratic convention goers, Biden
4. FNC: Huckabee hopes for Pawlenty, Veepstakes

Highlights, No Clip:
1. ABC: DAVID LETTERMAN: Even the leaders in the oil industry know that Senator McCain has it wrong. We can't simply drill our way to energy independence. If you drilled everywhere, if you drilled in all of John McCain's backyards, even the ones he doesn't know he has.
2. FNC: Rudy Giuliani appears to talk about instant replay in baseball; has to leave shortly after beginning interview

Local Coverage:
1. KPHO-CBS-AZ: CATHERINE ANAYA: John McCain spent the morning addressing the American legion convention today. He used the opportunity to launch new attacks on his democratic rival. McCain accused Barack Obama of being confused on his positions about America's place in world.
2. KGTV-ABC-CA: MICHAEL CHEN: The rally is organized by local Democrats, they sent us a press release; it's called 'How Many Homes, John?' Most of the protesters are protesting on veterans issues, they call McCain a veteran that is lost.

Clips:
Highlight #1
Giuliani Claims McCain Called For Surge Before Anyone; Says McCain Will Follow President Kennedy's Legacy (CNN 08/27/08 7:30am)
RUDY GIULIANI: I thought it was an excellent speech and from the point of view of being a Republican and a big supporter of John McCain, I appreciated the fact that it seemed to be a very technical speech about being a Democrat, supporting him as a Democrat, but she never answered the big question. The claim she made during the primaries was he wasn't prepared to be president of the United States. She never said that.

And, of course, during the day it got compounded by Bill Clinton having that speech that he gave in which he talked about candidate X and candidate Y. And he said there may be a candidate X that you agree with but you don't think is prepared to be president. And a candidate Y that you half agree with but you do believe is prepared. Who would you vote for?

Hillary never answered the question who is candidate X and who is candidate Y.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

KIRAN CHETRY: Well, you know --

GIULIANI: And I think that left a big gap.

CHETRY: Well, what I'm wondering though, you know, is the GOP trying to paint her into a no-win situation. If she started bringing up some of Barack Obama's weaknesses that she talked about in the primary, she would have been panned for that.

GIULIANI: Well, she doesn't have to say that. All she had to say is he's prepared to be president. She never said it. She could have talked about how she's gotten to know him, how much she believes in him, his character, his strength.

I think the reason that woman is undecided about supporting Barack Obama, the woman who is very close to Hillary Clinton, is nothing really came from the heart here. This was a very good speech. They clearly agree on the issues.

Now, Barack Obama is clearly Bill Clinton's candidate X with whom you agree on the issues but don't think is prepared to be president.

CHETRY: Well, we'll see.

GIULIANI: But I mean, we'll have to see what Bill says tonight. I'd like the answer from Bill as to who is candidate Y and who's candidate X. That was a very interesting thing that he did and at a very, very inauspicious time for Barack Obama.

CHETRY: You know, another big theme last night for many of the speakers was that a vote for McCain means a vote to continue four more years of the Bush administration. And I know, and we've talked to a lot of John McCain supporters who say, look, he's a maverick. On examples like campaign finance reform, he's gone against the Bush administration. But really, how will McCain show besides those things that he is different from the Bush administration?

GIULIANI: John McCain was a supporter of the surge, you know, for several years before the surge happened and a critic of the administration for not doing it. In fact, a much stronger critic than I think any of the Democrats. And John McCain was right about the surge and Barack Obama was wrong about the surge.

So this is a silly kind of democratic thing that isn't going to work which is why their convention I don't think is succeeding. There are reasons to attack different candidates. You cannot say if you really watched politics for the last eight years that John McCain is a continuation of George Bush. Just not so.

They agree on certain things. They disagree on certain things. And where John McCain disagreed he got in trouble in the Republican Party for being so strong about it.

CHETRY: You know, it's interesting because another place they disagree with is about how they would handle the economy, what they would do about taxes.

We have new poll out this morning. This is a CNN/Opinion Research poll showing that voters think Barack Obama would be better to handle the economy by a 51 to 43 percent margin. Has the economy become a Republican weak spot?

GIULIANI: No. Actually, given the nature of Barack Obama's coverage, the enormously favorable coverage he received that even Governor Rendell complained about the other night, it's remarkable that he has such a small edge on the economy.

The reality is that as the Americans get to know his plan to raise taxes, raise tariffs, and bring us towards socialized medicine and create a poverty fund for the world, I think Americans will realize that this would be the worst thing you could do to the economy. John McCain is going to stick to the things that worked for President Kennedy, President Reagan, and President Bush.

CHETRY: How do you pay for it all? If you lower taxes and lower the corporate tax by 10 to 15 percent, how do you pay for it all?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GIULIANI: How about you lower expenses? Which John McCain has been a hawk about all during the time he's been in Congress. After all, he came in with Ronald Reagan and he believes in the two twins of fiscal conservatism which is lower taxes but also significantly lower expenses which is what I did as mayor of New York City. That's how I paid for it. I lowered expenses. It's something that republicans and democrats have both run away from in the last four or five years. But John McCain can bring us back to that. And that is good, sound, American economics.

Brzezinski Mocks Ridge; Giuliani Stumped On Why Bush Is Speaking On Labor Day (MSNBC 08/27/08 9:02am)
RUDY GIULIANI: [...] Are they going to do to him what they did to Governor Warner and stick him to slots earlier so he doesn't get in prime time, we'll have to see.

DAVID SHUSTER: As supposed to sticking him in the first night of the Convention like what the Republicans are doing with George W. Bush and Vice President Cheney?
[...]
GIULIANI: I think George H.W. Bush did the same thing with Ronald Reagan. He put em on on a Monday night. President Reagan had a nice good bye and generally when you're moving on, thats what you- and what did Gore do with Bill Clinton in 2000?
[...]
SHUSTER: How does the Republican Party keep from dissolving into chaos unless if it is Ridge or Lieberman, there's going to be a floor fight somebody else introducing the nomination of the Vice President. How does the GOP keep that-

GIULIANI: I think the Vice Presidential candidate whoever he is has to say, I support John McCain's policies. I understand if I get elected, on the Republican ticket with John McCain at the top of the ticket- those are the policies the American people expect of me and the candidate will have to agree to that.
[...]
MIKE BRZEZINKI: Tom Ridge? You mean the guy behind the guy behind the color coded security alerts? [throws hands up in disgust] Are you kidding me?

JOE SCARBOROUGH: Tell me when's the last time we had an attack on domestic soil?

BRZEZINSKI: I remember when we had the highest alert right before the election.

Giuliani Praises Hillary's Speech; Says Clinton Remark Aimed At Obama (CBS 08/27/08 7:40am)
RUDY GIULIANI: I enjoyed Hillary's speech. I noted that she did not answer the major question that she's raised about Barack Obama. She's the one in the primary that said he's not prepared to be President of the United States, as Joe Biden did. No where in the speech did she answer that question about his character, his ability to lead, the things that are really at issue here. And here's the -

DEAN REYNOLDS: But standing in this stadium and feeling the enthusiasm, don't you think Republicans have something to worry about?

GIULIANI: No I think Republicans are very hardened by this convention. Everything seems to have gone not the way they have planned it. And the fact is, yesterday, Bil Clinton set up this equation that only Bill Clinton could do, about candidate Y and candidate X I don't know if you heard that. He said candidate Y is someone you agree with, but don't think is prepared to be President. And candidate X is someone you agree with half the time but is prepared, who would you vote for? Sounded to me like Hillary Clinton was talking about candidate Y last night.

REYNOLDS: Wow. Mmm hmm.

GIULIANI: And never answered the question is he prepared to be President and until she does, you're going to have a lot of Hillary Clinton supporters that either not going to vote, I talked to some of them here, or going to vote for John McCain.

REYNOLDS: I don't remember any precedent for this where I've actually seen very very high profile members of the opposition party literally in the same building during the convention. You're here. We're going to talk to you.

GIULIANI: Well I was there four years ago. The morning of John Kerry's speech, the one where he reported for duty. I was on the floor of the Democratic Convention then too so this is my second one. And Democrats came to our convention in New York. So this change in tradition goes back at least one campaign.

REYNOLDS: Let me ask you this question, because as your convention comes up next week in the twin cities, I have to say Hillary Clinton had a very funny line about you can't tell them apart - George Bush and John McCain- twins just like the twin city. What do you think your most important job is next week?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GIULIANI: My most important role is to talk to people from the heart. John McCain is someone I consider a hero. Even when I ran against John McCain, I announced if I wasn't running I'd be supporting him. So my job is to explain to the American people why John McCain would be so much more effective a leader than Barack Obama who has no experience.

Highlight #2
Henry Covers McCain's Slew Of Attacks On Obama, Use of POW As Attack On Obama's Foreign Policy
(CNN 08/27/08 8:30am)
KIRAN CHETRY: Well, there's Jay Leno taking a shot at Barack Obama's experience. And this morning John McCain's doing the same thing. His campaign going all out to spoil the Democrats' unity party in Denver with a series of new attacks. CNN's Ed Henry is looking at that.

ED HENRY: John, Kiran, tonight Joe Biden takes center stage in Denver for national security night at the Democratic Convention. But John McCain tried to preempt all that here in Phoenix by launching a whole new series of attacks on Barack Obama.
UNIDENTIFIED MALE: From the Department of Arizona, Senator John McCain.

HENRY: John McCain teetered on the edge of questioning Barack Obama's patriotism, charging the Democrat is more confident in himself than in America's ability to provide moral leadership around the world.
[begin clip]
JOHN MCCAIN: My opponent had the chance to express such confidence in America when he deliver a much anticipated address in Berlin. He was a picture of confidence, but in some ways, confidence itself and confidence in one's country are not the same.
[end clip]
HENRY: McCain also claimed his opponent is naive about world affairs, citing the lesson he says Obama took from the end of the Cold War.

BARACK OBAMA: There is no challenge too great for a world that stands as one.

HENRY: McCain slammed that by mentioning his time as a prisoner of war.

[begin clip] JOHN MCCAIN: I miss a few years of the Cold War as a guest of one of our adversaries. But as I recall, the world was deeply divided during the Cold War, between the side of freedom and the side of tyranny. The Cold War ended not because the world stood as one, but because the great democracies came together, bound together by sustained and decisive American leadership. [end clip]

HENRY: While Democrats feel the selection of Joe Biden as Obama's running mate helps inoculate them against attacks on foreign policy, McCain plans to harp on the inexperience at the top of the ticket to woo independent voters. A key part of the Republican strategy is to target disaffected Hillary Clinton supporters by using some of her words against Obama. Like recycling her old 3:00 a.m. ad in a new pitch released by McCain.
[end clip]
NARRATOR: Rogue nations. Radicalism.
SEN. HILLARY CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: I know Senator McCain has a lifetime of experience that he will bring to the White House. And Senator Obama has a speech he gave in 2002.
[end clip]
NARRATOR: Hillary's right.
HENRY: McCain is also still firing away at Obama's reaction to Russia's invasion of Georgia as too weak.
[begin clip]
MCCAIN: Confusion about such questions only invites more trouble, violence and aggression. To promote stability and peace, America must stand firmly on the side of freedom and justice. [end clip]
HENRY: The Obama camp called this a false attack, noting the senator in Berlin also said he loves America because the nation sacrifices so much for freedom around the globe. But that's not stopping McCain. He believes this race is a dead heat because of all the tough questions about Obama's experience, and his advisers are promising they're only going to ramp up the attacks at next week's Republican Convention -- John, Kiran.

Highlight #3
Romney Voices Praise For Democratic Convention Goers, Biden(MSNBC 08/27/08 8:30am)
MITT ROMNEY: So far we haven't heard a lot about positions, or how votes have been taken in the past, so it' nice to talk about reality, talk about what Barack Obama's actually done, what he stands for, what John McCain stands for. And frankly, the Democrats have been quite gracious, I went through the convention hall yesterday and people shook hands and were friendly. It's nice to see even in a political convention, people are respectful of the folks on the other side.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

JOE SCARBOROUGH: Let me tell you Governor, it hasn't been that way in the past conventions. I have been struck by the kindness and the generosity and the warmth of the Democrats on the Convention floor. It really- I don't think I've seen a group as well behaved and just gracious.
MIKA BRZEZINSKI: Couldn't get off the floor because people were mobbing him.

ROMNEY: Isn't that amazing. [cross talk]

SCARBOROUGH: Let me tell you when we get to St. Paul, I'm going to need body armor. But Governor let's talk about Hillary's speech last night. You've been going around saying she's been critical of Barack Obama but last night people a lot of people thought that was a full throated endorsement of Barack Obama. The party looks like it's unifying.

ROMNEY: Well looks like and is are two different things. As Bill Clinton has said before is isn't what is means but in reality a lot of people in this country not going to do exactly what the party tells them to do or what their own candidate told them to do. They want to look at the individuals and decide who will really lead America in a place where we're stronger and more prosperous and I think they realize that Hillary's going to say everything she has to show her support of Barack Obama. They're going to hear loud and clear what she said during the primary, and that was that he was a speech, that he didn't have the experience to be President. And then Joe Biden saying that Barack Obama did not have the qualifications to be President. Those things ring loud in your ears long after the primary. We all said- we all said critical things of John McCain on issues, but no one on the Republican platform-when we had those debates-said that John McCain was anything other than a good [inaudible] President. [cross talk] But everyone said he was qualified, that he was a man who could be President and that we would support his President, and that's really different than what you heard from Joe Biden and Hillary Clinton.

SCARBOROUGH: You did say though that he did not know anything about the economy.

ROMNEY: No, not exactly that phrase [crosstalk] but I could be accused of a little hyperbole as well. But John McCain knows a lot more about the economy than Barack Obama does. John McCain may not have spent years in the private sector, but I was trying to pitch myself on that basis, but John McCain has been there during the Reagan revolution, he's seen what has made the economy go up, cause it to get weak, and John McCain-

SCARBOROUGH: Look at you guys, friends forever. Best friends. [...] If you were John McCain, who would you pick for Vice President?

ROMNEY: Joe Scarborough. [...]

ROMNEY: I don't think many people can stand up to Joe Biden, I'm quoting a columnist in the Boston Globe, talking about someone else, and impenetrable thicket of words, the guy is all words. And I don't know anyone who is going to beat him in a debate, but I do believe we happen to be right on the issues and I hope we win. But I also believe if you go back and look at where Joe Biden has been for, you'll see he has thirty years of foreign policy experience, but he's got thirty years of usually being wrong. Everything from our build up to defeat the Soviets, he was wrong on that, he voted against the first Gulf War, he was in favor of dividing Iraq into three different nations, where would be now if we had done that? So he's been wrong time and time again. [...]

Highlight #4
Huckabee Opines On VP Choices, Support Of Pawlenty (FNC 08/27/08 10:07am)
[...]
MIKE HUCKABEE: Tim Pawlenty's smart, he's effective, he's one of my personal favorites. I've known Tim of course as a Governor and I like him a lot. I think you know one of the things he brings is a total loyalty to John McCain. He was on McCain's team from the very beginning, nothing he has to live down what he ever said, so you know it's a safe pick in that no ones goin to dig up tape of Tim Pawlenty saying something unkind or unholy about John McCain from six months ago.
[...]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.

-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "t r u t h o u t" <messenger@truthout.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 1/25/2015 8:21:48 AM
Subject: Dahr Jamail | Mourning Our Planet: Climate Scientists Share Their Grieving Process

View Recent Newsletters

Tell a friend about Truthout!

Sunday, 25 January 2015

truthout

Donate Today!

Truthout is a 501(c)3 nonprofit organization; donations are tax deductible.

As you know, honest reporting is rare, especially when it comes to crucial issues like climate change, surveillance, drone warfare or the corporate stranglehold on our democracy. Support Truthout's investigative work by making a tax-deductible donation today. We can't carry on without you!

Click here to donate.

(Truthout is a 501(c)(3) nonprofit. EIN: 20-0031641)

You can also donate by check, made payable to:
Truthout, P.O. Box 276414, Sacramento, CA 95827
(Please include your email address on your check.)

Dahr Jamail | Mourning Our Planet: Climate Scientists Share Their Grieving Process

Dahr Jamail, Truthout: Can you relate to the grieving process as it relates to climate change? If so, you might find solace in the fact that you are not alone: Climate science researchers, scientists, journalists and activists have all been struggling with grief around what we are witnessing.

Read the Article

Peter McLaren: Putting Radical Life in Schools

Paul Street, Truthout: Peter McLaren's Life in Schools: An Introduction to Critical Pedagogy and the Foundations of Education argues that schools can and must become zones of popular de-indoctrination, democratic re-imagination and resistance to capital, where teachers instill students with confidence, hope and capacity for resistance and solidarity.

Read the Review

BuzzFlash

The BuzzFlash commentary for Truthout will return soon.

Obama Administration to Propose New Wilderness Protections in Arctic Refuge; Alaska Republicans Declare War

Read the Article at The Washington Post

Pentagon Dispatches First Batch of US Forces to Train Syrian Rebels

Read the Article at RT

Nuclear Regulatory Commission: We're Keeping Fukushima-Style Nuclear Reactors Going

Read the Article at

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ALEC Forces the Question: Will Labor Really Go Local?

Simon Davis-Cohen, Truthout: As workers and labor turn to local law-making to achieve gains, their role in a debate over how to ethically and consciously devolve some power to localities seems inevitable.

Read the Article

Eighty People Control Half of the World's Wealth and All of the Elected Officials

Crystal Shepeard, Care2: Global poverty has continued to rise and it's only going to get worse. Oxfam has predicted that if we do nothing, the wealthiest 1% of the world will control the same amount of wealth as the other 99% combined do.

Read the Article

The Next Big Progressive Battle: A Living Wage

LeeAnn Hall, OtherWords: Refusing to pay employees a wage they can live on isn't a business plan. Paying employees enough so they can shop or dine at your business or neighboring businesses and grow the local economy - now that's smart.

Read the Article

With Syriza, the Greek People Can Revive Hope in Europe

Rosa Moussaoui, Translated by Isabelle Métral, L'Humanité in English: For Alexis Tsipras, Syriza's leader, an absolute majority in Parliament would be an asset in order to impose a renegotiation of the Greek debt. Tsipras promises to set up "a government for all Greek people" if his party comes first in Sunday's election.

Read the Article

Common Dreams

Charles Koch Calls on Fellow Conservative Donors to Expand Their Commitment
Read the Article at Crooks and Liars

New Documents Show FBI Targeted NATO Protesters
Read the Article at In These Times

The US Won't Admit to Killing a Single Civilian in the ISIS War
Read the Article at The Daily Beast

Let's Not Morph Obama Into Elizabeth Warren Quite Yet
Read the Article at Salon

Effort to Make the "Right to Vote" a True Constitutional Right

Miya Pontes, Campaign for America's Future: In an effort to undo the work being done in numerous states and counties to disenfranchise groups of voters, two progressive House members are aiming to make a promise that is implicit in the Constitution explicit - by calling on Congress to pass a "right to vote" constitutional amendment.

Read the Article

Why Campaign Finance Reform Is the First Issue That We Must Address

Katie Rose Quandt, Moyers & Company: Politicians of all stripes are beholden to their donors, not the US public. And as long as special interest groups and extremely wealthy individuals continue to bankroll campaigns, they'll be the only ones getting what they want.

Read the Article

Humanity's Future: Below Replacement Fertility?

Joseph Chamie, Inter Press Service: Is below replacement level fertility the future for humanity? The answer to this seemingly simple question regarding human reproduction is not only of considerable demographic concern, but also has enormous social, economic and environmental consequences for the planet.

Read the Article

New Front Opens in Cold War of the Koreas: Restaurants

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Katarzyna Cwiertka, The Conversation: With both Korean governments now pushing their countries' cuisines, it raises questions about who owns the property rights to Korean food. Where lies the legitimate source of the authentic Korean culinary tradition?

Read the Article

This week in Speakout:

Survival International reports on the forced eviction of tribespeople from a tiger reserve in India as a result of seeking tourist industry dollars; John LaForge examines why military recruiters should feel like Hansel and Gretel's "wicked witch," fattening up the children to eat them; staff at the Center for Economic and Policy Research highlight how the private equity industry scored its first victory in its campaign to roll back the SEC regulatory oversight of private equity fund advisers; David Swanson looks at how "Kill Team" is not just a video game anymore; Jen Chapin celebrates the hard and sometimes dangerous work of grassroots democracy in her video "Gospel"; Joshua Tartakovsky shows why Syriza is poised to win with a promise of major social reforms; Kelly Hayes describes how, for Marissa Alexander, survival and freedom from abuse have carried a heavy price; Len Ellis offers one way to celebrate, honor and follow Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.; 99Rise organizers report that seven activists disrupted the nation's highest court on the fifth anniversary of Citizens United; Victor Grossman deconstructs the far-right anti-immigrant group PEGIDA's place in German politics; Pedro Marin describes how Brazilian reporting of events in Ukraine has been distorted by mainstream media; the National Bureau of the UJFP - France Jewish Union for Peace deplores the "trap" set for French Jews; and more.

Read the Articles

Support Truthout with a tax-deductible donation

Please add messenger@truthout.org to ensure you receive our messages

Truthout is a proud member of the New spaper Guild/CWA, Local 36047

Subscribe | Unsubscribe

Privacy Policy

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <ctrfriendsfamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 8/18/2014 4:15:39 AM
Subject: CTR Monday Aug 18, 2014 Afternoon Roundup

Correct The Record Monday August 18, 2014 Afternoon Roundup:

Tweets:

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: Today in 1920, American women gained the right to vote. HRC has always fought for women's equality. #HRC365 http://nydn.us/1hpWNyU [8/18/14, 1:11 p.m. EDT]

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: #ICYMI we put out a new report highlighting @HillaryClinton's strong advocacy for global #LGBT rights. http://correctrecord.org/hillary-clinton-global-lgbt-advocate/ … [8/17/14, 4:00 p.m. EDT]

Headlines:

Associated Press: "Hillary Clinton to Attend Fundraiser in Iowa"

"Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton will headline the annual steak fry for retiring Sen. Tom Harkin of Iowa, making a big return to the leadoff caucus state as the former secretary of state considers another presidential campaign."

Des Moines Register (I.A.): "BREAKING: Hillary Clinton (and Bill) coming to Iowa Sept. 14"

"It will mark Hillary Clinton's first public appearance in Iowa since losing the state's first-in-the-nation caucuses in early 2008, and will undoubtedly spark a national political firestorm, as she is widely expected to run again in 2016."

CNN: "Hillary Clinton makes big political move, heads to Iowa"

"Hillary Clinton will headline Sen. Tom Harkin's Iowa Steak Fry, a Democratic source familiar with the event tells CNN, a move the steps up Clinton's political activity ahead of the 2016 presidential race."

ABC News: "Hillary Clinton Is Finally Going Back to Iowa"

"Hillary Clinton is going back to Iowa for the first time in six years."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "Hillary Clinton to kick off midterm campaigning in Iowa"

"Bill and Hillary Clinton are headed to Iowa in September to headline retiring Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin's (D) annual steak fry. The event, sources confirmed to The Hill, marks the launch of Hillary's fall campaign schedule as she contemplates a run for president in 2016."

USA Today: "Paul Ryan on Hillary Clinton: Formidable — and beatable"

"Rep. Paul Ryan, the GOP's vice presidential nominee in 2012, predicts Hillary Rodham Clinton would be a formidable presidential candidate in 2016 but one with an equally formidable problem."

CNN: "Hillary Clinton is front and center in House super PAC ad"

"Hillary Clinton isn't running for Congress in Virginia's 10th district. But you wouldn't know that based on a Democratic super PAC web ad targeting the race."

Huffington Post opinion: Peter Rosenstein: "Clinton and Obama on Martha's Vineyard; Much Ado about Nothing"

"I am a strong Hillary Rodham Clinton supporter but even I want to understand where she is today on the issues and how she will lead America. Things have changed since 2008 when she last laid out her vision for the nation."

Wall Street Journal blog: Speakeasy: "Watch 'House of Cards' Cad Frank Underwood Prank-Call Hillary Clinton"

"The Clinton Foundation shared a video of Kevin Spacey impersonating Frank Underwood impersonating Bill Clinton as a part of a spoof leading up to the 68th birthday of the former president."

People Magazine: "Kevin Spacey Prank Calls Hillary Clinton as Frank Underwood (VIDEO)"

"This one gets complicated, so bear with us: The Clinton Foundation just released this video of Kevin Spacey as his House of Cards character Frank Underwood phoning Hillary Clinton as Bill Clinton, and it's hilarious."

Elle: "Kevin Spacey Prank Called Hillary Clinton as Frank Underwood"

"Regardless of political leanings, no one can really deny that the Clintons just really get the whole meta, viral thing."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Articles:

Associated Press: “Hillary Clinton to Attend Fundraiser in Iowa”

[No Writer Mentioned]

August 18, 2014, 12:32 p.m. EDT

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) -- Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton will headline the annual steak fry for retiring Sen. Tom Harkin of Iowa, making a big return to the leadoff caucus state as the former secretary of state considers another presidential campaign.

Sam Roecker, a spokesman for the Harkin Steak Fry, says Monday that both Clintons will speak at the Sept. 14 fundraiser in Indianola, just south of Des Moines. It will be the former first lady's first appearance in Iowa since 2008. She is the leading Democratic presidential contender, and the event is among her first campaign appearances before the 2014 midterm elections.

Clinton has said she intends to campaign for Democratic candidates this year. Iowa is the home of a key Senate race, and its presidential caucuses will begin the 2016 nomination process.

Des Moines Register (I.A.): “BREAKING: Hillary Clinton (and Bill) coming to Iowa Sept. 14”

By Jason Noble and Jennifer Jacobs

August 18, 2014, 10:36 a.m. CDT

Hillary and Bill Clinton will return to Iowa next month as headliners for the 37th Harkin Steak Fry, the Des Moines Register has learned.

It will mark Hillary Clinton's first public appearance in Iowa since losing the state's first-in-the-nation caucuses in early 2008, and will undoubtedly spark a national political firestorm, as she is widely expected to run again in 2016.

The Harkin Steak Fry, hosted annually by U.S. Sen. Tom Harkin, frequently attracts the top names in Democratic politics. The Sept. 14 event in Madison County just south of Des Moines will be Bill Clinton's fourth visit, and Hillary Clinton's second.

"What started out nearly 40 years ago as a handful of interested Iowans sitting around on hay bales,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

discussing politics, has grown to be an iconic gathering," Harkin said in a statement. "This year's Steak Fry just might be the best ever."

With Harkin's retirement this year from the Senate, this year's Steak Fry will be his last.

"That's why I couldn't be happier than to share this special day with two such close friends," Harkin said of the Clintons. "They have contributed so much good, inspiring leadership to this country, and I know they will continue to do so in the years ahead."

Here are details, according to a press release to be issued by Harkin's campaign staff:

The event will be held Sunday, September 14th from 1:00 - 4:00pm at the Indianola Balloon Field.

CNN: "Hillary Clinton makes big political move, heads to Iowa"

By Dana Bash, Eric McPike, and Dan Merica

August 18, 2014, 11:24 a.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton will headline Sen. Tom Harkin's Iowa Steak Fry, a Democratic source familiar with the event tells CNN, a move the steps up Clinton's political activity ahead of the 2016 presidential race.

Former President Bill Clinton will also speak at the event, according to the source.

Hillary Clinton's attendance at the 2014 steak fry, which brings together prominent Democratic leaders from the first-in-the-nation caucus state, is the most obvious political step for the former secretary of state and possible candidate for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination. Other than campaigning for candidates with whom she has a personal relationship, Clinton has largely tried to stay out of politics since leaving the State Department in 2013.

It has been over five years since Clinton visited Iowa. Her attendance at the event has been rumored by Clinton insiders for over a month.

The steak fry regularly draws big-name, national politicians and is seen as a required stop for any Democrat seeking the presidency. Vice President Joe Biden and then-San Antonio Mayor Julian Castro headlined the event last year and then-Sen. Barack Obama headlined the event in 2006, two years before he bested Clinton for the Democratic presidential nomination.

Since leaving the State Department in 2013, Clinton has become a regular on the speaking tour and published a memoir in June about her four years as secretary of state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Although widely seen as the frontrunner for the Democratic Party's presidential nomination in 2016, Clinton has tried to play coy about her aspirations. She has, however, used her book tour to tout her record at State and in the past months has become more open about the fact that she is considering running for president.

ABC News: "Hillary Clinton Is Finally Going Back to Iowa"

By Liz Kreutz

August 18, 2014, 12:25 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton is going back to Iowa for the first time in six years.

The former secretary of state will headline Sen. Tom Harkin's annual steak fry in Indianola next month, making her first visit to the state since 2008.

Bill and Hillary Clinton will be on hand for Harkin's final steak fry, a representative for the couple confirmed. It's a long-standing tradition that launched a young Barack Obama back in the fall of 2006. This year's event is scheduled for Sept. 14.

Hillary Clinton's decision to headline the steak fry, which "might promise to be the best ever," according to Harkin's website, could be seen as a swift political move for the former New York senator as she continues to mull a second run for president.

The former presidential candidate has not stepped foot in Iowa since she came in third in the Iowa caucuses Jan. 4, 2008: 2,420 days ago. And when she skipped the state during her nationwide book tour this summer, some in Iowa started to feel neglected.

The Gazette, an Iowa newspaper, practically begged Mrs. Clinton to visit last month.

"We've watched as you have flexed your muscles on the international stage and have been impressed with your ability to connect," the Gazette editorialized. "But as Iowans, we need to see that connection in action. Our hope, if you are really considering a 2016 run, is that you have learned from your experience and come to Iowa intent on having true conversations about what matters to our state and the fine people in it."

The Des Moines Register was first to report the news of Hillary Clinton's upcoming Iowa appearance today. It has been confirmed to ABC News by a top Iowa Democrat with long ties to Harkin, who plans to retire next year at the end of his fifth term.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "Hillary Clinton to kick off midterm campaigning in Iowa"

By Alexandra Jaffe

August 18, 2014, 12:31 p.m. EDT

Bill and Hillary Clinton are headed to Iowa in September to headline retiring Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin's (D) annual steak fry.

The event, sources confirmed to The Hill, marks the launch of Hillary's fall campaign schedule as she contemplates a run for president in 2016.

She's one of Democrats' most in-demand surrogates this cycle, with an unpopular President Obama persona non grata on the trail and the party excited at the prospect of her potential presidential bid.

And it marks her first return to a state that was not kind to her during her last run. Clinton posted a damaging third-place finish in the Iowa caucuses in 2008, which crippled her ultimately failed bid at the outset.

Other potential 2016 Democratic hopefuls have already made appearances in the state, including Vice President Joe Biden, who headlined the steak fry last year, and Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, who keynoted an Iowa Democratic dinner last month.

The fundraiser will benefit Democratic candidates across Iowa, including Rep. Bruce Braley (D), who's locked in a tough fight for Harkin's seat.

Hillary Clinton is also expected to raise money for the major Democratic campaign committees, and is likely to hit the trail for a number of other Democratic candidates facing difficult races.

USA Today: "Paul Ryan on Hillary Clinton: Formidable — and beatable"

By Susan Page

August 18, 2014, 1:04 p.m. EDT

Rep. Paul Ryan, the GOP's vice presidential nominee in 2012, predicts Hillary Rodham Clinton would be a formidable presidential candidate in 2016 but one with an equally formidable problem.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That would Barack Obama.

"I don't think people are going to want to have an Obama third term, and no matter how she tries to shake that label, she won't be able to," the House Budget chairman told USA TODAY in an interview in his Wisconsin hometown. While the former secretary of State would be daunting — "I mean, look at the Clinton name, the ability to fundraise" — she would have vulnerabilities that Obama and Joe Biden didn't when they handily defeated Republicans Mitt Romney and Ryan in the last election.

"The challenge Mitt and I had was, we sort of felt like we were shadow-boxing with big government in theory, because all of the things that the president passed hadn't become effective yet," Ryan says, mentioning implementation of major provisions of the Affordable Care Act and the Dodd-Frank financial regulation law. "Well, now it's 2014 and the rubber has hit the road, and the results look nothing like the rhetoric that was used to sell it. So they have a harder case to make because we see big government in action."

He calls Clinton's record "abysmal" on Russia, Libya, Afghanistan and Iraq.

"I'm thinking about the foreign policy that was created in the first four years of the Obama administration that now have manifested in the second term, and we're now seeing as a result of this foreign policy America losing its standing in the world and Americans becoming less prosperous and less secure as a result of that," he says.

That reminds him of a previous election when an uneasy electorate rejected the party in power in favor of a conservative Republican challenger. "Ronald Reagan beat Jimmy Carter with the exact same kind of dynamic," Ryan says. "I see the chance in the making for another 1980-like election."

Of course, that would depend on Republicans nominating a candidate who turns out to be as persuasive now as Reagan was then.

Politico: “Sharpton: Where are Christie, Clinton?”

By Jonathan Topaz

August 18, 2014, 12:35 p.m. EDT

Rev. Al Sharpton on Monday called out former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and other potential presidential candidates for what he sees as keeping quiet on the death of unarmed 18-year-old Michael Brown and the situation in Ferguson.

“I’m amazed that we’re not hearing from leading [presidential] candidates — Chris Christie or [former Florida Gov.] Jeb Bush, or Hillary Clinton,” he said on MSNBC.

“[A]ll of these candidates — I land in New York this morning and I see Chris Christie dancing with Jamie

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Foxx," he added, a reference to a video obtained by the New York Post that showed Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain and Christie dancing at a party hosted by the comedian in the Hamptons this weekend.

The civil rights leader said that anyone vying for the presidency in 2016 should have to weigh in on the events in Ferguson. "This is now a national, central issue, and anyone running for president needs to come up with a formula or — in my opinion — they forfeit their right to be taken seriously."

Neither Christie nor Clinton has made major public statements regarding the August 9 fatal shooting of Brown, a black teenager who was killed by a white Ferguson police officer, Darren Wilson. Clinton was also in the Hamptons this weekend for a book-signing event.

Sharpton — who has visited Ferguson at the invitation of Brown's family — weighed in on a preliminary autopsy that showed Brown was shot at least six times, including twice in the head. The report — first obtained by The New York Times — found that there was no gunpowder on Brown's body, suggesting that the bullets might not have been fired at close range. Dr. Michael Baden, who conducted the autopsy, said that determination could change depending on whether gunpowder is found on Brown's clothing, which have not yet been examined.

"What is disturbing to me is the amount of shots — which means even if we buy the story that the police is giving — why were there shots after the first shot?" Sharpton said Monday. "And, that they were not shot at close range," he said, adding that the report was "extremely disturbing."

Sharpton also said that Missouri Gov. Jay Nixon's decision early Monday to deploy National Guard troops to Ferguson could have "explosive" consequences.

"This could be explosive. The National Guard raises concern. I might be turning around and going right back," he said, suggesting he might return to Ferguson.

CNN: "Hillary Clinton is front and center in House super PAC ad"

By Dan Merica

August 18, 2014, 11:28 a.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton isn't running for Congress in Virginia's 10th district. But you wouldn't know that based on a Democratic super PAC web ad targeting the race.

Clinton, the former secretary of state and likely presidential contender in 2016, is featured prominently in a House Majority PAC web ad released Monday that looks to target Barbara Comstock, the Republican nominee for the northern Virginia seat.

On the campaign trail, Comstock has heralded her role as chief investigative counsel for the House

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Committee on Government Reform during former President Bill Clinton's second term in office. Comstock was a thorough investigator and headed a number of high-profile investigations into Clinton White House affairs.

While some turned up malfeasance, others didn't and Clinton loyalists have labels Comstock a serial and professional Clinton-hater.

"Barbara Comstock's running for Congress, hell-bent on smearing Hillary Clinton," said a narrator in the House Majority PAC ad.

The ad goes on to say that Comstock is "almost unhinged in her passion to bring down the Clintons," citing a book by David Brock, a Clinton defender.

"Regardless of Clinton's political future, Virginians deserve a representative who will focus on them, not a long-standing political vendetta," Matt Thornton, communications director for the PAC, said in a statement.

CNN attempted to contact the Comstock campaign for a comment about the ad, but did not receive a response.

The ad is paired with a simple website, StandingWithHillary.com . On the website, visitors are asked to register with their email and postal code.

Comstock has not been shy in her desire to continue to investigate the Clintons. She told delegates at the Virginia state Republican convention that if elected, she would try to get to the bottom the September 11, 2012 terror attack on a U.S. compound in Benghazi, Libya that killed four Americans. The attack, which occurred while Clinton was secretary of state, has continued to dog her since she left the office in 2013.

Clinton has been more open about her presidential aspirations of late. Widely seen the frontrunner for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016, the former first lady is already getting hit in campaign ads from the right.

Comstock will face off against John Foust, the Democratic nominee for the seat, in November. Both are vying to replace the retiring Rep. Frank Wolf.

Huffington Post opinion: Peter Rosenstein: "Clinton and Obama on Martha's Vineyard; Much Ado about Nothing"

By Peter D. Rosenstein

August 18, 2014, 11:07 a.m. EDT

It always amazes me when the media makes a huge deal out of nothing yet misses the real point of a story.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

An example is the recent flap over Hillary Clinton disagreeing with President Obama over foreign policy issues. The real story is how Hillary views America's role in the world and not whether she offends Barack Obama while talking about that.

We know what his vision is and we elected him based on it even if there are now some misgivings about that in certain sectors of the electorate. We knew when we elected Obama that foreign policy wasn't his strong point and he had little experience in that area. But we liked his vision for the world. When the Clinton campaign released their "3 a.m. Phone Call" commercial there was some laughter about it. Clearly enough primary voters didn't think her claim to more extensive experience was enough to make a difference and they supported Obama.

Obama and supporters like David Axelrod made disparaging remarks about Clinton at the time suggesting that all her meetings with world leaders amounted to being at a lot of tea parties. Samantha Powers, currently the US Ambassador to the UN, then an Obama campaign worker, said about Hillary in a 2008 interview with The Scotsman, "She is a monster, too -- that is off the record -- she is stooping to anything... if you are poor and she is telling you some story about how Obama is going to take your job away, maybe it will be more effective. The amount of deceit she has put forward is really unattractive." Clinton hater Maureen Dowd chimed in recently, "After buoying Hillary, Obama is learning the truth of another unofficial slogan in politics: "The Clintons will be there when they need you." Yet despite the attacks in 2008 and proving Dowd lives in a fantasy land, both Hillary and Bill Clinton worked hard to elect Obama after Clinton lost to him in the 2008 primary and Hillary went to work for him for four years. Many credit Bill's 2012 convention speech and his barnstorming the county with giving Obama the added momentum to win his 2012 reelection. That is what you do in politics when the campaign is over.

So reporting should be focused on Clinton's ideas on foreign policy and how she will handle various crisis and not whether the President will be offended if she differs with him. She will differ in some areas and like it or not she has a record on these issues. She stood by Obama for four years as his Secretary of State and kept their differences between them. No one can say she wasn't a good ally and a good spokesperson for the decisions that Obama made.

Today Hillary is viewed as the future and Obama shortly will become the past. It looks more and more like she will be a candidate for President in 2016 and there are times she will stand up for what Obama has done and at others she will make her differing positions clear. The American people deserve no less. They are entitled to know where she differs with him if she is going to ask for their vote.

It isn't Hillary's fault that we have this long drawn out election process. At this stage before the 2008 election Obama was already out there putting together his campaign and telling people why they should elect him. Hillary is entitled to do no less. She wrote a book in which she outlined differences she had with Obama and while some like Axelrod seem to question why she did this book tour it seems a little like sour grapes on his part. I don't think his views are that of the President who understands better than anyone else the vagaries of running for President.

I am a strong Hillary Rodham Clinton supporter but even I want to understand where she is today on the issues and how she will lead America. Things have changed since 2008 when she last laid out her vision for the nation.

President Obama brought us back from the brink of a deep depression to an economy that is starting to gain momentum. But issues surrounding our foreign policy are not so clear. We are the world's only remaining super power and don't have the luxury of being isolationist. We need a foreign policy that is robust but takes into consideration that the American people will not support sending our military into another war. For the next year and a half President Obama as Commander in Chief will be making decisions. But there will be a presidential campaign going forward, hopefully including Hillary, and she must tell us how she views the world and America's place in it. Hillary cannot be hamstrung in telling us what she believes because she is worried about offending the President.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I think he fully understands the position she is in and I believe he will respect why she needs to make her differences with him public.

Wall Street Journal blog: Speakeasy: "Watch 'House of Cards' Cad Frank Underwood Prank-Call Hillary Clinton"

By Lyneka Little

August 18, 2014, 9:00 a.m. EDT

Spoiler Alert: Frank Underwood spends time in the White House prank calling Hillary Clinton.

The Clinton Foundation shared a video of Kevin Spacey impersonating Frank Underwood impersonating Bill Clinton as a part of a spoof leading up to the 68th birthday of the former president.

"Washington, D.C. is so boring during summer that I like to entertain myself by having some, well, fun with my predecessors," Spacey in character as Underwood from "House of Cards" tells the camera from the Oval Office before phoning Hillary Clinton at a rectangular office.

Doing his best Bill Clinton impersonation, Spacey tries to get Hillary to reveal the former president's birthday gift. Unfortunately, has about as much luck as getting Clinton to reveal her presidential plans. The former Senator and Secretary of State refuses to divulge what she will be getting her husband for his birthday on Tuesday, August 19.

And, in the spoof, Spacey is unable to sell Clinton on convincing Chelsea to name the couple's first grandchild Frank or Claire.

Check out the video below.

[VIDEO]

People Magazine: "Kevin Spacey Prank Calls Hillary Clinton as Frank Underwood (VIDEO)"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Alex Heigl

August 17, 2014, 6:30 p.m. EDT

This one gets complicated, so bear with us: The Clinton Foundation just released this video of Kevin Spacey as his House of Cards character Frank Underwood phoning Hillary Clinton as Bill Clinton, and it's hilarious. Still with us? Okay, read on.

Spacey-as-Underwood-as-Clinton asks Hillary for an elephant for his 68th birthday (which is Aug. 19) – likely a reference to Hillary and Chelsea's pleas to stop elephant poaching – then listens as Hillary talks about her possible presidential bid. (He also suggests some names for Chelsea's baby, "Frank" notably among them.)

It's hardly the first time Spacey's brought Underwood into the real world for a laugh: He addressed Emmy viewers as Underwood last year and briefly slipped into the accent while presenting at the Oscars in March.

Elle: "Kevin Spacey Prank Called Hillary Clinton as Frank Underwood"

By Victoria Dawson Hoff

August 18, 2014, 10:00 a.m. EDT

As his presenting gig at this year's Oscars ceremony proved, Kevin Spacey certainly doesn't mind channeling his alter-ego Frank Underwood beyond the set of House of Cards. But that doesn't make this latest spoof video any less amazing—especially since Hillary Clinton got in on the action, too. In honor of husband Bill Clinton's birthday tomorrow, the former Secretary of State teamed up with the actor to film a prank call scene in the style of the Netflix show. It is, in a word, brilliant:

[VIDEO]

From the "oval office" vs. "rectangular office" denotation in the beginning, to the Frank and Bill text exchange at the end, this might be the best video we never asked for. Regardless of political leanings, no one can really deny that the Clintons just really get the whole meta, viral thing.

And we have to echo our favorite fictional President and say happy birthday in advance to the former actual President! We'll keep an eye out for a baby elephant.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Devine Mulvey Longabaugh" <julian@devinemulvey.com>
To: John <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 6/13/2013 8:25:56 AM
Subject: Two Big Wins for Devine Mulvey Longabaugh

Devine Mulvey Longabaugh (DML) is excited to announce two major victories in recent weeks for the new firm.

View this email in your browser

DEVINEMULVEYLONGABAUGH

Two Big Wins for Devine Mulvey Longabaugh

A Mayoral Primary Upset, and Nuclear Plant shutdown

Washington, DC—June 13---- Devine Mulvey Longabaugh (DML) is excited to announce two major victories in recent weeks for the new firm.

On May 22, mayoral candidate Eric Papenfuse stunned Harrisburg, PA's political class by winning the Democratic primary against incumbent Mayor Linda Thompson and City Controller Dan Miller. Initially, polls had Papenfuse in third place behind Mayor Thompson and 27 points behind Miller. Papenfuse ran a smart campaign tying his opponents together and becoming the only voice for change. Papenfuse won 38% of the vote, defeating both Miller (32%) and Thompson (28%) in what The Patriot News called, "the most hotly contested Harrisburg Mayoral race in 30 years."

See Papenfuse's ads here:
http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=LHGF2jddw_k

Last Friday, Southern California Edison announced they will permanently shut down the San Onofre Nuclear Power Plant. Over the last year and a half, Mark Longabaugh has worked with Friends of the Earth on a campaign to keep San Onofre shut down. With the help of his former partner and the partners of DML, Longabaugh produced a series of TV ads and mobile billboards highlighting the danger of the San Onofre plant and nuclear power. The announcement by SCE that they will close San Onofre is a huge and stunning victory for Friends of the Earth and opponents of nuclear power.

See Mark's latest ad here:
http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=kG1DuEZM17M

Devine Mulvey Longabaugh is a Washington, DC based Democratic Media Consulting firm. Together, its partners have produced advertising and advised 25 winning U.S. Senate and gubernatorial races, 22 winning US House races, 10 winning campaigns for president and prime minister around the world, and 57 winning State Senate and Representative races across America.

You can see their work here:
www.dmlmessage.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Copyright © 2013 Devine Mulvey, All rights reserved.
Sign Up

Our mailing address is:
Devine Mulvey
2141 Wisconsin Avenue Northwest, Washington, DC
Suite H
Washington, DC 20007

Add us to your address book
unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences

MailChimp

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Joshua Dorner" <jdorner@americanprogress.org>
To:	bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date:	10/19/2010 6:55:28 AM
Subject:	[big campaign] TP: 'US' Chamber Of Commerce Hosts Seminars With Chinese Gov Officials To Teach American Firms How To Outsource

http://thinkprogress.org/2010/10/19/chamber-chinese-seminar/

'US' Chamber Of Commerce Hosts Seminars With Chinese Gov Officials To Teach American Firms How To Outsource

Among the many lies told by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce recently, chief Chamber lobbyist Bruce Josten said that his organization's foreign affiliates, called AmChams, are only "comprised of American companies doing business abroad in those countries." In fact, the Chinese AmCham is comprised of Chinese firms like Northern Light Venture Capital ; the AmCham in Russia is comprised of Russian state-run companies like VTB Bank ; and, the AmCham of Abu Dhabi is comprised of UAE state-run oil companies.

The ties between the AmChams and the U.S. Chamber are deep. In addition to sharing staff members, the Chinese AmCham has worked closely with the U.S. Chamber and the Chinese government to sponsor a series of seminars in America to teach American businesses how to outsource jobs to China (called the China Grassroots Program). Below is an invite to an event sponsored by the right-wing billionaire Sheldon Adelson, inviting local businesses in Florida to come to Jacksonville and learn about outsourcing from Chinese government officials like Li Haiyan, the Counselor for Economic Affairs for the People's Republic of China, U.S. Chamber lobbyist Joseph Fawkner, and BChinaB, a firm that specializes in helping American firms outsource their manufacturing jobs to China. Click the screenshot below for the invitation:

8:50a.m.-10:00a.m. China Business Fundamentals: An on-the-ground perspective

Moderator: Joseph Fawkner, U.S. Chamber of Commerce

Hank Levine, Senior Vice President, Stonebridge International

Jeremy Haft, Author of All the Tea in China and Chairman, BChinaB Inc.

Similar events like the one above continued into 2009 and beyond.

The Chamber's CEO, Tom Donohue, frequently defends outsourcing: for example, in 2004, he said "there are legitimate values in outsourcing — not only jobs, but work." Recently, the Chamber came out against a Senate bill that would have discouraged outsourcing. As Campaign Money Watch report found that more than 1.4 million jobs were outsourced since 1994 in the nine states in which the U.S. Chamber of Commerce is spending significant money.

Separately from their relationship with the AmCham affiliates, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce receives direct foreign donations to the same 501(c)(6) political account the Chamber is using to run an unprecedented $75 million attack ad campaign against progressives. In an exclusive investigation, ThinkProgress documented over 80 foreign firms donating at least $885,000 to the Chamber's 501(c)(6) account. As ThinkProgress' Brad Johnson noted , many of these foreign supporters of the Chamber financing its 501(c)(6) are also some of the world's largest outsourcing companies.

Josh Dorner
Communications Director, Progressive Media
tel 202.481.8153
cel 202.679.7570

--

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail dubois.sara@gmail.com with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "John Anzalone" <john@algpolling.com>
To: "Jake Sullivan" <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com>
"Mandy Grunwald" <gruncom@aol.com>
re47@hillaryclinton.com
Date: 2/8/2016 2:08:35 PM
Subject: Re: Agenda for 5:30 Post NH Messaging Call - TESTING SUGGESTIONS

I would heavily lean into the "reality" lane here when testing the contrasts. I would not test any language or issue we would not have her, a close campaign surrogate or Jen's shop convey.

John Anzalone

Partner

Anzalone Liszt Grove Research

(o) 334.387.3121

Website | Twitter | LinkedIn | Facebook

From: Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: Monday, February 8, 2016 at 2:36 PM
To: Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com>, Robby Mook <re47@hillaryclinton.com>
Cc: Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com>, David Binder <david@db-research.com>, David Dixon <david@dixondavismedia.com>, Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>, Jim Margolis <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>, Joel Beneneson <Jbenenson@bsgco.com>, John Anzalone <john@algpolling.com>, "john.podesta@gmail.com" <john.podesta@gmail.com>, Navin Nayak <nnayak@hillaryclinton.com>, Oren Shur <oshur@hillaryclinton.com>, Rich Davis <rich@dixondavismedia.com>, "jandrews@jacompany.com" <jandrews@jacompany.com>
Subject: RE: Agenda for 5:30 Post NH Messaging Call - TESTING SUGGESTIONS

As phrased it's misleading.

Some of it is truly nuclear, like the women paragraph.

From: Mandy Grunwald [mailto:gruncom@aol.com]
Sent: Monday, February 8, 2016 3:21 PM
To: jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com; re47@hillaryclinton.com
Cc: dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com; david@db-research.com; david@dixondavismedia.com; jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com; jim.margolis@gmmb.com; jbenenson@bsgco.com; john@algpolling.com; john.podesta@gmail.com; nnayak@hillaryclinton.com; oshur@hillaryclinton.com; rich@dixondavismedia.com; jandrews@jacompany.com
Subject: Re: Agenda for 5:30 Post NH Messaging Call - TESTING SUGGESTIONS

True…but they are attacking her with Crime Bill, Monica Lewinsky, bankruptcy and all kinds of ancient stuff. He always brags about never changing positions -- why not use the old stuff to prove how wacky this thinking is?

Mandy Grunwald
Grunwald Communications
202-973-9400

-----Original Message-----
From: Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com>
To: Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com>; re47 <re47@hillaryclinton.com>
Cc: Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com>; david <david@db-research.com>; david <david@dixondavismedia.com>; Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>; jim.margolis <jim.margolis@gmmb.com>; jbenenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com>; john <john@algpolling.com>; john.podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com>; Navin Nayak <nnayak@hillaryclinton.com>; Oren Shur <oshur@hillaryclinton.com>; rich <rich@dixondavismedia.com>; jandrews <jandrews@jacompany.com>
Sent: Mon, Feb 8, 2016 3:19 pm
Subject: RE: Agenda for 5:30 Post NH Messaging Call - TESTING SUGGESTIONS

Some of the hard contrast is stuff from a very long time ago. The second graf makes it sound like he is currently proposing those things. Same for the national security graf.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: Mandy Grunwald [mailto:gruncom@aol.com]
Sent: Monday, February 8, 2016 3:14 PM
To: re47@hillaryclinton.com
Cc: dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com ; david@db-research.com ; david@dixondavismedia.com ; jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com ; jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com ; jim.margolis@gmmb.com ; jbenenson@bsgco.com ; john@algpolling.com ; john.podesta@gmail.com ; nnayak@hillaryclinton.com ; oshur@hillaryclinton.com ; rich@dixondavismedia.com ; jandrews@jacompany.com
Subject: Re: Agenda for 5:30 Post NH Messaging Call - TESTING SUGGESTIONS

Jim Andrews and I have been pouring through the oppo and have a couple new possible negatives to suggest we test in the poll, since most of our attacks haven't been working. We also proposed language for a split message test between where we've been (ideas that sound good on paper/can't wait) versus the new no barriers message -- stacked up against Sanders

Hope these are helpful.

YOU PAY FOR SOCIALISM

Bernie Sanders says he wants to restructure America's economy to make it work like it does in the socialist countries of Europe, providing things like free health care for everyone, free college for everyone, and free increases in Social Security for everyone. But Sanders does not mention that the middle class picks up the bill in these countries, paying nearly sixty percent of their income in taxes, three times what middle class Americans pay now.

FREE STUFF FOR EVERYBODY

Bernie Sanders said –quote– "all necessities of life must be provided free for people," and over the years he's proposed a radical restructuring of the entire American economy to make many things free, from the gas for people's cars to telephones and now free college and health care. To do this, Sanders proposed the complete government takeover of all oil companies, gas companies, electric utility companies, phone companies, health care companies, and all television networks. Combined, Sanders proposals would put the government in control of more than half of the American economy, but Sanders has never told anyone who would pay for all of this or how it would work.

SPEND, TAX AND COVER IT UP

Bernie Sanders' spending plans cost at least eighteen trillion dollars, would increase government spending by 50% and equal the size of the current national debt. And it's actually worse. Experts say Sanders health care plan alone is quote –twice as expensive as he says it is and they say Sanders plans would increase middle class taxes by one third, even for people making less than nineteen thousand a year, and Sanders plans would raise the top tax rate to seventy seven percent. The Boston Globe said –quote "Sanders is not leveling with voters" about the real cost of his spending plans.

EXTREME ON NATIONAL SECURITY

Bernie Sanders' extreme views would gut America's national security and make less safe. Sanders ran for Congress calling for the military budget to be cut by more than half and spending the money on a "major electrified rail system" instead. In Washington, Sanders sponsored a law to unilaterally terminate America's entire nuclear weapons program and sponsored another law to cut the nuclear submarine fleet in half. In Congress, Sanders proposed massive cuts in the intelligence budget and earlier said we should shut down the entire CIA because –quote they "might even be able to overthrow the U.S. government if they chose to." Sanders is so ideologically committed to military cuts that just last year he said –quote we shouldn't spend money on the military "even if it does create jobs."

TROUBLING PATTERN ON CAMPAIGNING

Bernie Sanders says he's running a different kind of campaign, but the record tells another story. Last year a Sanders affiliated political action committee was fined by the federal election commission and Sanders staffers were caught hacking into computers and stealing data on political opponents. This year, Sanders got caught running ads that said he was endorsed by newspapers that actually endorsed his opponent and was forced to remove ads from the air. Sanders got caught claiming endorsements from organizations that endorsed his opponent and the American Legion is now threatening to sue him for falsely claiming he has their support.

TROUBLING PATTERN ON WOMEN

Bernie Sanders says he supports women's rights, but has a pattern of expressing and tolerating extreme views on women. Sanders once wrote that men fantasize about women being on their knees and women fantasize about being raped by three men simultaneously. Sanders wrote another article that connecting women's sexual behavior to breast cancer and said the way parents teach their daughter about sex –quote– "very well determine whether or not she will develop breast cancer." Now Sanders' supporters are flooding the internet with troubling comments about women quote –voting with their vaginas– and calling women who support Hillary Clinton quote –bitches.

BERNIE VS HRC MESSAGE TEST

BERNIE

Bernie Sanders says we have a corporate establishment whose greed is destroying the economy and a corrupt political establishment beholden to billionaires. Sanders says the billionaire class can't get huge tax breaks and hide profits overseas while the middle class is being hollowed out. Sanders says corporate America and the billionaire class have to start paying their fair share, and that to change things we need a political revolution to undo the power of corporate America and Wall Street. You sure can't change a corrupt system by taking its money. Sanders says one person alone can't change this country, but we can do it together.

HRC: BARRIERS

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton says we need to break down barriers of social injustice. Clinton says racism and sexism and other forms discrimination are not simply an effect of economic inequality, but are also part of the cause of economic inequality. Clinton says she will hold Wall Street accountable, but Wall Street is not gunning down young African Americans or denying immigrants a path to citizenship. Clinton says we can't move forward when women make seventy eight cents for each dollar men make, when people can be fired just because they're gay or when African American men go to prison at the same rate they graduate college. Clinton says that America can't reach its full potential when you're held back from reaching yours.

HRC CAN'T WAIT

Hillary Clinton says she is not interested in ideas that sound good on paper but will never make it the real world, and she won't make promises she can't keep. Clinton says the single mom who needs raise can't wait for plans that will never happen. The student with a mountain of debt can't wait. The grandmother who has to choose between paying for medicine and paying the rent can't wait. Clinton says she's spent a lifetime making a difference for people and getting results, from winning benefits for the National Guard and Reserve to winning health care for eight million children and she's ready to roll up her sleeves and get to work right now. Clinton says she's ready to tackle our toughest challenges and move our country forward.

Mandy Grunwald
Grunwald Communications
202-973-9400

-----Original Message-----
From: Robby Mook (via Google Docs) <drive-shares-noreply@google.com >
To: gruncom <gruncom@aol.com >
Cc: dschwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >; david <david@db-research.com >; david <david@dixondavismedia.com >; jsullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com >; jpalmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com >; jim.margolis <jim.margolis@gmmb.com >; jbenenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com >; john <john@algpolling.com >; john.podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >; nnayak <nnayak@hillaryclinton.com >; oshur <oshur@hillaryclinton.com >; rich <rich@dixondavismedia.com >
Sent: Sun, Feb 7, 2016 4:19 pm
Subject: Agenda for 5:30 Post NH Messaging Call

Robby Mook has attached the following document:

Agenda for 4:30 Post NH Messaging Call

Attached is an agenda/guide for our 5:30 call.

Google Docs: Create and edit documents online.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: Tikkun <magazine@tikkun.org>
To: Podesta@Law.Georgetown.Edu
Date: 10/21/2015 7:52:33 AM
Subject: The War Against Youth in the U.S.: cultural, economic, political, creating the groundwork for authoritarianism

Tikkun { tē-kün } to heal, repair, and transform the world

Editor's note: Please send this remarkable article by Henry Giroux to everyone you know under age forty--this article will help illuminate the situation they face in the U.S. today--and while you are at it, let them know about Tikkun www.tikkun.org, the NSP, and our Environmental and Social Respnsibility Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Perhaps the most drastic element of the war on youth in the U.S. is the willingness of the powerful to continue to squander the resources of the planet earth and destroy the life-support system of the planet. Having abandoned hope in any real transformation of the world, the powerful are willing to continue to amass wealth and power and to ignore all the scientific data that shows that if we continue in the path that we've been on for the past several hundred years, the youth of today will be suffering an environmental catastrophe brought on by the selfishness, materialism, chauvinistic nationalism that together are the consequences of global capitalism. Yet the war on youth today has the consequence of making many of them less willing to embrace the kind of seemingly utopian transformations of our society without which the logic of the capitalist order will continue and may yet yield a fascistic outcome to protect the powerful from the righteous indignation of those who will be suffering through the decline of the earth in the next fifty years. That's why the ESRA--Environmental and Social Responsibility Amendment is at once so important (read it please at www.tikkun.org/esra) and so frequently dismissed as "too visionary to be relaistic." Yet it is actually the most modest first step in the transition from a capitalist society to The Caring Society--Caring for Each Other and Caring for the Earth.--

Rabbi Michael Lerner rabbilerner.tikkun@gmail.com

Youth in an Authoritarian Age: Challenging the politics of disposability by Henry Giroux

Following the insight of Hannah Arendt, a leading political theorist of mid-20th century totalitarianism, a dark cloud of political and ethical ignorance has descended upon the United States. (1) Thoughtlessness, a primary condition of authoritarian rule, now occupies a privileged, if not celebrated, place in the political landscape and the mainstream cultural apparatuses. A new kind of infantilism now shapes daily life as adults gleefully take on the role of unthinking children, while children are pushed to be adults, stripped of their innocence and subject to a range of disciplinary pressures that saddle them with debt and cripple their ability to be imaginative. (2)

Under such circumstances, agency devolves into a mind-numbing anti-intellectualism evident in the banalities produced by Fox News infotainment and celebrity culture, and in the blinding rage produced by populist politicians who support creationism, argue against climate change and rail against immigration, the rights of women, public service workers, gay people and countless others. There is more at work here than a lethal form of intellectual, political and emotional infantilism. There is also a catastrophe of indifference and inattentiveness that breeds flirtations with irrationality, fuels the spectacle of violence, creates an embodied incapacity and promotes the withering of public life.

The citizen is now urged to become a consumer, politicians are now mouthpieces for money and power (3) and the burgeoning army of anti-public intellectuals in the mainstream media present themselves as unapologetic enemies of compassion, the commons and democracy itself. Education is no longer viewed as a public good but as a private right, and critical thinking is no longer valued as a fundamental necessity for creating engaged and socially responsible citizens. Neoliberalism's contempt for the social is now matched by an utter disdain for the common good. Public spheres that once encouraged progressive ideas, enlightened social policies, democratic values, critical dialogue and exchange have been replaced by corporate entities whose ultimate fidelity is to increasing profit margins and producing a vast commercial culture "that tends to function so as to erase everything that matters."(4)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

One outcome of this tangle of forces is that we live at a time in which institutions that were designed to limit human suffering and indignity and protect the public from the boom-and-bust cycles of capitalist markets have been either been weakened or abolished. (5) Free market policies, values and practices, with their now unrestrained emphasis on the privatization of public wealth, the denigration of social protections and the deregulation of economic activity, influence practically every commanding political and economic institution in North America. Finance capitalism now drives politics, governance and policy in unprecedented ways and is more than willing to sacrifice the future of young people for short-term political and economic gains.

Nation-states organized by neoliberal priorities have implicitly declared war on their children.

Given these conditions, an overwhelming catalogue of evidence has come into view that indicates that nation-states organized by neoliberal priorities have implicitly declared war on their children, offering a disturbing index of societies in the midst of a deep moral and political catastrophe. (6) Far too many youth today live in an era of foreclosed hope, an era in which it is difficult either to imagine a life beyond the dictates of a market-driven society or to transcend the fear that any attempt to do so can only result in a more dreadful nightmare. As Jennifer Silva has pointed out, this generation of especially "young working-class men and women … are trying to figure out what it means to be an adult in a world of disappearing jobs, soaring education costs and shrinking social support networks…. They live at home longer, spend more years in college, change jobs more frequently and start families later." (7)

Youth today are not only plagued by the fragility and uncertainty of the present; they are also "the first post war generation facing the prospect of downward mobility [in which the] plight of the outcast stretches to embrace a generation as a whole." (8) It is little wonder that "these youngsters are called Generation Zero: A generation with Zero opportunities, Zero future," and zero expectations. (9) Or to use Guy Standing's term, "the precariat," (10) which he defines as "a growing proportion of our total society" forced to "accept a life of unstable labour and unstable living." (11) Too many young people and other vulnerable groups now inhabit what might be called a geography of terminal exclusion, a space of disposability that extends its reach to a growing number of individuals and groups.

The human face of those who inhabit this geography of exclusion has been captured in a story told by Chip Ward, a former librarian in Salt Lake City, who writes poignantly about a homeless woman he calls Ophelia, who retreats to the library because like many homeless people she has nowhere else to go to use the bathroom, secure temporary relief from bad weather or simply be able to rest. Excluded from the American dream and treated as both expendable and a threat, Ophelia, in spite of her obvious mental illness, defines her own existence in terms that offer a chilling metaphor for her own plight and those of many others. Ward describes Ophelia's presence and actions in the following way:

> Ophelia sits by the fireplace and mumbles softly, smiling and gesturing at no one in particular. She gazes out the large window through the two pairs of glasses she wears, one windshield-sized pair over a smaller set perched precariously on her small nose. Perhaps four lenses help her see the invisible other she is addressing. When her "nobody there" conversation disturbs the reader seated beside her, Ophelia turns, chuckles at the woman's discomfort, and explains, "Don't mind me, I'm dead. It's okay. I've been dead for some time now." She pauses, then adds reassuringly, "It's not so bad. You get used to it." Not at all reassured, the woman gathers her belongings and moves quickly away. Ophelia shrugs. Verbal communication is tricky. She prefers telepathy, but that's hard to do since the rest of us, she informs me, "don't know the rules." (my emphasis) (12)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ophelia represents just one of the 3.5 million people who are homeless at some point in the year in the United States, many of whom use public libraries and any other accessible public spaces to find shelter. Many are women and children; they are often sick, disoriented and suffering from substance abuse or mental health issues, and many are barely able to cope with the stress, insecurity and dangers they face every day. And while Ophelia's comments may be dismissed as the ramblings of a mentally ill woman, they speak to something much deeper about the current state of US society and its desertion of entire populations who are now considered the human waste of a neoliberal economic order.

People who were once viewed as facing dire problems and in need of social protection are now seen as a problem threatening society. This becomes clear when the war on poverty is transformed into a war against the poor, when the plight of the homeless is defined less as a political and economic issue in need of social reform than as a matter of law and order or when government budgets for prison construction eclipse funds for higher education.

"Problem People"

The transformation of the social state into the corporate-controlled punishing state is made startlingly clear when young people, to rephrase W.E.B. Du Bois, become*problem people* rather than people who face problems. Young people, especially low-income and poor people of color, are now viewed as trouble rather than being seen as facing troubles. As such, they are increasingly subject to the dictates of the criminal legal system rather than subject to assistance from social programs that could address their most basic needs.

If youth were once the repository of society's dreams, that is no longer true.

Beyond exposing the moral depravity of a society that fails to provide for its youth, the symbolic and real violence waged against many young people reflects nothing less than a collective death wish – especially visible when youth protest their conditions. As Alain Badiou argues, we live in an era in which there is near zero tolerance for democratic resistance and "infinite tolerance for the crimes of bankers and government embezzlers which affect the lives of millions." (13) How else to explain the FBI's willingness to label as a "terrorist threat" youthful activists speaking against corporate and government misdeeds, while at the same time the Bureau refuses to press criminal charges against the banking giant HSBC for laundering billions of dollars for Mexican drug cartels and terrorist groups linked to al-Qaeda?(14) Equally disturbing are the revelations that the Department of Homeland Security, which was "created in large part to combat terrorism," has put under surveillance members of the Black Lives Matter movement who have been organizing against the racist conditions producing police violence against Black people in the United States. (15)

If youth were once the repository of society's dreams, that is no longer true. Increasingly, young people are viewed as a public disorder, a dream now turned into a nightmare. Many youth are forced to negotiate a post-9/11 social order that positions them as a prime target of its "governing through crime" complex. Consider the many "get tough" policies that now render young people criminals, while depriving them of basic health care, education and social services. Punishment and fear have replaced compassion and social responsibility as the most important modalities for mediating the relationship of youth to the larger society, all too evident by the upsurge of zero-tolerance laws in schools along with the expanding reach of the punishing state in the United States. (16) When the criminalization of social problems becomes a mode of governance and war its default strategy, youth are reduced to soldiers or targets – not social investments. As anthropologist Alain Bertho points out, "Youth is no longer considered the world's future, but as a threat to its present." (17)

Increasingly, the only political discourses available to many young people derive from privatized regimes of self-discipline and “emotional self-management.” (18) Youth are now removed from any meaningful register of democracy. Their absence is symptomatic of a society that has turned against itself, punishing its children at the risk of bringing down the entire body politic. What I call the war on youth emerged in its contemporary forms when the social contract, however compromised and feeble, came crashing to the ground around the time Margaret Thatcher “married” Ronald Reagan. Both were hard-line advocates of a market fundamentalism, and announced, respectively, that there was no such thing as society and that government was the problem not the solution to citizens’ woes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Within a decade, democracy and the political process were hijacked by corporations and the call for austerity policies became a cheap copy for weakening the welfare state, public values and public goods. The results of this emerging neoliberal regime included a widening gap between the rich and the poor, a growing culture of cruelty and the dismantling of social provisions. One result has been that the promise of youth has given way to an age of market-induced angst, and a view of many young people as a drain on short-term investments and a threat to untrammeled self-interest and quick profits.

Many young people are being depoliticized because they are struggling just to survive, not only materially but also existentially.

The war on youth is spreading out across the United States. How else might we explain the United States’ turning of schools into training centers, modeling many after prisons, or promoting the rise of pedagogies of repression such as teaching to the test and high-stakes testing, all in the name of educational reform? What is the role of education in a democracy when a society burdens an entire generation with high tuition costs and student loans? I think David Graeber is right in arguing, “Student loans are destroying the imagination of youth. If there’s a way of a society committing mass suicide, what better way than to take all the youngest, most energetic, creative, joyous people in your society and saddle them with, like $50,000 of debt so they have to be slaves? There goes your music. There goes your culture…. We’re a society that has lost any ability to incorporate the interesting, creative and eccentric people.” (19) What he does not say is that many young people are also being depoliticized because they are struggling just to survive, not only materially but also existentially.

Under such circumstances, all bets are off regarding the future of democracy. What is also being lost in the current historical conjuncture is the very idea of interpersonal responsibility, a commitment to the collective good, a democratic notion of the commons, the idea of connecting learning to social improvement and the promise of a robust democracy dedicated to a full measure of personal, political and economic rights. Under the regime of a ruthless economic Darwinism, we are witnessing the crumbling of social bonds and the triumph of individual desires over social rights, nowhere more exemplified than in the growth of civic illiteracy, gated minds in gated communities, simplistic intolerance, atrophied social skills, a culture of cruelty and a downward spiral into the dark recesses of an oligarchic social order. Children pay most acutely for this. Consider that the United States is the only country in the world that has refused to ratify the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, which calls for “a commitment to promote and respect the human rights of children, including the right to life, to health, to education and to play, as well as the right to family life, to be protected from violence and from any form of discrimination.” (20)

Politics is now driven by a much-promoted hypercompetitive ideology with a message that surviving in society demands reducing social relations to forms of social combat. Too many young people today learn quickly that their fate is solely a matter of individual responsibility, irrespective of wider structural forces. As such, politics has become an extension of war, just as “systemic economic insecurity and anxiety” and state-sponsored violence increasingly find legitimation in the discourses of austerity, privatization and demonization, which promote anxiety, moral panics and fear, and undermine any sense of communal responsibility for the well-being of others. The curse of privatization in a consumer-driven society is intensified by the market-driven assumption that for young people the only obligation of citizenship is to consume. Yet, there is more at work here than the mechanisms of depoliticization; there is also a flight from social responsibility, if not politics itself. Also lost is the importance of those social bonds, modes of collective reasoning, public spheres and cultural apparatuses crucial to the formation of a sustainable democratic society.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As one eminent sociologist points out, “Visions have nowadays fallen into disrepute and we tend to be proud of what we should be ashamed of.” (21) For instance, politicians, such as former Vice President Dick Cheney, not only refuse to apologize for the immense misery, displacement and suffering they have imposed on the Iraqi people – principally Iraqi children – but also they seem to gloat in defending such policies. Doublespeak takes on a new register as President Obama employs the discourse of national security to sanction a surveillance state, a targeted assassination list and the ongoing killing of young children and their families by drones. This expanding landscape of lies has not only produced an illegal and global war on terror and justified state torture, even against children; it has also provided a justification for the United States’ slide into barbarism after the tragic events of 9/11. Yet, such acts of state violence appear to be of little concern to the shameless apostles of permanent war.

The War Against Youth

In what follows, I want to address the intensifying assault on young people through the related concepts of “soft war” and “hard war.” (22) The idea of the soft war considers the changing conditions of youth within the relentless expansion of a global market society. Partnered with a massive advertising machinery, the soft war targets all children and youth, devaluing them by treating them as yet another “market” to be commodified and exploited, and conscripting them into the system through relentless attempts to create a new generation of hyperconsumers.

This low-intensity war is waged by a variety of corporate institutions through the educational force of a culture that commercializes every aspect of kids’ lives, and now uses the internet and various social networks along with the new media technologies such as smart phones to immerse young people in the world of mass consumption in ways that are more direct and expansive than anything we have seen in the past. Commercially carpet-bombed by an advertising industry that in the United States spent $189 billion in 2012, the typical child is exposed to about 40,000 ads a year and by the time they reach the fourth grade, children have memorized 300 to 400 brands.

Many young people, recast as commodities, can only recognize themselves in terms preferred by the market.

An entire generation is being drawn into a world of consumerism in which commodities and brand loyalty become both the most important markers of*identity* and the primary frameworks for mediating one’s relationship to the world. Increasingly, many young people, recast as commodities, can only recognize themselves in terms preferred by the market. As the sociologist Zygmunt Bauman points out, youth are simultaneously “promoters of commodities and the commodities they promote” – defined as both brands and merchandise, on the one hand, and marketing agents on the other. (23)

What are the consequences of the soft war? Public spaces have been transformed into neoliberal disimagination zones, which make it more difficult for young people to find public spheres where they can locate themselves and translate metaphors of hope into meaningful action. The dreamscapes that make up a society built on the promises of mass consumption translate deftly into ad copy, insistently promoting and normalizing a neoliberal order in which economic relations now provide the master script for how young people define themselves, and their relations with others and the larger world.

The data-mining marketers make young people think they count when in fact “all they want to do is count them.” (24) The dominant culture’s overbearing ecology of consumption now works to selectively eliminate and reorder the possible modes of political, social and ethical vocabularies made available to youth. Young peoples' most private experiences are now colonized by a consumerist ethic that deforms their sense of agency, desires, values and hopes. Trapped within a spectacle of marketing, their capacity to be critically engaged and socially responsible citizens is significantly compromised.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Hard War

The hard war is a more serious and dangerous development for young people, especially those who are marginalized by virtue of their ethnicity, race, gender, sexuality and class. The hard war refers to the harshest elements of a growing youth crime-control complex that operates through a logic of punishment, surveillance and control. The young people targeted by its punitive measures are often poor youth of color who are considered failed consumers and who can only afford to live on the margins of a commercial culture that excludes anybody without money, resources and leisure time. They are youth considered uneducable and unemployable, and therefore troublesome, if not a threat to the existing order.

Poor youth and youth of color become objects of a new mode of governance based on the crudest forms of disciplinary control.

The imprint of the youth crime-control complex can be traced back to the now normative practice of organizing life in schools through disciplinary practices that subject students to constant surveillance through high-tech security devices while imposing on them harsh and often thoughtless zero-tolerance policies that closely resemble measures used by the criminal legal system. In this instance, poor youth and youth of color become objects of a new mode of governance based on the crudest forms of disciplinary control. Punished if they don't show up at school and punished even if they do attend school, many of these students are funneled into what has been ominously called the "school-to-prison pipeline." If middle- and upper-class kids are subject to the seductions of market-driven public relations, working-class youth are caught in the crosshairs between the arousal of commercial desire and the harsh impositions of securitization, surveillance and policing.

How else do we explain the fact that in the United States today 500,000 young people are incarcerated and 2.5 million are arrested annually, and that by the age of 23, "almost a third of Americans have been arrested for a crime"? (25) What kind of society allows 1.6 million children to be homeless at any given time in a year? Or allows massive inequalities in wealth and income to produce a politically and morally dysfunctional society in which "45 percent of U.S. residents live in households that struggle to make ends meet"? (26) Current statistics paint a bleak picture for young people in the richest country in the world. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, "the number of unemployed youth was 2.8 million in July 2015″; (27) 12.5 million are without food; and in what amounts to a national disgrace, one out of every five US children lives in poverty. Nearly half of all US children and 90 percent of Black youngsters will rely on food stamps at some point during childhood. (28)

What are we to make of a society in which there were more young people killed on the streets of Chicago since 2001 then US soldiers killed in Afghanistan? To be more exact, 5,000 were people killed by gunfire in Chicago, many of them children, while 2,000 troops were killed between 2001 and 2012. (29) What kind of society is indifferent to the fact that this country "sees an average of 92 gun deaths per day – [with] more preschoolers … shot dead each year than police officers are killed in the line of duty"? (30) Near weekly mass shootings aside, what has flown under the radar is that in the last four years more than 500 children under the age of 12 were killed by guns.

As the war on terror comes home, public spaces have been transformed into war zones as local police forces have taken on the role of an occupying army, especially in poor neighborhoods of color, accentuated by the fact that the police now have access to armored troop carriers, night-vision-equipped rifles, Humvees, M-16 automatic rifles, grenade launchers and other weapons designed for military tactics. (31) Acting as a paramilitary force, the police have become a new symbol of domestic terrorism, shaking down youth of color and Black communities in general by criminalizing a multitude of behaviors.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The rise of the punishing state and the war on terror has emboldened police forces across the nation.

This was especially true in the stop-and-frisk policies so widespread under former Mayor Michael Bloomberg in New York City. In Ferguson, Missouri, the entire population was subject to a form of legal lawlessness in what can only be described as a practice of racist extortion. Rather than defined as a population to be protected, the largely Black citizens of Ferguson were arrested and fined for being unable to pay their debts, violating trivial rules such as letting their grass grow too high or jaywalking, all of which made them a prime target for the criminal legal system. As a result, the police viewed the Black residents of Ferguson "as potential targets for what can only be described as a shake-down operation designed to wring money out of the poorest and most vulnerable by any means they could, and that as a result, the overwhelming majority of Ferguson's citizens had outstanding warrants." (32)

The rise of the punishing state and the war on terror has emboldened police forces across the nation and in doing so feeds their use of racist violence against young people of color, resulting in what has been called an "epidemic of police brutality." Sadly, even children are not immune to such violence, as the killing of 12-year-old Tamir Rice on November 22, 2014, by a white police officer has made clear. Even more tragic is the fact that the City of Cleveland tried to blame the boy for his own death. (33) Rice was holding a BB gun when he was shot to death by a police officer judged unfit for duty just two years prior. The killing of Black youth and adults has taken on the image of a cruel sport suggestive of a police force spiraling downward into a form of authoritarianism that merges lawlessness with a dangerous form of militarism. (34)

Against the idealistic rhetoric of a government that claims to venerate young people lies the reality of a society that increasingly views youth through the optic of law and order, a society that appears all too willing to treat youth as criminals and when necessary "disappear" them into the farthest reaches of the carceral state. What are we to make of a society that allows New York City Police Department officers to come into a school and arrest, handcuff and haul off a 12-year-old student for doodling on her desk? (35) Or, for that matter, school systems that allow a 6-year-old in Georgia and a 5-year-old kindergarten pupil in Florida to be handcuffed and taken to police stations for having tantrums in their classrooms? (36) Where is the public outrage when two police officers called to a day care center in central Indiana to handle an unruly 10-year-old decide to taser the child? (37) Or when a school administration allows a police officer in Arkansas to use a stun gun to discipline an allegedly out of control 10-year-old girl?

One public response to this incident came from Steve Tuttle, a spokesman for Taser International Inc., who insisted that a "Stun gun can be safely used on children." (38) Sadly, this is but a small sampling of the ways in which children are being punished instead of educated in US schools, especially inner-city schools. All of these examples point to the growing social disregard for young people and the number of institutions willing to employ crime-and-punishment measures that together constitute not only a crisis of education, but the emergence of a new mode of politics that Jonathan Simon has called "governing through crime." (39)

Stolen Childhoods

Of course, we have seen this ruthless crime optic in previous historical periods, but at least crime was followed by attempts at reforms and rehabilitation, not revenge, as characterizes the contemporary criminal legal system. (40) For one historical example of this broader understanding of crime and punishment, I want to turn to Claude Brown, the late African-American novelist, who understood something about this war on youth in its mid-century articulation. Though his novel, Manchild in the Promised Land, takes place in Harlem in the 1940s and 1950s, there is something to be learned from his autobiographical novel. Take for example the following passage:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

> If Reno was in a bad mood – if he didn't have any money and he wasn't high – he'd say, "Man, Sonny, they ain't got no kids in Harlem. I ain't never seen any. I've seen some real small people actin' like kids, but they don't have any kids in Harlem, because nobody has time for a childhood. Man, do you ever remember bein' a kid? Not me. Shit, kids are happy, kids laugh, kids are secure. They ain't scared a nothin'. You ever been a kid, Sonny? Damn, you lucky. I ain't never been a kid, man. I don't ever remember bein' happy and not scared. I don't know what happened, man, but I think I missed out on that childhood thing, because I don't ever recall bein' a kid. (41)

In Manchild in the Promised Land, Brown wrote about the doomed lives of his friends, families and neighborhood acquaintances. The book is mostly remembered as a brilliant, but devastating portrait of Harlem under siege – a community ravaged and broken by heroin, poverty, unemployment, crime and police brutality. But what Brown really brought into focus was that the raw violence and dead-end existence that plagued so many young people in Harlem, stole not only their future but their childhood as well. In the midst of the social collapse and psychological trauma wrought by the systemic fusion of racism and class exploitation, children in Harlem were held hostage to forces that robbed them of the innocence that comes with childhood and forced them to take on the risks and burdens of daily survival that older generations were unable to shield them from.

At the heart of Brown's narrative, written in the midst of the civil rights struggle in the 1960s, is a "manchild," a metaphor that indicts a society that is waging a war on those children who are Black and poor and have been forced to grow up too quickly. The hybridized concept of "manchild" marked a liminal space in which innocence was lost and childhood stolen, and any meaningful sense of adult agency and autonomy was aggressively compromised. Harlem was a well-contained, internal colony and its street life provided the conditions and the very necessity for insurrection. But the many forms of rebellion young people expressed – from the public and progressive to the interiorized and self-destructive – came at a cost, which Brown reveals near the end of the book: "It seemed as though most of the cats that we'd come up with just hadn't made it. Almost everybody was dead or in jail." (42)

Young people are not dissatisfied with democracy but with its absence.

Childhood stolen was not to be salvaged by self-help – that shortsighted and mendacious appeal that would define the reactionary reform efforts of the 1980s and 1990s, from Reagan's hatred of government to Clinton's attack on welfare reform and his "instrumental role in creating one of the world's largest prison systems." (43) At that time, it was a clarion call for condemning a social order that denied children a viable and life-enhancing present and future. While Brown approached everyday life in Harlem more as a poet than as a political revolutionary, politics was embedded in every sentence of the book – not a politics marked by demagoguery, hatred and orthodoxy, but one that made visible the damage done by a social system characterized by massive inequalities and a rigid racial divide. Manchild created the image of a society without children in order to raise questions about the future of a country that had turned its back on its most vulnerable population.

Like the great critical theorist, C. Wright Mills, Brown's lasting contribution was to reconfigure the boundaries between public issues and private suffering. For Brown, racism was about power and oppression – not ignorance, not fear – and could not be separated from broader social, economic and political considerations. Rather than denying systemic causes of injustice (as did the discourses of individual pathology and self-help), Brown insisted that social forces had to be factored into any understanding of both group suffering and individual despair. Brown explored the suffering of the young in Harlem, but he did so by utterly refusing to privatize it, or to dramatize and spectacularize private life over public dysfunction, or to separate individual hopes, desires and agency from the realm of politics and public life.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Fifty years later, Brown's metaphor of the "manchild" is more relevant today than when he wrote the book, and "the Promised Land" more prescient than ever as his revelation about the sorry plight of poor children of color takes on a more expansive meaning in light of the current economic meltdown and the dashed hopes of an entire generation now viewed as a generation without hope for a decent future. Youth today are forced to inhabit a rough world where childhood is nonexistent, and they are crushed under the heavy material and existential burdens they are forced to bear.

Efforts to Break Free

The plight of poor youth of color also extends beyond the severity of material deprivations and violence they experience daily. Many young people have been forced to view the world and redefine the nature of their own youth within the borders of hopelessness, insecurity and despair. There is little basis on which to imagine a better future lying just beyond the highly restrictive spaces of commodification and containment. Neoliberal austerity in social spending means an entire generation of youth will not have access to the decent jobs, material comforts, educational opportunities or security that was available to previous generations. These are a new generation of youth who have to think, act and talk like adults. Many must worry about their family members' inability to find work or about the incarceration of a parent.

In the United States, young people are further burdened by registers of extreme poverty that pose the dire challenge of food security and access to even the most basic health care in communities ravaged by those illnesses and special needs that accrue in impoverished conditions. These young people inhabit a new and more unsettling scene of suffering, a dead zone of the imagination, which constitutes a site of terminal exclusion – one that reveals not only the vast and destabilizing inequalities in neoliberal economic landscapes, but also portends a future that has no purchase on the hope that characterizes a vibrant democracy.

Educators, individuals, artists, intellectuals and various social movements need to make visible both the workings of market fundamentalism "in all of its forms of exploitation whether personal, political, or economic [and they] … need to reconstruct a platform" and a set of strategies to oppose it. (44) Clearly, any political formation that matters must challenge the savage social costs that casino capitalism has enacted and work to undue the forms of social, political and economic violence that young people are daily experiencing. This will demand more than one-day demonstrations. Urgently needed are new public spheres in which there is a resurgence of public memory, civic literacy and civic courage – that is, a willingness to both "effectively analyze the structures and mechanisms of capitalist power [in order] to formulate a sophisticated political response" and the willingness to build longstanding oppositional movements. (45) Traces of such movements are beginning to emerge in the United States among fast-food workers and among students protesting crushing debt and police brutality. These traces are also apparent in the ongoing development of social movements in countries such as Spain and Greece that are rejecting the harsh neoliberal austerity policies imposed by the bankers and global financial elite.

We live at a time in which it is more crucial than ever to imagine a future that does not repeat the present.

In North America, we are seeing important, though inconclusive, attempts on the part of young people to break the hold of unaccountable governmental and financial power. This was evident in the Occupy movement, the Quebec student movement, the Idle No More movement and the Black Lives Matter movement. The New York Times recently reported that people all over the world are losing faith in democracy. What it missed is that young people are not dissatisfied with democracy but with its absence. In the United States, there is a new political momentum to reclaim a real democracy, one that provides all Americans with a livable minimum wage or guaranteed income; removes money from politics; reclaims the commons by reversing the pernicious nature of privatization; reins in the ravaging effects of unfettered casino capitalism; abolishes the bogus concept of corporate personhood; dismantles the permanent warfare state; reverses global warming; redistributes wealth in the interest of a vibrant democracy; nationalizes health care; breaks up the banks; eliminates the punishing-mass incarceration state; and eradicates the surveillance state, among other reforms. (46)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This is a language that says that no society is ever just enough and calls for new collective struggles in the hope of creating a future that refuses to be defined by the dystopian forces now shaping US society. These reforms are both profound and instructive for the time in which we live because they point to the need to think beyond the given, and to think beyond the distorted, market-based hope offered to us by the advocates of casino capitalism. Such thinking rooted in the radical imagination is a central goal of civic education, which, in the words of poet Robert Hass, is "to refresh the idea of justice which is going dead in us all the time." (47)

Current protests in the United States make clear that young people need to enlist all generations to develop a truly global political movement that is accompanied by the reclaiming of public spaces, the progressive use of digital technologies, the production of new modes of education and the safeguarding of places where democratic expression, new civic values, democratic public spheres, new modes of identification and collective hope can be nurtured and developed. A formative culture must be put in place pedagogically and institutionally in a variety of spheres extending from churches and public and higher education to all those cultural apparatuses engaged in the production of collective knowledge, desire, identities and democratic values. Crucial to the success of any collective struggle that matters is the necessity to embrace education as the center of politics and the source of an embryonic vision of the good life outside of the imperatives of unfettered "free-market" capitalism.

There is a need for educators, young people, artists and other cultural workers to develop a language of both critique and hope in which people can address the historical, structural and ideological conditions at the core of the violence being waged by the corporate and repressive state, and to make clear that government increasingly subsumed by global market sovereignty is no longer responsive to the most basic needs of young people. Nowhere will this struggle be more difficult than on the education front, a front in which a long-term organizing effort will have to take place to change consciousness, convince people that capitalism and democracy are not the same thing – and indeed are often in conflict – offer up a new vision of democracy, and create the ideological and collective momentum to create a broad-based social movement that moves beyond single-issue politics.

The issue of who gets to define the future, share in the nation's wealth, shape the parameters of the social state, steward and protect the globe's resources and create a formative culture for producing engaged and socially responsible members of society is not a rhetorical issue. This challenge offers up new categories for defining how matters of representations, education, economic justice and politics are to be defined and fought over. This is a difficult task, but what we are seeing in cities such as New York, Athens, Quebec, Paris, Madrid and other sites of massive inequality throughout the world is the beginning of a long struggle for the institutions, values and infrastructures that make communities the center of a robust, radical democracy.

We live at a time in which it is more crucial than ever to imagine a future that does not repeat the present. Given the urgency of the problems we face – mounting economic inequality, creeping disenfranchisement, the rise of the incarceration state, entrenched racism, the expanding surveillance state, the threat of nuclear destruction, ecological devastation and in the United States, the collapse of democratic governance – I think it is all the more crucial to take seriously the challenge of Jacques Derrida's provocation: "We must do and think the impossible. If only the possible happened, nothing more would happen. If I only did what I can do, I wouldn't do anything." (48)

My friend, the late Howard Zinn, got it right in his insistence that hope is the willingness "to hold out, even in times of pessimism, the possibility of surprise." (49) History is open, and the space of the possible is larger than the one on display.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Footnotes

1. Hannah Arendt, The Origins of Totalitarianism, (Houghton Mifflin Harcourt, New York: 2001).

2. See, for instance, Andre Spicer, “Adults with colouring books, kids with CVs – it’s a world turned upside down,” The Guardian (April 8, 2015). Online:http://www.theguardian.com/commentisfree/2015/apr/08/adults-colouring-books-kids-cvs-lego-children

3. According to a Princeton University Study, American is not a democracy but has devolved into an oligarchy controlled by a financial elite. See, for instance, Martin Gilens and Benjamin I. Page, “Testing Theories of American Politics: Elites, Interest Groups, and Average Citizens,” Perspectives on Politics, 12:3 (September 2014). Online: http://journals.cambridge.org/download.php?file=%2FPPS%2FPPS12_03%2FS1537592714001595a.pdf&code=1a1bc2717f1d6a1491f4e05f6aebbcf2

4. Angela Y. Davis, Abolition Democracy: Beyond Empire, Prisons, and Torture, (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2005), p. 91.

5. This theme is taken up powerfully by a number of theorists. See C. Wright Mills,The Sociological Imagination (New York: Oxford University Press, 2000); Richard Sennett, The Fall of Public Man (New York: Norton, 1974); Zygmunt Bauman, In Search of Politics (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1999); and Henry A. Giroux,Public Spaces, Private Lives (Lanham: Rowman and Littlefield, 2001).

6. J.F. Conway, “Quebec: Making War on Our Children,” Socialist Project, E-Bulletin No. 651, (June 10, 2012). Online: http://www.socialistproject.ca/bullet/651.php

7. Jennifer M. Silva, “Young and Isolated,” International New York Times (June 22, 2013). Online: http://opinionator.blogs.nytimes.com/2013/06/22/young-and-isolated/?_r=0

8. Zygmunt Bauman, On Education, (Cambridge, UK: Polity Press, 2012), p. 46.

9. Zygmunt Bauman, This Is Not A Diary, (Cambridge, UK: Polity Press, 2012), p. 64

10. Guy Standing, The Precariat: The New Dangerous Class, (London, Bloomsbury Academic, 2011).

11. Sara Mojtehedzadeh, “Q&A with precarious work expert Guy Standing,” The Toronto Star, (April 09, 2015). Online:http://www.thestar.com/news/gta/2015/04/09/qa-with-precarious-work-expert-guy-standing.html

12. Chip Ward, “America Gone Wrong: A Slashed Safety Net Turns Libraries into Homeless Shelters,” TomDispatch.com (April 2, 2007). Online:http://www.alternet.org/story/50023

13. Alain Badiou, The Rebirth of History, trans. Gregory Elliott (London: Verso, 2012), pp. 18-19

14. Matt Taibbi, “After Laundering $800 Million in Drug Money, How Did HSBC Executives Avoid Jail?” Democracy Now! (December 13, 2012). Online:http://www.democracynow.org/2012/12/13/matt_taibbi_after_laundering_800_million

15. George Joseph, “Exclusive: Feds Regularly Monitored Black Lives Matter Since Ferguson,” The Intercept (July 24, 2015). Online:https://theintercept.com/2015/07/24/documents-show-department-homeland-security-monitoring-black-lives-matter-since-ferguson/

16. See, for example, David Garland, The Culture of Control: Crime and Social Order in Contemporary Society (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2002); Jonathan Simon, Governing Through Crime: How the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

War on Crime Transformed American Democracy and Created a Culture of Fear (New York: Oxford University Press, 2009); Henry A. Giroux, The Violence of Organized Forgetting (San Francisco: City Lights, 2014); Brad Evans and Henry A. Giroux, Disposable Futures: The Seduction of Violence in the Age of the Spectacle (San Francisco: City Lights, 2015).

17. Quoted in Jean-Marie Durand, "For Youth: A Disciplinary Discourse Only,"Truthout (November 15, 2009), trans. Leslie Thatcher. Online:http://www.truthout.org/11190911

18. Jennifer M. Silva, Coming Up Short: Working-Class Adulthood In An Age of Uncertainty, (Oxford Press, New York, NY, 2013), 10

19. Alexander Reed Kelly, "David Graeber: 'There Has Been a War on the Human Imagination,'" Truthdig, (August 12, 2013). Online:http://www.truthdig.com/avbooth/item/david_graeber_there_has_been_a_war_on_the_human_imagination_20130812/

20. Steve Straehley," Somalia Ratifies Rights of Children Treaty, Leaving United States as only Holdout," AllGov.com (October 04, 2015), Online:http://www.allgov.com/news/us-and-the-world/somalia-ratifies-rights-of-children-treaty-leaving-united-states-as-only-holdout-151004?news=857561

21. Zygmunt Bauman, "Introduction and in Search of Public Space," In Search of Politics (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1999), p. 8.

22. Quoted in Jean-Marie Durand, "For Youth: A Disciplinary Discourse Only,"Truthout (November 15, 2009), trans. Leslie Thatcher. Online:http://www.truthout.org/11190911

23. Zygmunt Bauman, Consuming Life (London: (London: Polity, 2007), p. 6.

24. Zygmunt Bauman and David Lyons, Liquid Surveillance, (Cambridge, UK: Polity Press, 2013), pp. 54.

25. Erica Goode, "Many in US Are Arrested by Age 23, Study Finds," The New York Times (December 19, 2011). Online:http://www.nytimes.com/2011/12/19/us/nearly-a-third-of-americans-are-arrested-by-23-study-says.html?_r=1&pagewanted=print

26. Reuters, "45% Struggle in US to Make Ends Meet," MSNBC: Business Stocks and Economy (November 22, 2011). Online:http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/45407937/ns/business-stocks_and_economy/#.T3SxhDEgd8E

27. See: http://www.bls.gov/news.release/youth.nr0.htm

28. Lindsey Tanner, "Half of US Kids Will Get Food Stamps, Study Says," The Associated Press (November 2, 2009). Online: http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2009/11/02/food-stamps-will-feed-hal_n_342834.html

29. Daily Mail Reporter, "These kids don't expect to lead a full life': Fears for Chicago teens as fatal shootings in city outnumber US troops killed in Afghanistan," Mail Online, UK (June 19, 2012). Online: http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2161690/Chicago-crime-More-people-shot-dead-Chicago-killed-duty-Afghanistan.html

30. As Nicholas Kristof points out: It's not just occasional mass shootings like the one at an Oregon college … but a continuous deluge of gun deaths, an average of 92 every day in America. Since 1970, more Americans have died from guns than died in all US wars going back to the American Revolution. If that doesn't make you flinch, consider this: In America, more preschoolers are shot dead each year (82 in 2013) than police officers are in the line of duty (27 in 2013), according to figures from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention and the FBI. See, Nicholas Kristof, "A New Way to Tackle Gun Deaths," The New

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

York Times (October 3, 2015). Online:http://www.nytimes.com/2015/10/04/opinion/sunday/nicholas-kristof-a-new-way-to-tackle-gun-deaths.html?smid=tw-nytopinion&smtyp=cur&_r=0

31. Taylor Wofford, "How America's Police Became an Army: The 1033 Program,"Newsweek (August 13, 2014). Online: http://www.newsweek.com/how-americas-police-became-army-1033-program-264537

32. David Graeber, "Ferguson and the Criminalization of American Life," Gawker(March 19, 2015). Online: http://gawker.com/ferguson-and-the-criminalization-of-american-life-1692392051

33. Oliver Laughland, "Tamir Rice 'directly and proximately' responsible for own police shooting death, says city," The Guardian (March 1, 2015). Online:http://www.theguardian.com/us-news/2015/mar/01/tamir-rice-directly-proximately-responsible-police-shooting-death-city

34. Rich Juzwiak and Aleksander Chan, "Unarmed People of Color Killed by Police, 1999-2014," Gawker (December 8, 2014). Online: http://gawker.com/unarmed-people-of-color-killed-by-police-1999-2014-1666672349

35. Rachel Monahan, "Queens Girl Alexa Gonzalez Hauled Out of School in Handcuffs after Getting Caught Doodling on Desk," New York Daily News (February 4, 2010). Online: http://www.nydailynews.com/new-york/education/queens-girl-alexa-gonzalez-hauled-school-handcuffs-caught-doodling-desk-article-1.194141

36. Rene Lynch, "Kindergartner Throws Tantruym at School, Is Handcuffed by Police," Los Angeles Times (April 17, 2012), Online:http://articles.latimes.com/2012/apr/17/nation/la-na-nn-six-year-old-handcuffed-20120417; and Antoinette Campbell, "Police Handcuff 6-year-old Student in Georgia," CNN.com (April 17, 2012), Online:http://www.cnn.com/2012/04/17/justice/georgia-student-handcuffed/index.html. See also Robert Winnett, "Californian 5-year-old Handcuffed and Charged with Battery," The Telegraph (November 25, 2011). Online:http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/worldnews/northamerica/usa/8914514/Californian-5-year-old-handcuffed-and-charged-with-battery.html

37. The Associated Press, "Officers Suspended after Using Taser on 10-year-old,"CBC News (April 1, 2010), Online:http://www.cbc.ca/news/world/story/2010/04/01/police-indiana-taser-daycare.html. More recently, see The Huffington Post, "Boy 'Recklessly' Tasered by Police Officer During Career Day, Lawsuit Says," October 31, 2012, Online:http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2012/10/31/10-year-old-tasered-new-mexico_n_2050463.html

38. Quoted in Carly Everson, "Ind. Officer Uses Stun Gun on Unruly 10-Year old,"The Associated Press (April 3, 2010). Online:http://hosted.ap.org/dynamic/stories/U/US_POLICE_SHOCK_CHILD?SITE=FLPLA&SECTION=HOME&TEMPLATE=DEFAULT

39. Jonathan Simon, Governing Through Crime: How the War on Crime Transformed American Democracy and Created a Culture of Fear (New York: Oxford University Press, 2007), p. 5.

40. See, for instance, Matt Taibbi, The Divide: American Injustice in the Age the Great Wealth Gap (New York: Spiegel & Grau, 2014)

41. Claude Brown, Manchild in the Promised Land (New York: Signet Books, 1965).

42. Ibid., p. 419.

43. Jeff Stein, "The Clinton Dynasty's Horrific Legacy: More Drug War, More Prisons," Salon (April 2015), http://www.alternet.org/drugs/clinton-dynasty-horrific-legacy-more-drug-war-more-prisons

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

44. Chris Hedges, “Tariq Ali: The Time Is Right for a Palace Revolution,” Truthdig(March 1, 2015). Online:http://www.truthdig.com/report/item/tariq_ali_the_time_is_right_for_a_palace_revolution_20150301

45. Ibid.

46. I have borrowed many of these ideas from the National Endowment for American Renewal. See the NEAR Foundation Agenda at http://n-e-a-r.org/a-broad-agenda/

47. Robert Hass cited in Sarah Pollock, “Robert Hass,” Mother Jones (March/April, 1992), p. 22.

48. Jacques Derrida, “No One is Innocent: A Discussion with Jacques About Philosophy in the Face of Terror,” The Information Technology, War and Peace Project, p. 2 available online:http://www.watsoninstitute.org/infopeace/911/derrida_innocence.html

49. Howard Zinn, A People’s History of the United States (New York: Harper Perennial; Reprint edition, 2003), p. 634.

Copyright, Truthout. May not be reprinted without permission of the author.

HENRY A. GIROUX

Henry A. Giroux currently holds the McMaster University Chair for Scholarship in the Public Interest in the English and Cultural Studies Department and the Paulo Freire Chair in Critical Pedagogy at The McMaster Institute for Innovation & Excellence in Teaching & Learning. He also is a Distinguished Visiting Professor at Ryerson University. His most recent books include Youth in Revolt: Reclaiming a Democratic Future (Paradigm 2013),America’s Educational Deficit and the War on Youth (Monthly Review Press, 2013),Neoliberalism’s War on Higher Education (Haymarket Press, 2014), The Violence of Organized Forgetting: Thinking Beyond America’s Disimagination Machine (City Lights, 2014), Zombie Politics in the Age of Casino Capitalism, 2nd edition (Peter Lang 2014),Disposable Futures: The Seduction of Violence in the Age of the Spectacle, co-authored with Brad Evans, (City Lights Books 2015), Dangerous Thinking in the Age of the New Authoritarianism (Paradigm Publisher 2015). The Toronto Star named Henry Giroux one of the 12 Canadians changing the way we think! He is one of Tikkun's most deep, insightful, and provocative, authors!
This article appeared first in the wonderful daily website of our ally Truth Out and can be read there also at http://www.truth-out.org/news/item/33312-youth-in-authoritarian-times-challenging-neoliberalism-s-politics-of-disposability. If you send the link out, please also attach the introduction written above by Rabbi Michael Lerner (which does not appear on the Truth-Out website).

Click here to unsubscribe
if you are having trouble unsubscribing Click here

Copyright 2015 Tikkun Magazine. Tikkun is a registered trademark.
2342 Shattuck Avenue, #1200
Berkeley, CA 94704
510-644-1200
Fax 510-644-1255

empowered by salsa

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Sara Du Bois" <sdubois@progressivemediausa.org>
To:	bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date:	4/29/2008 9:09:32 AM
Subject:	[big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Afternoon 04/29/08
Attachments:	Full Transcript of Bush Press Conference 04-29-08.doc Full Transcript of McCain Health Care Speech 04-29-08.doc

Main Topics: McCain health care speech, Bush economy press conference

Highlights

1. Bush gives press conference on economy
   a. Bush endorses McCain, says he won't 'neglect the War on Terror'
   b. Bush concedes we are in 'tough times,' proposes alternative energy sources
   c. Bush says he's 'open' to any gas tax proposal, including McCain's, but not going to jump into '08 race
2. McCain gives health care policy speech in Tampa
   a. Eat right and exercise and 'you won't have to worry'
   b. Government can help solve problems, but 'often it comes down to personal responsibility'

Clips

Highlight #1

Below are highlights from Bush's press conference. For full transcript, see attached document, or go to http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2008/04/20080429-1.html

Bush: McCain Will Be President, Won't "Neglect the War on Terror" (MSNBC 04/29/08 10:30am)
PRESIDENT BUSH: I don't think John McCain is going to neglect the war on terror, and I do think he's going to be the president.

Bush Back-Peddles on 'We're Not in a Recession' Comment, Concedes These Are "Tough Times" (MSNBC 04/29/08 10:30am)
QUESTION: Thank you, Mr. President. Were you premature in saying that the U.S. economy is not in a recession, when food and energy prices are soaring so high? And what more can you do to persuade Saudi Arabia during your upcoming visit to reconsider output levels and cut prices?

PRESIDENT BUSH: I mean, you know, the words on how to define the economy don't reflect the anxiety the American people feel. The average person doesn't really care what we call it; the average person wants to know whether or not we know that they're paying higher gasoline prices and that they're worried about staying in their homes. And I do understand that. That's why we've been aggressively helping people refinance their homes. That's why I continue to call upon Congress to pass legislation that will enable people to stay in their homes.

These are tough times. People -- economists can argue over the terminology. And these are difficult times. And the American people know it, and they want to know whether or not Congress knows it. I think an important signal to send on energy, just like I said, is to say, okay, we're going to go find oil here at home.

We're transitioning to a new era, by the way -- a new era where we're going to have batteries in our cars that will power -- enable people to drive 40 miles on electricity. There's going to be more ethanol on the market, more alternative fuels. It would be -- our driving habits will change. But in the meantime, we need to be sending a signal to the world markets that we intend to explore here in America. We can also send a clear signal that we understand supply and demand, and then when you don't build a refinery for 30 years, it's going to be a part of restricting supply. And therefore, we ought to expand our refining capacity by permitting new refineries and getting after it quickly.

On the electricity front, as you know, I'm a big believer in nuclear power, except we keep getting mixed signals out of Congress. And the regulatory system sends mixed signals.

And so -- and then, to your question on the Saudis, look, I have made the case that the high price of oil injures economies. But I think we better understand that there's not a lot of excess capacity in this world right now. Hopefully high prices will spur more exploration to bring excess capacity on, but demand is rising faster than supply. And that's why you're seeing global energy prices rise. And that's why it's important for us to try to take the pressure off by saying we're going to start exploring here at home.

Bush Open to McCain's Gas Tax Moratorium, States Unwillingness to Enter Presidential Race (MSNBC 04/29/08 10:30pm)
JIM AXELROD: Good morning, Mr. President. Thank you. I just want to follow up on the idea of the gas tax moratorium if I may, because you're indicating that perhaps you'd be open to it. You mentioned in your opening remarks that --

PRESIDENT BUSH: I'm open to any ideas and we'll analyze everything that comes our way, but go ahead.

AXELROD: Well, we're talking about perhaps the most immediate relief to people who are buying gasoline every day, because it would be an 18.4 cents a gallon tax cut. Senator Clinton and Senator McCain are in favor of it; Senator Obama is not. But Americans are hearing about this every day. So could you flesh out perhaps some of your thinking about why this would be a good idea, or not; why you would agree with Senator McCain or Senator Obama?

BUSH: I appreciate you trying to drag me in the '08 race. And this is the first attempt to do so, and I can understand why you would want to do that. I will tell you that, first of all, the American people have got to understand that here in the White House we are concerned about high gasoline prices, we're concerned about high food prices, we're concerned about people staying in their homes, and we're concerned about student loans -- just like I described. And Congress can be helpful. Congress -- they can show leadership by dealing with these issues.

And we'll consider interesting ideas. But, Jim, what I'm not going to do is jump right in the middle of a presidential campaign. We'll let the candidates argue out their ideas.

AXELROD: Well, would --

BUSH: I just told you I'll consider the ideas. If it's a good idea, we embrace it; if not, we're analyzing the different ideas coming forward.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Highlight #2
Below are highlights from McCain's speech. For full transcript, see attached document, or go to http://www.johnmccain.com/Informing/News/Speeches/2c3cfa3a-748e-4121-84db-28995cf367da.htm
McCain's Health Care Plan: Eat Right and Exercise 'And You Won't Have To Worry' (CNN live stream 04/29/08 11:03am)
JOHN MCCAIN: Watch your diet! Watch your diet! Walk thirty or so minutes a day. And take a few other simple precautions, and you won't have to worry about these afflictions.

McCain: Government Can Help, But It 'Often… Comes Down to Personal Responsbility'
JOHN MCCAIN: Government can provide leadership to solve problems, of course. So-- But often it comes down to personal responsibility.

--
Sara L. DuBois
Progressive Media USA
Sdubois@progressivemediausa.org
202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara DuBois" <sara@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: "Sara Du Bois" <sara@progressiveaccountability.org>
Date: 7/15/2008 1:38:15 AM
Subject: [big campaign] '08 Daily News Clips - 7/15

08 Election Daily News Clips
July 15th, 2008

Candidate Tracking:

All times in Eastern Standard Time

7:30am McCain: Interview on CBS's "Good Morning America"

12pm McCain: Town Hall in Albuquerque, NM
- Tracking scheduled for this event
1:05pm BUSH: Photo op with recipients of the 2008 MATHCOUNTS National Competition Award in the Oval Office

5pm McCain: Fund raiser in St. Louis, MO

News Clips:

MCCAIN LA RAZA SPEECH NEWS

McCain's turn before La Raza in San Diego (LA Times 7/15/08)
By Robin Abcarian and Nicole Gaouette
He didn't break into Spanish, nor did he back down from his emphatic position that border security must be the cornerstone of immigration overhaul. But Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) continued his fervid courtship of Latino voters Monday, speaking to about 2,000 people at the National Council of La Raza's annual convention the day after his Democratic opponent, Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, came calling.
http://www.latimes.com/news/politics/la-na-mccain15-2008jul15,0,5118734.story
Link to transcript of speech: http://www.realclearpolitics.com/articles/2008/07/mccains_speech_to_la_raza.html

McCain defends his position on immigration reform (San Diego Union-Tribune 7/15/08)
By John Marelius
Republican presidential candidate John McCain on Monday vigorously disputed his opponent's assertion that he had backed away from his own comprehensive plan to overhaul the nation's immigration laws.
http://www.signonsandiego.com/news/politics/20080714-1339-bn14mccain.html

McCain rejects Obama attack on immigration (Reuters 7/14/08)
By Steve Holland
Republican presidential hopeful John McCain defended himself on Monday against charges from Democrat Barack Obama that he adopted a more aggressive stance against illegal immigration for political purposes.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/14/AR2008071400366.html

McCain touts free trade agenda to Hispanic group (AP 7/14/08)
Republican presidential candidate John McCain in one of his strongest endorsements of free trade called himself "an unapologetic supporter of NAFTA," an agreement that many Americans feel has cost them jobs. ...The Arizona senator has often defended free trade, but his speech Monday was among his most detailed and full-throated commentaries.
http://www.usatoday.com/news/politics/election2008/2008-07-14-mccain_N.htm

McCain speaks to La Raza (Politico blog 7/14/08)
Politico contributor Gebe Martinez looks at McCain's National Council of La Raza speech -- and catches a rhetorical shift: "Inching his way back to the center of the testy immigration issue, Sen. John McCain on Monday pledged to a national civil rights group that he remains 'committed to fair, practical and comprehensive immigration reform.'
http://www.politico.com/blogs/jonathanmartin/0708/McCain_speaks_to_La_Raza.html

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Immigration, Poison Pills Or Booster Shots? (Atlantic online 7/14/08)
By Marc Ambinder
In his speech to La Raza today, Sen. McCain blames Barack Obama in part for derailing the 2007 attempt at comprehensive immigration reform by larding up the bill with poison pill amendments.
http://marcambinder.theatlantic.com/archives/2008/07/military_officers_want_diploma.php

The campaign to jog La Raza's memory (Politico blog 7/14/08)
By Avi Zenilman
McCain is hitting Obama's record on immigration today while speaking in front of La Raza and argues that Obama abandoned him and Ted Kennedy -- the two main dealmakers -- during last summer's immigration reform battle. "Senator Obama declined to cast some of those tough votes. He voted for and even sponsored amendments that were intended to kill the legislation." But Obama did sponsor an amendment, with New Jersey Senator Bob Menendez, that would sunset the point-based system for new immigrants (which many groups feared would split up families) after 5 years.
http://www.politico.com/blogs/jonathanmartin/0708/The_campaign_to_jog_La_Razas_memory.html

Anti-War Protesters Heckle McCain at Hispanic Conference (ABC News blog 7/14/08)
By Jennifer Duck
Sen. John McCain addressed a conference of the National Council of La Raza in San Diego a day after his opponent, Sen. Barack Obama appeared before the nation's largest Latino civil rights group. Less than a minute into his speech protesters shouted repeatedly, "Bring our sons home."
http://blogs.abcnews.com/politicalradar/2008/07/anti-war-protes.html

MCCAIN NEWS

Poll Finds Voters Split on Candidates' Iraq-Pullout Positions (Washington Post 7/15/08)
By Jonathan Weisman and Jon Cohen; A01
A new Washington Post-ABC News poll finds the country split down the middle between those backing Sen. Barack Obama's 16-month timeline for withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq and those agreeing with Sen. John McCain's position that events, not timetables, should dictate when forces come home.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/14/AR2008071401853.html

Obama, McCain Would Look to Women, Hispanics for Supreme Court (Bloomberg 7/15/08)
By Greg Stohr
Gender and race will loom large when Barack Obama or John McCain has a chance to fill a U.S. Supreme Court vacancy.
http://www.bloomberg.com/apps/news?pid=20601070&sid=analt7SXDKiQ&refer=politics

A War The West Must Stop (Washington Post 7/15/08)
By Ronald D. Asmus; A19
There is war in the air between Georgia and Russia. Such a war could destabilize a region critical for Western energy supplies and ruin relations between Russia and the West. A conflict over Georgia could become an issue in the U.S. presidential campaign. How they respond could become a test of the potential commander-in-chief qualities of Barack Obama and John McCain.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/14/AR2008071401845.html

McCain applauds lifting of offshore drilling ban (AP 7/14/08)
Republican John McCain says President Bush is taking an important step by lifting an executive order banning offshore drilling. The Arizona Republican says offshore drilling will help give America sufficient reserves to help reduce or cushion the increasing costs of oil.
http://www.kswt.com/Global/story.asp?S=8671706&nav=menu613_2_6

Another McCain Co-Chair Bites the Dust (Vanity Fair 7/14/08)
by Christopher Bateman
Yet another member of John McCain's presidential campaign is stepping down after coming under scrutiny for shady business dealings. McCain finance co-chair and former New Jersey congressman Jim Courter, chief executive of telecom corporation IDT, is resigning from the campaign after the FCC slapped IDT with a $1.3 million fine last week for failing to disclose information about its contracts in Haiti.
http://www.vanityfair.com/online/politics/2008/07/another-mccain-cochair-bites-the-dust.html

Experts: Candidate's age shouldn't influence voters (AP 7/14/08)
By Ricardo Alonso-Zaldivar
So how old is John McCain? Six-packs of beer, automatic transmissions and the American Express card were all introduced after he was born — not to mention computers, which McCain admits he doesn't use. McCain, himself, jokes that he's older than dirt. And while his age is being raised as a campaign issue, medical experts say voters shouldn't be concerned that, if elected, McCain would be the oldest man to assume the presidency, at 72.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.usatoday.com/news/politics/election2008/2008-07-14-mccain-age_N.htm

McCain Can't Use 'a Google.' So What? (Newsweek blog 7/14/08)
By Andrew Romano
The liberal blogosphere's outrage du jour? John McCain's professed "computer illiteracy." "Did the GOP really pick one of the last few cavemen among us who has yet to learn how to use the internet or e-mail?" writes commenter Tony over at the Politico. "Pathetic," add DailyKos's BarbinMD. "How long should it take to 'learn' to get online? It's one point and a click." I understand the temptation to sic some snark on the senator from Arizona. ...The only problem? This line of reasoning is ridiculous.
http://www.blog.newsweek.com/blogs/stumper/archive/2008/07/14/mccain-can-t-use-a-google-so-what.aspx

Poor footwear for running (LA Times 7/15/08)
By Robin Abcarian
Aboard John McCain's Straight Talk Express jet, one of the Arizona senator's favorite traveling companions -- Steve Duprey, who co-chaired McCain's primary effort in New Hampshire and has been hanging around ever since -- handed out little customized bottles of McCain sunscreen. Reporters on the plane Monday morning also received yellow-and-blue flip-flops printed with the message "McCain . . . Another Day at the Beach." ...Isn't that a rather dangerous form of footwear for a senator who has been accused by some in his own Republican Party of changing his positions on issues such as immigration reform and tax cuts?
http://www.latimes.com/news/politics/la-na-trailflip15-2008jul15,0,1285561.story

McCain's Small-Business Bunk (FactCheck.org 7/14/08)
By Brooks Jackson
He claims 23 million small-business owners would pay higher tax rates under Obama. He's wrong. The vast majority would see no change, and many would get a cut.
http://www.newsweek.com/id/146210

McCain returns to NM, ads focus on Hispanics (AP 7/15/08)
Republican John McCain returns to New Mexico in search of money for his presidential campaign and support among Hispanics.
http://www.roswell-record.com/main.asp?SectionID=51&SubSectionID=124&ArticleID=30029

McCain to Hit Obama on Iraq/Afghanistan (The Page 7/15/08)
At Tuesday town hall in Albuquerque, New Mexico, the Arizonan plans to say about Obama's big address: "He is speaking today about his plans for Iraq and Afghanistan before he has even left, before he has talked to General Petraeus, before he has seen the progress in Iraq, and before he has set foot in Afghanistan for the first time. In my experience, fact-finding missions usually work best the other way around: first you assess the facts on the ground, then you present a new strategy."
http://thepage.time.com/2008/07/15/mccain-to-hit-obama-on-iraqafghanistan/#

McCain to deliver Afghanistan speech later this week (Politico blog 7/14/08)
By Avi Zenilman
On a McCain campaign conference call dedicated to piling on Obama's Iraq op-ed and his position on the surge, Randy Scheunemann drops a hint that McCain will speak on Afghanistan later this week -- and Sen. Lindsey Graham follows up by saying it will be Thursday.
http://www.politico.com/blogs/jonathanmartin/0708/McCain_to_deliver_Afghanistan_speech_later_this_week.html

Anti-war activists target McCain fundraiser (St. Louis Post-Dispatch blog 7/14/08)
By Adam Jadhav
Students and area residents that have organized with the social networking site Facebook say they will protest outside Sen. John McCain's fundraiser at Hunter Farms on Tuesday.
http://www.stltoday.com/blogzone/political-fix/political-fix/2008/07/anti-war-activists-target-mccain-fundraiser/

Remembering Czechoslovakia (Politico blog 7/14/08)
By Ben Smith
A reader notes that John McCain today expressed concern about Russia's "reducing the energy supplies to Czechoslovakia." Which hasn't existed for nearly two decades.
http://www.politico.com/blogs/bensmith/0708/Remembering_Czechoslovakia.html

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Link to Transcript of McCain's Remarks to the Press in Phoenix: http://thepage.time.com/transcript-of-mccains-remarks-to-the-press-in-phoenix/
Link to Pool Report of McCain in Phoenix Monday: http://thepage.time.com/pool-report-of-mccain-in-phoenix-monday/

McCain Aide Calls For Fully Funded No Child Left Behind, Which McCain Voted Against (Huffington Post 7/14/08)
By Sam Stein
Appearing on Meet the Press Sunday, John McCain's senior adviser Carly Fiorina touted the Senator's bona fides on education by laying out the reforms he had envisioned for the No Child Left Behind act.
http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/07/14/mccain-aide-calls-for-ful_n_112598.html

Obama Addresses Iraq, McCain Hits Back (Washington Post blog 7/14/08)
By Chris Cillizza
In advance of what is being billed as a "major" address on Iraq by Barack Obama tomorrow, his campaign is working overtime to reposition the Illinois senator on the future of American involvement in the country.
http://blog.washingtonpost.com/thefix/2008/07/mccain_obama_position_on_iraq.html

Obama would swap Iraq war loss for election win: McCain camp (AFP 7/14/08)
Republican John McCain's camp has charged that his Democratic foe Barack Obama would trade defeat in Iraq for an election win, as a fierce new row over the war rocked the White House race.
http://afp.google.com/article/ALeqM5i6dhh7DsKfFl7534Cn0gaalXi9UQ

McCain and Social Security (Atlantic online 7/14/08)
By Matthew Yglesias
I've been shocked by how little play John McCain's recent remarks on Social Security have gotten, especially considering his record of support for the Bush administration's unpopular privatization scheme. Maybe that's soon to change:
http://matthewyglesias.theatlantic.com/archives/2008/07/mccain_and_social_security.php

About Those Town-Hall Meetings... (NYT 7/14/08)
By ADAM NAGOURNEY
At nearly every town-hall meeting that John McCain conducts with voters these days, he stops to point out someone missing from the room: Barack Obama.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/07/14/us/politics/14web-nagourney.html

Analysis: Surrogates' sideshows becoming the main event (CNN 7/15/08)
* Campaigns used to have only a handoff of people speak for them
* Surrogates now spread message among expanding media outlets
* Gaffes by surrogates not uncommon, lead candidates to quickly disown statements http://www.cnn.com/2008/POLITICS/07/15/borger.surrogates/index.html

McCains to Profit on Anheuser, InBev Deal (WSJ blog 7/14/08)
T. W. Farnam
Cindy McCain, wife of Republican presidential candidate John McCain, is set to get a huge payout from the sale of Anheuser-Busch Cos., brewer of Budweiser and hundreds of other brands, to Belgian beverage giant InBev NV.
http://blogs.wsj.com/washwire/2008/07/14/mccains-to-profit-on-anheuser-inbev-deal/
See HuffPo's "How Much Could The McCains Make From Anheuser-Busch Co. Sale?": http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/07/14/how-much-could-the-mccain_n_112698.html

Cindy McCain: "In Arizona The Only Way To Get Around The State Is By Small Private Plane" (VIDEO) (Huffington Post 7/14/08)
Cindy McCain recently gave a rare private interview to CNN in which she disclosed her opinions on transportation in Arizona, her home state. The McCain's have tried to distance themselves from elitism, but apparently Mrs. McCain believes that the only way to get around is by "small private plane."
http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/07/14/cindy-mccain-in-arizona-t_n_112695.html

OPINIONS AND EDITORIALS

An Election Goes Abroad (Washington Post 7/15/08)
By Anne Applebaum; Page A19
Both McCain and Obama think foreign policy is important, but will voters agree?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/14/AR2008071401844.html

McCain's School Choice Opportunity (WSJ 7/15/08)
By CLINT BOLICK; Page A17
Education is slipping in priority among many voters but not among Hispanics, many of whom see school choice as a deciding factor in whom to vote for this fall. This has implications for the presidential election.
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB121607849587752587.html?mod=opinion_main_commentaries

BUSH NEWS

Bush Rescinds Father's Offshore Oil Ban (Washington Post 7/15/08)
By Dan Eggen and Steven Mufson; A08
President Bush yesterday lifted a presidential ban on offshore oil drilling on the Outer Continental Shelf that was implemented by his father, escalating a confrontation with Democrats in Congress over how to cope with soaring gas prices. ... Drilling Still Blocked by Congressional Edict
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/14/AR2008071401049.html
See AP's "Bush Lifts Executive Ban on Offshore Drilling": http://www.time.com/time/politics/article/0,8599,1822548,00.html
Link to video of Bush remarks: http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/video/2008/07/14/VI2008071401606.html
Link to transcript of Bush remarks: http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/14/AR2008071401358.html

Payne admits selling access could be 'perceived to be bribery,' but insists it's legal (ThinkProgress 7/14/08)
According to CNN, longtime associate of President Bush, Stephen Payne, is now admitting that his selling of access to Bush administration officials could be "perceived to be bribery." Payne still insists, however, that there was no "quid pro quo" for the donations which he solicited. Instead, he said, the Sunday Times is "engaging in 'gotcha journalism.'" http://thinkprogress.org/2008/07/14/payne-bribery/

Drilling's Lure (NYT 7/15/08)
President Bush's decision on Monday to lift the moratorium on offshore oil drilling first imposed by his father 18 years ago is designed to ratchet up the pressure on Congress to do likewise. Congress should resist. Offshore drilling will not bring short-term relief from $4-a-gallon gasoline, nor can it play much more than a marginal role in any long-term strategy for energy independence. The oil companies already have access to substantial unexplored resources.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/07/15/opinion/15tue3.html?ref=opinion

OTHER TOP NEWS

Ailing sentiment hits dollar and global stocks (Financial Times 7/15/08)
By Neil Dennis
Global equities fell sharply and the dollar sank on Tuesday after US government plans to rescue ailing mortgage groups Freddie Mac and Fannie Mae left investors unconvinced.
http://www.ft.com/cms/s/0/4552add0-5259-11dd-9ba7-000077b07658.html?nclick_check=1

General Motors to announce more cuts Tuesday (AP 7/14/08)
By DEE-ANN DURBIN and TOM KRISHER
General Motors Corp. is expected to cut several thousand salaried jobs and further slash truck production in response to falling U.S. sales and Wall Street's demands for more action to stem its losses, according to two people briefed on the plan.
http://hosted.ap.org/dynamic/stories/G/GM_RESTRUCTURING?SITE=MOSTP&SECTION=HOME&TEMPLATE=DEFAULT

Congress to hear Bernanke, Paulson on market strain (Reuters 7/15/08)
Discussion of persistent financial market turmoil is seen as likely to overshadow the Federal Reserve's semi-annual monetary policy outlook when Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke testifies before Congress on Tuesday. Bernanke is due to present semi-annual monetary policy to the Senate Banking Committee at 10 a.m. EDT.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/15/AR2008071500210.html

Suicide Bombers Kill 35 Iraqi Recruits (NYT 7/15/08)
By RICHARD A. OPPEL Jr.
Two suicide bombers posing as army recruits struck an Iraqi base just east of Baquba on Tuesday morning, killing at least 35 Iraqi recruits and wounding 63, according to the Iraqi police and medical officials in Diyala Province.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.nytimes.com/2008/07/16/world/middleeast/16iraq.html?_r=1&hp&oref=slogin

Obama's Iraq speech to set stage for trip (AP 7/15/08)
By GLEN JOHNSON
Barack Obama is setting the stage for his upcoming visit to Iraq with a high-profile explanation of his opposition to the war there and his pledge to complete a U.S. troop pullout within 16 months of becoming president.
http://www.time.com/time/world/article/0,8599,1822791,00.html
Link to excerpts of Obama's speech: http://thepage.time.com/excerpts-of-obamas-speech-on-iraqnational-security/

Obama Will Meet Palestinian Leaders in the West Bank (NYT 7/15/08)
By JOHN M. BRODER and ISABEL KERSHNER
Senator Barack Obama, the likely Democratic presidential nominee, will meet with Palestinian leaders in the West Bank during his trip overseas next week, the first details of which began to emerge on Monday.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/07/15/us/politics/15campaign.html?ref=politics

Obama's focus is responsibility in NAACP speech (CNN 7/14/08)
* Sen. Barack Obama addresses NAACP convention in Cincinnati on Monday night
* He vows to "stand up" for black people the way past generations "stood up for me"
* Speech is first time black presidential nominee from major party will address group
* Newer generation of black leaders focuses on economic, social justice issues http://www.cnn.com/2008/POLITICS/07/14/obama.naacp/index.html

Vegas Tycoon Bankrolls Republicans (WSJ 7/15/08)
By June Kronholz and Tamara Audi
In the Las Vegas casinos that made Sheldon Adelson one of the country's richest men, a "whale" is someone willing to bet millions. Republicans are hoping Mr. Adelson will be their whale this election.
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB121608018071652749.html?mod=special_page_campaign2008_topbox

Gore To Give Major Speech On Energy And The Environment (Atlantic online 7/14/08)
By Marc Ambinder
His office says Gore will lay out "an unprecedented challenge" on energy and climate change and will set a national goal for a "clean energy future." ...When: Thursday, July 17 at 12:00 p.m. EDT:
http://marcambinder.theatlantic.com/archives/2008/07/gore_to_give_major_speech_on_e.php

Military Officers Want More Diplomacy And Development Assistance (Atlantic online 7/14/08)
By Marc Ambinder
Here's a sneak preview of a poll of 606 commissioned U.S. military officers conducted for the Center for U.S. Global Engagement, which holds a conference on national security in DC tomorrow.
#A significant majority of the officers recognize the need for non-military tools and diplomacy. ...
http://marcambinder.theatlantic.com/archives/2008/07/military_officers_want_diploma.php

POLLS

McCain Tops Obama in Commander-in-Chief Test; Stays Competitive on Iraq (ABC 7/14/08)
by GARY LANGER
Poll Finds 72 Percent of Americans Say McCain Would be Good Commander-in-Chief http://abcnews.go.com/PollingUnit/Politics/story?id=5370538&page=1
New National Numbers (The Page 7/15/08)
Quinnipiac University poll:
Obama 50, McCain 41
Dates conducted: July 8-13. Error margin: 2.4 points.
http://thepage.time.com/2008/07/15/new-national-poll-expected-tuesday-morning/
--
Sara DuBois
Deputy Director of Tracking & Media Monitoring
Progressive Accountability Office
sara@progressiveaccountability.org
202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	5/6/2015 12:35:16 AM
Subject:	News Clips 5.6.15
Attachments:	H4A Clips 5.6.15.docx

H4A Press Clips

May 6, 2015

SUMMARY OF TODAY'S NEWS

The NYT/CBS poll released yesterday found Americans now view Mrs. Clinton more favorably and as a stronger leader than they did earlier in the year, despite weeks of scrutiny about her ethics. The poll is being pointed to as evidence that recent coverage on Clinton's email server and the fundraising activities of the Clinton Foundation have not dented Clinton's standing.

Yesterday in Nevada, Hillary Clinton met with DREAMers and defined her stance on how to fix the broken immigration system, saying that we need to find a "full and equal path to citizenship". This was described as bold and giving the activist more than they asked for in articles and on social media.

Yesterday Hillary for America released and launched a Briefing webpage with a video debunking 'Clinton Cash.' The page was generally well received by media and praised for being aggressive not abrasive. The video was picked up and used by several different TV news outlets throughout the day.

Coverage also noted the Clinton campaign's acceptance of the DNC proposal to host six debates during the primary campaign. A spokeswoman for Governor O'Malley, however, is quoted in most stories raising questions about the DNC's exclusivity demand.

LAST NIGHTS EVENING NEWS

ABC had a short segment on Huckabee's announcement and included Hillary Clinton's upcoming immigration round table. CBS had a more in depth segment about Huckabee, stating that he is touting taking on HRC in 2008. A CBS poll found that Americans are split on HRC's trustworthiness. CBS and NBC both discussed the campaign's pushback on Clinton Cash and included parts of Brian Fallon's video and referred to The Briefing. NBC noted that Huckabee took a swipe at HRC by saying that he does not have a global foundation to live off of.

SUMMARY OF TODAY'S NEWS..... 1

LAST NIGHTS EVENING NEWS..... 1

TODAY'S KEY STORIES..... 4

Under Fire, Clinton Camp Pushes Back, Amps Up // Real Clear Politics // Alexis Simendinger - May 5, 2015 4

Hillary Clinton Gains Favor, Times/CBS Poll Says // NYT // Jonathan Martin and Megan Thee Brenan - May 5, 2015 9

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton Just Won Over Much Of The Skeptical Immigrant Activist Movement // Buzzfeed // Adrian Carrasquillo and Ruby Cramer 12

SOCIAL MEDIA..... 15

America's Voice retweeted Hillary Clinton (5/5/15 6:54pm) @americasvoice: This is HUGE. RT @HillaryClinton "We should put in place an accessible way for parents of DREAMers & others to be eligible for the same deferred action as their children." 15

Chris Moody (5/5/15 9:29am) @moodyHillary: Clinton's campaign launched a version of Obama's AttackWatch, but without sounding angry and insane..... 15

Dara Lind (5/5/15 7:29pm) @DLind: I am stunned. Hillary actually did _more_ than advocates were asking her for. http://www.vox.com/2015/5/5/85572 16

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 16

Hillary Clinton's Appeal Survives Scrutiny, Poll Says // NYT // Jonathan Martin and Megan Thee-Brenan – May 5, 2015 16

NH Dem Primary Poll // WMUR Granite State Poll // Andrew E. Smith, Phd - May 5, 2015 19

For Hillary Clinton's Campaign Manager, It All Began in Vegas // Bloomberg // Jennifer Epstein – May 5, 2015 19

Hillary Clinton Draws Distinction With GOP on Immigration // TIME // Sam Frizell - May 5, 2015 21

Hillary Clinton To Unveil Path To Citizenship Immigration Plan // NPR // Tamara Keith - May 5, 2015 22

Hillary Clinton's Nevada play // POLITICO // Gabriel Debendetti - May 5, 2015..... 24

Clinton Pledges to Take Immigration Actions 'Even Further' // MSNBC // Andrew Rafferty and Andrea Mitchell – May 5, 2015 26

Clinton to reach out to Latinos in NH // New Hampshire Union Leader // Dan Tuohy - May 5, 2015 27

The Note: High Bar For Hillary on Immigration // ABC News // Jim Avila and Serena Marshall - May 5, 2015 28

Hillary Clinton revives hibernating '80s 'sleaze factor' // USA Today // James S. Robbins - May 5, 2015 28

Clinton camp on defense about her trustworthiness // CNN // Jeff Zeleny - May 5, 2015.... 30

Clinton 'War Room' Pushback And The 'Invent Your Own' Media Campaign // NPR // Jessica Taylor - May 5, 2015 32

Clinton camp pushes back on book, Benghazi with new Web site // WaPo // Anne Gearan - May 5, 2015 34

Here's Hillary Clinton's latest pushback against the 'dud' allegations in 'Clinton Cash'// Business Insider // Colin Campbell - May 5, 2015 36

Clinton Cash Author Peter Schweizer Admits He's Wrong On Bogus Clinton "Veto Power" Claim // Media Matters // Eric Hananoki - May 5, 2015 37

'Clinton Cash' Flashback: The Clintons Pressured Kazakhs To OK Uranium Deal // Daily Caller // Chuck Ross - May 5, 2015 39

Clinton Cash author: I like Marco Rubio // Politico // Nick Gass – May 5, 2015..... 41

Will the Benghazi Committee Block Clinton From Testifying About…Benghazi? // Mother Jones // David Corn - May 15, 2015 43

Warren and fellow 'sheriffs of Wall Street' waiting for more from Clinton // Boston Globe // Deirdre Fernandes - May 5, 2015 45

Lawyer says Hillary willing to testify once to U.S. Benghazi panel// Reuters // Susan Cromwell - May 5, 2015 45

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hoping to highlight good works, Clintons find controversy instead // WaPo // Philip Rucker, Rosalind S. Helderman and Tom Hamburger - May 5, 2015..... 46

Bill Clinton says nothing 'sinister' in foreign gifts to charity // Bloomberg // Justin Sink - May 4, 2015 50

Chelsea Clinton pushes back on scrutiny of family foundation // USA Today // Catalina Camia - May 5, 2015 50

Hillary Clinton's Campaign Declares War Against 'Clinton Cash' // National Journal // Emily Schultheis - May 5, 2015 51

A Swing and a Miss // Slate // Jamelle Bouie - May 5, 2015..... 52

What you don't know about the "Clinton Cash" author // American Bridge 21st Century // Brad Woodhouse - May 5, 2015 54

Clinton, Democratic presidential opponents to debate six times // CNN // Mark Preston - May 5, 2015 57

The Democratic presidential debates are great news for Hillary Clinton // Washington Post // Chris Cillizza – May 5, 2015 58

Hillary Clinton's rope-line antagonist // POLITICO // Hadas Gold - May 5, 2015..... 59

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 62

Asking Martin O'Malley To Explain Baltimore // The Atlantic // James Fallows – May 5, 2015 62

Bernie Sanders' "socialism" may have mainstream appeal // LA Times // David Horsey – May 5, 2015 62

Warren met privately with 'Draft Warren' supporters // POLITICO // Annie Karni - May 5, 2015 64

Elizabeth Warren: Trade bill could "tear down" Wall Street oversight // POLITICO // Zachary Warmbrodt - May 5, 2015 66

Democrats Take Fire for Exclusivity Clause in Official Debates // TIME // Zeke J Miller – May 5, 2015 67

GOP..... 68

Huckabee Joins Race With Tacit Contrast to Clintons // Real Clear Politics // Rebecca Berg - May 5, 2015 68

Huckabee, allies aim to raise $60 million // CNN // Sara Murray - May 5, 2015..... 70

Mike Huckabee and the Continuing Influence of Evangelicals // NYT- The Upshot // Nate Cohn – May 5,2015 72

The populist 1 percenter // Politico // James Hohmann – May 5, 2015..... 73

Rand Paul, Finally, To Open That Office in Silicon Valley // National Journal // Shane Goldmacher - May 5, 2015 77

The power players behind Carly Fiorina's campaign // POLITICO // Katie Glueck - May 4, 2015 78

Carly Fiorina Says She Would 'Roll Back' Net Neutrality Rules // TIME // Charlotte Alter – May 5, 2015 79

Fiorina: Clinton "pandering" on immigration // CNN // Theodore Schleifer – May 5, 2015 80

Marco Rubio to raise cash in Bellevue Thursday // Seattle Times // Jim Brunner – May 5, 2015 81

Marco Rubio says the United States is not modernizing its nuclear weapons // Politifact // Amy Sherman – May 5, 2015 82

Clinton Cash author: I like Marco Rubio // POLITICO // Nick Gass - May 5, 2015..... 84

Chris Christie's Other Problems // National Journal // Charlie Cook - May 5, 2015..... 85

College Course Marco Rubio Teaches Prominently Features Hillary Clinton's Foreign Policy Guru // Daily Caller // Eric Owens - May 5, 2015 87

Rand Paul's Donations Show His Small-Town Appeal // NYT – The Upshot // Derek Willis – May 5, 2015 89

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

TOP NEWS..... 90

DOMESTIC..... 90

Passing budgets and modest bills, Congress slowly increases productivity // Washington Post // Paul Kane – May 6, 2015 90

California board approves emergency water rules // USA Today // Ian James - May 6, 2015 93

E.P.A. Carbon Emissions Plan Could Save Thousands of Lives, Study Finds // NYT // May 5, 2015 94

U.S. Trade Gap Widens on Surging Imports // WSJ// Eric Morath – May 5, 2015..... 96

INTERNATIONAL..... 99

Germany, Too, Is Accused of Spying on Friends // NYT // Alison Smalemay – May 5, 2015 99

Obama Administration Approves First Ferry Service to Cuba // The Associated Press // May 5, 2015 102

40 Migrants Reported Dead After Dinghy Burst at Sea // WSJ // Liam Moloney - May 5, 2015 103

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS..... 105

What the Clintons Can Learn From Ben Franklin's Foreign Money Scandal // Daily Beast // Zephyr Teachout - May 5, 2015 105

'House of Cards' star wants a Bill Clinton cameo // The Hill // Judy Kurtz - May 5, 2015... 107

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Under Fire, Clinton Camp Pushes Back, Amps Up // Real Clear Politics // Alexis Simendinger - May 5, 2015

Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign is not yet a month old, and in the space of a day, her team paired a new online war room with cheery social media invitations to supporters to win a personal candidate phone call for Mother's Day.

In the Clinton world, the simultaneous melding of pushback politics (aimed at opponents and the news media) and sunny outreach (to likely voters and donors) is not unusual. Among 2016 campaign veterans who helped Bill Clinton win the White House twice, and watched Hillary Clinton lose to Barack Obama in 2008, the tools this time may be digitally fresh but the tactics are old hat.

"Republicans seem to only want to distort Hillary Clinton's record," her campaign chief said Monday. Referring to uncapped and undisclosed donations from corporations, individuals and unions permitted by law, her campaign complained, "It is clear they have a two-fisted strategy to try to undermine her, using unlimited dark money on the one hand and taxpayer funds on the other."

On the eve of championing immigration reform in Nevada on Tuesday, and a campaign fundraising blitz through California later this week, Clinton also confirmed through her attorney that she'll soon testify to a House investigative committee about the 2012 Benghazi attacks and her missing emails.

On the sidelines, her campaign team on Monday announced a new Web portal they titled "The Briefing," designed as a repository for counter-messaging to rebut critics in real time. A new book titled "Clinton Cash" – in bookstores Tuesday – inspired her campaign chairman, John Podesta (who served as a chief of staff to President Clinton and White House counselor to President Obama), to describe how the Web-based Hillary war room will operate. In a Monday night post on Medium, a site barely three years old, Podesta told readers "The

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Briefing" will serve the former first lady as a place for "facts" about her record and her "positive policy agenda."

"It will serve as a hub that allows Hillary for America to cut through the partisan noise over the next 18 months and directly communicate with voters," he wrote. "While we will not be consumed by these kinds of attacks, we will also not let them go unchallenged."

The book Podesta assailed as "debunked" and full of errors, and which Bill Clinton indirectly denounced during an NBC News interview broadcast Monday, asserts that foreign donations to the Clinton Foundation while Hillary Clinton served as secretary of state point to conflicts of interest and "questions of judgment."

Written by Peter Schweizer, a Republican author, political consultant and former speechwriter for George W. Bush, the book is billed by the publisher as an "exposé" that describes a "pattern of behavior" that Schweizer believes warrants additional independent investigation. The complete title: "Clinton Cash: The Untold Story of How and Why Foreign Governments and Businesses Helped Make Bill and Hillary Rich."

According to Podesta, "the book has zero evidence to back up its outlandish claims."

On Monday, President Clinton defended donations, including those from foreign governments that have supported global projects to the Clinton Foundation since he left the White House.

"There has been a very deliberate attempt to take the foundation down," he asserted while traveling in Africa.

The former commander-in-chief also defended lucrative earnings from speeches and said he would continue getting paid to talk to groups while his wife makes her White House bid. "I gotta pay our bills," he said, noting that he donates "a lot" of the family income each year to projects supported by the foundation.

He said the nonprofit's recent decision to limit donations from foreign governments to a small roster of countries was not an acknowledgement of mistakes.

"It's an acknowledgement that we're going to come as close as we can during her presidential campaign to following the rules we followed when she became secretary of state," he explained. Among those commitments is public disclosure of "all" foundation donors each quarter.

As with Hillary Clinton's campaign team, the foundation has also used its website to attempt to correct information it finds to be in error. In a letter reprinted on the site last week, Clinton Foundation Board Chairman Bruce Lindsey questioned news reporting and countered a quote used in a New York Post article. "The fact is that no money raised for the Clinton Foundation goes to the Clintons personally, ever," he wrote. "The Clintons draw no salary from the foundation and derive no financial benefit from the foundation."

Separate from foundation and paid-speaking controversies, Hillary Clinton is expected to be back on Capitol Hill within weeks to testify to a Republican-dominated panel about the Benghazi tragedy, her emails, and other topics. In a letter Monday to House Select Committee on Benghazi Chairman Trey Gowdy, David Kendall, attorney for the Clintons, advised lawmakers the former secretary of state will testify publicly one additional time, and "stay as long as necessary to answer the committee's questions," during the week of May 18 or at a later date.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Nearly a month into a primary season in which Hillary Clinton is the Democratic favorite against socialist/ independent/Democrat Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont (the party's second declared entrant in the race), she remains the GOP's top political target, after Obama. A Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll released Monday found that the controversies surrounding her candidacy have not undermined her strength with her base.

"Support for her among Democrats remains strong and unshaken," the Journal reported, adding that negative evaluations nevertheless increased in recent weeks. Compared with her 2008 campaign, Clinton in April was rated more easygoing and likable in the poll – an achievement her campaign advisers are working hard to maintain – but she is also perceived as less honest and straightforward than the last time she presented herself to voters.

At Rancho High School in Las Vegas on Tuesday, the former New York senator will reiterate her support for a pathway to citizenship and showcase the potential benefits for migrant families and the economy. She'll speak with a select young audience from a student body that is 70 percent Hispanic.

Immigration is an issue that divides Republican presidential candidates, offering Clinton the opening to spotlight contrasts with the large GOP field. For example, Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida, who helped draft a comprehensive reform measure and then abandoned the effort, supports legal status (but not citizenship) with restrictions, such as barring access to health insurance under the Affordable Care Act.

"She will say that the standard for a true solution is nothing less than a full and equal path to citizenship," said a Clinton campaign official on background. "She will say that we cannot settle for proposals that provide hard-working people with merely a `second-class' status."

Clinton has endorsed President Obama's executive actions to defer deportation for up to 4 million people who may qualify for Department of Homeland Security enforcement waivers.

From Nevada, Clinton will head to San Francisco to raise money for her campaign on May 6; to Los Angeles for a fundraiser May 7; and to Silicon Valley May 8 to meet donors at the home of eBay CEO John Donahoe and wife Eileen Chamberlain Donahoe, an intellectual property attorney who was Obama's first U.S. ambassador to the United Nations Human Rights Council in Geneva.

Later this month, Clinton will campaign in South Carolina, continuing her campaign's focus on early primary states and exchanges with potential voters in smaller settings.

Her first large campaign rally is expected to take place sometime in May, at an as-yet undisclosed location.

Clinton 'War Room' Pushback And The 'Invent Your Own' Media Campaign // NPR // Jessica Taylor - May 5, 2015

The Hillary Clinton campaign went into overdrive Tuesday trying to minimize the damage from a new book that delves into Clinton Foundation fundraising — and they're not using the typical channels to do so.

On the same day that the controversial new book, "Clinton Cash" by Peter Schweizer, was officially released, the Democrat's presidential campaign largely went around the traditional media in favor of new media tools.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Though campaigns have been trying to bypass the media filter for years, it's an advent of a new era in politics. The Clinton campaign is embracing several new technologies and platforms to get their message out more directly to voters, and it's a tactic her potential rivals are sure to employ, too.

"It's almost media 3.0," said Tobe Berkovitz, a professor of political communication at Boston University. "If 1.0 was dealing with the press and 2.0 was trying to circumvent the press and going to friendly sites, 3.0 is, 'Why even bother with that? Just invent your own.'"

Through a new section of its campaign website called, "The Briefing," and a post on the platform-sharing site Medium, Clinton's campaign went on offense against Schweizer and his suggestions that foreign donations to her family's foundation influenced her time at the State Department — all without the candidate addressing it head on.

A two-and-a-half-minute video posted on the new site from campaign spokesman Brian Fallon derides Schweizer as a GOP operative, who was a former adviser to 2008 vice-presidential nominee Sarah Palin, and a close friend of the Koch brothers. He also noted that research by ABC News and even Fox News revealed there was no "smoking gun."

"The book is already being debunked far and wide," Fallon said."It's full of sloppy research and attacks pulled out of thin air with no actual evidence. And it's missing the most important thing of all: facts."

Campaign Chairman John Podesta also explained the campaign's strategy in a memo posted to Medium:

"While we will not be consumed by these kinds of attacks, we will also not let them go unchallenged. That's why we are building a new one-stop shop to provide the facts about Hillary Clinton's positions and her record. We are calling it 'The Briefing.' You will be able to find information and it will serve as a hub that allows Hillary for America to cut through the partisan noise over the next 18 months and directly communicate with voters. This forum will provide the public with direct access to the facts on the positive policy agenda that Hillary will unveil over the course of campaign, as well as the facts needed to debunk false attacks."

This isn't the first time since she announced last month that Clinton's team has utilized these new platforms, especially to target Schweizer. Though his book was just released on Tuesday, details have been leaking out for weeks and other media organizations like the New York Times have used his research to further investigate specific claims.

Team Clinton has turned to Medium before, with Fallon releasing a statement on the Times story that alleged donations to the Clinton foundation were tied to the government's approval of uranium mining company to the Russian government:

"Without presenting any direct evidence in support of the claim, the Times story — like the book on which it is based — wrongly suggests that Hillary Clinton's State Department pushed for the sale's approval to reward donors who had a financial interest in the deal."

Last week, the Clinton campaign also released a Vine of comments Schweizer had made at a 2014 Koch brothers summit, where he told fellow conservatives "we cannot let up."

The use of new media in favor of more traditional media isn't a surprising strategy from the Clinton campaign, given Clinton's decades-long distrust of and tension with the media. It's also not a new tactic, with campaigns' rapid-response teams trying to get their message out at any cost and through any channel. And given the way more and more people, especially younger voters, consume news, it might be the most efficient as well.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The embrace of these new platforms is one that both the Democratic and Republican presidential candidates are likely to use even more this cycle.

Clinton's campaign insists it is not bypassing the media in the new approach, but is instead using multiple platforms to get their message out.

"Our campaign will work with the oldest of media outlets and the newest of technologies to reach voters," Clinton spokesman Josh Schwerin told NPR in emailed statement. "It would be a false choice to say it's one or the other. There is so much misinformation flying around that, whether it's through the press or on social media, it's important for voters to be able to access the facts directly, so they can assess for themselves and help beat back the partisan attacks."

It's also a way for the campaign to release a controlled, scripted narrative instead of having Clinton herself answer questions about the issue. National Journal noted last week she has only answered a total of seven media questions since she became an official candidate. She twice dismissed allegations in Schweizer's book as "distractions" but she did not answer the charges directly.

The one unscripted response came from former President Bill Clinton in an interview with NBC News Monday that the family foundation had "never done anything knowingly inappropriate" in accepting money from foreign governments for their charitable foundation.

The foundation has reinstated a ban on donations from all but six foreign countries now, but the former president said that move was "absolutely not" an acknowledgement that accepting previous donations was a mistake.

For the Clinton campaign, this approach is "much better than actually trotting Hillary out somewhere and have her answer what might be tough or aggressive questions," Berkowitz said. "Release the video, and then you release the hounds."

Democratic strategist Jim Manley, a former top aide to Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said it's the right approach for the Clintons.

"What I see happening is a classic Clinton-style war-room operation utilizing all the new media that are out there," Manley said. "I think they deserve a lot of credit for utilizing new things like Medium, but I also respect that they're not going to leave any charge unanswered."

Clinton is far and away the Democratic frontrunner for president, and she still beats most of her possible GOP rivals in hypothetical head-to-heads too. But amid questions about the Clinton foundation and an earlier controversy about her use of a private email server instead of a government account while she was at the State Department, her polling numbers have suffered.

Since March, Clinton's unfavorable rating has risen six percentage points while those who said she was honest and straightforward has dropped 13 points in a year, according to an NBC/Wall Street Journal poll released this week.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton has been under sustained assault from Republicans on the campaign trail and Capitol Hill. And she will continue to be with hearings and testimony coming about the terrorist attack on the U.S. outpost in Benghazi, Libya.

"I think every bit is going to help, but the Republicans have an amazing ability to drudge up all sorts of crazy conspiracies about the Clintons," Manley said. "These kind of tools can only take you so far, but, at some point, she's going to have to start addressing some of these things herself."

Hillary Clinton Gains Favor, Times/CBS Poll Says // NYT // Jonathan Martin and Megan Thee Brenan - May 5, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton appears to have initially weathered a barrage of news about her use of a private email account when she was secretary of state and the practices of her family's foundation, an indication that she is starting her second presidential bid with an unusual durability among Democratic voters.

Americans now view Mrs. Clinton more favorably and as a stronger leader than they did earlier in the year, despite weeks of scrutiny about her ethics, a New York Times/CBS News poll has found. And nearly nine in 10 Democrats say the nation is ready to elect a woman president.

Republican voters showed the most openness to considering SenatorMarco Rubio of Florida and former Govs. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas andJeb Bush of Florida among their party's presidential contenders, the survey found.

Mrs. Clinton remains a polarizing figure — nearly the same percentage of Americans view her positively as negatively — but her favorability rating has improved by nine percentage points since the disclosure in late March that she did not use a government email account as secretary of state.

And the number of Americans who think Mrs. Clinton has strong qualities of leadership has risen by eight percentage points, to 65 percent from 57 percent, in that same period. Still, Mrs. Clinton begins this campaign with fewer voters saying she possesses such qualities than did in July 2007, near the outset of her first presidential bid.

Mrs. Clinton already has one primary opponent, Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont, and more Democrats are likely to enter the race, but her party seems particularly unbothered by questions relating to the emails and to the foundation that she, her husband and their daughter oversee.

While roughly 48 percent of Americans say Mrs. Clinton is honest and trustworthy, about four of five Democrats think she has those traits — and about the same numbers of Democrats say she shares the values most Americans try to live by.

Fifty-two percent of Democrats said they knew nothing or very little about the Clinton Foundation, and only 10 percent said foreign donations to the foundation affected Mrs. Clinton's decisions while she was the nation's top diplomat. Just 9 percent of Democratic voters said they would not consider voting for Mrs. Clinton.

"I think the whole thing is political and it's going to wash away eventually," Herbert Levengard, 83, a Democratic retiree from Maryland, said in a follow-up interview. “There are always going to be people who mess around and look for things to yell about, but I don’t care.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mrs. Clinton is also helped in her own party by the enduring popularity of former President Bill Clinton: Seventy-six percent of Democrats have a favorable view of him and only 4 percent view him unfavorably.

Democrats also assume that Mr. Clinton — who memorably said in his 1992 presidential bid that he and Mrs. Clinton represented “two for the price of one” — would play a substantial role were Mrs. Clinton to win the White House. Seven in 10 Democratic voters said he would have a great deal or some influence on Mrs. Clinton if she became president.

If Democrats seem largely content with the prospect of another Clinton in the White House, Republicans are not quite as certain about electing a third member of the Bush family president.

Nearly three-quarters of Republican voters view George W. Bush favorably, but almost 70 percent have not yet formed an opinion of his brother Jeb, a likely presidential candidate.

The Republican primary is largely unformed, with many Republicans indicating openness to a variety of candidates in a large and still growing field.

There is positive news for Jeb Bush, though. Forty-nine percent of conservative Republican voters think his stance on the issues is about right.

While Mr. Bush has faced initial questions about whether he is sufficiently conservative to win a Republican primary, only 22 percent of Republican voters said his views were not conservative enough. Further, 60 percent of Republican voters said having the right experience was more important in a presidential candidate, while only 27 percent said they thought offering fresh ideas was more valuable.

What could also help Mr. Bush — along with the other governors or former governors seeking the GOP nomination — is that 73 percent of Republican voters said they preferred candidates with experience outside Washington.

“I would really prefer a candidate who has been a governor,” said Vinton Ernest, an 85-year-old Republican retiree in Las Vegas. “Running a state is just as difficult as running a government. It’s just multiplied when you’re running the country.”

Still, Mr. Rubio, 43, a first-term senator, seems to have more room to gain in popularity than Mr. Huckabee or Mr. Bush: Only 17 percent of Republicans said they would not consider supporting him, while 26 percent said they would not back Mr. Huckabee, and 23 percent ruled out supporting Mr. Bush.

Republican voters were least resistant to Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin: only 13 percent said they would not consider voting for him. At the opposite extreme, 42 percent of Republicans said they would not consider voting for Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey.

Over all, Democrats enter the next presidential campaign with a better image than Republicans. Forty-three percent of Americans said they had a favorable opinion of the Democratic Party while only 29 percent said the same of the Republican Party.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But as Democrats seek to retain the White House for a third consecutive term, they do so as many Americans are dissatisfied with the country's direction. Sixty-three percent of Americans said the country had gotten off track, and 66 percent said the economy was growing worse or staying the same.

The candidates will make their case to an increasingly polarized electorate: Two-thirds of Democrats support legalizing same-sex marriage, while about the same percentage Republicans do not think same-sex marriages should be legal.

In addition, 69 percent of Republicans say small-business owners who provide wedding-related services should be able to refuse, on the basis of their religious belief, such services to same-sex couples. But 58 percent of Democrats think the businesses should be required to provide those services.

On immigration, 46 percent of Republicans said illegal immigrants should be required to leave the United States, while only 16 percent of Democrats said the same. And while 71 percent of Democrats said illegal immigrants should be able to stay in the country and apply for citizenship, just 38 percent of Republicans said they should be allowed to remain in America and pursue citizenship.

The poll was conducted by telephone, on landlines and cellphones nationwide, from April 30 to May 3 with 1,027 adults, of whom 868 were registered to vote. The margin of sampling error is plus or minus three percentage points for all adults and registered voters.

Hillary Clinton Just Won Over Much Of The Skeptical Immigrant Activist Movement // Buzzfeed // Adrian Carrasquillo and Ruby Cramer

Activists challenged Hillary Clinton to go left on immigration — something the Obama administration fought them on — and they didn't expect much. But at one small event in Nevada on Tuesday, Clinton surprised them all.

LAS VEGAS — Hillary Clinton tacked hard to the left on immigration at a campaign event here in North Las Vegas, outlining an aggressive and detailed policy agenda that called for a path to citizenship, protections for parents of children brought to this country illegally, and full-scale changes to the immigrant detention system.

Clinton's proposals for the immigration system— and the government's approach to undocumented immigrants — would expand President Obama's efforts, and go even further.

It was a noticeably progressive vision from Clinton, who has been a target of the activist community since leaving her post at the State Department. Last year, when she refused for weeks to articulate her stance on Obama's executive actions, protestors trailed her events, staging a series of loud and unannounced disruptions.

Her comments on Tuesday afternoon, made at a small "roundtable" discussion with students in the library of Rancho High School, are among her most thorough on domestic policy since the start of her presidential campaign last month.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Six DREAMers — or undocumented youth brought to the country as children — sat alongside Clinton at the Nevada event, her first in the key primary state. Each was a student at Rancho High and a recipient of DACA, the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program that Obama launched through executive action.

When she opened the discussion, Clinton told the students she would like to "do more on behalf of parents of DREAMers who are not necessarily included" in the current deferred action plan — to the consternation of activists who pushed strongly for that measure to be included in Obama's actions last year.

As president, Clinton said, she would do everything possible to "avoid family breakup" — a "terrible experience" that isn't "smart" or "right."

Calling for full changes to the detention system, Clinton advocated broadly for "more humane treatment" — and specifically for a "higher level of care" for children, LGBT people, and others who could be considered more vulnerable in large facilities.

Clinton also promised to support and expand Obama's executive actions, pushing to allow more undocumented immigrants the right to apply for work permits and protections. She repeated her call to Congress for a comprehensive bill and a "full and equal" path to citizenship.

But if Congress does not undertake legislative changes, Clinton said she would pursue more executive actions herself. "I would do everything possible under the law to go even further," she said.

The appearance in Nevada instantly rippled through the community of activists at the heart of the immigration debate — many of whom followed the event by video and social media. They said on Tuesday afternoon that Clinton showed she would draw sharp contrasts to Republicans who have been more receptive to immigration changes, including former governor Jeb Bush and Sen. Marco Rubio.

"This is big," said Frank Sharry, an activist who leads America's Voice and worked closely with the Obama administration on their 2014 executive actions.

"Obama's executive actions cover some 5 million people, but leave out at least as many," he said. "She's saying she'll devise a process for them to apply — DREAMers' parents, LGBT families, and others with strong ties [to the country] will be able to get relief" from deportation.

Erika Andiola — a DREAMer activist whose high-profile return from Congress, where she was staffer, to Arizona to fight her mother's deportation garnered national headlines — said Clinton's comments were an encouraging sign.

If, as Clinton suggested, she would move to protect the parents of DREAMers, Andiola's mother could be protected from deportation, she said.

"This is a really great step recognizing what she could do," Andiola said. "I'm happy that this first step was greatly taken, now it's about making sure that accountability is there."

Cristina Jiménez, with the group United We Dream, said that the 2016 election may stand out as the first time in history that the country will be able to have a substantive debate on immigration policy and executive actions. “Full and equal citizenship for our communities, the protection of existing executive actions on immigration and a commitment to expand that relief were good to hear,” she said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Still, many activists mentioned Bush, the former Florida governor who supports “earned legal status” — rather than Clinton’s endorsement of “full and equal citizenship.”

Activists have said they will continue to pressure Bush on immigration — a demand he may find difficult to entertain in the midst of a competitive Republican primary.

Some, like Ali Noorani with the National Immigration Forum, who works with evangelicals and law enforcement, attributed Clinton’s move to pressure not just from the left, but also from the right.

“It’s great that Hillary is demarcating and differentiating herself between Jeb and other Republicans,” he said. “But she’s moving because leading Republicans are moving. She’s moving because there is real pressure, not necessarily pressure from the left, but pressure from the right. That’s the difference here.”

He dinged both parties, adding that in 2008, Democrats had no reason to move to the left on immigration and Republicans have not been responding to the nation’s interests at all, until recently.

Clinton’s mention of family detention issues, which Noorani previously called a “scar” of the Obama administration, showed him she is responding to is the fact that conservative faith leaders believe families should stay together, even if they’re in deportation proceedings. “Somebody in her world is giving her a sense of how to approach this,” he said.

That could be her political director, Amanda Renteria, who was working the phones speaking to immigration leaders even before the campaign was announced, to understand what community leaders wanted to see from Clinton.

That ask included many issues, like asking for an end to local police working with immigration enforcement agents in their jails. But it also called for Clinton to move away from her at times wooden, awkward tones on immigration last year during her book tour to a place with a more welcoming, inclusive tone focused on families, activists said.

Of course, cautious optimism from activists doesn’t mean they are hanging it up and going home to put up Clinton 2016 lawn signs.

The National Day Laborer Organizing Network, or NDLON, hardly had a positive word for Clinton, though they acknowledged her comments were surprising.

“It is also an indication the Clinton campaign is concerned about the prospect of a pro-reform candidate winning the GOP nomination,” Chris Newman said.

He argued that by “moving so far to the left so quickly, she has inadvertently increased pressure on the Obama administration to take additional significant action on deportation and detention in his remaining two years.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jiménez already had a new ask, as well, calling on Clinton, if elected, to take immediate executive action.

“Saying that executive action will happen only if Congress fails to act could set up a long blame game between the president and Congress which we’ve seen before,” she said.

Clinton concluded the event with a vow to the DREAMers to her left and right.

“I pledge to you that I will do everything I possibly can to make this an issue in the campaign,” she said, “but more importantly, when I’m president, to put it at the top of my priority list.”

It was a promise that Betsaida Frausto, one of the participants, said she will take to heart. Frausto is a recipient of DACA. She has the highest grade average of her peers — a 4.8 — and said she dreams of going to Yale and becoming a doctor.

“Before, my future was unknown,” Frausto said after meeting Clinton. “Now I feel more secure. At the bottom of my heart, I know that she gets it.”

“If there’s a person who can help, it’s her.”

SOCIAL MEDIA

Jorge Ramos (5/5/15 8:25pm) ↰ @jorgeramosnews: Hillary just took a stunningly aggressive stance on immigration reform http://www.vox.com/2015/5/5/8557271/clinton-immigration-obama?utm_campaign=vox&utm_content=article%3Atop&utm_medium=social&utm_source=twitter

America's Voice retweeted Hillary Clinton (5/5/15 6:54pm) @americasvoice: This is HUGE. RT @HillaryClinton “We should put in place an accessible way for parents of DREAMers & others to be eligible for the same deferred action as their children.”

Chris Moody (5/5/15 9:29am) @moodyHillary: Clinton's campaign launched a version of Obama's AttackWatch, but without sounding angry and insane.

Carolyn Ryan ↰ 5/5/15 6:38pm @carolynryan: Despite barrage of tough stories, Hillary Clinton remains strong in polls. http://www.nytimes.com/2015/05/06/us/politics/hillary-clinton-gains-favor-times-cbs-poll-says.html

Dara Lind (5/5/15 7:29pm) @DLind: I am stunned. Hillary actually did _more_ than advocates were asking her for. http://www.vox.com/2015/5/5/85572

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton's Appeal Survives Scrutiny, Poll Says // NYT // Jonathan Martin and Megan Thee-Brenan – May 5, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton at Columbia University in New York last week. Credit Michael Appleton for The New York Times

Hillary Rodham Clinton appears to have initially weathered a barrage of news about her use of a private email account when she was secretary of state and the practices of her family's foundation, an indication that she is starting her second presidential bid with an unusual durability among Democratic voters.

Americans now view Mrs. Clinton more favorably and more see her as a strong leader than they did earlier in the year, despite weeks of scrutiny about her ethics, a New York Times/CBS News poll has found. And nearly nine in 10 Democrats say the nation is ready to elect a woman president.

Republican voters showed the most openness to considering Senator Marco Rubio of Florida and former Govs. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas and Jeb Bush of Florida among their party's presidential contenders, the survey found.

Mrs. Clinton remains a polarizing figure — nearly the same percentage of Americans view her positively as negatively — but her favorability rating has improved by nine percentage points since the disclosure in late March that she did not use a government email account as secretary of state.

Americans' Views on the 2016 Presidential Campaign and the Issues

See what Americans think about Hillary Rodham Clinton, the Republican candidates and issues like the health care law and same-sex marriage.

And the number of Americans who think Mrs. Clinton has strong qualities of leadership has risen by eight percentage points, to 65 percent from 57 percent, in that period. Still, Mrs. Clinton begins this campaign with fewer voters saying she possesses such qualities than did in July 2007, near the outset of her first presidential bid.

Mrs. Clinton has one primary opponent, Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont, and more Democrats are likely to enter the race, but her party seems particularly unbothered by questions relating to the emails and to the foundation that she, her husband and their daughter oversee.

While roughly 48 percent of Americans say Mrs. Clinton is honest and trustworthy, about four of five Democrats think she has those traits — and about the same numbers of Democrats say she shares the values most Americans try to live by.

Fifty-two percent of Democrats said they knew nothing or very little about the Clinton Foundation, and only 10 percent said foreign donations to the foundation affected Mrs. Clinton's decisions while she was the nation's top diplomat. Just 9 percent of Democratic voters said they would not consider voting for Mrs. Clinton.

"I think the whole thing is political and it's going to wash away eventually," Herbert Levengard, 83, a Democratic retiree from Maryland, said in a follow-up interview. "There are always going to be people who mess around and look for things to yell about, but I don't care."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mrs. Clinton is also helped in her own party by the enduring popularity of former President Bill Clinton: Seventy-six percent of Democrats have a favorable view of him, and only 4 percent view him unfavorably.

Democrats also assume that Mr. Clinton — who memorably said in his 1992 presidential bid that he and Mrs. Clinton represented “two for the price of one” — would play a substantial role were Mrs. Clinton to win the White House. Seven in 10 Democratic voters said he would have a great deal or some influence on Mrs. Clinton if she became president.

Continue reading the main story

If Democrats seem largely content with the prospect of another Clinton in the White House, Republicans do not seem quite as certain about electing a third member of the Bush family president.

Nearly three-quarters of Republican voters view George W. Bush favorably, but almost 70 percent have not yet formed an opinion of his brother Jeb, a likely presidential candidate.

The Republican primary is largely unformed, with many Republicans indicating openness to a variety of candidates in a large and still growing field.

There is positive news for Jeb Bush, though. Forty-nine percent of conservative Republican voters think his stance on the issues is about right.

While Mr. Bush has faced questions about whether he is conservative enough to win a Republican primary, only 22 percent of Republican voters said his views were not conservative enough. Further, 60 percent of Republican voters said having the right experience was more important in a presidential candidate, while only 27 percent said they thought offering fresh ideas was more valuable.

What could also help Mr. Bush — along with the other governors or former governors seeking the G.O.P. nomination — is that 73 percent of Republican voters said they preferred candidates with experience outside Washington.

“I would really prefer a candidate who has been a governor,” said Vinton Ernest, an 85-year-old Republican retiree from Las Vegas. “Running a state is just as difficult as running a government. It’s just multiplied when you’re running the country.”

Still, Mr. Rubio, 43, a first-term senator, seems to have more room to gain in popularity than Mr. Huckabee or Mr. Bush: Only 17 percent of Republicans said they would not consider supporting him, while 26 percent said they would not back Mr. Huckabee and 23 percent ruled out supporting Mr. Bush.

Republican voters were least resistant to Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin: Only 13 percent said they would not consider voting for him. At the opposite extreme, 42 percent of Republicans said they would not consider voting for Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey.

Over all, Democrats enter the next presidential campaign with a better image than Republicans. Forty-three percent of Americans said they had a favorable opinion of the Democratic Party while only 29 percent said the same of the Republican Party.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But as Democrats seek to retain the White House for a third consecutive term, many Americans are dissatisfied with the country's direction. Sixty-three percent of Americans said the country had gotten off track, and 66 percent said the economy was growing worse or staying the same.

The candidates will make their case to an increasingly polarized electorate: Two-thirds of Democrats support legalizing same-sex marriage, while about the same percentage of Republicans do not think same-sex marriages should be legal.

In addition, 69 percent of Republicans say small-business owners who provide wedding-related services should be able to refuse, on the basis of their religious belief, such services to same-sex couples. But 58 percent of Democrats think the businesses should be required to provide those services.

On immigration, 46 percent of Republicans said illegal immigrants should be required to leave the United States, while only 16 percent of Democrats said the same. And while 71 percent of Democrats said illegal immigrants should be able to stay in the country and apply for citizenship, just 38 percent of Republicans said they should be allowed to remain in America and pursue citizenship.

The poll was conducted by telephone, on landlines and cellphones nationwide, from April 30 to May 3 with 1,027 adults, of whom 868 were registered to vote. The margin of sampling error is plus or minus three percentage points for all adults and registered voters.

NH Dem Primary Poll // WMUR Granite State Poll // Andrew E. Smith, Phd - May 5, 2015

DURHAM, NH –Hillary Clinton remains the frontrunner in the 2016 New Hampshire Primary although support for her has dipped somewhat in recent months. Her favorability ratings among Democratic primary voters have dropped significantly since February. These findings are based on the latest WMUR Granite State Poll, conducted by the University of New Hampshire Survey Center. Seven hundred and six (706) randomly selected New Hampshire adults were interviewed by landline and cellular telephone between April 24 and May 3, 2015. The margin of sampling error is +/- 3.7 percent. Included were two hundred twenty-nine (229) likely 2016 Democratic Primary voters (MSE = +/-6.5), two hundred ninety-three (293) likely 2016 Republican Primary voters (MSE = +/-5.7), and six hundred and twenty-seven (627) likely 2016 presidential election voters (MSE = +/- 3.9

For Hillary Clinton's Campaign Manager, It All Began in Vegas // Bloomberg // Jennifer Epstein – May 5, 2015

A few days before that year's Nevada caucus, among the most rancorous of primary battles of 2008, the head of Hillary Clinton's state team went to the emergency room.

Robby Mook wasn't ill, but one of his field organizers—a junior staffer he'd known for a few months—was. Though the campaign was at one of its busiest moments, Mook was determined to show the woman that he was there to support her.

When he got to the hospital, a recognizable face was already in the waiting room: his counterpart on Barack Obama's campaign, David Cohen, who'd been friends with the woman for years.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It was days before the caucus and there we were, sitting together waiting and joking around about both being there,” said Cohen, who had met Mook only once before that night. “I was struck—it was the height of the campaign and he could’ve just stayed in the office or sent someone else. But he was like, ‘Nope, I know where I’ve got to be.’”

That was just one hint of the kind of campaign leader Mook, who was 27 during most of his 11 months as Clinton's Nevada state director, had already become. After helping Clinton to a split decision in Nevada—she won the popular vote while Obama won the delegate count—he moved on to lead her winning state operations in Ohio and Indiana.

He's since refined his skills, leading Jeanne Shaheen’s 2008 successful Senate campaign in New Hampshire, Terry McAuliffe’s gubernatorial campaign in Virginia, and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee through the 2012 cycle.

As Clinton makes her first trip of the campaign cycle to Nevada on Tuesday for a roundtable on immigration reform and a fundraiser hosted by Las Vegas Sun president and publisher Brian Greenspun, the memory of Mook's role in her 2008 campaign remains fresh. And the way that Mook ran Nevada operation—his first presidential-level leadership role—offers a clue toward the way he’ll approach the next 18 months: focused on teamwork, discipline and keeping costs low. He’s described by people who’ve worked for and against him as someone who approaches the platonic ideal of the campaign manager: a skilled strategist, talented field organizer and able manager.

But one person who won't be the source of a description of him is Mook himself. As a general rule, he doesn't talk to reporters, let alone agree to interviews for profiles of himself.

Eight years ago, as a young out-of-stater with two cycles of experience under his belt, Mook could have rubbed Nevada’s Democrats the wrong way. He didn’t.

“He wasn’t a snotty-nosed kid that didn’t know what he was doing,” said Rory Reid, the well-connected lawyer and son of Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid who was the Clinton campaign’s state chairman in 2008.

His work was “very methodical and effective” and his demeanor was “gentlemanly,” Reid said. “Most political operatives are not frequently described as likable. They tend to be bombastic and foul mouthed and objectionable in many ways, and he’s not that. He’s very unassuming and focused.”

The 2008 race was the first time Nevada held caucuses on such a large scale, and organizing for them was a complex and challenging undertaking. Mook was the “mastermind,” said Alisa Nave-Worth, the 2008 campaign’s Southern Nevada political director. He directed the communications strategy, created a how-to-caucus website that got out ahead of other campaigns and helped build a vast network of endorsements.

Mook was also aggressive in pushing for what he needed from headquarters in Virginia. “When he felt we needed something from the folks at national, he got on the phone and was very clear,” said Pam duPré, the northern Nevada political director. “He had reasons lined up—why we needed a surrogate, more money, more people.”

The operation was thrifty, and that started from the top. Mook and his field director Marlon Marshall would stay in duPré’s house when visiting the Reno area, and out-of-state surrogates were put up in supporters’ homes or inexpensive hotels. Now that he’s running the whole campaign, the rules are even tighter: no business cards for staff, and they are urged to take the bus when traveling between New York and Washington.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mook is even-keeled, resisting the impulse to get too excited when something goes well or to get discouraged by a setback.

Throughout 2007, the Clinton campaign pushed hard for the endorsement of the Culinary Union's Local 226, which represents workers on the Las Vegas Strip. When the union chose to back Obama, the near-universal response among Clinton supporters was "oh my gosh, we're in trouble," Reid said. Bill Clinton lashed out at the "establishment organization" for siding with Obama while the rank-and-file "insurgents" backed his wife.

Mook stayed calm. "He just looked at me and said, 'let's win those caucuses,'" Reid recalled. Field workers buckled down, Bill and Chelsea started reaching out to voters, and Clinton won 7 of the 9 caucus sites along the Strip.

"I've never once seen him angry," said Emmy Ruiz, the 2016 Nevada state director, who worked with Mook throughout the 2008 Nevada campaign as a field organizer.

Mook's unruffled approach also translated into the way he managed his staff, choosing to intervene and then move on when he saw conflict.

"Other campaign people can be like, 'if it means I'm spending 60 fewer seconds on voter contact, I'm ignoring the issue,'" duPre said. "Robby wasn't like that. He would simply shift his focus very briefly, take care of whatever he had to take care of, and get back on track."

Mook makes it clear to his teams that "you have to be personally invested in the people around you," Nave-Worth said. He's also a proponent of "mandatory fun"—meals, drinks and retreats—to help build those bonds.

In late 2007, aware that many staffers wouldn't be able to get home to their families for Christmas and wouldn't be able to spend the day calling voters, Mook engineered a party for 200. "All the senior staff basted turkeys," recalled Nave-Worth, whose mother hosted the group at her Las Vegas home. "We went outside in the cold and cooked some on the grill."

Ruiz, the first field organizer the Clinton campaign hired back in 2007, is now doing Mook's old job as state director. "He invested in my development, and I'm not the only one," she said, pointing to Brynne Craig, a 2008 Nevada field organizer who is now deputy political director, as another beneficiary of Mook's mentoring.

Asked for a weakness, duPré said that Mook was "always walking around talking on his phone," a Samsung smartphone with a keyboard. "He didn't sit still very often and he had to sit still sometimes to plug in his phone."

And, she added, "I hope he eats well and gets enough rest. I hope he's following his own advice."

Hillary Clinton Draws Distinction With GOP on Immigration // TIME // Sam Frizell - May 5, 2015

Republican policies would create a "second-class status" for immigrants, she argued

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton drew a sharp distinction Tuesday between herself and the 2016 Republican hopefuls on immigration reform, and called for a full path to citizenship for people who came to the U.S. illegall

“Today, not a single Republican candidate, announced or potential is clearly consistent in supporting a path to citizenship,” the former Secretary of State said in prepared remarks before a roundtable at a high school in Nevada. “When they talk about ‘legal status,’ that is code for second-class status.”

Calling immigration a family and an economic issue, Clinton said she supported expanding programs for so-called Dreamers to help parents of immigrant children stay in the United States.

Clinton raised eyebrows in June when she said that the unaccompanied minors fleeing violence in Central America should not be allowed to stay in the U.S. “to send a clear message.” Immigration activists expect Clinton to firmly embrace comprehensive immigration reform as a central part of her platform in 2016.

In response to a question from one of the roundtable participants, Clinton said she would make immigration reform one of her first initiatives if elected.

“We should put in place a simple, straightforward and accessible way for parents of Dreamers and others with a history of service and contributions to their community to make their case and to be eligible for the same deferred action as their children,” she said.

Hillary Clinton To Unveil Path To Citizenship Immigration Plan // NPR // Tamara Keith - May 5, 2015

Hillary Clinton is expected Tuesday to lay out her plan for a path to citizenship for many who are presently in the United States illegally. Meanwhile, her campaign is ramping up its efforts to get ahead of the scandal stories involving a new book about the Clinton Foundation and the upcoming Benghazi hearings.

MELISSA BLOCK, HOST:

Immigration is the key topic for Hillary Clinton today, and it's the purpose for her visit to Las Vegas. She visited Rancho High School where 70 percent of the student body is Hispanic. She called for a path to citizenship for the 12 million immigrants in the U.S. illegally.

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON: It is at heart a family issue, and if we claim that we are for families, we have to pull together and resolve the outstanding issues around our broken immigration system.

BLOCK: Clinton made her pitch on the same day the book "Clinton Cash" hit stores. It raises questions about foreign donors to the Clinton Foundation. NPR's Tamara Keith is in Las Vegas, and she joins me now. And, Tamara, what's the dynamic here for the Clinton campaign on the question of immigration?

TAMARA KEITH, BYLINE: The Latino vote is critical to the Democratic coalition, and in particular, in Nevada, an energized Hispanic electorate can be the difference between winning and losing for Democrats. And Clinton's team sees immigration as a wedge issue. Republicans are running in primaries where they will likely take positions on immigration that many Latino voters will disagree with. Think Mitt Romney's self-deportation comments in 2012. And what Clinton is trying to do here is draw a contrast between herself and Republican candidates, many of whom do not support a path to citizenship. She's not going out on a limb in terms of Democratic voters, but it also sends a signal to the Latino activists that she's on their team on this one.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BLOCK: Now, I also mentioned the book that comes out today, "Clinton Cash." It's been raising a lot of uncomfortable questions for both Hillary Clinton and former President Clinton. How are they - how are they responding to that?

KEITH: Bill Clinton did an interview from Africa where he was doing foundation work with NBC, and he described the book as basically a political hit job. He said that the foundation never did anything knowingly inappropriate, and he touted the transparency of the foundation. But then he also said that he feels like the Clintons are held to a different set of rules - that are rules for the Clintons and there are rules for other people, and that they are held to a higher standard. Now, lots of people out there believe that the Clintons play by their own rules, so this was seen as somewhat tone deaf. He also said that he wasn't planning to stop giving these big speeches where he's paid hundreds of thousands of dollars for a single speech because he, quote, "has to pay the bills."

BLOCK: So Bill Clinton pushing back about allegations about the foundation. What about the Clinton campaign, Hillary Clinton's campaign?

KEITH: They've launched something called The Briefing, and they're describing it as your go-to source for the facts you need to set the story straight. They just announced it today. You know, in 1992, the Bill Clinton campaign had a war room, and they really innovated this concept of political rapid response. Now Hillary Clinton's campaign is doing something very similar, though with all of the modern technology of Internet videos and web posts and Twitter. Here's Brian Fallon, who's a press secretary for the campaign, in a web video they put out today about that "Clinton Cash" book.

BRIAN FALLON: It's full of sloppy research and attacks pulled out of thin air with no actual evidence and it's missing the most important thing of all - facts. Let's just take a look at a few of the craziest conspiracy theories.

KEITH: And that term conspiracy theories, you know, that is sort of an echo to Hillary Clinton's line about the vast right-wing conspiracy. And I think that they are planning to try to downplay any criticism of Clinton or the Clinton Foundation as part of conspiracy theories.

BLOCK: At the same time, Tamara, there's now word this week that Hillary Clinton has agreed to testify before a House committee. She's going to be testifying about the Benghazi attack when she was secretary of state, also about her private email server. So questions about things other than the campaign will continue to swirl around her.

KEITH: A good friend of hers recently told me that Hillary Clinton has a remarkable ability to compartmentalize, and I think that that's exactly what the campaign is trying to do here. They want to as much as possible let the candidate be the candidate while at the same time, not letting any attack go unanswered.

BLOCK: OK, NPR's Tamara Keith following the Clinton campaign in Nevada. Tamara, thanks.

KEITH: You're welcome.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton's Nevada play // POLITICO // Gabriel Debendetti - May 5, 2015

Hillary Clinton's return to Nevada, the site of one of her toughest battles with then-Sen. Barack Obama, is designed to project a sense that she's taking the Democratic nominating contest seriously, even in the absence of stiff competition.

But Tuesday's visit is also about November 2016, when her ties to Hispanic voters and union members could prove pivotal for her presidential ambitions — and to Democratic hopes of recapturing the Senate.

In what has become a familiar format for the former secretary of state's campaign stops, Clinton will convene a roundtable of locals at Rancho High School here, where she will focus on immigration reform and call for a path to citizenship for undocumented immigrants, according to a campaign official.

It's just a quick swing through the state — a trip that will take place against the backdrop of the much anticipated release of "Clinton Cash: The Untold Story of How and Why Foreign Governments and Businesses Helped Make Bill and Hillary Rich," by conservative author Peter Schweizer.

Nonetheless, Clinton's team sees ample opportunity in the one-day visit: the candidate can draw a contrast with Republicans on immigration reform while personally laying the groundwork for a caucus organization that Nevada Democrats hope translates into broader voter registration and interest.

With a largely static Electoral College map and a limited number of states truly in play in 2016 — not to mention an open Senate race to replace retiring Minority Leader Harry Reid — few places are more important than Nevada next year.

"What she's able to do there is go to an early state which will clearly be important to her in the presidential process even though she won't have much of a primary," explained Democratic strategist Maria Cardona, a senior advisor to Clinton in 2008 who worked on the campaign's Hispanic outreach effort. "It gives her the opportunity to say, 'Look: I'm not taking this for granted.'"

Eight years ago, Nevada hosted one of the most bruising fights of the primary contest, featuring a split among the unions that are central to the state's organizing infrastructure and a resulting tussle over the shape of the caucus itself. While Clinton walked away with more votes than Obama, the president-to-be claimed more delegates to the convention.

But this time around Clinton's likely primary opponents have little presence here, and her own campaign is run by operatives who know Nevada well: her 2008 state director Robby Mook now serves as her national campaign manager, her top organizing official Marlon Marshall worked alongside Mook here that year, and her highest-ranking staffer in Nevada is Obama's 2012 state director and Clinton 2008 field organizer Emmy Ruiz.

As in the other prominent caucus state of Iowa, Clinton's team insists it is best served by building a highly-structured field organization from the start, which it has already begun to do.

"In order to win in Nevada, they're going to have to do real, concerted organizing," said Yvanna Cancela, the political director of the Culinary Union 226 Local — Nevada's largest and most influential union, which endorsed Obama over Clinton eight years ago. "2014 wasn't necessarily a Republican wave. It was a massive not-voting on behalf of the populations they want to turn out. In order to change that behavior, they're going to have to invest and organize an infrastructure that moves those folks to the polls."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The campaign has started its union outreach in a state where organized labor holds major sway, Marshall told POLITICO. That's helped assuage concerns of Democrats who recognize that the battle for Reid's Senate seat will be among the most expensive and closely-contested in the nation — and who want the Clinton campaign to ramp up quickly.

"What I learned in the general election of 2008 was that having the organizing from the primary helped," Marshall explained. "Focusing on building infrastructure really helps Democrats up and down the ballot."

Still, GOP leaders, including the Republican National Committee's new political director, Nevada veteran Chris Carr, are also keeping an eye on Clinton's efforts in the state, aware that it represents not only an important early-voting contest, but a useful six electoral votes come November — votes that have gone Democratic in the last two presidential elections.

Republicans have cause for optimism: After the 2014 elections, they control the levers of state government, including the governorship and both state legislative chambers.

Clinton will aim to rally a key part of the state's Democratic base — Hispanic voters — with her comments about immigration on Tuesday: she will tell voters at the school, which has a roughly 70 percent Hispanic student body, that the country "cannot settle for proposals that provide hard-working people with merely a 'second-class' status," according to a campaign aide. The former senator and first lady was extremely popular among Hispanics in 2008, garnering two times as many Latino votes as Obama during their drawn-out primary contest, and is now seeking to rekindle that relationship.

But the immigration landscape has changed since then, and Clinton has occasionally faced tough questions about her precise immigration position from DREAMers who were brought into the United States illegally when they were children. Her remarks on Tuesday are intended to send a clear message of support to them.

"The Hispanic voters are really looking to her to see what is going to be her stance on immigration," said Cardona. "They understand that she has supported [comprehensive immigration reform] in the past, that she has voiced support for President Obama's executive action. But I think they want to hear what she would do if she was elected."

By staking out a liberal position on immigration early Clinton could avoid criticism from possible primary challengers, but the real aim is to draw a hard line between Democrats and Republicans who are opposed to broader immigration reform and Obama's 2014 executive action.

"From a political standpoint it is incredibly smart for her to be doing this early and in such an intimate way, one-on-one with Latino voters," said Cardona. "I guarantee you the contrast with her Republican opposition could not be starker."

Clinton Pledges to Take Immigration Actions 'Even Further' // MSNBC // Andrew Rafferty and Andrea Mitchell – May 5, 2015

Democratic presidential front runner Hillary Clinton pledged Tuesday to take further executive actions if

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Congress fails to pass comprehensive immigration reform and accused Republicans of advocating to give undocumented workers "second class status."

"If Congress refuses to act, as president, I would do everything possible under the law to go even further," Clinton said during a campaign stop in Las Vegas.

Clinton said it is time for "a path to full and equal citizenship" and dismissed competing proposals that would give undocumented immigrants a limited time-frame to remain in the country legally.

And Clinton said that if she is elected president she would expand DACA provisions to include parents who had deep roots in the United States.

The former secretary of state made the remarks after meeting with youths at Rancho High School in Las Vegas, which is 70 percent Hispanic. The roundtable included one student from Rancho HS, Betsaida Frausto, a junior who has a 4.8 grade point average, is taking three Advanced Placement classes, and wants to go to Yale to become a doctor.

She also heard heartwarming stories from the students, including several who come from "mixed" families — where one parent and/or a sibling are legal and the rest of the family are not and are faced with deportation. Clinton told them it is foolish to talk about deporting 11 million people, saying we are a nation of immigrants and we have to solve this issue.

"I don't understand how anyone can look at these young people and think we should break up more families or turn away more hard workers with talent to help us build the kind of country we all want to see," Clinton said. "So I will fight for comprehensive immigration reform and a path to citizenship for you and for your families across our country."

President Barack Obama took executive actions last year that would give temporary legal status to millions of illegal immigrants. The orders, which are currently being challenged in court, resulted in a political showdown with Congressional Republicans who said the president had overstepped his Constitutional authority.

While the orders led to contentious showdowns in Washington that threatened to shut down the Department of Homeland Security and delayed the confirmation of Obama's attorney general nominee this year, polling shows the rest of the country largely approves the orders. An MSNBC/Telemundo/Marist poll released last month found 57 percent of Americans and 78 percent of Latinos approved what the president did.

How to deal with the nation's estimated 11 million undocumented immigrants has already proved to be a key issue in the early stages of the 2016 campaign. Many in the Republican party have slammed a path to citizenship for undocumented immigrants as "amnesty" that threatens American workers and ignores the law.

"Today not a single Republican candidate either announced or potential is clearly and consistently supporting a path to citizenship, not one," Clinton said at Rancho High School. "When they talk about legal status, that is code for second class status."

Clinton to reach out to Latinos in NH // New Hampshire Union Leader // Dan Tuohy - May 5, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While Hillary Clinton focuses on immigration Tuesday in Nevada, her campaign this week will be reaching out to the Latino community in New Hampshire to talk about her reform ideas.

The Democratic presidential candidate, in Nevada, will talk about the need to pass comprehensive immigration reform that provides “a path to citizenship,” upholds the law and protects border and national security, according to the Clinton campaign.

Clinton’s goal is to bring “millions of hard-working people out of the shadows and into the formal economy so they can pay taxes and contribute to our nation’s prosperity.”

Clinton’s New Hampshire campaign is in the process of organizing a “Latino Americans for Hillary” house party in Manchester and reaching out to Latino-owned businesses in Manchester and Nashua.

The campaign also plans to confer with immigration reform advocates and Latino residents in New Hampshire.

The Note: High Bar For Hillary on Immigration // ABC News // Jim Avila and Serena Marshall - May 5, 2015

She is the presumed favorite of the Latino vote and today in Las Vegas Hillary Clinton is expected to double down on this gateway issue for Hispanic voters, ABC’s JIM AVILA and SERENA MARSHALL note. A Clinton official telling ABC News she plans to focus on a path to citizenship as part of comprehensive immigration reform. Latino leaders consulting her campaign tell ABC News Clinton is looking for a way to clearly contrast herself from republican candidates for president by embracing the full path to citizenship rather than proposing a second class of Americans who can work in the United States but not enjoy the protection of citizenship. Clinton is also expected to promise to extend the dreamer program to undocumented parents of children born in the United States Latino groups will be listening today for a timetable for implementation of these changes. President Obama has been faulted with moving too slowly during his first term when he had a democratic majority and failed to pass immigration reform. Latino groups also say they will listen for consistency in Hillary Clinton’s campaign, concerned that what happens in Vegas today on immigration doesn't just stay in Vegas but is promised in Iowa and other primary states

Hillary Clinton revives hibernating '80s 'sleaze factor' // USA Today // James S. Robbins - May 5, 2015

In the wake of revelations regarding the questionable nexus between Hillary and Bill Clinton's family foundation and those who benefitted from her tenure as Secretary of State, their defenders say there is no proof of misdeeds, no verifiable quid pro quo, not a shred of evidence against them. True so far, at least none that weren't deleted.

However there is a pattern of dubious behavior, and certainly an appearance of impropriety. The sheer scale of the money involved is daunting. Hundreds of thousands of dollars in donations and speaker's fees on the one hand, with contracts and agreements worth multi-millions of dollars being doled out on the other. The fact that Mrs. Clinton has not already been written off as politically dead says a lot about how perceptions of the role of money in politics have changed.

The Clintons' troubles bring to mind "the sleaze factor," an expression used by Walter Mondale early in the 1984 presidential campaign to describe what he called "a tawdry record of unethical conduct" in the Reagan administration. It was rooted in allegations of misconduct among several members of Reagan's team. Mondale said that almost every week, "another rotten apple falls out of the tree."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mondale took aim specifically at then-Attorney General nominee Edwin Meese, who was being investigated by the Justice Department for a potential violation of the Ethics in Government Act. In particular, questions had arisen over a $15,000 interest-free loan from his assistant Edwin Thomas to Meese's wife, Ursula, that Meese had not reported on his financial disclosure form. Thomas, his wife and son later went on to receive Federal appointments.

One editorial from the time summarized the charges against Meese as "suspicious-looking loans from people who later received White House favors [and] financial dealings that were either unreported or misreported." That could be used as boilerplate for an article about the Clintons today. Meese was cleared of wrongdoing, only to fall afoul of the Wedtech scandal three years later, an affair the New York Times called "too indecent and too predictable." Again, useful boilerplate.

Reagan's National Security Advisor Richard Allen was also hit with the sleaze charge. He was hounded from office principally because of an envelope containing $1000 cash that was left behind in his safe when he moved offices. The money was an honorarium that Allen's longtime friend Tamotsu Takase, husband of Japanese journalist Chizuko Takase, had tried to present to Nancy Reagan for an interview before the inauguration. Allen, then a leader of the transition team, intercepted the envelope and gave it to his secretary, who put it in the safe. He then forgot about it.

Allen was cleared of criminal wrongdoing for taking — that is, not spending, not using, just storing, then abandoning — the cash. However he was eventually hounded out of office for having accepted two Japanese wristwatches from Takase, valued at $135 each, which were personal gifts for him and his wife. Allen also admitted it may be been possible that Takase "brought me a bottle of sake … he always brings me a bottle of sake." This amounted to sleaze? It sounds positively quaint compared to the relentless efforts of the Clinton money machine.

Liberal commentator Tom Braden thought the sleaze factor would be a major campaign theme. He said the names of the Reagan officials under suspicion such as Meese and Allen "do not conjure the image of openness, candor, honesty and fair-mindedness that Americans respect." These are also words one would not immediately associate with the name Clinton.

The sleaze charge did not change the outcome of the 1984 election, in which Mondale was trounced. And Clinton lawyer Lanny Davis in his book Scandal noted that "Democrats paid dearly in the Clinton years for this careless use of the charge 'corruption.'" But not all charges are baseless. If Mrs. Clinton wins the White House, it would be useful to swear in a special prosecutor the day of the inauguration, just for the sake of convenience. It will be one busy office.

Clinton camp on defense about her trustworthiness // CNN // Jeff Zeleny - May 5, 2015

Washington (CNN)A month after launching Hillary Clinton's presidential candidacy, with every moment of her announcement video and reintroduction tour to voters carefully crafted, her campaign team now finds itself consumed by fending off a familiar, yet far more elusive, adversary: The Clinton legacy.

As she visits Nevada on Tuesday and calls for a path to citizenship for immigrants living in the country illegally, her advisers are trying to keep old fires from becoming political obstacles with staying power. Questions about donations to the family's foundation, along with Bill Clinton's defiant comments this week, have alarmed Democrats who hoped she could start her campaign on fresh footing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Aides to Clinton still insist she will run the race on her own terms without distraction from whirlwinds of controversy. Yet strategists acknowledge sufficient concern by an erosion of trust and credibility that they are forcefully fighting back. One way is through a new blog, "The Briefing," which is notably not devoted to Clinton's platform for 2016, but rather simply fact-checking attacks against her.

"While we will not be consumed by these kinds of attacks, we will also not let them go unchallenged," John Podesta, the campaign chairman, said in a message intended to allay any worry among supporters. "That's why we are building a new one-stop shop to provide the facts about Hillary Clinton's positions and her record."

It's a key challenge of her candidacy: Shoring up her perceptions of trust and credibility.

The campaign, through its own surveys and focus groups with voters, is closely studying a decline in her approval since she entered the race last month. An NBC/Wall Street Journal poll released Tuesday found only a quarter of registered voters said they viewed her as honest and straightforward, down 13 percentage points from last summer. But she still fares stronger when facing a Republican rival.

But a central question facing Clinton in her second presidential bid is whether she and her new team of advisers can answer questions and fight allegations openly -- in a far different media climate -- without reverting to a familiar Clinton defensive crouch that all criticism is automatically partisan and no legitimate inquires could exist.

As Bill Clinton's first televised interview of the campaign still reverberated Tuesday, several top Democrats told CNN they were taken aback by his tone and they wondered anew whether his words could be a detriment to his wife's campaign. Some Democrats said they cringed when he brushed aside questions about collecting $500,000 for delivering a speech by saying: "I've gotta pay our bills."

"There is no doubt in my mind that we have never done anything knowingly inappropriate in terms of taking money to influence any kind of American government policy," Bill Clinton told NBC News in Nairobi. He also criticized what he characterized as "political" attacks on the foundation.

His comments raised more skepticism of the charges included in a book that was released on Tuesday, "Clinton Cash: The Untold Story of How and Why Foreign Governments and Businesses Helped Make Bill and Hillary Rich."

Inside the Clinton campaign headquarters in Brooklyn, aides were widely pleased with the disciplined rollout of her announcement tour and the campaign's aggressive rebuttals to the book, written by conservative author Peter Schweizer.

But now, advisers acknowledge they are bracing for an even more challenging -- and uncertain -- second month of her campaign.

Clinton could be called as soon as May 18 to testify before the House Select Committee on Benghazi in its investigation of the attacks that killed four Americans on Sept. 11, 2012. She also will be questioned over the use of a private email server during her time as secretary of state.

It will be an unusual scene for a presidential candidate: Raising her right hand and swearing an oath to testify during a televised congressional committee. The proceedings have already taken a partisan tone on both sides. Podesta fueled Democratic suspicion in his message to supporters this week, arguing the inquiry by Republicans is part of a "two-fisted strategy to try to undermine her."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To be sure, Clinton's trust and credibility are at the forefront of the Republican campaign against her. Republican presidential candidates are spending less time trying to link Clinton to Obama these days than they do raising questions about whether she's trustworthy.

"I think that Bill Clinton is saying what Hillary Clinton has said on many occasions: 'Just trust us,'" Carly Fiorina said as she announced her candidacy Monday. "Trust is earned through transparency."

Republicans are hoping to take a page from the winning Democratic playbook of 2012: Define Clinton in a negative light early by chipping away at her credibility. It's similar to how the Obama campaign rushed to define Mitt Romney, which stuck with him for the duration of the race.

Clinton advisers downplayed that comparison. They said the trust question was not simply about whether voters trusted Clinton, but whether they trusted her to do the right things for them.

Democrats close to Clinton believe the best antidote to the Republican attacks is to step up her own campaign and begin to aggressively outline what she stands for and why she wants to be president. She has intentionally downsized the early stage of her campaign, holding only a handful of appearances.

The only stop on her public campaign schedule this week is in Nevada on Tuesday, leaving her Republican critics to fill the vacuum of silence.

Clinton 'War Room' Pushback And The 'Invent Your Own' Media Campaign // NPR // Jessica Taylor - May 5, 2015

The Hillary Clinton campaign went into overdrive Tuesday trying to minimize the damage from a new book that delves into Clinton Foundation fundraising — and they're not using the typical channels to do so.

On the same day that the controversial new book, "Clinton Cash" by Peter Schweizer, was officially released, the Democrat's presidential campaign largely went around the traditional media in favor of new media tools.

Though campaigns have been trying to bypass the media filter for years, it's an advent of a new era in politics. The Clinton campaign is embracing several new technologies and platforms to get their message out more directly to voters, and it's a tactic her potential rivals are sure to employ, too.

"It's almost media 3.0," said Tobe Berkovitz, a professor of political communication at Boston University. "If 1.0 was dealing with the press and 2.0 was trying to circumvent the press and going to friendly sites, 3.0 is, 'Why even bother with that? Just invent your own.'"

Through a new section of its campaign website called, "The Briefing," and a post on the platform-sharing site Medium, Clinton's campaign went on offense against Schweizer and his suggestions that foreign donations to her family's foundation influenced her time at the State Department — all without the candidate addressing it head on.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A two-and-a-half-minute video posted on the new site from campaign spokesman Brian Fallon derides Schweizer as a GOP operative, who was a former adviser to 2008 vice-presidential nominee Sarah Palin, and a close friend of the Koch brothers. He also noted that research by ABC News and even Fox News revealed there was no "smoking gun."

"The book is already being debunked far and wide," Fallon said."It's full of sloppy research and attacks pulled out of thin air with no actual evidence. And it's missing the most important thing of all: facts."

Campaign Chairman John Podesta also explained the campaign's strategy in a memo posted to Medium:

"While we will not be consumed by these kinds of attacks, we will also not let them go unchallenged. That's why we are building a new one-stop shop to provide the facts about Hillary Clinton's positions and her record. We are calling it 'The Briefing.' You will be able to find information and it will serve as a hub that allows Hillary for America to cut through the partisan noise over the next 18 months and directly communicate with voters. This forum will provide the public with direct access to the facts on the positive policy agenda that Hillary will unveil over the course of campaign, as well as the facts needed to debunk false attacks."

This isn't the first time since she announced last month that Clinton's team has utilized these new platforms, especially to target Schweizer. Though his book was just released on Tuesday, details have been leaking out for weeks and other media organizations like the New York Times have used his research to further investigate specific claims.

Team Clinton has turned to Medium before, with Fallon releasing a statement on the Times story that alleged donations to the Clinton foundation were tied to the government's approval of uranium mining company to the Russian government:

"Without presenting any direct evidence in support of the claim, the Times story — like the book on which it is based — wrongly suggests that Hillary Clinton's State Department pushed for the sale's approval to reward donors who had a financial interest in the deal."

Last week, the Clinton campaign also released a Vine of comments Schweizer had made at a 2014 Koch brothers summit, where he told fellow conservatives "we cannot let up."

The use of new media in favor of more traditional media isn't a surprising strategy from the Clinton campaign, given Clinton's decades-long distrust of and tension with the media. It's also not a new tactic, with campaigns' rapid-response teams trying to get their message out at any cost and through any channel. And given the way more and more people, especially younger voters, consume news, it might be the most efficient as well.

The embrace of these new platforms is one that both the Democratic and Republican presidential candidates are likely to use even more this cycle.

Clinton's campaign insists it is not bypassing the media in the new approach, but is instead using multiple platforms to get their message out.

"Our campaign will work with the oldest of media outlets and the newest of technologies to reach voters," Clinton spokesman Josh Schwerin told NPR in emailed statement. "It would be a false choice to say it's one or the other.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There is so much misinformation flying around that, whether it's through the press or on social media, it's important for voters to be able to access the facts directly, so they can assess for themselves and help beat back the partisan attacks."

It's also a way for the campaign to release a controlled, scripted narrative instead of having Clinton herself answer questions about the issue. National Journal noted last week she has only answered a total of seven media questions since she became an official candidate. She twice dismissed allegations in Schweizer's book as "distractions" but she did not answer the charges directly.

The one unscripted response came from former President Bill Clinton in an interview with NBC News Monday that the family foundation had "never done anything knowingly inappropriate" in accepting money from foreign governments for their charitable foundation.

The foundation has reinstated a ban on donations from all but six foreign countries now, but the former president said that move was "absolutely not" an acknowledgement that accepting previous donations was a mistake.

For the Clinton campaign, this approach is "much better than actually trotting Hillary out somewhere and have her answer what might be tough or aggressive questions," Berkowitz said. "Release the video, and then you release the hounds."

Democratic strategist Jim Manley, a former top aide to Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said it's the right approach for the Clintons.

"What I see happening is a classic Clinton-style war-room operation utilizing all the new media that are out there," Manley said. "I think they deserve a lot of credit for utilizing new things like Medium, but I also respect that they're not going to leave any charge unanswered."

Clinton is far and away the Democratic frontrunner for president, and she still beats most of her possible GOP rivals in hypothetical head-to-heads too. But amid questions about the Clinton foundation and an earlier controversy about her use of a private email server instead of a government account while she was at the State Department, her polling numbers have suffered.

Since March, Clinton's unfavorable rating has risen six percentage points while those who said she was honest and straightforward has dropped 13 points in a year, according to an NBC/Wall Street Journal poll released this week.

Clinton has been under sustained assault from Republicans on the campaign trail and Capitol Hill. And she will continue to be with hearings and testimony coming about the terrorist attack on the U.S. outpost in Benghazi, Libya.

"I think every bit is going to help, but the Republicans have an amazing ability to drudge up all sorts of crazy conspiracies about the Clintons," Manley said. "These kind of tools can only take you so far, but, at some point, she's going to have to start addressing some of these things herself."

Clinton camp pushes back on book, Benghazi with new Web site // WaPo // Anne Gearan - May 5, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Clinton campaign is expanding its defense of the candidate against allegations of alleged influence-peddling and questionable financial dealings at her family foundation, unveiling an online tutorial Tuesday to counter what the campaign calls Republican smears.

Polls suggest that Hillary Rodham Clinton is being damaged, if only slightly, by the continuing controversy surrounding a book released Tuesday, “Clinton Cash,” outlining possible improprieties while she was secretary of state.

On a new Clinton-backed Web site called “The Briefing,” campaign press secretary Brian Fallon says the book by conservative author Peter Schweizer is “full of sloppy research and attacks pulled out of thin air with no evidence.”

A pro-Clinton group called Correct the Record is also slated to go live later Tuesday with its own Web site, defending the candidate's record on the 2012 attacks in Benghazi, Libya.

The campaign has been pushing back hard against the reported contents of the book called “Clinton Cash” ahead of its release and against related news coverage of ties among the Clinton Foundation, donors and foreign governments. Fallon calls the book’s charting of some of those ties “crazy conspiracy theories,” and invites supporters to share the Web video and sign up for updates.

The video follows a Monday memo from campaign chairman John Podesta that previewed the online and social media campaign against the book’s charges and wider criticism of former president Bill Clinton and Hillary Clinton. Podesta said critics of Hillary Clinton have a “two-fisted strategy” to undermine her that includes a newly announced hearing into the deaths of four Americans in Benghazi, while Clinton was secretary of state.

“While we will not be consumed by these kinds of attacks, we will also not let them go unchallenged,” he said. The various claims “will not be the last false set of allegations” Clinton faces over the 18 months to the general election, Podesta wrote.

That assumes that Clinton wins the Democratic nomination, which she is the heavy favorite to do.

The fact-checking site will give the campaign a way to address supporters about things they may be hearing and seeing in the media without going through the media itself. The campaign will collect e-mail addresses of those who visit the site, which also includes a link to donate.

“You and I both know that Republicans will latch on to whatever far-flung theories they can find in order to try and distract from Hillary's record of fighting for everyday Americans,” campaign communications director Jennifer Palmieri wrote in an e-mail to supporters Tuesday. “The Briefing will be your regular download on what you can do to help fight back against attacks like these.”

Also Tuesday, Correct The Record's new Web site will be devoted to undercutting Republican claims about Benghazi and advancing the Democratic argument that Clinton played no direct role.

Called “Benghazi By The Numbers,” the site includes facts and figures about the multiple Republican-led investigations into Benghazi as well as the independent State Department review that found bureaucratic errors but no scandal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“In interviews, testimony and in her book, Secretary Clinton has taken responsibility repeatedly,” Correct The Record said. “Clinton fully and publicly answered questions before Congress.”

Here is a sampling of the site’s compilations:

“10: Number of congressional committees that have participated in Benghazi investigations.

32: Number of congressional hearings, public or private, held on the Benghazi tragedy according to publicly available hearing transcripts, congressional reports, and committee websites and fact sheets.

54: Approximate number of hours spent to date in publicly available hearings about the tragedy in Benghazi.

2,780: Number of questions asked in public hearings held on the Benghazi tragedy.”

The Web site also claims, "Past investigations of the tragedy have cost taxpayers millions of dollars and thousands of man-hours. The newest committee has already cost taxpayers more than $2.5 million to date, and has been on course to cost more than $6 million."

Clinton is scheduled to testify as early as May 18 before a Republican-led special committee looking into Benghazi and questions about the security and propriety of Clinton’s e-mail system. The State Department plans to soon release edited versions of some 300 Clinton e-mails turned over to the committee.

Here's Hillary Clinton's latest pushback against the 'dud' allegations in 'Clinton Cash' // Business Insider // Colin Campbell - May 5, 2015

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's campaign released another video on Monday blasting the book "Clinton Cash" for its unproven allegations against her.

"'Clinton Cash' was billed as a bombshell before being exposed as a dud," Clinton spokesman Josh Schwerin told Business Insider. "The media has examined the conspiracy theories in the book and found it to be completely lacking in evidence supporting its outrageous claims."

The book has been generating waves of headlines since April 23, when a series of media outlets published critical investigations based on author Peter Schweizer's work. Schweizer accuses Clinton of doling out State Department favors to people who gave to her family foundation or paid speaking fees to her husband, former President Bill Clinton.

However, Schweizer has admitted he has no "direct evidence" of corruption. The new Clinton video — titled "No Evidence" — doubles down on that point. It features a highlight reel of reporters noting the lack of indisputable proof behind Schweizer's claims.

The video is part of a new Clinton rapid-response effort against the "Clinton Cash" allegations and other, future attacks. Her team released another video blasting the "debunked" book earlier on Monday and vowed to aggressively respond to partisan hits against her candidacy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"While 'Clinton Cash' has already been debunked, we are clear-eyed about the fact that this will not be the last false set of allegations flung our way," wrote John Podesta, the campaign's chairman. "We will stand ready to fight for a better future for everyday Americans and to swat back these unfair attacks from those invested in protecting a status quo that is stacked in favor of those at the top."

Schweizer has not responded to Business Insider's requests for comment on criticism against him, but he has repeatedly defended the seriousness of the allegations in his book. Indeed, he has previously claimed his work presents enough circumstantial evidence to warrant a criminal investigation of Clinton's behavior at the State Department.

"The smoking gun is in the pattern of behavior," Schweizer said in a recent ABC interview. "Here's the analogy I would give you. It's a little bit like insider trading. ... They look at a pattern of stock trades. If the person has access to that information and then they do a series of well-timed trades. That warrants investigation. I think the same thing applies here."

Clinton Cash Author Peter Schweizer Admits He's Wrong On Bogus Clinton "Veto Power" Claim // Media Matters // Eric Hananoki - May 5, 2015

In an interview released on the day of his Clinton Cash book launch, Peter Schweizer admitted he overreached in attacking Hillary Clinton's purported role in approving a Russian uranium deal.

Schweizer is a Republican activist and consultant with a long history of errors and retractions. His latest book, Clinton Cash, is being released today and claims the Clintons helped foreign donors through State Department decisions. The book features over 20 errors, fabrications, and distortions.

During an April 26 appearance on Fox News Sunday promoting the book, Schweizer falsely claimed that then-Secretary of State Clinton "had veto power" to stop the Russian State Atomic Nuclear Agency from purchasing Uranium One. Schweizer has suggested Clinton approved the deal as a favor for Clinton Foundation donors.

Schweizer's "veto" claim is false. As Media Matters and others have noted, the State Department was just one part of a nine-agency review panel that oversees such decisions. And members can only make recommendations to the president, not unilaterally "veto" deals. Furthermore, as TIME reported, there's "no indication of Hillary Clinton's personal involvement in, or even knowledge of, the deliberations." To the contrary, one official involved in the process said Clinton "had nothing to do with the decision in the Uranium One case."

During a May 5 Politico podcast interview, Schweizer admitted that "veto is probably not the best word" and "what I meant by veto power was as we explain the process, you know, if somebody objects it kicks in the special investigation."

Despite his shoddy history and admission of getting a key detail of the uranium decision wrong, Schweizer lashed out at Media Matters for "trying to muddy the water and obscure the facts in a way that's not particularly enlightening."

Schweizer also defended his 1998 book Disney: The Mouse Betrayed. Media Matters noted that the book attacked The Walt Disney Company for what he deemed its "endorsement of the homosexual lifestyle from a company that had traditionally been family-oriented." Schweizer told Politico that "I'm very proud of because one of the results of that book -- the book talked about the fact that Disney did not do criminal background checks. They had a problem with pedophiles. The book came out and Disney afterwards changed their policy. And I was proud of the fact that we highlighted that."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From Politico's podcast interview with Schweizer:

GLENN THRUSH (Politico senior writer): I want to ask you about Media Matters and sort of this, the barrage of attacks that you've gotten from Clinton-aligned groups and the Clinton campaign itself.

SCHWEIZER: Sure.

THRUSH: As somebody who is taking money from groups with a political interest, do you think Media Matters is legitimate to sort of scrutinize you? Do you think anyone has gone over the line in terms of kind of the public statements they've made about the book?

SCHWEIZER: I don't know -- statements about the book, no. I do think there's some particularly strange and bizarre tweets that Paul Begala and others have put out. Kind of reminds me of middle school, frankly. With, you know, the level of commentary. But no, I don't think that --

THRUSH: Any particular one that Begala did?

SCHWEIZER: I'll just leave it at that.

THRUSH: No, come on. Come on, come on.

SCHWEIZER: People can go through --

THRUSH: I'm not letting you off the hook.

SCHWEIZER: Well, I had written a book on Disney back in 1998, which actually I'm very proud of because one of the results of that book -- the book talked about the fact that Disney did not do criminal background checks. They had a problem with pedophiles. The book came out and Disney afterwards changed their policy. And I was proud of the fact that we highlighted that. But, you know, Begala was putting out tweets about, you know, "Well I went to Disney when I was, you know, 13 years old and I'm still straight." You know, it was the most ridiculous, boneheaded stuff and you just have to kind of chuckle at it.

But you know, to get to your point, there's no problem with looking at the work that I've done and the research that I've done and have a vigorous conversation.

THRUSH: And they've come across a couple -- you've had to reel a few things back. Less in the way of outright errors, than in sort of a couple of overstatements like for instance on the Uranium One thing you've said that Hillary had veto power on that -- you've modified that a touch.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SCHWEIZER: Yeah, what I meant by veto power was as we explain the process, you know, if somebody objects it kicks in the special investigation -- but veto is probably not the best word.

But no, I mean, my view is that, you know, what David Brock is doing though is obscuring the facts, not really confronting and dealing with them. I have no problem with somebody saying, you know, we disagree with him on the way that CFIUS is characterized. What they are doing though is, I think, trying to muddy the water and obscure the facts in a way that's not particularly enlightening. And look, at the end of the day, you know, my question would be does David Brock have anything negative to say about Hillary Clinton and I think the answer is no because he is basically an extension of the campaign, so, you know, we have to keep that in mind.

'Clinton Cash' Flashback: The Clintons Pressured Kazakhs To OK Uranium Deal // Daily Caller // Chuck Ross - May 5, 2015

In 2005, then-Sen. Hillary Clinton cancelled meetings with Kazakh officials in an apparent attempt to force the country to approve a lucrative uranium mining deal that would benefit a Clinton associate, a Kazakh energy executive said in a 2009 interview.

Former Kazatoprom executive Mukhtar Dzhakishev's videotaped interview has been reported before — in 2010 by The Washington Post. But it flew under the radar until author Peter Schweizer's revisited it in his new book, "Clinton Cash," which was released Tuesday.

Dzhakishev said that in 2005, Clinton pressured Kazakhstan to approve a deal being sought by UrAsia Energy, a Canadian company whose main investor was mining magnate Frank Giustra.

Giustra is a close associate of Bill Clinton's and a major donor to the Clinton Foundation.

According to Schweizer's translation of Dzhakishev's interview, Kazakh prime minister Karim Massimov "was in America and needed to meet with Hillary Clinton, but this meeting was canceled."

"And they said that those investors connected with the Clintons who were working in Kazakhstan have problems. Until Kazakhstan solved those problems, there would be no meeting, and all manner of measures would be taken."

Dzhakishev said he was then instructed by Massimov to fix the problem. He also said that he was contacted by Tim Phillips, an adviser to Bill Clinton at the time, who told him that there would be no meeting with Hillary Clinton until the Kazakhs removed a major roadblock hindering the deal.

According to a Feb. 2010, Washington Post article, the hold-up centered on a law that the Kazakh government had recently passed concerning deals between private companies for natural resources.

According to The Post's interpretation of Dzhakishev's interview, he said that "investors who currently work in Kazakhstan and have ties to Clinton have problems and meetings will be resumed only after Kazakhstan resolves the problems."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He also said that he got an earful from Phillips.

“I called them, and they came. I met them in Astana and then Clinton’s aide, Tim Phillips, began to scream that this deal involves Democrats and is financed by them, and that we were hampering the deal.”

Phillips did not respond to The Post at the time. Clinton and Giustra have long denied that the Clintons used their power to influence the deal.

But the deal was secured in Sept. 2005 after Giustra and Clinton flew to Kazakhstan on Giustra’s private jet. There, Clinton met with Kazakhstan’s president, Nursultan Nazarbayev. Clinton spoke glowingly in public about the authoritarian Nazarbayev, and days later, the uranium deal was approved.

UrAsia and Giustra profited handsomely, and the company eventually merged with Uranium One. Uranium One, in turn, was packed with Giustra associates and was eventually taken over by Russia-controlled Rosatom. The takeover, which was approved by Hillary Clinton’s State Department and other federal agencies, gave Russia control of 20 percent of uranium produced in the U.S.

In its 2010 article, The Post considers that Dzhakishev’s account is questionable. Dzhakishev was accused of embezzling funds from Kazatoprom and removed from the company in 2009. However, as Schweizer notes, leaked diplomatic cables show that U.S. ambassador Richard Hoaglund believed that Dzhakishev was receiving harsh treatment because he was allied with a political foe of President Nazarbayev.

“In a portion of the video that could cast doubt on his account, Dzhakishev misstated the size of Giustra’s donation, saying it was $300 million, and voiced vague suspicions of a scheme to manipulate world uranium prices,” The Post reported.

But according to Schweizer, who hired Dr. David Meyer to translate Dzhakishev’s interview, the Kazakh said that Giustra made $300 million on the UrAsia transaction.

Regardless, Dzhakishev has proven more truthful than Giustra and Clinton in at least one regard.

Dzhakishev told The New York Times that in Feb. 2007 he met with Clinton and Giustra at Clinton’s Chappaqua, N.Y. home. He said that Giustra arranged the three-hour meeting to discuss Kazakhstan’s desire to purchase a 10 percent stake in Westinghouse, a U.S. company which supplies nuclear energy technology.

According to The Times, both Clinton and Giustra initially denied that such a meeting occurred.

Giustra admitted to The Times after being asked about the discrepancy: “You are correct that I asked the president to meet with the head of Kazatomprom. Mr. Dzhakishev asked me in February 2007 to set up a meeting with former President Clinton to discuss the future of the nuclear energy industry.”

A Clinton spokesman told The Times: “Today, Mr. Giustra told our office that in February 2007, he brought Mr. Dzhakishev from Kazatomprom to meet with President Clinton to discuss the future of nuclear energy.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton Cash author: I like Marco Rubio // Politico // Nick Gass – May 5, 2015

Enough with the doom-and-gloom candidates, says author Peter Schweizer.

Glenn Thrush sits down with Peter Schweizer, the conservative author at the center of the Clinton Foundation firestorm.

There needs to be optimism in the race for the White House, the “Clinton Cash” author told POLITICO’s Glenn Thrush in an hour-long interview ahead of his May 5 book launch, noting that he always liked President Ronald Reagan’s upbeat messaging.

Florida Sen. Marco Rubio would seem to fit the bill this time around, he said.

Schweizer, who makes his home in Tallahassee, is also probing the finances of former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush.

“If your basic position is ‘everything’s going to heck in a handbasket, we can’t do anything about it,’ that’s going to throw a lot of people off. So I do think the optimism will be there,” Schweizer said. “The question is: Is that optimism backed up by real boldness? Because if you aren’t an optimist and you feel like we are struggling or facing challenges, it’s bold change that’s going to be required.”

“You don’t want a grinder as president,” Schweizer said. “You don’t want somebody who’s doom and gloom.”

Regarding the Clintons, Schweizer says he has been talking to congressional investigators about his findings, both in the House and Senate, and broached the possibility of more interactions with Republican staff.

“I think you need to have congressional committees with subpoena power, and I think you need to have somebody with law-enforcement capability in power, either by DOJ or a federal prosecutor somewhere,” he added.

He also revealed details about his process and cast himself as the head of a sprawling Florida-based research team that he described as as an eccentric group of diggers, “Columbo”-type investigators and 30-something computer experts.

“I call them the Island of Misfit Toys, ‘cause we have all these different personalities,” he said. “We’ve got some people who have a background in hacking, they are not computer hackers now, but they can do research on the so-called deep web and find information that has not been sort of charted. It’s actually surprising how much information you can find, not going past a firewall doing anything illegal [but finding information] not catalogued by Google.”

The Clinton book was funded by specific conservative donors, but not the Koch brothers, with whom he has had a long-term collaborative relationship. “We have received funding from the Kochs in the past, not for this project, but on a project-by-project basis,” he told Thrush. “We have other donors that to varying degrees made this project possible.” He went on to talk about his association with New York-based donor Rebekah Mercer.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Schweizer also described his work for Sarah Palin's PAC, saying he was drawn to her hawkish, assertive views on American foreign policy, but that he turned down her offer to go grizzly bear hunting in Alaska.

Schweizer's book, "Clinton Cash: The Untold Story of How and Why Foreign Governments and Businesses Helped Make Bill and Hillary Rich," hits shelves Tuesday.

Will the Benghazi Committee Block Clinton From Testifying About…Benghazi? // Mother Jones // David Corn - May 15, 2015

Could the main obstacle to Hillary Clinton testifying about Benghazi be Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.), the chair of the special House committee set up to investigate the 2012 terrorist attack that killed US Ambassador Chris Stevens and three other Americans?

Clinton and Gowdy have been in a tug-of-war for the past few weeks. At the end of March—following the news that Clinton, the leading Democratic 2016 candidate, had used a private email account when she was secretary of state and that her emails about Benghazi and all other official matters were not originally kept by the State Department—Gowdy asked Clinton to come before the committee for a private interview to discuss the emails she had exchanged concerning Benghazi and Libya. After such a session, Gowdy noted, the panel would schedule a time for her to testify publicly about the event itself.

Last month, Clinton's lawyer, David Kendall, responded and said there was "no reason to delay her appearance or to have her testify [about the emails] in a private interview." It was a clear sign that the Clinton camp would like to get her inevitable appearance before the GOP-created Benghazi committee over and done with. This move came just as Gowdy's committee signaled that it may not release its findings until soon before the 2016 election. Reacting to that news, John Podesta, Clinton's campaign chairman, huffed that the committee's admission "Is the most telling evidence yet that their investigation is solely about playing politics in the 2016 presidential campaign."

Then, on April 23, Gowdy fired back with a letter to Kendall insisting that Clinton submit to either a private "transcribed interview" or a public hearing to discuss her emails and other documents (but not to talk about the actual Benghazi attack). Only if that interview or hearing assured Gowdy that "all documents needed to have a constructive conversation with the Secretary are in the Committee"s possession" would he then hold a hearing with Clinton to examine what happened in Benghazi. That is, no public hearing on the substance of the matter until Clinton testified (privately or publicly) about the emails and convinced Gowdy that the committee now possessed all the related emails and documents.

And that's the rub. Can Clinton, whose official emails were first kept on a private server and then vetted by her own aides before being turned over to the State Department, say under oath that she knows beyond doubt that every single Benghazi email she sent or received now resides within the committee's files? And will Gowdy ever accept an assurance from her that all her Benghazi emails made it to the State Department and were subsequently shared with the committee?

This political dance played out at the end of last week. In an interview with USA Today's Susan Page, Gowdy indicated that he might be willing to accept Clinton's word if she said under other that all her emails have been provided to his committee. "If she were, under some theory, able to say, 'yes, I can promise you under penalty of perjury you have every single document you're entitled to,' that would probably shut off that line of inquiry," Gowdy said. "If she can, then it will be a short conversation."

But Gowdy also left himself plenty of room to be unpersuaded by Clinton. He noted, "If she testified under oath [that all emails and relevant documents were turned over], I think my first question would be, 'Madame Secretary, with all due respect, how do you know that? Because you're not the one who went through the emails; your lawyer did."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It looks as if Gowdy might be setting a trap for Clinton. (At least one conservative pundit sees it this way.) If Clinton cannot say with 100-percent certainty that Gowdy's committee has every digit of her data related to Benghazi, then she cannot testify on what happened—and the committee will drag out the proceedings further into the 2016 campaign season.

Clinton is trying to avoid being so cornered. On Monday, Kendall sent a letter to Gowdy, asserting there was no need for two rounds of testimony. "Respectfully," he wrote, "there is no basis, logic, or precedent for such an unusual request." Clinton, he added, was prepared to come before the committee and stay as long as necessary to answer all queries about the Benghazi attack and her emails. Kendall reminded Gowdy that Clinton has already testified about Benghazi before other House and Senate committees (which, by the way, have found no wrongdoing or conspiracies on her part). In a not-so-veiled jibe at Gowdy, Kendall noted that Clinton "believes that the Members of the Committee are able to decide how much they will focus on the tragic deaths of four Americans in Benghazi, including what can be done to keep those who serve our country safe—and how much they will focus on how she e-mailed."

After all this parrying, the question is, does Gowdy want to have Clinton testify about the what transpired in Benghazi (and Washington) and proceed with the investigation—the House GOPers have already spent more time investigating Benghazi than Congress devoted to the Iran-contra scandal—or does he want to play cat and mouse with Clinton far into the election cycle? By the standard Gowdy cited during his interview with Susan Page, Clinton will not be able to satisfy him about the emails. After all, given how she and her aides handled those records, there is no way for her to provide an iron-clad guarantee. But will Gowdy exploit that to drag out his inquiry and prevent Clinton from an appearance in which she presumably will defend her actions and swat aside the various Benghazi conspiracies (as she has previously done)?

At this stage, Clinton is eager to address the core issues and move on, and Gowdy is focusing on the emails and establishing potential grounds to stop her from testifying publicly about the attack itself. If no deal is sorted out, the committee could end up blocking Clinton from testifying about the main event. That could look odd to some. But any delay—as politically brazen as it might appear—could well inconvenience Clinton more than the committee.

Warren and fellow ‘sheriffs of Wall Street’ waiting for more from Clinton // Boston Globe // Deirdre Fernandes - May 5, 2015

The women dubbed the “New Sheriffs of Wall Street” aren’t prepared to deputize presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton, just yet.

Former top financial regulators Sheila Bair and Mary Schapiro, along with Massachusetts Democratic Senator Elizabeth Warren, said Clinton just hasn’t outlined clearly the financial regulatory policies she would pursue to protect American consumers and the economy.

Bair, the former chair of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., said she fears that Clinton will rely on the same economic team as Obama, which included many veterans of her husband’s President Bill Clinton’s administration.

“I worry about it … . They’re very Wall Street friendly,” said the usually blunt Bair, who headed the FDIC during the financial crisis.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The trio spoke at Harvard University Monday to celebrate the fifth anniversary of their Time magazine cover heralding the women's efforts to police the financial sector.

Schapiro, who headed up the Securities and Exchange Commission, said she'll be watching how forceful Clinton is about protecting investors and the need for greater transparency from companies.

Warren, who has been encouraged to run against Clinton for the Democratic nomination, said most Americans believe the financial sector could use more regulation. Clinton should ensure that the reforms put in place post-financial crisis aren't watered down.

"She has a real opportunity here," Warren said. "The key is we're moving forward, we're not going back."

Lawyer says Hillary willing to testify once to U.S. Benghazi panel // Reuters // Susan Cromwell - May 5, 2015

WASHINGTON - Hillary Clinton is willing to testify once before a special congressional panel investigating the 2012 attack on U.S. diplomatic facilities in Benghazi, Libya, not twice as the panel's chairman has asked, her lawyer said on Monday.

The attack has hounded former Secretary of State Clinton for years, and Republicans in charge of the House of Representatives investigative panel are digging deeper as she ramps up her bid for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination.

South Carolina Republican Trey Gowdy, chairman of the committee, said last month he wanted Clinton to answer questions at two public hearings about Benghazi and her use of a private email server while Secretary of State from 2009 to 2013.

Clinton's lawyer David Kendall said that there was "no basis, logic or precedent for such an unusual request."

In a letter to Gowdy, Kendall said Clinton was fully prepared to stay as long as necessary to answer all questions from the committee whenever she appears, but that she would not testify on two separate occasions "when one will suffice."

Four Americans including U.S. Ambassador Chris Stevens were killed when militants stormed U.S. facilities in the eastern Libyan city of Benghazi on the night of Sept. 11, 2012.

Gowdy's select committee was established last year to investigate the attack, despite numerous other probes by congressional panels and the State Department.

The earlier panels issued findings that generally criticized the State Department for not having adequate security at the U.S. compound in Benghazi, but concluded that the Obama administration's response to the attack was proper.

Republicans say more inquiry is needed because Clinton's State Department failed to protect diplomatic personnel.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democrats say the panel is politically motivated and that Republicans are dragging out proceedings to undercut Clinton's candidacy.

Kendall said Clinton has already testified for more than five hours before other congressional committees on Benghazi.

Kendall's letter was released by the office of Representative Elijah Cummings, the senior Democrat on the Benghazi committee.

A spokesman for Gowdy said the chairman would take Kendall's response into consideration and issue a statement "regarding the path forward."

Hoping to highlight good works, Clintons find controversy instead // WaPo // Philip Rucker, Rosalind S. Helderman and Tom Hamburger - May 5, 2015

Bill and Chelsea Clinton are convening foreign leaders here at a lush golf resort set in a palm grove this week to showcase their foundation's charitable work. But the conference also highlights new controversies engulfing the Clinton family's vast philanthropic enterprises as Hillary Rodham Clinton begins her presidential campaign.

A liberal human rights organization and several Republican lawmakers, for instance, are criticizing the Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation for accepting donations from a Moroccan government-owned mining company, whose seven-figure sponsorship of this week's gathering came amid growing scrutiny of foreign-government donations.

Meanwhile, some blue-chip companies that have long provided large donations to the Clinton Foundation are pulling back or reassessing their support.

An Exxon Mobil spokesman said this week that the company has decided not to be involved in the Clinton Global Initiative this year. The oil company said its decision was unrelated to recent scrutiny of the foundation, but this is the first year it has not been a sponsor since 2009. Other sponsors, including Monsanto, are reevaluating their partnerships.

This week's flashy Morocco conference — a first-ever Africa and Middle East spinoff of the flagship CGI held each September in New York — underscores the foundation's controversial fundraising practices, which have become a potential anchor on Hillary Clinton's nascent campaign.

In an interview with The Washington Post, Chelsea Clinton, the foundation's vice chair, defended its work and suggested that scrutiny was politically motivated.

"My family is no stranger to scrutiny and neither is the foundation," she said. "It has been under intense scrutiny since inception. When you mix together the higher level of scrutiny around the foundation and then the political dimension, I'm not surprised."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Morocco conference offers the latest examples of the Clinton Foundation accepting money from foreign entities. The event is sponsored by an array of global corporations, including the state-owned Office Cherifien des Phosphates, or OCP, which has given between $1 million and $5 million overall to the foundation and whose sponsorship of the Morocco conference was first reported by Politico.

Human rights advocates — including several members of Congress — have criticized the company's mining operations in the Western Sahara territory because they claim that OCP does not have the consent of the indigenous population there.

The Moroccan government has disputed such charges. Nonetheless, U.S. Reps. Joe Pitts (R-Pa.) and Christopher H. Smith (R-N.J.) wrote the Clinton Foundation last month urging it to refuse the Moroccan contribution, citing human rights and fair-trade concerns.

"This donation is an example of a blatant conflict of interest" for the Clintons, Pitts said in a statement. "Morocco would like nothing more than having a possible future First Family condone its illegal exploitation of natural resources."

The Robert F. Kennedy Center for Justice & Human Rights has also expressed concern about the company. "To us what is concerning is that the donation may be . . . an attempt by Morocco to show that they can mine resources in the Western Sahara and can do so publicly and with impunity," said David McKean, program officer with the group.

Craig Minassian, spokesman for the Clinton Foundation, referred questions about the alleged violations to representatives of the company.

Talal Zouaoui, a company spokesman, said contrary to the complaints of activists, the phosphate mining operation is closely connected to the local community. All profits from that mine are reinvested in the plant and the surrounding area, he said.

Other sponsors of the Morocco event mirror the kinds of companies that have backed the Clinton Foundation for years — foreign companies with significant holdings and powerful CEOs. They include two of Morocco's largest financial institutions, the Attijariwafa Bank and the BMCE Group, which is led by Othman Benjelloun, who ranks as Morocco's richest man.

Other money comes from AKWA Group, a Moroccan conglomerate that focuses on oil and gas, and Channel IT, a telecom company founded in Nigeria that has extended its reach to 19 countries in Africa and the Middle East. Channel IT — which hosted a welcome reception for CGI attendees Tuesday in Marrakesh — is led by wealthy entrepreneur Bassim Haidar, a regular at Davos who has signed on with Richard Branson's Virgin Galactic and bills himself "Lebanon's First Astronaut."

With Hillary Clinton running for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination, scrutiny of her family foundation's finances has become politicized. The Clinton campaign is aggressively attacking a new book, "Clinton Cash," released Tuesday by conservative writer Peter Schweizer, which focuses on the nexus between the Clintons' political lives and their philanthropic enterprises.

Over the past week, Bill and Chelsea Clinton toured four African countries with a delegation of billionaires, lobbyists and business executives who have given generously to the Clinton Foundation and now are raising money for Hillary Clinton's campaign, blurring the line between politics and philanthropy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the Post interview, Chelsea Clinton dismissed the suggestion that donors gave to the foundation — and came along on the Africa trip — to curry favor with her parents.

“What people who choose to partner with us, whether it’s in a financial capacity or a programmatic capacity, expect to get is the work that we’ve seen on this trip,” she said during the visit to Kenya. “They expect to make a difference in stopping elephant poaching. They expect to make a difference in expanding secondary education for girls.”

Chelsea Clinton added: “Whenever I have had a conversation with anyone, it’s always about the work. I’ve never had anyone talk to me about my parents in a political capacity for a foundation program.”

Bill Clinton was defensive to the point of seeming testy in an interview with NBC News this week, saying the foundation had never done anything “knowingly inappropriate” when accepting donations from foreign governments, including Saudi Arabia.

For years, companies and wealthy individuals, as well as foreign governments, have clamored to be associated with the high-powered CGI conference in New York or its spinoff events.

But Monsanto, a multinational agricultural company, is weighing whether to pull its sponsorship of CGI. “As with all of our strategic partnerships and collaborations, we continually assess their value to ensure we are investing in opportunities that will have the greatest positive benefits for society,” Monsanto spokesman Tyson Pruitt said.

Spokesmen for two other previous CGI sponsors, Samsung and Deutsche Bank, refused to say whether they would sponsor the conference again this fall.

Minassian said he was not aware of an exodus of sponsors. “We have not seen that,” he said, and he called reports of budget troubles “not accurate.”

Chelsea Clinton said many employees have been confused by the scrutiny.

“When you look at the 2,200 people who work at the Clinton Foundation and the Clinton Health Access Initiative, it would be disingenuous to say it hasn’t affected people,” she said. “But it’s affected people insofar as they don’t understand why the world isn’t more interested in the work that they’re doing.”

Republicans have harshly criticized the foundation for accepting millions in donations from foreign governments while Hillary Clinton was secretary of state. In response, the Clinton Foundation recently announced it would restrict donations from foreign governments except six Western nations.

The foundation also canceled a planned CGI conference this summer in Athens, Greece, which was to focus on economic and social challenges in the Mediterranean region.

Plans continue for CGI America, a domestic-themed conference that Bill and Chelsea Clinton are hosting in Denver from June 8 to 10 that will feature Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack, Housing and Urban Development Secretary Julián Castro and Detroit Mayor Michael Duggan (D).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

After leaving the White House, Bill Clinton founded CGI, intending to create a new model for philanthropy in which he would leverage connections built in policies to play matchmaker between the public, private and nonprofit sectors. At each conference, corporate leaders get to mingle with world leaders, but they also make public commitments to fund targeted charitable programs. Clinton Foundation officials then monitor their progress in fulfilling the pledges.

Some CGI supporters said they are proudly standing by the annual gathering. Richard Brown, the president of the Starkey Foundation, which helps provide hearing aids to those who cannot afford them, including many people in Africa, said: “We have witnessed CGI’s good work throughout the world and have committed our support for 2015.”

Here in Marrakesh, CGI attendees checking in at the Palmeraie Palace, the luxury resort hosting the three-day conference, said they hoped the spotlight would shift to their charitable work,

“I feel that we are above politics,” said Patricia Wyatt, president of Innovation:Africa, a U.S.-based group that tries to bring Israeli technologies, such as solar and drip irrigation systems, to rural African communities.

But other attendees see the Morocco conference as an opportunity to make high-level connections. Faruk Taban, president of the Washington-based Turkic American Alliance, said he flew to Marrakesh to meet African business leaders and persuade them to become active in his group — and said that Bill Clinton’s role as convener “obviously was a big motivation to come.”

“This is a networking event,” Taban said. “We try to establish connections and get the correct leverage to do our activities.”

Bill Clinton says nothing ‘sinister’ in foreign gifts to charity // Bloomberg // Justin Sink - May 4, 2015

WASHINGTON — Former President Bill Clinton said criticism over his family foundation’s donations from foreign governments is politically motivated and there is no evidence to support suggestions that the gifts influenced Hillary Clinton’s behavior as secretary of State.

“I asked Hillary about this and she said, you know, no one has ever tried to influence me by helping you,” the former president said in an interview with NBC News broadcast today. “No one has even suggested they have a shred of evidence to that effect.”

There has been a “deliberate attempt to take the foundation down,” Clinton said. But he doesn’t believe there was “anything sinister in trying to get wealthy people in countries that are seriously involved in development to spend their money wisely in a way that helps poor people and lifts them up.”

Donations to the Clinton Foundation have come under new scrutiny since the former first lady announced her decision to seek the Democratic presidential nomination.

Chelsea Clinton pushes back on scrutiny of family foundation // USA Today // Catalina Camia - May 5, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Chelsea Clinton defended her family's foundation amid questions about donations from foreign governments, essentially agreeing with her father that the Clintons are subjected to a double standard.

"My family is no stranger to scrutiny and neither is the foundation," Clinton told The Washington Post. "It has been under intense scrutiny since inception. When you mix together the higher level of scrutiny around the foundation and then the political dimension, I'm not surprised."

The comments from Clinton, who serves as vice chairwoman of the global philanthropy, follow those that Bill Clinton made in an NBC News interview that aired Monday. The former president also defended the foundation's donation policies and said criticism is "political" and "part of a very concerted effort to bring the foundation down."

The twin interviews come as Hillary Clinton steps up her campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination. Several news stories have raised questions about foreign money donated to the Clinton Foundation while Hillary Clinton was secretary of State.

In her Washington Post interview, conducted while Bill and Chelsea Clinton toured African countries on foundation business, Chelsea Clinton said foundation donors are interested in the charity's good works and not politics.

"Whenever I have had a conversation with anyone, it's always about the work. I've never had anyone talk to me about my parents in a political capacity for a foundation program."

Hillary Clinton's Campaign Declares War Against 'Clinton Cash' // National Journal // Emily Schultheis - May 5, 2015

"Clinton Cash" gets released Tuesday, and Hillary Clinton's campaign is going on the offensive to undercut the book and discredit its author before the message ever reaches readers' hands.

With everything from a YouTube video to emails for supporters to Medium posts to a 42-page opposition research report from a Clinton-aligned group, the Democrat's team is throwing everything is has at Clinton Cash.

The book, by conservative author Peter Schweizer, accuses Clinton of dirty dealings during her time as Secretary of State, alleging that she traded access and influence for foundation donations—including those from foreign donors. The accusations have been a headache for Clinton since before she announced her campaign, spawning headlines in major newspapers and shifting the national conversation about Clinton far, far away from her campaign message.

When the accusations first surfaced, Clinton herself was largely quiet on the topic, dismissing it as an attempt to distract voters from more substantial issues. Since then, they've slowly ramped up their defense efforts: Clinton's campaign issued a lengthy condemnation of a New York Times story regarding a Canadian Clinton Foundation donor getting State Department approval to sell uranium holdings to a Russian company, and her allies launched a fact-check of the Schweizer's allegations when excerpts from the book were floated.

Now, with the book's full release, Clinton's team going all out, suggesting they don't see the accusations as controversies that will burn themselves out, but rather as a fire they need to actively extinguish.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For campaigns, pushing back on unflattering reports is pro-forma, but the team's effort goes above and beyond the standard plan. On Tuesday morning, Clinton's campaign launched what it's calling "The Briefing," a new section of its website paired with videos and posts on other social media platforms, that aims to combat what an email to supporters describes as "whatever far-flung theories [Republicans] can find in order to try and distract from Hillary's record of fighting for everyday Americans."

In the 2.5-minute introductory YouTube video, Clinton press secretary Brian Fallon says the book is "full of sloppy research and attacks pulled out of thin air with no actual evidence." Fallon goes through all the biggest allegations from the book, cutting to footage from various TV networks, all of which point out the lack of direct evidence or a "smoking gun." (The new Clinton website also lists "10 Things You Should Know" about the book, linking to media coverage of various sections of it.)

"The bottom line is this: as secretary of State, Hillary Clinton made decisions based on her commitment to protecting America's national security and standing up for freedom and dignity around the world, not the interests of donors to the Clinton Foundation," Fallon says.

Clinton campaign chairman John Podesta posted to Medium about the new effort, pointing to "Clinton Cash" and the Benghazi proceedings on the Hill as proof that Republicans "seem to only want to distort Hillary Clinton's record."

The new book is getting further pushback from the pro-Clinton group Correct the Record, which served as an unofficial rapid-response operation before her campaign was announced. In a 42-page report, Correct the Record goes line-by-line through the various allegations in Schweizer's book, including questions about the Foundation's involvement in the Russian uranium company purchase, Bill Clinton's dealings in Kazakhstan and questions over Clinton's support for a U.S.-India nuclear deal.

The response is far different from two months ago, when Clinton — who then had not yet launched a full campaign and communications operation — waited eight days to hold a press conference following the revelation that she'd conducted State Department business on a private email server. With "Clinton Cash" in the news these last few weeks, her team has been pushing back pretty consistently, an approach that appears likely to be norm going forward.

A Swing and a Miss // Slate // Jamelle Bouie - May 5, 2015

here’s a certain rhythm to Clinton Cash: The Untold Story of How and Why Foreign Governments and Businesses Helped Make Bill and Hillary Rich, the most recent tome from conservative writer Peter Schweizer. Take his chapter on the Clintons and India—titled “Indian Nukes: How to Win a Medal by Changing Hillary’s Mind”—which makes the case that Hillary switched gears on an India-U.S. nuclear deal after donations from various Indian elites. After detailing the history of the bill, Clinton’s early skepticism, and Bill’s relationship with prominent Indian donors and officials, Schweizer makes a bold claim:

Hillary had not been a supporter of the bill, and her closest aides were all opposed to it. But in September 2008, as the bill’s fate hung in the balance, Amar Singh made a visit to New York to see Hillary. Joining him for a private dinner with the senator was Sant Chatwal. Opposition to the bill had come primarily from Democrats. Hillary had supported the “killer amendment” two years earlier. According to Amar Singh, they had a two-hour dinner. In the days following, he was confident the deal would go through, based on what he heard. Having grown accustomed to the deal making and influence buying ways of the Indian parliament, he was open with the Indian media about what transpired in New York. (Hillary Clinton probably considered herself fortunate that his comments were never reported in American media.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The structure is clear. Schweizer makes several statements of fact—either through quotes or paraphrasing—but doesn't ever build connective tissue between them. Instead, he lets them stand, and lets the reader draw the conclusion that Schweizer outlines in the very beginning: that Bill and Hillary traded influence for cash and donations.

But for as much as he can make the Clintons look bad with lurid examples of iffy transactions—Chatwal, for instance, arranged a $450,000 speaking gig for Bill Clinton—Schweizer never gets around to giving definitive proof of illegal deals or unethical behavior. Take the India affair: Not only does Schweizer lack evidence of a tit-for-tat between Clinton and the Indian donors, but he gets key details wrong. He writes that in 2006 she was a "reluctant and questionable supporter of the bill," but in June of that year—notes Politico—she issued a press release announcing her plan to vote for the legislation. Likewise, contra Schweizer, Clinton voted for two of the three "killer amendments" that put safeguards for nonproliferation on the agreement.

It's this missing evidence that consistently hurts the case for wrongdoing in Clinton Cash. You saw this in the follow-up from outlets like the New York Times on the uranium deal between the United States and a Russian state energy company. Both Schweizer and the New York Times detail donations and associations without showing a causal relationship between the Clintons and any particular deal. And Schweizer, in particular, ignores crucial context. Yes, the Clinton Foundation received donations from the same executives who would benefit from the sale. At the same time, Hillary was just one of a group of officials who reviewed the deal, and she didn't have the power—as Schweizer claims—to "veto" the arrangement. That the federal government approved the deal after the donations doesn't mean the donations had anything to do with the deal. To prove otherwise requires a much more exhaustive look at the details of the deal and of the relationships among all the characters.

Schweizer doesn't just rely on classic logical fallacies. He gets facts wrong as well. In the book's chapter on Haiti—titled "Disaster Capitalism Clinton-Style"—Schweizer notes that Bill was paid $600,000 for speeches by a company trying to secure a mobile phone contract in the country. He then notes that the company, Digicel, began receiving contracts from USAID, and that Bill gave a speech just weeks before Digicel received its first grant.

But, as a Clinton spokesman told BuzzFeed, "neither the former president nor the Clinton Foundation was paid for two of the three speeches Clinton gave in Ireland, and that while the foundation did receive a donation following his Sept. 29, 2010 speech, Clinton himself was not compensated." What's more, the final speech was given a full year before the contract was awarded, and the company itself had a prior relationship with USAID. None of this looks good for the Clintons, and Schweizer might be right about what it means. But he hasn't done the work to show it.

Overall, Clinton Cash is best described as an exercise in question begging, in which you assume your conclusion in the premise of your argument. Schweizer believes that the Clintons are corrupt influence peddlers who have enriched themselves at the expense of America's interests, and he's written a book to justify himself. What hehasn't done is written a book that proves his claims. Instead, all he has is a compendium of bad decisions and gross behavior that a more sober-minded writer could have used to make a real hit on the Clintons. As it stands, they will brush this off like they have most attacks from the right.

Indeed, there's a sense in which Schweizer knows that he hasn't done anything to hurt his intended targets. "I realize how shocking these allegations may appear," he writes at the beginning of the book. "Are these activities illegal? That's not for me to say. I'm not a lawyer."

What you don't know about the "Clinton Cash" author // American Bridge 21st Century // Brad Woodhouse - May 5, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The author of “Clinton Cash,” the latest conservative hatchet job against Hillary Clinton, is a right-wing Republican operative who was an advisor to Sarah Palin and a speechwriter for President George W. Bush. But what you might not know about Peter Schweizer is that he has deep ties to the Koch brothers and the right-wing billionaire bankrolling Sen. Ted Cruz’s nascent campaign. He’s a current contributor to conservative blog Breitbart and is thepresident of the Government Accountability Institute (GAI), a right-wing research group.

“Clinton Cash” has already been repeatedly debunked by reporters given early access to the accusations, which is no surprise given Schweizer’s history as a conservative researcher peddling misleading and false attacks that have discredited his work. American Bridge today released a video of FOX, ABC, NBC, and MSNBC anchors confronting Schweizer during his media blitz with the pesky fact that he doesn’t have any evidence for his theories.

Even Schweizer admits that he found “no direct evidence” of any wrongdoing by Clinton. Schweizer’s publisher, HarperCollins, expressly discloses that the book “does not allege illegal or unethical behavior.” When reading the coverage swirling around “Clinton Cash” or the anti-Clinton book itself, consider Schweizer’s past:

1. Schweizer’s deep ties to Koch brothers

As with just about any dubious attack on Democrats, the Koch brothers are inextricably connected to Schweizer. The Koch brothers might have funneled $1.5 million to Schweizer through donations from Donors Trust, which a former top IRS official has said the Kochs use as an anonymous pass through for their donations.

In return, Schweizer has spoken to several Koch groups. In February 2014, he gave a speech to the Charles Koch Institute. In March 2014,Schweizer spoke to Regent University’s Koch Leadership Program for undergraduates. And according to The Nation, Schweizer spoke to the Kochs’ annual summer conference in June 2014.

2. Billionaire bankrolling Cruz campaign also funds Schweizer

Robert Mercer is a key backer of Cruz’s campaign and is the primary donor behind the network of four Cruz-allied Super PACs that raised $31 million already. He’s also funneled at least $2.5 million to the Koch brothers’ Freedom Partners Action Fund and earned the title "ultimate behind-the-scenes kingmaker" during the 2014 midterm elections.

The Mercer Family Foundation, which is headed by Mercer’s daughter, Rebekah Mercer, donated $1 million to Schweizer’s GAI in 2013 alone. Rebekah Mercer was also on the Board of Directors at GAI. And ever since Bob Mercer funneled $2.5 million to the Koch’s Freedom Partners Action Fund, they’ve been recruiting Rebekah Mercer to join their sprawling political network.

As MSNBC's Rachel Maddow explained, "When you take a closer look at Mr. Schweizer's organization and who is backing him, it is a who's who of big right-wing funders.”

3. Schweizer attacked Clinton in 2008 book

Schweizer wrote a 2008 book called “Makers and Takers” that was filled with personal attacks on Hillary and Bill Clinton, but is trying to sell “Clinton Cash” as “bipartisan citizen action” in the intro to the book.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He said Hillary Clinton had an “impressive record of public whining.” He argued that Clinton’s and other Democrats’ focus on income inequality meant they were obsessed with money and “preoccupied with material things.” He even attacked Clinton’s advice on raising children, saying “liberals who express little interest in having children of their own want control over how other people’s children are raised. As Hillary Clinton told Newsweek, ‘there is no such thing as other people’s children.’”

4. Conservative Foundation funneled $1 million to Schweizer while head was on GAI’s Board

Rebekah Mercer served on the Board of Directors at Schweizer’s GAI as recently as 2013, when the Mercer Family Foundation she runs also donated $1 million to GAI. She’ the daughter of conservative billionaire Bob Mercer, who’s funneled millions to the Koch brothers and Ted Cruz, among other right-wing Republican candidates.

Mercer even threw a cocktail party for Cruz at her New York City apartment the same day he announced his presidential bid. Close friends become even closer.

5. Schweizer’s prior claims have been repeatedly debunked

Schweizer has had at least 10 serious issues where fact-checkers and media outlets have found significant errors questionable sourcing, or have forced retractions of his work. Among them:

“Bears a fatal shortcoming in Journalism 101” -- In 2013, Schweizer falsely claimed that President Obama and then Secretary of Health and Human Services, Kathleen Sebelius, held zero one-on-one meetings. The Washington Post said Schweizer's story “bears a fatal shortcoming in Journalism 101.”

“Bogus” -- In 2012, The Washington Post fact-checker deemed Schweizer's claim that President Obama skipped more than half of his intelligence briefings “bogus.” Furthermore, he said, “we had nearly given this data four pinocchios and in retrospect we were perhaps too generous with three. It turns out, presidents receive intelligence briefings in different formats that Schweizer did not consider. BySchweizer’s standards, President Reagan would have missed 99 percent of his briefings.”

“Partisan Source” -- In 2012, Schweizer was exposed for his inflated allegations that President Obama’s major donors received loan guarantees from the Department of Energy. FactCheck.Org excoritated his data saying, “We find that figure is both inflated and from a partisan source that Crossroads obscures with deceptive attribution.”

“Incorrect” -- In 2011, Schweizer was forced to retract his insider trading charge against Senator Sheldon Whitehouse. The Providence Journal noted “numerous factual problems with Schweizer's allegations, including that Whitehouse wasn't a member of the committee in question at the time.”

“Inaccurate”-- In 2010, USA Today was forced to issue a correction on Schweizer’s op-ed. “Peter Schweizer inaccurately stated that former vice president Al Gore receives royalties from a zinc mine on his property in Tennessee despite his environmental advocacy. He no longer does, as the mine was closed in 2003.”

“The facts don't fit Schweizer's claim” – In 2006, KGO TV in San Francisco investigated Schweizer’s claim against Nancy Pelosi and found “the facts don't fit Schweizer's claim.”

6. Schweizer attacked Disney for supporting gay employees

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Some of Schweizer's most egregious attacks are in his 1998 book, "Disney: The Mouse Betrayed: Greed, Corruption, And Children At Risk." This book is so incendiary that Schweizer has scrubbed it from his website, which claims to list all of his writing under the section, "all books."

He accuses Disney of pushing a homosexual agenda, specifically by giving benefits to their gay employees, being too accepting of gay culture, and making heroines too feminist. Schweizer alleged that there was "collusion" between Disney and the "outrageous" acts of the LGBT community. Wildly, he suggested that Disney gave its gay employees unfair "special treatment" as it was cutting benefits of straight employees.

7. Schweizer co-authored book depicting theoretical U.S. wars

In 1998, Schweizer wrote about the theoretical wars the U.S. would be fighting through the next decade in a book he co-authored, "The Next War." He believed the U.S. would begin wars with both Japan and Mexico, and that Russians would successfully occupy most of Europe. (Map included!)

Clinton, Democratic presidential opponents to debate six times // CNN // Mark Preston - May 5, 2015

Washington (CNN)Democrats will announce Tuesday six presidential primary debates, giving long shots a potential opportunity to share the debate stage with frontrunner Hillary Clinton, CNN has learned.

The Democratic National Committee has plans for debates to occur in the early-contest states of Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire and South Carolina. The two other locations will be decided at a later date.

The DNC will set the criteria for debate inclusion and any candidate who participates in a separate debate outside of the sanctioning process will be barred from future DNC debates, a Democratic official told CNN.

The official said that the DNC decided six debates was a reasonable number and in line with what the national committee sanctioned in 2008. The debate process won't begin until the fall, according to the official, because that is "when voters are truly beginning to pay attention."

The Democratic debates will be sponsored by state Democratic parties, civic groups, and national and local broadcast media. Details including specific dates and broadcast networks for each debate will be announced at a later date, the official said.

Clinton and Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, an independent, are the two only announced candidates for the Democratic presidential nomination. Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee and former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb have all said they are seriously considering running for the Democratic nomination.

Republicans have a much larger and more contested field of candidates. They will sponsor between nine and 12 primary debates beginning in August.

The Democratic presidential debates are great news for Hillary Clinton // Washington Post // Chris Cillizza – May 5, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democratic presidential hopeful and former secretary of state Hillary Clinton speaks with students and faculty of New Hampshire Technical Institute, Concord Community College, on April 21, 2015, in Concord, New Hampshire. T(Photo by Andrew Burton/Getty Images)

Hillary Clinton got some much-needed good news on Tuesday when the Democratic National Committee announced that it would hold six presidential primary debates starting this fall.

What?! you say. How can it be a good thing for Clinton to be in a bunch of debates (okay, six) with candidates who will see these skirmishes as their best (and, really, only) chances of knocking her front-runner block off?

Sure, the debates will give every Bernie Sanders, Jim Webb and Martin O'Malley an equal-ish platform to Clinton that they could never afford -- literally -- otherwise. But, viewed broadly, the debates are likely to do Clinton more good than harm.

Remember that Clinton and her team want to make sure you and everyone else knows that she is not taking this nomination for granted -- despite the fact that the field running against her is not exactly the 1927 Yankees.

What better way to show that she is willing to fight for the every vote than to stand on a debate stage six times with the other candidates? That leveling process is a net good thing for Clinton in a way it wouldn't be for virtually any other candidate. While this would be seen as "punching down" for most well-known candidates, Clinton badly needs to avoid the appearance of a coronation, and a bunch of debates is a very good way to do that.

Then there is the fact that Clintonworld would like some positive media coverage during the primary and some credit for winning it.

Clinton is, if the 2008 campaign is any evidence, a skilled and poised debater who will likely perform well in the six showdowns to come. Her debate performances will then provide a storyline that isn't about her e-mail server, the Clinton Foundation or how much she or her husband were paid to give speeches. Clinton and her top aides abhor process stories, but a series of pieces about her ability and agility on the debate stage would be the sort of process-y story they would welcome with open arms.

Clinton also doesn't want the prevailing sentiment of the coverage, especially among Democratic voters, to be that she beat a bunch of nobodies and proved nothing in the process. An ideal Clinton primary win would be one in which she was challenged just enough to get credit for not just winning but for answering some of her critics in the process but not one so competitive that, well, she wasn't guaranteed victory. A series of debates lends credibility to Clinton's challengers that they might not be able to acquire otherwise.

Then there is the general election consideration. Clinton has not been an active candidate for anything since mid-2008. She is rusty -- as any candidate would be who hasn't run for anything in seven years. Carefully stage-managed conversations with average people in early primary and caucus states is not the same thing as a freewheeling debate when it comes to getting your game legs under you for the general election. Clinton's people might not ever admit it publicly, but she undoubtedly needs practice before the three highly watched and highly meaningful general election debates against the GOP nominee. These warm-up debates will give her just that.

Taken together, the debates are a very good thing for Clinton. They expose her to risk, sure, but the rewards for her campaign are far greater.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton's rope-line antagonist // POLITICO // Hadas Gold - May 5, 2015

In the usual scrum of reporters crowded around Hillary Clinton, sticking microphones, cameras and phones in the Democratic front-runner's face on her campaign trips to early states, one face and voice in particular stands out.

Over and over again she calls out: "Mrs. Clinton!" "Hillary!" "Ma'am!"

It's Andrea Mitchell, host of "Andrea Mitchell Reports" on MSNBC, a top correspondent for NBC News, and a veteran of the Clinton beat who will spearhead the network's Clinton coverage for 2016 — years after driving coverage on big stories like Whitewater, Bill's impeachment, and Hillary's first forays as a candidate.

Mitchell, 68, is back on the trail, acting more like a cub reporter hungry for her first scoop than a star television journalist with her own show or a Washington insider married to former Fed chair Alan Greenspan. She's one of the most senior reporters covering the race, and one of the most outwardly aggressive, calling Clinton out, chasing her down, asking her questions — and occasionally getting a roundabout answer. Some sources suggest she's getting under the Clinton camp's skin, a rope-line irritant constantly shouting after the former secretary of state to answer questions. For Mitchell, it's second nature.

"Sometimes people use the term 'aggressive' pejoratively. It is not anything to apologize for. I love to go after stories. I'm passionate about whatever I'm covering. I'm competitive, and I think nothing could be more important than getting under the surface of a political campaign, especially one this important, this historic," Mitchell said in an interview.

As for constantly asking Clinton questions on the trail, even when she knows the Democratic front-runner is unlikely to answer, she explains: "It's wanting to tell a story that's more thorough and complex than a stage-managed event that the candidate is giving you, whether it's Ronald Reagan, Hillary Clinton or George W. Bush."

Mitchell followed Clinton's campaign stops in Iowa and New Hampshire, and was in Nevada with her this week.

"I think [reporting from the trail] is the only way to really understand the dynamics of a candidate, what she's saying, or he," Mitchell said. "You have to be able to hear the nuance, a change in what she says about trade, a hint that she's expressing a different view on a policy, the way she interacts with voters. I wanted to see it."

One reporter on the trail relayed tales of spotting Mitchell jostling with other journalists waiting outside of an event, and making sure they were sidled up next to her since she was likely to get a question in. Others said she's known to incessantly shout questions at Clinton and is often a figure in campaign pool reports.

"Man, do I admire her," New York Times reporter Amy Chozick said in an email. "Way too often journalists get rich and famous and stop doing the shoe-leather reporting that got them there in the first place, but Andrea is a workhorse yelling questions on the campaign trail with the rest of us."

Hillary Clinton reacts to applause from the crowd before speaking during the sixth annual Women in the World Summit,

Getting Clinton to answer a question has been somewhat of a rare feat since her campaign started several weeks ago. She has yet to sit down to a formal interview since announcing her candidacy and according to National Journal, has only answered seven questions from the media – many of them non-answer answers.

In New Hampshire, Mitchell actually got something of an answer about what Clinton thinks about the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade agreement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Do you have any concerns about the trade deals and whether that will hurt — ” Mitchell asked.

Clinton initially ignored the question, raising her hand toward the press pool as though to pause them and continuing to chat with school officials. But a few moments later she responded, marking the first time she had personally weighed in on a fraught piece of legislation pitting the Elizabeth Warren-led left against President Barack Obama, centrist Democrats, and most Republicans.

“Any trade deal has to produce jobs and raise wages and increase prosperity and protect our security, and we have to do our part in making sure we have the capabilities and the skills to be competitive,” Clinton said. More dodge than answer, it was nonetheless more than anyone else had gotten her to say.

Mitchell, meanwhile, is emerging as an ombudsman of sorts for the Clinton press pack. In Iowa, she spoke to fellow reporters about pushing for more access and information about Clinton’s campaign and schedule and making sure the pools included correspondents.

“We had some private conversations while we were waiting for another one of these very controlled roundtables, because I think they thought that having a photo spray inside a cafe without … identifying who the people were, or where she was going or any chance for questions was going to be satisfactory press coverage,” Mitchell said.

“I think they learned and to their credit they changed it by New Hampshire.”

And Mitchell makes no apologies for her complaints about the Clinton campaign’s clenched-fist media management strategy. By her reckoning, the Hillary Clinton of 2015 has been even less available to the press than during her first run for president, in 2008, and much less accessible than any of the Democratic candidates in previous election cycles.

“To think that a presidential candidate can be driving around a primary or caucus state without anyone knowing where they’re going but have us waiting for hours for a very controlled conversation with pre-selected voters, it’s just inviting media criticism,” Mitchell groused

Mitchell has covered both Clintons for years, dating back to the early 1990s, when she covered former President Bill Clinton’s first run for president. It was actually Mitchell who asked Hillary the question that led to the infamous “tea and cookies” quote.

The question had nothing to do with food.

It was 1992, and Mitchell had staked out a good location at a diner hours before Clinton would be stopping by for a campaign photo-op. Mitchell, by then a seasoned political correspondent, surprised the future first lady with a question about Hillary’s law firm and an obscure Arkansas land deal, later known as “Whitewater.” Clinton responded acidly that she had chosen to pursue her profession instead of staying home in order to have “baked cookies and served teas,” a quote that opened Clinton up to criticism that she didn’t appreciate the everyday American housewife.

“It was an example of how important it is to cover an event yourself, no matter how routine, rather than relying on a producer or other surrogate,” Mitchell wrote in her 2006 book “Talking Back.” “Unfortunately it gave me a reputation for being very aggressive, for getting in people’s faces — not a popular quality with candidates or their aides.”

Mitchell then covered the Clinton White House (where she was deemed the “White House watchdog” and “pit bull" in a USA Today profile), Hillary's 2000 run for Senate, and her 2008 run for president before breaking the news that she would be appointed secretary of state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"That's some history," Mitchell reflected. "I think in many ways that experience makes me more empathetic to how she's reacting to certain situations."

In one memo released by the Clinton library about the press that would be traveling with Hillary to the 1995 World Conference on Women in Beijing, Press Secretary Lisa Caputo outlined which reporters on the trip she thought had given Clinton positive treatment and would be helpful for Clinton to cozy up to, like Terry Hunt, Larry McQuillan, Claire Shipman and Martha Teichner and Ann Compton, whom Caputo deemed a converted "Hillary fan."

Mitchell, Caputo wrote, wasn't a "Hillary fan" but one to contend with: "Andrea Mitchell, NBC – Former White House correspondent. She was replaced by Brian Williams, whom NBC is grooming to take over for Tom Brokaw. Andrea now covers the State Department. She is very aggressive and a very good reporter."

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE

Asking Martin O'Malley To Explain Baltimore // The Atlantic // James Fallows – May 5, 2015

Just ten days ago, President Obama was one of several speakers at the White House Correspondents Dinner to deliver a casual slight to Martin O'Malley's not-yet-official 2016 presidential aspirations, based on the premise that no one had ever heard of him. Obama's joke was that Hillary Clinton had started off her campaign by going unrecognized at a Chipotle—and Martin O'Malley had gone unrecognized at a Martin O'Malley campaign event. Hardee har!

[The unmentioned "meta" aspect of the joke is that most presidential candidates necessarily go through the humiliating "You're running for what???" stage of campaigning, notably including the ultimately nominated-and-elected Jimmy Carter, Bill Clinton, and Barack Obama.]

It's a joke no one would make about O'Malley now. Protests over Freddie Gray's death were spreading in Baltimore even as the black-tie dinner took place 40 miles away in northwest Washington. Martin O'Malley—for eight years a Baltimore city council member, for seven years its mayor, for eight years until this January the governor of Maryland—came back to his city from an overseas trip, walked the streets, received both congratulations and criticism, and generally found himself at the center of the intersecting debates about inequality, opportunity, justice, and accountability that will certainly play a large role in the American politics of the next 18 months and the American realities of the era ahead.

Bernie Sanders' "socialism" may have mainstream appeal // LA Times // David Horsey – May 5, 2015

Finally, conservatives have a real socialist to go crazy about. Instead of concocting dark fairytales about how Barack Obama, a very conventional liberal Democrat, is a secret Marxist who wants to destroy the American way of life, they can shriek about Bernie Sanders, the independent Vermont senator who has never shied away from the socialist label.

Bernie Sanders version of socialism is not all that radical

Sanders is now the first person to challenge Hillary Clinton in the race to win the 2016 Democratic Party presidential nomination. Clinton, though, is not his real adversary, Sanders says. He refuses to make disparaging comments about Clinton and insists he has never run an attack ad in any campaign and will not do so against her. Sanders wants to take on the billionaires, not Hillary.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Nobody gives the 73-year-old Sanders a chance of stopping the Clinton political juggernaut, but some think he could make it veer to the left. If the Vermonter gets traction in debates and primaries with his unabashed progressive positions, Clinton might be forced to match at least some of his rhetoric. Would that be a bad thing for Democrats? Not if enough beleaguered middle class voters get a chance to consider what Sanders' version of "socialism" entails and like what they see.

Let's consider some of Sanders' wild ideas:

Free college tuition. That is something that students can count on in many European countries and once was not uncommon in the United States. In what many consider the most golden era of the Golden State, California's great public university system was tuition-free. In many other states, students paid only a few hundred dollars per year to go to top state colleges. Now, of course, American students are graduating with crushing student loan debts while many others cannot afford to pay in the first place. Sanders' idea seems radical only in that it makes radically good sense.

A $1 trillion program to rebuild the nation's roads and bridges. This would not only create thousands of jobs, it would finally address the country's glaring infrastructure crisis that threatens freight mobility and interstate commerce. This sounds pretty pro-business — in a good way.

Break up giant financial institutions. "If they are too big to fail, they are too big to exist," Sanders says. Unless you enjoyed the economic crash of 2008, this probably sounds like a pretty reasonable idea.

Publicly funded elections. Instead of seeing the spectacle of candidates for president and Congress taking turns begging for money at gatherings of billionaires and corporate lobbyists, public funding for campaigns might encourage politicians to pay attention to those of us who don't have the ability to buy influence in our government. This feels vaguely un-American only because it has been so long since money did not rule American politics.

Higher taxes on the wealthy. Well, obviously, the schemes Sanders wants to enact would not be free. The money has to come from somewhere. The United States is a very rich country and should be able to do things like rebuild bridges, fix highways and insure that the next generation gets an education without being loaded with debt. The problem is that the vast majority of that wealth is held by a tiny few and a huge share of the new dollars coming into the economy are derived from the financial sector. Those financiers are really bad at creating middle class jobs, but they are experts at avoiding taxes. Getting more of the wealth spun from elaborate financial trickery to spend on the common good rather than on more mansions in the Hamptons may be a radical idea, but it's not necessarily a bad idea.

Government-run healthcare. Yup, this one really is socialism. It's what they have in hellish commie wastelands like Germany, Denmark, Japan, Canada and the rest of the industrialized world. It's also what Americans over the age of 64 have. We call it Medicare.

Sanders is never going to be president. Most voters are not ready to approve his full program. Still, he will have done this country a great service if, through his blunt talk and grandfatherly presence, he gets more citizens to stop being distracted by scare stories and political labels and to start considering ideas on their merits. A 40-hour work week, a minimum wage and restrictions on child labor were once thought of as subversive, socialist doctrines, but they have turned out to be pretty good ideas for Americans — except maybe for the billionaires.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Warren met privately with 'Draft Warren' supporters // POLITICO // Annie Karni - May 5, 2015

Elizabeth Warren says she has no intention of jumping into the 2016 race. But she recently met behind closed doors with members of the “Draft Warren” movement who are urging her to run for president.

The Massachusetts senator held a private April 22 meeting with a small group of progressive leaders from across the country – including some vocal “Draft Warren” supporters who continue to hold out hope that she’ll enter the presidential race.

In an hour-long meeting with her staff and a 30-minute meeting with Warren, the group of about a half-dozen top progressive activists — including three who were active in the Draft Warren movement — did not discuss the draft campaign. Instead, the conversation focused on issues of social and racial justice. They highlighted specific issues the senator can use to influence the presidential debate in 2016 and, they hope, push Hillary Clinton to the left on issues including police brutality, immigration reform, the privatization of prisons, and reducing naturalization fees to promote naturalization, among other issues.

The meeting’s purpose was to see “how Elizabeth Warren, with her platform, could work with us to move a progressive vision for the country and really engage with communities of color,” said Jonathan Westin, director of New York Communities for Change, who attended. “That goes hand in hand with what she’s already doing. The language she is speaking is part and parcel of what we believe is wrong with this country.”

An aide to Warren maintained that the senator did not know the group she was meeting with had any connection to the “Draft Warren” campaign until POLITICO informed her office. “The point of the meeting was to discuss economic and social justice issues,” the aide said. “As Senator Warren has said many times, she does not support the draft group’s efforts and is not running for President.”

But Westin is a vocal supporter of the “Draft Warren” campaign who, as a co-chair of New York’s Working Families Party, voted for the political party to join the Draft Warren coalition last February. Just weeks before the sit-down with Warren, he wrote a blog post for MoveOn.org calling for her to run for president. His co-author on the piece, Katelyn Johnson, executive director of Chicago’s Action Now Institute, also attended the sit-down with Warren.

“Elizabeth Warren is not the only candidate who could ensure a robust presidential primary, but she is the best,” they wrote. “[Warren] is the one who can truly give Clinton a run for the money and yes, even has a shot to win the nomination. We urge Warren to acknowledge the importance of this political moment and enter the race.”

At the meeting with Warren, they were also joined by Daniel Altschuler, managing director of the Make The Road Action Fund, which is also on the advisory council of the Working Families Party and supports the “Draft Warren” movement. But no effort was made during the meeting to urge the senator to enter the race.

“This was about someone who we want to be sharing the issues that are affecting communities of color and working class communities to make her the strongest possible champion on those issues,” Altschuler said. “The senator has been a tremendous champion on issues of the financial system run amok and income inequality. We think that a lot of the issues affecting our communities are tied to those big financial systems, we wanted to share some of the issues we’re working on.”

Attendees said they did not discuss their presidential aspirations for Warren, but some in the group – which included Shabnam Bashiri from Rise Up Georgia; Bill Bartlett from Action United, a Pennsylvania group; and

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Brian Kettenring, co-executive director of the Center for Popular Democracy – privately pointed out that November 2016 is a long time away and insisted there is still plenty of time for her to get in if she decides to do so.

If Warren wanted the group to stand down, the meeting with some of its diehard supporters did little to advance that goal.

"I would still love to see her run for president," said Westin, speaking after the meeting. "Connecting with the grassroots groups is a very big piece of how we continue to amplify her message. People are getting away with murder — literally and figuratively, on Wall Street."

The "Run Warren Run" campaign was launched in December 2014, by Democracy for America and MoveOn and coordinates with Ready for Warren, another group urging the senator to run. In a letter to the FEC from her attorney last August regarding the Ready for Warren PAC, Warren said she "does not, explicitly or implicitly, authorize, endorse, or otherwise approve of the organization's formation or activities."

But the shared position of many who met with her last month is that Clinton needs a serious primary challenger.

"The Democratic party needs a contested primary," said Jennifer Epps-Addison, director of Wisconsin Jobs Now, who was also in the Warren meeting. "Black folks in our communities have been systematically attacked. It's not simply about police brutality. Our goal in talking to Warren was to make those connections the same way we did during the civil rights movement." She said her goal was to get Warren "to be talking about racial justice as part of her progressive message."

While she is not part of the "Draft Warren" movement, Epps-Addison added, "We feel that many Democrats are not speaking truthfully to the values that many of the base and voters are concerned about, including black folks."

In the absence of a competitive Democratic primary, however, some progressives are hoping they can at least push Warren to be the party's agenda-setter.

"For Sen. Warren, you're seeing her evolve from a very effective advocate on a set of issues into more of a movement leader and a party leadership role," said Kettenring. "We're all evolving and she is, too. That's part of the dynamic at work here. Some of the people I know who were in the Draft Warren movement are people we work with and know, because they're part of the broader progressive ecosystem. I'd say more of us are stepping up to define the terms of the debate."

Elizabeth Warren: Trade bill could "tear down" Wall Street oversight // POLITICO // Zachary Warmbrodt - May 5, 2015

Sen. Elizabeth Warren said the next big threat to keeping Wall Street risk-taking in check is an upcoming fast-track trade bill — a top priority for President Barack Obama that has attracted liberal opposition.

The Massachusetts Democrat said late Tuesday that giving the president greater leeway to negotiate trade deals for years to come is a dangerous proposition because of the chance that a Republican who wants to roll back Dodd-Frank, like Sen. Ted Cruz, could win the White House in 2016.

"I very much hope that a Democrat wins the White House in 2016 and again in 2020. But what happens if we have a Republican president in 2016 or 2020? Ted Cruz has already said flatly, 'We need to repeal Dodd-

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Frank,'" Warren said in a speech prepared for a Washington dinner hosted by the Institute for New Economic Thinking. "Republicans have been itching to tear down Dodd-Frank from the moment it passed."

Warren launched her latest salvo against the administration's trade policy as Obama attempts to convince Congress, in particular fellow Democrats, to approve the trade bill to help him wrap up agreements he is negotiating with countries in the Asia-Pacific region and Europe.

Warren's attempt to link the fast-track bill with Wall Street oversight, specifically Democrats' signature 2010 Dodd-Frank law that sought to strengthen banking regulation after the 2008 crisis, will put some of her more trade-friendly colleagues in an awkward spot.

"Let me put this as simply as I can: After fighting hard to protect Dodd-Frank for years, Democrats in the next few weeks could give Republicans the very tool they need to dismantle Dodd-Frank," Warren said. "Anyone who supports Dodd-Frank and who believes we need strong rules to prevent the next financial crisis should be very worried."

Wall Street banks have kept a close eye on recent trade negotiations, particularly the Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership with Europe, and have pushed for financial regulation to be part of the talks. Last month, the Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce said in a joint statement that it is "vital" that the European trade agreement cover financial regulation.

Big banks on both sides of the Atlantic are gearing up to use the agreement to "water down" regulations, Warren said.

"A six-year fast track bill is the missing link they need to make that happen," she said.

Democrats Take Fire for Exclusivity Clause in Official Debates // TIME // Zeke J Miller – May 5, 2015

Democratic presidential hopeful and former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton speaks during the David N. Dinkins Leadership and Public Policy Forum at Columbia University on April 29, 2015 in New York City.

Kevin Hagen—Getty Images Democratic presidential hopeful and former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton speaks during the David N. Dinkins Leadership and Public Policy Forum at Columbia University on April 29, 2015 in New York City.

The Democratic National Committee is coming under fire for its takeover of the presidential primary debate process.

Just minutes after announcing that it will only sanction six contests and that candidates who appear in any debate outside of those six will be barred from attending a sanctioned debate, Lis Smith, a spokeswoman for likely Democratic contender former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley criticized the small number of debates and the exclusivity requirement.

"If Governor O'Malley decides to run, we will expect a full, robust, and inclusive set of debates — both nationally and in early primary and caucus states," she said in a statement to reporters. "This has been customary in previous primary seasons. In a year as critical as 2016, exclusivity does no one any favors."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The DNC said the six debate number was the jumping off point in 2004 and 2008 but it was quickly overridden by candidates and news outlets wanting more. In 2008, Democrats faced off more than 20 times before President Obama won the nomination.

"The precedent that was set was six, but there was no mechanism controlling that," said DNC Communications Director Mo Elleithee. "We've always said that we'd like to come up with a number and stick with it."

"Every now and then Republicans have ideas that aren't so terrible, and this was one of them," he added of the exclusivity clause.

But an aide to one Democratic 2016 aspirant said they were taken aback by the exclusivity clause. "In the discussions that the DNC had with potential 2016 candidates, they explicitly said there would be no exclusivity clause and it was a shock to see that they included one in their press release today," the aide said. "It was all an elaborate game where everything was worked out in advance with the Clinton people," the aide alleged.

Elleithee declined to detail the nature of internal conversations the DNC conducted with candidates and campaigns, including whether the exclusivity clause was a late addition to the parameters.

"I have been involved in debate negotiations for various campaigns for nearly 20 years and they are almost always have some people who want more and some people who want fewer," Elleithee said.

Appearing on stage with Clinton would be a significant credibility boost to the likely Democratic field, which includes lesser-known figures like O'Malley, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, and former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb. Clinton aides understandably want to limit her opposition's potential for a breakout moment on stage, while protecting a candidate who who occasionally struggled during the 2008 primary debates. Minutes after the DNC announced its debate plans, Clinton tweeted her support.

Elleithee added that campaigns were given a heads up about the press release Tuesday morning before it was sent out. But a spokesman for likely presidential aspirant Jim Webb said the former senator's team had not discussed the debates "internally or externally."

–Additional reporting by Sam Frizell

GOP

Huckabee Joins Race With Tacit Contrast to Clintons // Real Clear Politics // Rebecca Berg - May 5, 2015

HOPE, Ark. — Mike Huckabee used his metaphor-rich hometown on Tuesday as a backdrop to launch his second bid for president — the setting drawing contrasts at once with former President Bill Clinton, who also hails from Hope, and President Obama, who ran for office on a platform of "hope" and "change"

"We were promised hope, but it was just talk," said Huckabee, a former Republican governor of Arkansas. "Now we need the kind of change that really can bring America from Hope to higher ground."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a community college auditorium, Huckabee recalled his upbringing in the town that's now home to roughly 10,000 people, where he said he "was raised to believe that where a person started didn't mean that's where he had to stop," and where he ran in his first race, for student council in junior high school.

"So it seems fitting that it would be here that I announce I am a candidate for president," Huckabee said to cheers from an enthusiastic, conservative crowd of roughly 2,500, including those in overflow areas. At intervals, supporters chanted, "We like Mike" and waved signs supplied by the campaign.

Huckabee, who proved a surprisingly strong candidate when he ran for president in 2008, still commands a substantial following among religious and social conservatives, having since then cultivated a national audience with a weekly show on Fox News and as a prolific author.

But Huckabee has expressed frustration at the idea that he only appealed in 2008 to evangelical voters — a "misconception," he told reporters in Washington last month. On Tuesday, he began in earnest to flirt with working-class voters, using his personal story to shape a narrative of social and economic mobility.

"I grew up blue collar, not blue blood," Huckabee said.

Huckabee's strategy has changed in other ways, too. Whereas he announced his previous bid for president during an interview on NBC's "Meet the Press," his campaign launch on Tuesday was decidedly less low-key, mimicking the flow of a party convention with multiple introductory speakers, including wife Janet Huckabee, and campaign videos. The program kicked off with a musical performance by the candidate's friend Tony Orlando, the '70s singer of "Tie a Yellow Ribbon Round the Ole Oak Tree" fame.

Still, Huckabee is no frontrunner. He starts the race in sixth place among Republicans, the RealClearPolitics national polling average shows. Huckabee on Tuesday took pains to acknowledge, and even embrace, his standing as an underdog.

"I never have been and never will be the favorite candidate of the Washington-to-Wall Street corridor of power," he said. He added, striking an implicit contrast to the Bill and Hillary Clinton, that he does not have a "global foundation" to advance his name or offer financial security.

Huckabee scarcely needed to allude to the Clintons — and not once did he explicitly invoke Hillary Clinton, the likely Democratic nominee — because the setting so obviously called the power couple to mind.

"I still believe in a place called Hope," Bill Clinton famously said as he accepted the Democratic nomination for president in 1992. Today, the town is something of a shrine to its most famous son.

Huckabee's own political arc has been inextricably linked to the Clintons. An introduction video Tuesday noted that he took office in "Bill Clinton's Arkansas," when Democrats controlled both chambers of the state legislature.

Today, both sons of Hope have cut their immediate ties to the Natural State. The Clintons reside in New York;

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Huckabee's primary residence is a beachfront home in Florida.

Still, the hometown crowd came out strong for Huckabee on Tuesday, including Arkansas Gov. Asa Hutchinson, a Republican who led the state party in the 1990s when Huckabee first won statewide office as lieutenant governor.

Huckabee "led our state with conviction. He led our state with conservative values," Hutchinson said in his remarks. "That is the type of leadership that we need on the national stage."

The surest early sign that Huckabee would run for president came in January, when he abruptly quit his Fox News show — a move that he and aides insisted he would not have made if he weren't serious about waging another campaign.

Since then, he has gradually laid the groundwork for a bid: publishing a new memoir, traveling to key presidential primary states and, last month, quietly forming an exploratory committee.

Huckabee will hope to build on his success in 2008, when he defeated Mitt Romney to win the Iowa caucuses.

"I have no presumptions that I'm a lock to win [Iowa] or that I go into it with this unbreakable position in favor," Huckabee said last month. "But we have a good structure, a good organization, good contacts, a good network there, a good message there. And I do know how to win Iowa."

Early polling shows him in a competitive position in some of the pivotal states. The RCP average shows Huckabee in fourth among Republicans in Iowa and in South Carolina, with a solid 9 percent in each key primary state.

Huckabee's campaign team is also hopeful that he will perform well in the so-called "SEC primary" of Southern states on March 1, which will include Arkansas.

Huckabee, allies aim to raise $60 million // CNN // Sara Murray - May 5, 2015

Hope, Arkansas (CNN)Mike Huckabee is eyeing a more favorable calendar and stronger fundraising chops as the firewalls that will prevent his presidential bid from fizzling out early.

After winning the GOP caucuses in Iowa in 2008 and hosting a Fox News television show for years, Huckabee has become a nationally recognized figure. Now the pressure is on for the Republican presidential candidate to prove he can raise money and notch top tier finishes in the early nominating contests.

Huckabee's advisers acknowledged he will need a strong finish in Iowa, where Huckabee plans to spend much of this week campaigning. Then the race moves on to New Hampshire, which is less friendly territory for Huckabee and will largely be a fight among moderate Republicans such as New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and Ohio Gov. John Kasich.

On Friday, Huckabee is scheduled to deliver an economic address in South Carolina, another state that where

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Huckabee could be competitive. But the field there is muddled by Sen. Lindsey Graham, who is weighing a potential presidential run. Meanwhile, Florida's two favorite sons -- former Gov. Jeb Bush and Sen. Marco Rubio -- will face off over the Sunshine State.

But Huckabee sees an opportunity in a handful of Southern states that are looking to move their contests up to March 1. If the so-called "SEC primary" pans out, it could include a handful of states that Huckabee won in 2008.

"The key is what kind of resources do you have beyond Iowa," said Bob Vander Plaats, chief executive of the social conservative organization The Family Leader in Iowa. After years in the public eye as a former presidential candidate and Fox News personality, "I don't think he can come in with $500,000 and say, 'I'm a real candidate,'" Vander Plaats added.

Huckabee raised about $16 million in 2008, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, before dropping out of the race in March. This time around Huckabee expects to raise about $60 million between his campaign and his super PAC in the early stages of his campaign, an adviser said.

A spokesman for Huckabee declined to name the donors who have pledged to support Huckabee, but there are signs the team isn't bluffing about their improved fundraising prowess. Ronnie Cameron, the chief executive of an Arkansas-based poultry producer who has given millions to conservatives, said he would back Huckabee.

Huckabee used his announcement speech Tuesday to make a plea for some cash, too, saying he won't be relying on billionaires to back his campaign.

"I will be funded and fueled not by the billionaires, but by working people across America," Huckabee said. But, "if you want to give a million dollars, please do it."

That remark is already garnering negative press because, while outside groups can accept unlimited donations, the most a presidential candidate can accept from an individual is $5,400. Now that Huckabee is officially a candidate, he and his super PAC are no longer allowed to coordinate.

Mike Huckabee and the Continuing Influence of Evangelicals // NYT- The Upshot // Nate Cohn – May 5,2015

The religious right remains the largest voting bloc in the Republican Party, and that gives Mike Huckabee, the former Arkansas governor, the potential to play a big role in the presidential nominating contest.

But Mr. Huckabee, who was set to announce his presidential bid Tuesday morning, will have a harder time winning Iowa than he did in 2008, when religious conservatives had serious reservations about the two main candidates, John McCain and Mitt Romney.

This year’s conservative favorites do not have Mr. Romney’s vulnerabilities among evangelicals, like Mormonism or past support for abortion rights. Some candidates might be outright good fits, like Scott Walker, an evangelical Christian and the son of a pastor.

Mr. Huckabee, a Southern Baptist minister who won the Iowa caucuses and five state primaries in 2008, has retained at least some of his support among evangelical Christians, averaging around 8 percent in the polls — as much as fresh-faced candidates like Ted Cruz or Rand Paul.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Credit Illustration by Matt Dorfman and photo by Yana Paskova for The New York Times

The similarity of Mr. Huckabee to Mr. Cruz or Mr. Paul extends far beyond their polling numbers. Each has championed the cause of one of the party's large and distinctive factions — the religious right, the Tea Party and libertarians. In doing so, all three became the favorite of a large bloc of voters — and all but unacceptable to the rest of the party.

Mr. Huckabee has received less news media attention than Mr. Cruz or Mr. Paul, but he has an equal chance to play a big role in the race. White evangelical Christians are about 40 percent of Republican primary voters, representing a majority of the vote in many of the party's caucuses and in the Southern primaries. That gives an evangelical favorite an easy road to winning many contests.

Most important, evangelicals also represent nearly 60 percent of Iowa caucus goers, which allowed cultural conservatives like Rick Santorum (in 2012) and Mr. Huckabee (in 2008) to carry the state.

So a conservative candidate who hopes to win Iowa, like Senator Cruz or Governor Walker, needs to capture a significant slice of the evangelical vote. Mr. Romney's failed bid in 2008 is a cautionary tale. He sought to become the main conservative candidate in the race, but ultimately failed to take Iowa because he could not get the support of evangelical Christians.

Mr. Huckabee still has the potential to be a spoiler again. He could deny another conservative a large enough share of evangelical voters. He could even win himself. Mr. Huckabee remains a compelling retail politician with strong ratings. He led an NBC/Marist survey of Iowa as recently as two months ago. He has won Iowa before, after all.

Of course, Mr. Huckabee did not go on to win the nomination in 2008. And he is unlikely to do so this time. He was pummeled outside the South.

Money and organization were part of Mr. Huckabee's challenge in 2008 in populous, expensive states like Illinois, Florida and California. My Upshot colleague Derek Willis found that just 7 percent of the top 250 Republican donors had contributed to one of Mr. Huckabee's campaigns, a paltry figure that reflects the secular inclinations of top Republican donors.

Continue reading the main story

But the limits of Mr. Huckabee's appeal were ultimately about his message and record. Fiscal conservatives were very skeptical of Mr. Huckabee, who raised taxes and increased spending as a governor.

Pat Toomey, the former head of the Club for Growth and a current senator from Pennsylvania, said, "Mike Huckabee is no conservative."

Last month, Mr. Huckabee attacked conservative plans to reduce entitlement spending and said he wouldn't vote for the Paul Ryan budget plan. The Club for Growth has already indicated its intention to oppose his bid again.

Mr. Huckabee has not done much to broaden his appeal over the last eight years. He has, if anything, more fully embraced his populist brand of religious conservatism.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He gave a recent interview with an Iowa talk-radio host in which he said the military, under President Obama's leadership, "punishes" Christians and Orthodox Jews. He added that parents might want to ponder waiting until a new president is in charge before supporting their children to enlist.

It was the kind of talk that could continue to make him a favorite of an influential wing of the party — someone who can lead polls and even win states, but who is opposed by much of the rest of the party and is therefore highly unlikely to win the nomination.

Correction: May 5, 2015

Because of an editing error, an earlier version of this article misstated how Mitt Romney lost the 2008 Iowa caucuses. He was defeated by Mike Huckabee. He did not lose a narrow decision to Rick Santorum (that was in 2012).

The populist 1 percenter // Politico // James Hohmann – May 5, 2015

LITTLE ROCK, Arkansas—Mike Huckabee was not a millionaire when he ran for president in 2008, and liked to let people know it during his underdog campaign against wealthy rivals like John McCain and Mitt Romney.

"I may not be the expert that some people are on foreign policy, but I did stay at a Holiday Inn Express last night," he quipped.

Now, after hosting his own Fox News show and a syndicated radio program, while authoring several books, the former governor is solidly – and, some would say, ostentatiously — a part of the one percent.

There's the 10,900-square-foot beachfront mansion he built on Florida's Panhandle, worth more than $3 million. There are regular trips on private jets, often to elite events at which he has given countless paid speeches.

On Tuesday, as he formally kicked off his second campaign for the presidency, Huckabee knows he must reassure his former supporters that he has not changed even as his pockets grew much, much deeper. His announcement, in the small town of Hope where he grew up poor, reflects a broader effort by his campaign to show that he's still folksy and down-to-earth.

"I think I'm the same person that I was," the 59-year-old told POLITICO during an interview ahead of his announcement. "I haven't, to my knowledge, changed a single belief or conviction. I believe everything I believed in 2008."

Last time, he won the Iowa caucuses and carried seven other states with a populist message that the little guy was getting trampled by the special interests.

"Where my strength really came from was blue-collar working class people," Huckabee recalled. "They didn't have money but they had energy. They felt like no one else was there to speak for them or even knew who they were. I think they believed, and I think they still believe, that not only have I come from them – that's who I am – but that I've never lost touch with what it's like to be out there working harder and getting nowhere."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

More than anyone else in the 2016 field, including Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul, the former Southern Baptist minister decries the influence of “corporatists” and “globalists” over the GOP. Still, hints of his fabulous new life bleed into his rhetoric. He raised eyebrows during a speech in New Hampshire two weeks ago, for instance, when he recalled a recent conversation with a Russian limo driver.

“A couple of weeks ago I was in Los Angeles, and I was going to be on The Bill Maher Show,” he told hundreds of activists at the climax of a half-hour speech. “The driver comes and picks me up at the hotel and is taking me to the studio.”

In short, the driver fled the Soviet Union in 1988 with his infant daughter and they’re now living the American Dream: the dad owns the car service company, and his daughter became a nurse. “I said, ‘Dmitri, you make more sense and talk better than 90 percent of the people we’ve elected to Congress,’” Huckabee told the crowd. “He said, ‘Well I don’t think I’ll ever have that platform.’ I told him, ‘Dmitri, you may not. Maybe you don’t want it. But I hope I can tell your story!’”

Huckabee still tells his own up-from-the-bootstraps story, but it’s not quite the same as in 2008 – when he’d only been out of the governorship for a year and had a small bank account.

During that campaign, in the days before the crucial Wisconsin primary, Huckabee was so strapped for cash that he went off the trail to deliver a paid speech in the Cayman Islands. “You’ve got to work for a living and pay your bills,” he said at the time. He attacked Romney that year for looking like “the guy who laid you off.” He held events at Pizza Ranches because it was free to rent space at the chain restaurant.

In the years since, Huckabee has aggressively filled his coffers.

A POLITICO report last July highlighted his penchant for using private jets. He’s racked up more than a quarter-million dollars in private air travel bills over the past few years and has routinely insisted that candidates or local parties that he’s coming to support pay the expense.

The New York Times recently spotlighted dubious groups Huckabee has rented his campaign email list out to – from survivalists warning of coming food shortages to a group that says there’s a miracle cure for cancer hidden in the Bible (which people can find out about with a $72 subscription to their product). Huckabee recorded an infomercial for a sketchy diabetes treatment that scientists say is bunk.

He enters the 2016 race with high expectations. Because he won Iowa last time, many pundits say the caucuses will be do-or-die for him this time. Not surprisingly, his first appearances after the Arkansas announcement are there.

“A second or third place finish does not move him forward,” said Ed Rollins, the national chairman of Huckabee’s 2008 campaign, who has not endorsed him for 2016.

A broader — and probably more important — question is whether a retread can stand out in a crowded field with fresher faces. Even his rollout has been partly overshadowed by dark horse upstarts like former Hewlett Packard CEO Carly Fiorina and retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson, both of whom announced on Monday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Leading social conservatives in Iowa say that Huckabee retains a big reservoir of goodwill, but that he cannot count on retaining his supporters from 2008. Many broke for Rick Santorum in 2012, who will run again. And this time, candidates like Texas Sen. Ted Cruz and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker have already been making an aggressive play for his base of support. Florida Sen. Marco Rubio is traveling the early states making the case that the party needs to nominate a young, fresh face to contrast with Hillary Clinton. Huckabee notes that he was battling the Clintons for decades in Arkansas before anyone else even heard of them.

Huckabee has acknowledged he probably needs to win Iowa again and should perform stronger in New Hampshire than last time. South Carolina, the first state in the South with a primary, could give him a boost if he gets momentum and enough money from the first contests.

That makes March 1 central to his strategy. A handful of Southern states Huckabee won in 2008, including Arkansas, have coordinated to schedule an “SEC primary” that day.

Ironically, though he’s now rich himself, it’s an open question whether Huckabee will be able to raise enough money to stay in the race through the SEC primary and beyond. He’ll get a lot of small-dollar gifts, but he has yet to demonstrate the ability to put together a high-dollar finance operation. “That’s not been solved, to the best of my knowledge,” said Rollins.

Iowa GOP operative Nick Ryan, who ran the pro-Rick Santorum super PAC in 2012, will run the pro-Huckabee super PAC this time. A handful of big donors from the evangelical community could sustain the governor if they chose to do so in this post-Citizens United world, another change since he ran last time.

One thing money cannot easily buy is the name recognition that Huckabee already has from his first run. He undeniably enters the race as a well-defined figure, and especially in the case of Iowa Republicans, remains well-liked, according to polls.

Huckabee says he has not changed, but he knows campaigns have. He recognizes that he’s likely to be outspent but seems to have satisfied himself that he can raise enough money to be viable. He made clear that his campaign will more aggressively push back on attacks using social media and other platforms.

“People asked me how to spell my name eight years ago,” Huckabee said. “They didn’t know what state I had been governor of or for how long. I’ve had a rather significant national platform … It’s not like I’ve been in hibernation for eight years. I’ve been more visible than when I was a candidate or an office holder.”

Huckabee has mellowed a bit. His fifth grandchild is on the way. He says he learned a lot of lessons from the last campaign about “pace and rhythm” to inform how he’d approach another one.

“You learn not to be overly alarmed at a single poll at any particular point, particularly early,” he said. “You learn not to be overly excitable about the flow of things because it changes so often and rapidly.”

Huckabee’s inner circle is packed with loyalists from his 2008 campaign. His daughter, GOP operative Sarah Huckabee Sanders, will manage the 2016 campaign.

The governor stressed that he doesn’t want to hire anyone just because they want to work on a presidential campaign. He needs them to believe in the cause.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“You can’t win like that,” he said. “You’re better to have a very loyal group of people that are really with you that may be smaller in number than it is to have a huge crowd of people that you’re paying but who would leave you tomorrow if somebody came along.”

If Huckabee gets traction, his record will get scrutinized. While still well-regarded by Republicans in Arkansas, there are elements that could be used to sow doubts on the right. Two years ago, he reportedly said the Common Core standards were “near and dear to my heart.” Now he decries them. In 2000, Huckabee commuted the sentence of Maurice Clemmons, who was serving time for burglary charges. In 2009, the convict killed four police officers in Washington State.

